RIAL, from the Span real, i. e. royal money, because it is stamped with the king's effigies. In England, a rial was a piece of gold coin, current for 10*s.* in the reign of King Henry VI., at which time there were half rials passing for 5*s.* and quarter rials, or rial farthings, going for 2*s.* 6*d.* In the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, golden rials were coined at 15*s.* a-piece; and 3 Jac. 1. there were rose rials of gold at 30*s.*, spur rials at 15*s.* Lowndes' Essay on Coins, p. 38.

RIBAUD, Fr. ribauld, ribaldus.] A rogue, vagrant, whoremonger, or person given to all manner of wickedness: anno 50 Edw. 3, there was a petition in parliament against ribauds and sturdy beggars.

RIDER-ROLL. A schedule, or small piece of parchment, often added to some part of a roll, record, or act of parliament.

RIDGE-WASHED KERSEY. Kersey cloth made of fleece wool, washed only on the sheep's back. See 35 Eliz. c. 10.

RIDING ARMED. See Armour, and Arms.

RIDING-CLERK. One of the six clerks in Chancery, who in his turn, for one year, keeps the controlment-books of all grants that pass the great seal. Blount.

RIDINGS, corrupted from trithings.] Are the names of the parts or divisions of Yorkshire, which are three, viz. East-Riding, West-Riding, and North-Riding, mentioned in 22 Hen. 8, c. 5. And, in indictments for offences in that county, the town and the riding must be expressed, &c. West Symb. p. 2. See 1 Comm. 116; and tit. Rape, Registry of Deeds.

RIENS ARREAR. A plea used in an action of debt for arrearages of account, whereby the defendant alleges that there is nothing in arrear. Book Entr. See Account, Issue, Pleading.

RIENS PASSE PER LE FAIT, nothing passes by the deed. The form of an exception taken in some cases to an action on a deed. Broke. See Pleading.

RIENS PER DESCENT, nothing by descent. The plea of an heir, where he is sued for his ancestor's debts, and hath no land from him by descent, or assets in his hands. 3 Cro. 151. In an action of debt against the heir, who pleads riens per descent, judgment may be had presently; and when assets descend, a scire facias lies against the heir, &c. 8 Rep. 184. See Heir, Real Estate.

RIER COUNTY, retro comitatus, from the Fr. arrear, posterior.] Is opposed to full and open country; and appears to have been some public place, which the sheriff appointed for receipt of the king's money, after the end of his county-court. See 2 Edw. 3, c. 5; and also stat. Westm. 2, 13 Edw. 1, c. 38; Fleta, l. 2, c. 67.

RIFFLARE, from the Saxon, riefe, rapina.] To take away any thing by force; from whence comes our English word rifle. Leg. Hen. 1, c. 57.

RIGHT, jus.] In general signification, includes not only a right for which a writ of right lay, but also any title or claim, either by virtue of a condition, mortgage, or the like, for which no action is given by law, but only an entry. Co. Litt. l. 3, c. 8, § 445.

There is jus proprietatis, a right of property; jus possessionis, a right of possession; and jus proprietatis et possessionis, a right both of property and possession; and this was anciently called jus duplicatum: for example, if a man were disseised of an acre of land, the disseisee had jus proprietatis, the disseisor had jus possessionis; and if the disseisee released to the disseisor, he had jus proprietatis et possessionis. Co. Litt. l. 3, § 447.

Jus est sextuplex. 1. Jus recuperandi. 2. Intrandi. 3. Habendi. 4. Retinendi. 5. Percipiendi. 6. Et possidendi. 8 Co. Ed. Altham's case.

The disseisor had only the naked possession, because the disseisee might have entered and evicted him; but against all other persons the disseisor had right, and in this respect only could be said to have the right of possession; for, in respect to the disseisee, he had no right at all. But when a descent was cast, the heir of the disseisor had jus possessionis, because the disseisee could not enter upon his possession, and evict him, but was put to his real action, being the freehold cast upon the heir. The notions of the law made this title to him, that there might be a person in being to do the feudal duties, to fill the possession, and to answer the actions of all persons whatever; and since it was the law that gave him this right, and obliged him to these duties, antecedent to any act of his own, it defended such possession from the act of any other person whatever, till such possession were evicted by judgment, which being also the act of law might destroy the heir's title. Gillb. Ten. 18. See Estate, Property, Release, Title.

There was formerly also a present and future right; a jus in re, which might be granted to a stranger; and what was called a naked right, or jus ad rem, where an estate was turned to a right, on a discontinuance, &c. Co. Litt. 345.

Right doth also include an estate in esse in conveyances; and therefore if tenant in fee-simple makes a lease and release of all his right in the land to another, the whole estate in fee passes. Wood's Inst. 115, 116.

Sir Edward Coke tells us, that of such an high estimation is right, that the law preserveth it from death and destruction; trodden down it may be, but never trodden out: and there is such an extreme enmity between an estate gained by wrong and ancient right, that the right cannot possibly incorporate itself with the estate gained by wrong. 1 Inst. 279; 6 Rep. 70; 8 Rep. 105. A right may sometimes sleep, though it never dies; a long possession, exceeding the memory of man, will make a right; and if two persons are in possession by divers titles, the law will adjudge the possession in him that hath the right. Co. Litt. 478; 6 Litt. § 158. When there is no remedy, there is presumed to be no right by law. Vaugh. 38.

The former statutes of limitations only barred the remedy, but not the right; but now by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27. § 34. when the remedy is taken away the right is also extinguished. See Limitation of Actions, II. 1.

RIGHT CLOSE, secundum consuetudinem manerii, according to the custom of the manor.] A writ which lay for tenants in ancient demesne, and others of a similar nature, to try the right of their lands and tenements in the court of the lord exclusively. (Abolished.) See Writ.

RIGHT IN COURT. See Rectus in Curia.

RIGHTS AND LIBERTIES. See Liberty.

RINE, Saxon, ryne] A water-course, or little stream, which rises high with floods.

RINGA. A military girdle; from the Saxon, ring, i. e. annulus circulus, because it was girt round the middle; but, according to Bracton, ringa enim dicuntur quod renes circumdant, unde dicitur accingere gladio. Bract. lib. 1. c. 8.

RINGHEAD. An engine used in stretching of cloth. See 43 Eliz. c. 10.

RINGILDRE. A kind of bailiff or serjeant; and such rhungyl signifies in Welsh. Chart. Hen. 7.

RIOT;

ROUT; AND UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY.

RIOT, riota, and riotum, from the French riotte; quod non solum rixam et jurgium significat, sed vinculum etiam, quo plura in unum, fasciculorum instar, colligantur.] The forcible doing of an unlawful thing by three or more persons assembled together for that purpose. West. Symbol. part 2. tit. Indictments, § 65.

The distinction between these offences appears to be, that a riot is a tumultuous meeting of persons upon some purpose which they actually execute with violence; a rout is a similar meeting upon a purpose, which, if executed, would make them rioters, and which they actually make a motion to execute; an unlawful assembly is a mere assembly of persons upon a purpose, which, if executed, would make them rioters, but which they do not execute, or make any motion to execute. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65. § 1, 8, 9; 3 Inst. 176; 4 Comm. c. 11. p. 146. See more at large under the following divisions:—

I. What are considered as Riots, Routs, and unlawful Assemblies, at Common Law.

II. The Punishment of these Offences, and the Provisions against them, by statute Law.

I. Holt, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said, that the books are obscure in the definition of riots, and that he took it, that it is not necessary to say, they assembled for that purpose; but there must be an unlawful assembly; and as to what act will make a riot or trespass, such an act as will make a trespass will make a riot; as, if a number of men assemble with arms, in terroron populi, though no act is done; so if three come out of an alehouse and go armed. 11 Mod. 116, 117; Hob. 91.

Hawkins says, a riot seems to be a tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons, or more, assembling together of their own authority, with an intent mutually to assist one another against any who shall oppose them in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature; and afterwards actually executing the same in a violent and turbulent manner to the terror of the people, whether the act intended was of itself lawful or unlawful. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65. § 1.

A rout seems to be, according to the general opinion, a disturbance of the peace by persons assembling together with an intent to do a thing, which, if it be executed, will make them rioters, and actually making a motion towards the execution thereof; but by some books the notion of a riot is confined to such assemblies only as are occasioned by some grievance common to all the company, as the inclosure of land, in which they all claim a right of common, &c. However, inasmuch as it generally agrees with a riot, as to all the rest of the above-mentioned particulars, requisite to constitute a riot except only in this, that it may be a complete offence without the execution of the intended enterprise, it seems not to require any farther explication. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65. § 8.

In every riot there must be some such circumstances, either of actual force or violence, or at least of an apparent tendency thereto, as are naturally apt to strike a terror into the people, as the show of armour, threatening speeches, or turbulent gestures; for every such offence must be laid to be done in terror of the people. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65. § 5. But it is not necessary, in order to constitute this crime, that personal violence should have been committed. Per Mansfield, C. J. Clifford v. Broad, 2 Camp. 309.

An unlawful assembly, according to the common opinion, is a disturbance of the peace by persons merely assembling together with an intention to do a thing which, if it was executed, would make them rioters, but neither actually executing it, nor making a motion toward the execution of it. (says Hawkins) this seems to be much too narrow a definition for any meeting whatsoever of great numbers of people, with such circumstances of terror as cannot but endanger the public peace, and raise fears and jealousies among the king's subjects, seems properly to be called an unlawful assembly; as where great numbers, complaining of a common grievance, meet together armed in a warlike manner, in order to consult together concerning the most proper means for the recovery of their interests; for no one can foresee what may be the event of such an assembly. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65. § 9.

These offences are thus defined and distinguished by Blackstone: An unlawful assembly is when three or more do assemble themselves together to do an unlawful act, as to pull down inclosures, to destroy a warren, or the game thereon, and part, without doing it, or making any motion towards it. 3 Inst. 176. A rout is where three or more meet to do an unlawful act upon a common quarrel, as forcibly breaking down fences upon a right claimed of common or of way, and make some advances towards it. Bro. Abr. tit. Riots, 3, 5.

A riot is where three or more actually do an unlawful act of violence, either with or without a common cause or quarrel; 3 Inst. 176; as if they beat a man, or hunt and kill game in another's park, chase, warren, or liberty; or do any other unlawful act, as removing a nuisance in a violent and tumultuous manner. 4 Comm. c. 11. p. 14.

If a man be in his house, and he hears that J. S. will come to his house to beat him, he may well make an assembly of people of his friends and neighbours to assist and aid him in safe keeping his person. Per Fincuz, Ch. Just. Br. Riots, pl. 1. cites 21 Hen. 7. 39.

But if a man be menaced or threatened that if he comes to the market of B. or to W. that he shall be beat, he cannot make an assembly of people to assist him to go there, and this in safeguard of his person; for he need not go there, and he may have remedy by surety of the peace; but the house of a man is to him his castle and his defence, and where he properly ought to be. Br. Riots, p. 1. c. 21. II. 7. 22.

Hawkins, citing the above case, remarks, that such violent methods cannot but be attended with the danger of raising tumults and disorders to the disturbance of the public peace. Though a man may ride with arms, yet he cannot take two with him to defend himself, even though his life is threatened; for he is in the protection of the law, which is sufficient for his defence. See 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65. § 10; Dalt. J. c. 137; 11 Mod. 116, 117.

If a number of people be assembled together in a lawful manner, and upon a lawful occasion, as for celebrating a marriage, or the like, and during the assembly a sudden affray happens, this will not make it a riot ab initio; but it is only a common affray. Id. Raym. 967.

If a number of people assemble in a riotous manner to do an unlawful act, and a person who was upon the place, upon a lawful occasion, and not privy to the occasion, comes and joins himself with them, he will be guilty of a riot equally with the rest. Id. Raym. Rep. 965; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65. § 3.

If several are assembled lawfully without any ill intent, and an affray happens, none are guilty but such as set it; but if the assembly was originally unlawful, the act of one is imputable to all. Per Holt, Ch. J. 2 Salk. 595.

It seems agreed, that if a number of persons, being met together at a fair or market, or church-ale, or any other lawful and innocent occasion, happen on a sudden quarrel to together by the ears, they are not guilty of a riot, but of a sudden affray only, of which none are guilty but those who actually engage in it; because the design of their meeting was innocent and lawful, and the subsequent breach of the peace happened unexpectedly without any previous intention concerning it; yet it is said that if persons innocently assembled together do afterwards, upon a dispute between them, arise among them, form themselves into parties, with promise of mutual assistance, and then make affray, they are guilty of a riot; because, upon their confederating together with an intention to break the peace, they may as properly be said to be assembled together for that purpose from the time of such confederacy, as if their first coming together had been on such a design; however, it seems clear that if, in an assembly of persons met together on any lawful occasion whatsoever, a sudden proposal shall be started of going together in a body to pull down a house or inclosure, or to do any other act of violence, to the disturbance of the public peace, and such motion be agreed to and executed accordingly, the persons concerned cannot but be rioters, because their associating themselves together for such a new purpose is no way extenuated by their having met at first upon another. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65. § 3.

Wherever there is a predetermined purpose of acting with violence and tumult, the conduct of the parties may be deemed riotous. Thus, although the audience in a public theatre have a right to express the feelings excited at the moment by the performance, and therefore to applaud or hiss any piece which is represented, or any person who exhibits on the stage, yet where a number of persons, having come to a theatre with a predetermined purpose of interrupting the performance, made a great noise and disturbance, so as to render the actors entirely inaudible, though without offering personal violence to any individual, or any injury to the house, it was held that they were guilty of a riot. Clifford v. Brandon, 2 Camp. 358.

If any person encourage or promote, or take part in a riot, whether by words, signs, or gestures, or by wearing the badge or ensign of the rioters, he himself is to be considered as a rioter, for in this case all are principals. 2 Campb. 370. The inciting persons to assemble in a riotous manner appears also to have been considered as an indictable offence. Cro. Circ. Comp.; 2 Chitty's Crim. Law, 506.

Women are punishable as rioters; and infants, if above the age of discretion. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65. § 14; 2 Lid. Raym. 1284.

II. The punishment of unlawful assemblies, if to the number of twelve, may, as hereafter fully noticed, be capital, according to the circumstances that attend them; but from the number of three to eleven, is by fine and imprisonment only. The same is the case in riots and routs by the common law, to which the pillory, in very enormous cases, was heretofore sometimes superadded. 4 Comm. c. 11. See further, tit. Pillory.

By the 34 Edw. 3. c. 1. justices of the peace have power to restrain rioters, &c., to arrest and imprison them, and cause them to be duly punished. By the 17 Rich. 2. c. 8. the sheriff and other the king's ministers generally have power to arrest rioters with force. And by the 13 Hen. 4. c. 7.

Two justices, together with the sheriff or under sheriff of the county, may come, with the posse comitatus, if need be, and suppress any riot, assembly, or rout, arrest the rioters, and record, upon the spot, the nature and circumstances of the whole transaction, which record alone shall be a sufficient conviction of the offenders. And if the offenders are departed, the said justices, &c. shall, within a month after, make inquiry thereof, and hear and determine the same; and if the truth cannot be found, then within a further month the justices and sheriffs are to certify to the king and council, &c., on default whereof the justices, &c. shall forfeit 100*l*.

These statutes are understood of great and notorious riots. And the record of the riot within the view of the justices by whom it is recorded, is such a conviction as cannot be traversed, the parties being concluded thereby; but they may take advantage of the insufficiency of the record, if the justices have not pursued the statute, &c. It is said that the offenders, being convicted upon the record of their offence in the presence of the justices, ought to be sent immediately to gaol till they pay a fine assessed by the same justices, which fine is to be estreated into the exchequer; or the justices may record such riot, and commit the offenders, and after certify the record into B. R. or to the assizes or sessions. If the offenders are gone, then the justices shall inquire by a jury; and the riot being found, they are to make a record of it, and fine them, or receive their traverse, to be sent by the justices to the next quarter sessions, or into the King's Bench, to be tried according to law. Dalt. 200, 201, 202.

It hath been adjudged that where rioters are convicted upon the view of two justices, the sheriff must be a party to the inquisition on the stat. 13 Hen. 4. c. 7. But if they disperse themselves before conviction, the sheriff need not be a party; for in such case the two justices may make the inquisition without them; and this is pro domino rege. And if the justices neglect to make an inquisition within a month after the riot, they are liable to the penalty for not doing it within that time; but the lapse of the month doth not determine their authority to make an inquisition afterwards. 2 Salk. 592.

In the interpretation of the above stat. 13 Hen. 4. c. 7. it hath also been holden, that all persons, noblemen and others, except women, clergymen, persons decrepit, and infants under fifteen, are bound to attend the justices in suppressing a riot, upon pain of fine and imprisonment. And that any battery, wounding or killing the rioters, that may happen in suppressing the riot, is justifiable. 1 Hal. P. C. 495; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65. § 20, 21.

On the above Blackstone remarks, that our ancient law seems pretty well to have guarded against any violent breach of the public peace, especially as any riotous assembly, on a public or general account, as to redress grievances, or pull down all inclosures, and also resisting the king's forces, if sent to keep the peace, may amount to overt acts of high treason, by levying war against the king. This observation will appear confirmed by a statement of the following statutes, also made on this subject. And see further, 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65.

Rioters convicted on view of two justices, and of the sheriff of the county, are to be fined by the two justices and the sheriff; and if the sheriff do not join in setting the fine, it is error; for the statute requires that he should be joined with the justices in the whole proceedings. Raym. 386. By the 2 Hen. 5. st. 1. c. 8. if the justices make default in inquiring of a riot at the instance of the party grieved, the king's commission shall be issued to inquire as well of the riots as of the default, by sufficient and indifferent men of the county, at the discretion of the chancellor; and in case the sheriff is in default, the coroners shall make the panel of inquest upon the said commission, which is returnable into the Chancery, &c. and by this statute heinous rioters are to suffer one year's imprisonment.

The lord chancellor, having knowledge of a riot, may send the king's writ to the justices of peace, and to the sheriff of the county, &c. requiring them to put the statute in execution; and the chancellor, upon complaint made that a dangerous rioter is fled into places unknown, and on suggestion, under the seals of two justices of peace and the sheriff, that the common fame runneth in the county of the riot, may award a capias against the parties, returnable in Chancery upon a certain day, and afterwards a writ of proclamation, returnable in the King's Bench, &c. 2 Hen. 5. st. 1. c. 9; 8 Hen. 6. c. 14.

A mayor and alderman of a town making a riot are punishable in their natural capacities; but where they have countenanced dangerous riots within their precincts, their liberties have been seized, or the corporation fined. 3 Cro. 252; Dalt. 204, 326.

The riotous assembling of twelve persons or more, and not dispersing upon proclamation, was first made high treason by the 3 & 4 Edw. 6. c. 5, when the king was a minor, and a change in religion to be effected; but that statute was repealed by the 1 Mar. c. 1. among the other treasons created since the 25 Edw. 3; though the prohibition was in substance re-enacted, with an inferior degree of punishment, by the 1 Mar. st. 2. c. 12. which made the same offence a single felony. These statutes specified and particularized the nature of the riots they meant to suppress; as, for example, such as were set on foot with intention to offer violence to the privy council, or to change the laws of the kingdom, or for certain other specific purposes; in which cases, if the persons were commanded by proclamation to disperse, and they did not, it was by the statute of Mary made felony, but within the benefit of clergy; and the act also indemnified the peace-officers and their assistants, if they killed any of the mob in endeavouring to suppress such riot. This was thought a necessary security in that sanguinary reign, when popery was intended to be re-established, which was like to produce great discontents; but at first it was made only for a year, and was afterwards continued for that queen's life. And by the 1 Eliz. c. 16. when a reformation in religion was to be once more attempted, it was revived and continued during her life also, and then expired. From the accession of James I. to the death of Queen Anne, it was never once thought expedient to revive it; but in the first year of George I. it was judged necessary, in order to support the execution of the act of settlement, to renew it, and at one stroke to make it perpetual, with large additions.

For whereas the former acts expressly defined and specified what should be accounted a riot, the 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 5. enacts, generally, that if any persons, to the number of twelve, are unlawfully assembled to the disturbance of the peace, and any one justice of the peace, sheriff, under-sheriff, or mayor of a town, shall think proper to command them by proclamation to disperse, if they contemn his orders, and continue together for one hour afterwards, such contempt shall be felony without benefit of clergy. And farther, if the reading of the proclamation be by force opposed, or the reader be in any manner wilfully hindered from the reading of it, such opposers and hinderers are felons without benefit of clergy; and all persons to whom such proclamation ought to have been made, and knowing of such hinderance, and not dispersing, are felons without benefit of clergy. There is in this act also an indemnifying clause, in case any of the mob be unfortunately killed in the endeavour to disperse them. Prosecutions on this act are to be commenced within one year after the offence. This statute, being wholly in the affirmative, doth not take away any authority in the suppressing a riot by common law or by other statutes. See 4 Comm. 125, 435.

The provisions of this act, 1 Geo. 1. c. 5. were introduced into Ireland by the Irish act, 27 Geo. 3. c. 15. which contains additional clauses for prevention of such riots; and in particular by § 9. imposes the penalty of felony without clergy, for printing and publishing notices, exciting or tending to excite any riot, &c.

A person present aiding and abetting rioters, is a principal in the second degree under this statute. 4 Burr. 2079.

A riot is not the less a riot, neither is an illegal meeting the less an illegal meeting, because the proclamation from the Riot Act has not been read, the effect of that proclamation being to make the parties guilty of a capital offence if they do not disperse within an hour; but if the proclamation be not read, the parties are guilty of the common law offence, which is a misdemeanor; and all magistrates, constables, and even private individuals, are justified in dispersing the offenders; and if they cannot otherwise succeed in doing so, they may use force. Without any proclamation at all, if a meeting is illegal, a party who attends it, knowing it to be so, is guilty of an offence. Rex v. Furzey, 6 C. & P. 81. A meeting called "to adopt preparatory measures for holding a national convention," is an illegal meeting. Ibid.

The clauses of the above act relating to the riotous demolition of buildings, were repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27. but were re-enacted and considerably enlarged by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 30. § 8. See Malicious Injuries, I.

Nearly related to this head of riots, is the offence of tumultuous petitioning, which was carried to an enormous height in the times preceding the grand rebellion. Wherefore by the 13 Car. 2. st. 1. c. 5. it is enacted, that not more than twenty names shall be signed to any petition to the king, or either house of parliament, for any alteration of matters, established by law, in church or state, unless the contents thereof be previously approved, in the country, by three justices, or the majority of the grand jury at the assizes or quarter sessions; and in London by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council; and that no petition shall be delivered by a company of more than ten persons, on pain in either case of incurring a penalty not exceeding 100*l.* and three months imprisonment. See Liberty, Petition.

Proceedings of the same nature, and manifestly tending to the same end, as the tumultuous petitions above alluded to, had arrived to such a height in the year 1795, that the legislature found it necessary to interpose by a temporary act, 36 Geo. 3. c. 8. for more effectually preventing seditious meetings and assemblies. But this act, after being revived by 41 Geo. 3. c. 30. (for a short period), was allowed to expire.

The 57 Geo. 3. c. 19. for the more effectually preventing seditious meetings and assemblies, enacted, (by § 1—22, containing provisions declared to be temporary only, and which are now expired), that no meeting of more than fifty persons, except county meeting or meetings called by two justices, or by the grand jury, and meetings in corporate towns called by the mayors, &c. should be holden for the purpose, or on the pretext, of preparing any petition or address to the sovereign, or parliament, for alteration of matters established in church or state, or for the purpose, or under pretext, of deliberating on any grievance in church or state, unless called by advertisement signed by seven householders, &c. or by notices delivered by them to the clerk of the peace. Meetings called without such notice might be dispersed by proclamation of a justice, on like penalties as under the Riot Act, 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 5. Meetings might be dispersed, though held under such notices, if the notices purported the alteration of matters established by law, otherwise than by the authority of the king and parliament, or if they contained any matter tending to incite the people to hatred or contempt of the king or government. By § 23. of that act (which section is permanent) no public meeting shall be held, within one mile of Westminster Hall, for the purpose or on pretext of petitioning, &c. on any day during the sittings of parliament or of the courts of justice there. This act does not extend to Ireland. But see 54 Geo. 3. c. 131 (amended by 55 Geo. 3. c. 13), and a temporary act, 54 Geo. 3. c. 181. I further provision for the preventing tumultuous meetings or assemblies, were made (for five years) by the 60 Geo. 3. c. 1, now expired.

Our sovereign lord the king chargeth and commandeth all persons being assembled, immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations or to their lawful business, upon the pains contained in the act made in the 1st year of King George, for preventing tumult and riotous assemblies.

God save the king.

PROCLAMATION under 57 Geo. 3. c. 19. § 6.

Our sovereign lord the king chargeth and commandeth all persons here assembled, immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations or to their lawful business, upon pain of death.

God save the king.

An indictment for a riot must show for what act the rioters assembled, that the court may judge whether it was lawful or not. 2 Ld. Raym. 1210. And there must not only be an unlawful act to be done, but an unlawful assembly of more than two persons. 2 Salk. 59. 511. When six persons were indicted for a riot, two died without being tried, two were acquitted, and the other two were found guilty, the court refused to arrest the judgment, on the ground that as the jury had found two guilty of a riot, it must have been several are indicted, and all but two acquitted, no judgment can be given against the two. 1 Ld. Raym. 484. But although an indictment will not lie against two persons only for making a riot, yet an indictment against "W. R., for that he, together with divers other persons, to the jurors unknown, committed a riot, is good." 3 Salk. 317.

RIPARIA, from ripa, a bank of a river.] A river, or water running between the banks. Magna Charta, c. 5; stat. Westm. 2. c. 47; 2 Inst. 478. It has usually been translated a bank, but this seems erroneous. Aqua vocata le Lee magna riparia existit, is a great river. Rot. Parl.

RIPIERS, riparii, à piscellò quò in devehendis piscibus utuntur, Anglicè, a rip.] Those that bring fish from the sea-coast to the inner parts of the land. Camd. Brit. 234.

RIPPERS, reapers or cutters down of corn.] Hence riponel was a gratuity or reward given to customary tenants, when they had reaped their lord's corn. Conell.

RIVAGIUM, rinage or riverage.] A duty paid to the king on some rivers for the passage of boats or vessels. Quieti sint ab omni lastagio, passagio, tallagio, rivagio, &c. Placit. temp. Edw. 1.

RIVEARE. To have the liberty of a river for fishing and fowling. Pat. 2 Edw. 1.

RIVERS. A navigable river is, with respect to the right of the public to pass along it, for the conveyance of themselves or their goods and merchandizes from one destination to another, in the nature of a public highway, and is so considered by Callis and by most legal writers. 1 Hawk. c. 76. § 1; 3 Com. Dig. 23. In some respects, however, it differs from a highway; for if a highway be foundered and out of repair, the public have a right to go on the adjoining land; but if a river should happen to be choked up with mud, that would not give the public a right to cut another passage through the adjoining lands. And upon this principle it was decided, that the public are not entitled, at common law, but only by custom, to tow on the banks of a navigable river. 3 T. R. 263. But as a highway may be changed by the act of God, so, on the same principle, if an ancient navigable river, by degrees, change its course, and go over different ground from that wherein it used to run, the right of passage then continues in the new channel in the same manner as in the old. 1 Hawk. c. 76. § 4; 1 Rol. Abr. 390. A navigable river also differs from a public highway in this respect, that whereas the freehold of the soil of the highway belongs to the lord of the manor or the owners of the adjoining lands on each side the way; 2 Inst. 75; 1 Burr. 149; 2 T. R. 232; yet the soil of a navigable river, primò facie, though not necessarily, belongs to the king, and is not, by presumption of law, in the owners of the adjoining lands. Doug. 441.

All navigable rivers, as well above the flowing of the sea as below, are public rivers, juris publici, and therefore all nuisances and impediments of boats and vessels, though in the private soil of any person, may be punished by indictment. Hale, de Jure Maris, part 1. c. 3. p. 9.

It is a common nuisance to divert a part of a public navigable river, whereby the current of it is weakened and made unable to carry vessels of the same burden as it could before. 1 Hawk. c. 75. § 11.

The erections of weirs across public rivers was reprobated in the earliest periods of our law, and was always considered as a public nuisance, for Magna Charta directs "that all weirs from henceforth shall be utterly pulled by Thames and Medway, and through all England, but only by the sea coast." Magna Charta, c. 23. And the 12 Edw. 4. c. 7. and other subsequent acts, forbid the erections of new weirs, and the enhancing, straightening, or enlarging those which aforesaid existed. Therefore where a brushwood weir across a public river was converted into a stone one, by which the fish were prevented from passing except in flood times; this was considered to be a public nuisance, although two-thirds of the weir had been so converted for forty years without interruption. 7 East. 198. So in another case it was considered, that an obstruction to the navigation of a river, though continued for a period of twenty years, was no bar to the right of the public. 2 B. & A. 662. For no length of time will legitimate a public nuisance. 3 Campb. 227. See further, Nuisance, I.

As to annoyances in rivers, either positively by actual obstructions, or negatively, by want of reparations, the persons so obstructing, or such individuals as are bound to repair and cleanse them, or (in default of these last,) the parish at large may be indicted, distrained to repair and amend them, and in some cases fined. 4 Comm. 167. And see the provisions of the recent statute, tit. Sewers.

By the statute of West. 2. c. 47. the king may grant commissions to persons to take care of rivers and the fishery therein. The lord mayor of London is to have the conservation in breaches and ground overflowed as far as the water ebbs and flows in the river Thames. 4 Hen. 7. c. 15. Persons annoying the river Thames, making shelves there, casting dung therein, or taking away stakes, boards, timber-work, &c. off the banks, incurred a forfeiture of 5*l.* under the 27 Hen. 8. c. 18. Commissioners appointed to prevent exactions of the occupiers of locks, weirs, &c. upon the river Thames westward from the city of London, to Cricklade, in the county of Wilts, and for ascertaining the rates of water-carriage, on the said river, &c. 6 & 7 Wm. 3. c. 16; which statute was revived, with authority for the commissioners to make orders and constitutions to be observed, under penalties, &c. 3 Geo. 2. c. 11; 24 Geo. 2. c. 8.

An ancient towing-path on the bank of a river is not within the jurisdiction of commissioners, under the general terms of an inclosure act. 2 Bos. & Pul. 296.

The owner of land through which a river runs cannot, by enlarging a channel of certain dimensions, through which the water had been used to flow, before any appropriation of it by another, divert more of it to the prejudice of any other landowner lower down the river, who had at any time, before such enlargement, appropriated to himself the surplus water which did not escape by the former channel. 6 East, 209.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 17. to steal goods in any vessel, barge, or boat, upon any river, &c., or any dock, wharf, &c. adjacent thereto, is punishable with transportation for life, &c. See further, Malicious Injuries.

ROBE, a robe, coat, or garment. Walsing. 267. See Retainer.

ROBBERY, robaria.] A felonious taking away of money or goods of any value from the person of another, or in his presence, against his will, by violence or putting him in fear, and of purpose to steal the same. West's Symbol. part 2. title Indictments, § 60; 2 East's P. C. c. 16. § 124; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 34; 1 Hale, P. C. 132; 3 Inst. 68.

This offence was called robbery, either because they bereaved the true man of some of his robes or garments, or because his money or goods were taken out of some part of his garment or robe about his person. Co. 3 Inst. c. 16. This is sometimes called violent theft. West, Symbol., ubi sup. Kitchin. fol. 16, 22; Lib. Ass. 39. See Skene de Verborum Signif. verb. Reif; and Cromp. Justice of Peace, fol. 30. What is or amounts to a Robbery in respect of the Manner, or the Person from whom any thing is taken.—

Open and violent larceny from the person, or robbery, is the felonious and forcible taking, from the person of another, of goods or money to any value, by violence, or putting him in fear. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 34.

1st, There must be a taking, otherwise it is no robbery.

If the thief, having once taken a purse, return it, still it is a robbery: and so it is, whether the taking be strictly from the person of another, or in his presence only: as, where a robber, by menaces and violence, puts a man in fear, and drives away his sheep or his cattle before his face. 1 Hal. P. C. 533. But if the taking be not either directly from his person, or in his presence, it is no robbery. Com. 478; Stra. 10, 15.

2dly, It is immaterial of what value the thing taken is: a penny as well as a pound, thus forcibly extorted, makes a robbery. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 34. § 5.

But the property taken must be of some value. Therefore, in a case where the prisoner (a woman) had obtained a note of hand from a gentleman, by threatening him with a knife, held to his throat, to take away his life, and it appeared that she had furnished the paper and ink with which it was written, and that the paper was never out of her possession, this was holden not to be a robbery: the judges being of opinion that the note was of no value to the prosecutor, and not within the proviso of 2 Geo. 2. c. 5 § 2, which made the stealing a chose in action felony. Phipps's case, 2 Leach, 673.

Lastly, The taking must be by force, or a previous putting in fear; which makes the violation of the person more atrocious than privately stealing. This previous violence, or putting in fear, is the criterion that distinguishes robbery from other larcenies. For if one privately steal from the person of another, and afterwards keep it by putting him in fear, this is no robbery, for the fear is subsequent: neither was it formerly capital, as privately stealing, being under the value of twelve pence. 1 Hal. P. C. 534. Not that it is indeed necessary, though usual, to lay in the indictment that the robbery was committed by putting in fear; it is sufficient if laid to be done by violence, and against the will of him robbed. Foster, 128; 2 East's P. C. c. 16. § 127. And when it is laid to be done by putting in fear, this does not imply any great degree of terror or affright in the party robbed: it is enough that so much force, or threatening word or gesture, be used, as might create an apprehension of danger, or induce a man to part with his property without or against his consent. Thus, if a man be knocked down without previous warning, and stripped of his property while senseless, though strictly he cannot be said to be put in fear, yet this is undoubtedly a robbery. Or, if a person, with a sword drawn, begs an alms, and I give it him through mistrust and apprehension of violence, this is a felony as robbery. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 45. § 6. So if, under a pretence of sale, a man forcibly extorts money from another, neither shall this subterfuge avail him. But it is doubted, whether the forcing a higgler, or other chapman to sell his wares, and giving him the full value of them, amounts to so heinous a crime as robbery. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 34. § 7. See 1 East, 615; 2 East, 712.

The circumstance of putting one in fear, makes the difference between a robbery and a cut-purse; both taken it from the person, but this takes it clam et secretè without assault or putting in fear, and the robber by violent assault and putting in fear. 3 Inst. 68. c. 16.

Wherever a person assaults another, with such circumstances of terror, as put him in fear, and causes him, by reason of such fear, to part with his money, the taking thereof is adjudged robbery; whether there were any weapon drawn or not, or whether the person assaulted delivered his money upon the other's command, or afterwards gave it to him upon his ceasing to use force, and begging an alms; for he was put into fear by his assault, and gives him his money to get rid of him. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 34. § 9.

So in cases of extortion of money by threats of a mob, to injure the person's house or property. 2 East's P. C. c. 16. § 128.

If the fact appear upon the evidence to have been attended with those circumstances of violence or terror which, in common experience, are likely to induce a man to part with his property against his consent, either for the safety of his person, or for the preservation of his character and good name, it will amount to a robbery; and this, though no express demand of money is made. Thus if an officer feloniously take money from a prisoner, not to take him to gaol, under colour of authority; or if one obtain property by threatening to accuse another of having been guilty of an unnatural crime, (see post,) these acts, particularly the latter, on the solemn opinion of all the judges, have been held acts sufficient to raise, in the mind of the party menaced, such a terror and apprehension of mischief, as to constitute the offence of robbery, by putting him in fear. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 34. § 6; 2 Leach. 731; 2 East's P. C. c. 16. § 130.

But these latter cases of terror are to be considered as in some measure qualified and restrained: for in a case where the prosecutor had parted with his property for the purpose of convicting the offender, and after apprehension of injury to his character had ceased, this was held not to be a robbery; 2 East's P. C. c. 16. § 132; and in another case it was held, by a majority of the judges, that, in order to constitute robbery, in cases of this kind, the property must be taken on an immediate apprehension of present danger upon the charge being made, and not after the parties have separated, and there has been time to deliberate and procure assistance, and a friend has been consulted on the transaction. Jackson and Shipley's case, 1 East's P. C. Add. xxi.

The following distinction has been frequently admitted in prosecutions for robbery, viz. That if any thing is snatched suddenly from the head, hand, or person of any one without any struggle on the part of the owner, or without any evidence of force or violence being exerted by the thief, it does not amount to robbery. But if any thing is broken or torn in consequence of the sudden seizure, it would be evidence of such force as would constitute a robbery: as where part of a lady's hair was torn away by snatching a diamond pin from her head, and an ear was torn by pulling of an ear-ring, each of these cases was determined to be a robbery. 4 Comm. c. 17. p. 244. n. cites Leach, 238.

The words of the indictment, "forcibly and feloniously did take," must be understood to imply that there is either an actual taking in deed, or a taking in law, and the latter may be when a thief receives, &c. For example: if thieves rob a true man, and finding but little about him, take it, this is an actual taking; and by threats of death compel him to swear upon a book to fetch them a greater sum, which he does, and delivers it to them, which they receive, this is a taking in law by them, and adjudged robbery; for fear made him take the oath, and the oath and fear continuing, made him bring the money, which amounts to a taking in law; and so it is, if a purse, &c. is delivered to the thief through fear. 3 Inst. 68. c. 16.

See 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 34. § 4. That the thief must be in possession of the things stolen, or otherwise he is not guilty of robbery. 3 Inst. 69. c. 16. S. P.

If a man having a purse fastened to his girdle be assaulted by a thief, who, the more easily to take the purse, cuts the girdle, and the purse falls to the ground, this has been held no taking. 3 Inst. 99; 1 Hale, 533. But if the thief take up the purse, and afterwards let it fall, this is a sufficient taking; Id. ib.; for it is not necessary that the property, if once taken, should continue in the possession of the thief; for, where the robbery is once actually committed, it cannot be purged by any subsequent redelivery for any purpose. Peat's case, 1 Leach, 228; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 34. § 2.

The words of the indictment are from the person, &c. If the true man seeking to escape, for the safeguard of his money casts it into a bush, which the thief perceiving, takes it; this is a taking in law from the person, because it is done at one time. 3 Inst. 69. c. 16. And so, if one drive my cattle, in my presence, out of my pasture, or takes my hat, which fall from my head, he may be indicted as taking taken things from my person. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 34. § 8. See also 3 Inst. 69. c. 16; and 116 pt. 161; Sty. 156.

Also taking cattle from A, which he is driving on the highway, is a taking from his person, and so a robbery; 2 Salk. 641.

And if a man-servant be robbed of his master's goods, in his master's sight, this shall he taken for a robbing of the master. Sty. 156.

In some cases, a man may be said to rob me, where in truth he never actually had any of my goods in his possession; as where I am robbed by several in one gang, and one of them takes my money; in which case, in judgment of law, every one of the company shall be said to take it, in respect of that encouragement which they give to another through the hopes of mutual assistance in their enterprise: nay, though they miss of their first intended prize, and one of them afterwards rides from the rest, and robs a third person in the same highway, without their knowledge, out of their view, and then returns to them, all are guilty of robbery; for they came together with an intent to rob, and to assist one another in so doing. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 34. § 7.

But where a gang of poachers attacked a gamekeeper, and left him senseless on the ground, and one of them returned and stole his money, it was held that one alone could be convicted of the robbery, as it was not perpetrated in pursuance of any common intent. 3 C. & P. 392.

This offence of robbery is an aggravated species of larceny, and has long been liable to capital punishment; having been excluded from clergy by the old statutes, all of which have been repealed.

Now, by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 6, if any person shall rob any other person of any chattel, money, or valuable security, he shall suffer death as a felon.

A mere attempt to rob was indeed held to be felony so late as Henry the Fourth's time. 1 Hal. P. C. 532. But afterwards it was taken to be only a misdemeanor, and punishable with fine and imprisonment; till the 7 Geo. 2. c. 21, which first made it a felony, (transportable for seven years,) unlawfully and maliciously to assault another, with any offensive weapon or instrument; or by menaces, or by other forcible or violent manner, to demand any money or goods with a felonious intent to rob.

Now, by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 6, if any person shall assault any other person, with intent to rob him, or shall, with menaces, or by force, demand any such property of any other person, with intent to steal the same, he is guilty of felony, punishable with transportation for life or years, or imprisonment not exceeding four years, and whipping. See 6 C. & P. 515, 521.

By § 7. of the same statute it is declared, that to accuse, or threaten to accuse, a person of any infamous crime, and thereby, by intimidating such person, extorting money, chattel, or any valuable security, shall be deemed robbery.

As to stealing from the person without violence, and other thefts, see Larceny.

ROBBERSMEN, or ROBBERDSMEN. A sort of great thieves, mentioned in the statutes 5 Edm. 3. c. 14; 7 R. 2. c. 6; of whom Coke says, that Robin Hood lived in the reign of King Richard I. on the borders of England and Scotland, by robbery, burning of houses, rapine and spoil, &c. and that these robberdsmen took name from him. 3 Inst. 197.

ROCHET. That linen garment which is worn by bishops gathered at the wrists. It differs from a surplice, for that hath open sleeves hanging down, but a rochet hath close sleeves. Lindemede, lib. 3. tit. 27.

ROD, rada terræ.] A measure of sixteen feet and a half long, otherwise called a perch.

ROD KNIGHTS, from the Sax. rad, equitatio, and cnyl, famulus, quasi ministri equitantes.] Certain servitors who held their land by serving their lords on horseback. Bract. lib. 1. c. 1.

ROGATION-WEEK, Dies Rogationum; Robigalia.] A time so called because of the special devotion of prayer and fasting then enjoined by the church for a preparative to the joyful remembrance of Christ's ascension. Cowell.

ROGUE, Fr.] An idle sturdy beggar, who, by ancient statutes, for the first offence, was called a rogue of the first degree, and punished by whipping and boring through the gristle of the right ear with a hot iron; and for the second offence he was termed a rogue of the second degree, and executed as a felon if he were above eighteen years old; 27 H. 8. c. 25; 14 Eliz. c. 5; but repealed by 35 Eliz. c. 7. § 24, as related to vagabonds of the second degree.

All former statutes relative to rogues and vagabonds were repealed by the 5 Geo. 4. c. 83. See Vagrants.

ROGUS, Lat.] A funeral pile. A great fire wherein dead bodies were burned; and sometimes it is taken simply for a pile of wood. Claus. 5 Hen. 3.

ROLL, rotulus.] A schedule of parchment that may be turned up with the hand in the form of a pipe. Staudf. P. C. 11. Rolls are parchments on which all the pleadings, memorials, and acts of courts are entered and filed with the proper officer, and then they become records of the court. 2 Lill. Abr. 491. By a rule made by the Court of King's Bench, every attorney is to bring in his rolls into the office fairly engrossed by the times thereby limited, viz. The rolls of Trinity, Michaelmas, and Hilary terms, before the essoin day of every subsequent term; and the rolls of Easter term before the first day of Trinity term; and no attorney at law, or any other person, shall file any rolls, &c. but the clerks of the chief clerks of this court. Ord. B. R. Mich. 1705. If rolls are not brought into the office in time, it has been ordered that they shall not be received without a particular rule of court for that purpose. Mich. 9 W. 3. See Practice, Pleadings.

ROLL OF COURT, rotulus curie.] The court-roll in a manor, wherein the business of the court, the admissions, surrenders, names, rents, and services of the tenants are copied and inrolled. See Copyhold.

ROLLS OFFICE OF THE CHANCERY. An office in Chancery Lane, London, which contains rolls and records of the High Court of Chancery, the master whereof is the second person in the chancery, &c. Among these are the inrollments of acts of parliament, &c. See Chancery, Master of the Rolls.

ROLLS OF THE EXCHEQUER. Are of several kinds, as the great wardrobe roll, the cofferer's roll, the subsidy roll, &c. See Exchequer.

ROLLS OF PARLIAMENT. The manuscript registers of the proceedings of our old parliament; in these rolls are likewise a great many decisions of difficult points in law, which were frequently in former times referred to the determination of this supreme court by the judges of both benches, &c. Nicholson, Hist. Libr. part 3. cap. 3. edit. 1714. The inrollments in chancery of the acts of parliament, transmitted or certified from the parliament office, are sometimes termed parliament rolls, and sometimes statute rolls. See Statutes. Also Records.

ROLLS OF THE TEMPLE. In the two Temples is a roll called the calves-head roll, wherein every bench, barrister, and student, is taxed yearly at so much to the cook and other officers of the houses, in consideration of a dinner of calves-head provided in Easter term. Orig. Jurid. 199.

ROMAN CATHOLICS. The penal laws against the catholics, although for the most part not expressly repealed, have been superseded by the provisions of modern statutes, and particularly by the 10 Geo. 4. c. 7.

By the 18 Geo. 3. c. 60. the 11 & 12 W. 3. c. 4. was repealed in favour of such papists as should duly take the oath therein prescribed: of allegiance to his majesty, abjuration of the pretender, renunciation of the pope's civil power, and abhorrence of the doctrine imputed to them of destroying and not keeping faith with heretics, and deposing or murdering princes excommunicated by authority of the See of Rome,—so far as it disabled them from purchasing or inheriting, or authorised the apprehending or prosecuting the popish clergy, or subjected to imprisonment either them or any teachers of youth.

By the 31 Geo. 3. c. 32. also, all the severe restrictions and penalties of the former laws were removed from those Roman Catholics who should make and subscribe a declaration of their professing the Roman Catholic religion, and also take the oath required by the last statute.

But by § 5. their places of worship are required to be certified to the quarter sessions, and there recorded; and no minister can officiate in any place of worship until his name and description are also recorded at the sessions, under the penalty of being deprived of all benefit of the act.

By § 6. their places of worship are prohibited from being locked or fastened.

By § 10. if any person shall wilfully, and on purpose, maliciously and contemptuously come into any congregation or assembly of their religious worship and disturb the same, or misuse any priest, minister, preacher, or teacher therein, on proof by two witnesses before one justice, he may be required to find two sureties in 50*l.* to appear at the next sessions, and upon conviction is liable to a penalty of 20*l.*

By § 11. a Roman Catholic minister is prohibited from officiating in any place of worship having a steeple and bell, or at any funeral in a church or church-yard, or from wearing the habits of his order, except in a place allowed by the statute, or in a private house where there shall not be more than five persons besides the family.

By § 13. 14. 15. 16. no person, who shall take the appointed oath, shall be prosecuted for teaching youth as a tutor or schoolmaster, except in any college or school of royal foundation, or any other endowed college or school, or except in any school in either of the two universities; but no Catholic schoolmaster can receive into his school for education the child of any Protestant father; nor is he permitted to keep a school until his name and description shall have been recorded at the sessions. See post.

But the great measure of relief to the Catholics was the 10 Geo. 4. c. 7. whereby the restrictions which prevented them from sitting in either Houses of Parliament, and holding many offices and franchises, were removed.

After reciting that "by various acts of parliament certain restraints and disabilities are imposed on the Roman Catholic subjects of his majesty, to which other subjects of his majesty are not liable; and that it is expedient that such restraints and disabilities shall be from henceforth discontinued; and that by various acts certain oaths and certain declarations, commonly called the declaration against transubstantiation, and the declaration against transubstantiation and the invocation of saints and the sacrifice of the mass, as practised in the church of Rome, are or may be required to be taken, made, and subscribed by the subjects of his majesty, as qualifications for sitting and voting in parliament, and for the enjoyment of certain offices, franchises, and civil rights:"

It is by § 1. enacted, that all such parts of the said acts as require the said declarations, or either of them, to be made or subscribed by any of his majesty's subjects, as a qualification for sitting and voting in parliament, or for the exercise or enjoyment of any office, franchise or civil right, be (save as hereinafter excepted) repealed.

By § 2. Roman Catholics may sit and vote in either Houses of Parliament on taking the oath therein contained, instead of the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration.

By § 5. Roman Catholics may vote at elections of members to serve in parliament for England and for Ireland, and also vote at the elections of representative peers of Scotland and of Ireland, and may be elected such representative peers, being in all other respects duly qualified, upon taking and subscribing the oath thereinbefore set forth, and upon taking also such other oath or oaths as may be lawfully tendered to persons offering to vote at such elections.

By § 8. so much of any acts as require the formula contained in 8 & 9 W. 3. c. 3. (S.) to be tendered or taken, is repealed. Roman Catholics may elect and be elected members of parliament for Scotland, and enrolled as free-holders, &c. on taking the appointed oath.

By § 9. no Roman Catholic priest is to sit in the House of Commons.

By § 10. Roman Catholics may hold and enjoy all civil and military offices and places of trust or profit under his majesty, and exercise any other franchise or civil right, except as hereinafter excepted, upon taking and subscribing the oath thereinbefore appointed.

But by § 11. nothing therein contained shall exempt any person professing the Roman Catholic religion from taking any oaths, or making any declaration, not thereinbefore mentioned, or required to be taken or subscribed by any person on his admission into any such office or place of trust or profit as aforesaid.

§ 12. Provided that nothing therein contained shall enable Roman Catholics to hold or exercise the office of guardians and justices of the United Kingdom, or of regent of the United Kingdom, under whatever name, style or title such office may be constituted; or to enable any person, otherwise than as he is now by law enabled, to hold or enjoy the office of lord high chancellor, lord keeper or lord commissioner of the great seal of Great Britain or Ireland; or the office of lord lieutenant, or lord deputy, or other chief governor or governors of Ireland; or his majesty's high commissioners to the general assembly of the church of Scotland.

By § 14. Roman Catholics may be members of any lay body corporate, and hold any civil office or place of trust or profit therein, and do any corporate act, or vote in any corporate election or other proceeding, upon taking and subscribing the oath thereby appointed; and upon taking also such other oaths as may by law be required to be taken by any person becoming members of such lay body corporate, or being admitted to hold any office or place of trust or profit within the same.

But by § 15. such members of corporations not to vote in ecclesiastical appointments.

By § 16. the act is not to extend to offices, &c. in the established church, or ecclesiastical courts, universities, colleges, or schools: Provided also, that nothing therein contained shall extend to enable any person, otherwise than as he is now by law enabled, to exercise any right of presentation to any ecclesiastical benefice whatsoever; or to repeal, vary, or alter in any manner the laws now in force in respect to the right of presentation to any ecclesiastical benefice.

§ 17. Provided that where any right of presentation to any ecclesiastical benefice shall belong to any office in the gift or appointment of his majesty, his heirs or successors, and such office shall be held by a person professing the Roman Catholic religion, the right of presentation shall devolve upon and be exercised by the Archbishop of Canterbury for the time being.

§ 22. Provided that the oath thereinbefore appointed shall be taken by the officers in his majesty's land and sea service, professing the Roman Catholic religion, at the same times and in the same manner as the oaths and declarations now required by law are directed to be taken, and not otherwise.

For the provisions of the act with respect to Jesuits, see that title.

By the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 115. it is enacted, that Roman Catholics in respect to their schools, places of religious worship, education, and charitable purposes in Great Britain, and the property held therewith, and the persons employed about the same, shall be subject to the same laws as the Protestant Dissenters are subject to in England in respect of their schools, &c.

King Henry III. granted a charter to Romney-Marsh, empowering twenty-four men thereunto chosen to make distresses equally upon all those who have lands and tenements in the said marsh, to repair the walls and water-gates of the same against the dangers of the sea. There are also several laws and customs observed in the said marsh, established by ordinance of justices thereto appointed in 42 Hen. 3; 16 E. 1; 33 E. 3; &c. RULE OF COURT. An order made either between parties to a suit on motion, or to regulate the practice of the court. See Motion in Court, Practice.

Where a defendant, consenting to a judge's order, obtains a benefit under it, the Court of C. P. will, upon the order being afterwards made a rule of court, enforce by attachment the defendant's performance of such terms of the rule as are beneficial to the plaintiff, or to the crown in a qui tam action. 7 Taunt. 43.

A variety of general rules have recently been made by the judges, regulating and assimilating the practice of the courts at Westminster, altering the mode of pleading, &c. in pursuance of the authority given to them by various statutes, which are shortly noticed under the head Judges.

A rule of court is also granted to prisoners in the King's Bench or Fleet prisons, every day the court sits, to go at large, if such prisoner have business in law of his own to follow. But by rule of court of K. B. Easter term, 30 Geo. 3. on this subject, every prisoner within the King's Bench prison, or the rules thereof, having a day rule, shall return within the walls or rules before nine o'clock in the evening. 3 T. R. 584.

The rules of the King's Bench prison are certain limits without the walls, within which prisoners in custody are allowed to live, on giving security to the marshal not to escape. The benefit of these rules may be had by one in custody in an excom. cap. but is never granted to a prisoner in execution on a criminal account, or for a contempt. See Tidd's Pract.

RUSSIA COMPANY, (or, as it has sometimes been termed, The Muscovy Company,) subsisted by virtue of a charter granted by Philip and Mary in the first and second year of their reign, which was confirmed by a private statute passed in the eighth of Elizabeth. The charter was granted to them under the style of "The Merchants Adventurers of England for the Discovery of Lands, Territories, Isles, Dominions, and Seigniories unknown, and not, before their late Adventure or Enterprise, by Seas or Navigation commonly frequented." In the statute they were described by the name of "The Fellowship of English Merchants for the Discovery of New Trades." The extent of their rights under the statute was the sole privilege of trading to and from the dominions and territories of the Emperor of Russia, lying northward, north-eastward, and north-westward from London, as also to the countries of Armenia Major, or Minor, Media, Arcania, Persia, or the Caspian Sea. It was said in 10 & 11 W. 3. c. 6. to be commonly called "The Russia Company."

In the reign of King William III. it was thought this trade might be considerably enlarged, if the admission of persons into the company was made more easy; and that it would be very proper to ascertain the fee of admission, which had not been done either by the charter or the statute [of Elizabeth.] It was accordingly enacted by the 10 & 11 W. 3. c. 6. § 1. 2. that every subject of this realm might be admitted into the company on payment of 5*l.* only.

Every individual admitted into the company conducts his business entirely as a private adventurer, or as he would do were the company abolished.

For the charter and other matters relating to this company, see Hackluyt, vol. 1. p. 258—274. And for the particulars as to the trade to Persia, through Russia, see Reeve's Law of Shipping and Navigation.

SACRAMENT, sacramentum.] Usually applied to the Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. By the rubric there must be three at the least to communicate, and a minister is not without lawful cause to deny it to any who shall devoutly and humbly desire it: but notorious sinners are not to be admitted to it till they have repented; nor those who maliciously contend, until they are reconciled, &c.; also the sacrament is not to be administered to such who refuse to be present at the prayers of the church, or to strangers; for a minister is not obliged to give it to any but those of his own parish; and the partakers of the holy sacrament ought to signify their names to the curate at least a day before it is administered. Can. 27.

If a minister refuse to give the sacrament to any one, being required by the bishop, he is to certify the cause of such refusal; and a parson refusing to administer the sacrament to any without just cause, is liable to be sued in action on the case: because a man may have a temporal loss by such refusal. 1 Sid. 34.

In every parish church the sacrament is to be administered three times in the year, (whereof the feast of Easter to be one,) and every layman is bound to receive it thrice every year, &c. In colleges and halls of the universities the sacraments are to be administered the first or second Sunday of every month; and in cathedral churches, upon all principal feast days. Canon. 21, 22, 23.

The churchwardens, as well as the minister, are to take notice whether the parishioners came so often to the sacrament as they ought; and on a churchwarden's presenting a man for not receiving the sacrament, he may be libelled in the ecclesiastical court and excommunicated, &c. Reviling the sacrament of the Lord's Supper is punishable under 1 Eliz. c. 1; 1 Edw. 6. c. 1. with fine and imprisonment.

The acts commonly called the Test and Corporation Acts, requiring persons to take the sacrament as a qualification for office, have been repealed. See Nonconformists.

SACRAMENTUM. An oath: the common form of all inquisitions might in Latin, by a jury, run thus: qui dicunt supra sacramentum suum, &c.; whence possibly the proverbial offering to take the sacrament of the truth of a thing, was first meant by attesting upon oath.

SACRAMENTUM ALTARIS. The sacrifice of the mass, or what is now called the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Paroch. Antiq. 488.

SACRILEGE, sacrilegium.] Church robbery, or a taking of things out of a holy place; as where a person steals any vessels, ornament, or goods of the church: and it is said to be a robbery of God, at least of what is dedicated to his service. 3 Cro. 153. If any thing belonging to private persons, left in a church, be stolen, it is only common theft, not sacrilege: but the canon law determines that also to be sacrilege; as likewise the stealing of a thing known to be consecrated, in a place not consecrated. Treat. Laws, 360.

By the civil law sacrilege is punished with greater severity than other thefts; and the common law distinguished this crime from other robberies; for it denied the benefit of the clergy to the offenders, which it did not do to other felons but by statute it is put upon a footing with other felonies, by making it felony excluded of clergy, as most other felonies are. 2 Inst. 250.

All the old statutes on the subject are repealed, and now by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 10. persons breaking and entering any church or chapel and stealing therein any chattel, or having stolen any chattel therein, breaking out of the same, are guilty of felony and shall suffer death.

A dissenting chapel is not within the above statute. 6 C. & P. 335. See further Accessory, Burglary.

The term sacrilege was also anciently applied to the alienation to laymen, and to profane or common purposes, of what was given to religious persons and to pious uses: this was a guilt which our forefathers were very tender of incurring; and therefore when the order of the knights templars was dissolved, their lands were, under this pretext, afterwards violated, given to the knights hospitallers of Jerusalem, for this reason: ne in pios usus erogata, contra donatorum voluntatem in alios usus distraherentur. Paroch. Antiq. 390.

SADBERGE. A denomination of part of the county palatine of Durham. See 11 Geo. 4. c. 11; Domesday, Bolden-Book, 577; Camden's Britannia; Brigantes, p. 744, ed. 1637.

SAFE-CONDUCT, salvus conductus.] A security given by the prince, under the great seal, to a stranger, for his safe coming into, and passing out of, the realm; the form whereof is in Reg. Orig. 25.

The royal prerogative of granting safe-conducts is considered by Blackstone as nearly related to, and plainly derived from, that of making war. See King, V. 3.

Great tenderness is shown by our laws, not only to foreigners in distress, (see Wreck,) but with regard also to the admission of strangers who come spontaneously; for as long as their nation continues at peace with ours, and they behave themselves peaceably, they are under the king's protection, though liable to be sent home whenever the king sees occasion. But no subject of a nation at war with us can, by the law of nations, come into the realm, nor can travel himself upon the high seas, or send his goods and merchandise from one place to another, without danger of being seized by our subjects, unless he has letters of safe-conduct; which by divers ancient statutes must be granted under the king's great seal, and enrolled in Chancery, or else are of no effect; the king being supposed the best judge of such emergencies, as may deserve exception from the general law of arms. But passports under the king's sign-manual, or licences from his ambassadors abroad, are now more usually obtained, and are allowed to be of equal validity. 1 Comm. c. 7. p. 259, 260. See 15 Hen. 6. c. 3; 18 Hen. 6. c. 8; 20 Hen. 6. c. 1; and tit. Alien.

Indeed the law of England, as a commercial country, pays a very particular regard to foreign merchants in innumerable instances. One is highly proper to be mentioned in this place. By Magna Charta, c. 30. it is provided, that all merchants (unless publicly prohibited beforehand) shall have safe-conduct to depart from, to come into, to tarry in, and to go through England, for the exercise of merchandise, without any unreasonable imposts, except in time of war; and, if a war breaks out between us and their country, they shall be attached (if in England) without harm of body or goods, till the king or his chief justiciary be informed how our merchants are treated in the land with which we are at war; and, if ours be secure in that land, they shall be secure in ours. See 1 Comm. p. 260; Montesq. Sp. L. xx. 13.

The violation of safe-conducts or passports, or the committing acts of hostility against such as are in amity, league, or truce with us, who are here under a general implied safe-conduct, are breaches of public faith; without the preservation of which there can be no intercourse or commerce between one nation and another; and they are considered as one just ground of national war. And as, during the continuance of any safe-conduct, either express or implied, the foreigner is under the protection of the king and the law; and, more especially, as we have seen that it is one of the articles of Magna Charta, that foreign merchants should be entitled to safe-conduct and security throughout the kingdom; there is no question but that any violation of either the person or property of such foreigner may be punished by indictment in the name of the king, whose honour is more particularly engaged in supporting his own safe-conduct. And when this malicious rapacity was not confined to private individuals, but broke out into general hostilities, by 2 Hen. 5. c. 1. c. 6. the breaking of truce and safe-conducts, or abetting and receiving the truce-breakers, was (in affirmation and support of the law of nations) declared to be high treason against the crown and dignity of the king; and conservators of truce and safe-conducts were appointed in every port, and empowered to hear and determine such treasons (when committed at sea) according to the ancient marine law, then practised in the admiral's court; and, together with two men learned in the law of the land, to hear and determine according to that law the same treasons, when committed within the body of any county. Which statute, so far as it made these offences amount to treason, was suspended by 14 Hen. 6. c. 8. and repealed by 20 Hen. 6. c. 11. but revived by 29 Hen. 6. c. 2. which gave the same powers to the lord chancellor, associated with either of the chief justices, as belonged to the conservators of truce and their assessors; and enacted that, notwithstanding the party be convicted of treason, the injured stranger should have restitution out of his effects, prior to any claim of the crown. And it is farther enacted by 31 Hen. 6. c. 4. that if any of the king's subjects attempt or offend upon the sea, or in any port within the king's obedience, against any stranger in amity, league, or truce, or under safe-conduct; and especially by attaching his person, or spoiling him, or robbing him of his goods; the lord chancellor, with any of the justices of either the King's Bench or Common Pleas may cause full restitution and amends to be made to the party injured.

It is observed that the suspending and repealing acts of 14 & 20 Hen. 6. and also the reviving act of 29 Hen. 6. were only temporary; so that it should seem that, after the expiration of them all, the 2 Hen. 5. continued in full force; but yet it is considered as extinct by the 11 Edw. 1. c. 4. which revives and confirms all statutes and ordinances, made before the accession of the House of York, against breakers of amities, truces, leagues, and safe-conducts, with an express exception to the 2 Hen. 5. But (however that may be) it seems to have been finally repealed by the general statutes of Edward VI. and Queen Mary, for abolishing new created treasons; though Hale seems to question it as to treasons committed on the sea. 1 Hal. P. C. 267. But certainly the 31 Hen. 6. remains in full force to this day. 4 Comm. c. 5. p. 69, 70.

For encouraging the manufacture of sail-cloth, any person may import into this kingdom undressed flax, without paying any duty for the same, so as a due entry be made thereof at the custom-house, &c. No drawback is to be allowed on re-exportation of foreign sail-cloth: but an allowance shall be made of 1*d.* per ell for British sail-cloth exported, &c. All foreign sail-cloth imported, from which duties are granted, shall be stamped, expressing from whence imported, &c. Manufacturers of sail-cloth in this kingdom are to affix to every piece by them made, a stamp containing their names and places of abode; or exposing it to sale shall forfeit 10*l.* If any persons cut off or obliterate such stamps, they incur a forfeiture of 5*l.* upon conviction before one or more justices, to be levied by distress, &c. 4 Geo. 2. c. 27.

Under the provisions of the 9 Geo. 4. c. 76. § 16. the bounties formerly allowed on the exportation of sail-cloth are discontinued.

Ships built, on first setting out to sea, to have one complete set of sails manufactured here, on pain of 50*l.* No sail-maker may work up into sails foreign sail-cloth not stamped, under 20*l.* penalty: sail-cloth made in Great Britain, the pieces being made of certain lengths and breadths, shall weigh so many pounds each bolt, and the warp wrought of double yarn, &c. Flax yarn used in British sail-cloth not to be whitened with lime, on forfeiture of 6*d.* a yard. Sail-makers, &c. are to cause this act to be put up in their shops and workhouses, under the penalty of 40*s.* 9 Geo. 2. c. 37.

So much of the last-mentioned act as relates to the materials to be used in the manufacture of British sail-cloth, and the manner of manufacturing the same, was repealed by the 1 Geo. 4. c. 25.

Masters of ships are to make entry of all foreign made sails on board, under the penalty of 50*l.* and pay duty for the same, unless they choose to deliver up the sails as forfeited: sails brought from the East Indies were exempted from duty; [but this is repealed by 54 Geo. 3. c. 66. § 2.] Foreign-made sail-cloth imported, is to be stamped at the landing: forger of stamps, &c. shall forfeit 50*l.* A sail-maker making foreign sail-cloth unstamped into sails, shall forfeit 50*l.* A sail-maker shall not repair or amend the same under the penalty of 20*l.* 19 Geo. 2. c. 27.

Now, by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 76. § 12. foreign sails when imported by, and fit and necessary for, and in the actual use of any British ship, are exempted from duty; but when otherwise disposed of, they pay an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent.

SAINT MARTIN LE GRAND, court of.] The chief of the several courts in London are the sheriff's courts, holden before their steward or judge; from which a writ of error lies to the court of hustings, before the mayor, recorder, and sheriffs; and from thence to justices appointed by the king's commission who used to sit in the church of Saint Martin le Grand; and from the judgment of those justices, a writ of error lies immediately to the House of Lords. 3 Comm. 80. n. cites F. N. B. 32.

SAIO. A tipstaff, or serjeant-at-arms; derived from the Saxon, sagol, fustis, because they used to carry a rod or staff. Spelm.

SAKE. See Sac, Soke.

SALARY, salarium.] A recompense or consideration made to a person for his pains and industry in another man's business: the word is used in the 23 Edw. 3. c. 1.

It is so called, as Pliny saith in the thirty-first book of his Natural History, c. 7. because it is as necessary for a man as salt; and makes his labour relish, as salt doth his meat. Termes de la Ley.

Salarium at first signified the rents or profits of a sala, hall or house; (and in Gascoigne they now call the seats of the gentry salas, as we do halls;) but afterwards it was taken for any wages, stipend, or annual allowance. Cowell.

SALE, venditio.] The transferring the property of goods from one to another, upon valuable consideration: if a bargain is that another shall give me 5*l.* for such a thing, and he gives me earnest which I accept, this is a perfect sale. Wood's Inst. 316. On sale of goods if earnest be taken to the seller, and part of them are taken away by the buyer, he must pay the residue of the money upon fetching away the rest, because no other time is appointed; and the earnest given binds the bargain, and gives the buyer a right to demand the goods; but a demand without paying the money is void: and it has been held that, after the earnest is taken, the seller cannot dispose of the goods to another, unless there is some default in the buyer; therefore if he doth not take away the goods and pay the money, the seller ought to require him so to do; and then if he doth not do it in convenient time, the bargain and sale is dissolved, and the seller may dispose of them to any other person. 1 Salk. 113. A seller of a thing is to keep it a reasonable time, for delivery; but where no time is appointed for delivery of things sold, or for payment of the money, it is generally implied that the delivery be made immediately, and payment on the delivery. 3 Salk. 61. Where one agrees for wares sold, the buyer must not carry them away before paid for; except a day of payment is allowed him by the seller. Noy, 87.

A sale may be of any living or dead goods in a fair or market, be they whose they will, or however the seller come by them, if made by the cautions required by law: but if one sell my goods unduly, I may have them again. Doct. & Stud. 328; Perk. § 93. If a man affirm a thing sold is of such a value when it is not, this is not actionable; but if he actually warrants it, at the time of the sale, and not afterwards, it will bear an action, being part of the contract. 2 Cro. 5. 386. 630; 1 Roll. Abr. 97.

Where the seller of goods, upon the buyer's refusal to accept them, requested the buyer to sell them for him, which the buyer agreed to do, if he could, but did not: the court of K. B. held that, in an action by the seller for the price, the jury, in considering whether the request made by the seller was a waiver of the contract of sale, could not take into their consideration whether such request was made under an ignorance of the law, and an impression that his remedy was gone. 3 M. & S. 378.

A., by letter, offered to sell to B. certain specified goods, receiving an answer by return of post: the offerer's letter being misdirected, the answer, notifying the acceptance, arrived two days later than it would otherwise have done, and A. had then sold the goods: the court of K. B. held that B. was entitled to recover against A. in an action for not completing his contract, the default in the return of the answer resulting from A.'s mistake, and that there was a contract binding the parties from the moment the offer was accepted. 1 B. & A. 681.

A., a foreign merchant, employs B. to purchase goods on commission: the vendors (with the knowledge that the purchases were made on account of A.) make out the invoice to B., and take in payment his acceptances, payable at six months: held, 1st, that there was no contract of sale as between A. and B.; and, 2dly, that B. could not, at all events, maintain any action against A. before the six months expired. 1 B. & A. 14.

By the common law, a parol contract for the sale of goods was valid; but by the statute of frauds, a memorandum or note in writing, is requisite where the price of the goods amounts to 10*l.* unless the buyer accept and actually receive part of the goods, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain or in part of payment. See Agreement.

The statute of frauds was held not to apply to certain executory contracts, which were nevertheless within the mischief thereby intended to be remedied; but by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. § 7. its enactments were extended to all contracts for the sale of goods of the value of 10*l.* "notwithstanding the goods may be intended to be delivered at some future time, or may not at the time of such contract be actually made, procured, or provided, or fit or ready for delivery, or some act may be requisite for the making or completing thereof, or rendering the same fit for delivery."

SALMON. No person may take salmon in rivers, between the 1st of August and the 11th of November; and salmon are not to be taken under eighteen inches long, &c. under penalties. 13 Edw. 1. c. 47; 1 Eliz. c. 17. See 25 to salmon in the Teign, Dart, and Plym rivers, 43 Geo. 3. c. 61. and as to those in the rivers of Carmarthenshire, 43 Geo. 3. c. 33. Salmon not to be taken in the Thames between 24th August and 11th November. 9 Ann. c. 26. Fishmongers prohibited to buy salmon under six pounds weight. 1 Geo. 1. c. 18. Salmon may be taken in the Ribble between 1st January and 15th September. 23 Geo. 2. c. 26.

By 58 Geo. 3. c. 43. for preventing the destruction of the breed of salmon, and fish of salmon kind, in the rivers of England, the justices at quarter sessions are authorized to appoint conservators or overseers of rivers; and to fix the periods, not exceeding 150 days in each year, to be Fence-days during which such fish, or the brood or fry thereof shall not be taken. Penalties are imposed on persons illegally destroying the fish, or brood or fry, by poisoning or spoiling the water, &c. or having in their possession fish, &c. at unreasonable times.

SANCTA. The reliques of the saints; parati super sancta was to make oath on those reliques. L. g. Cant. c. 57.

SANCTUARY. Sanctuarium. A place privileged for the safeguard of offenders' lives, being founded upon the law of mercy, and the great reverence and devotion which the prince bears to the place whereunto he grants such privilege. Sanctuaries were first granted by King Lucius to our churches and their prelates; and among all other nations, our ancient kings of England seem to have attributed most to those sanctuaries, permitting them to shelter such as had committed heinous crimes and treasons, so as within forty days they acknowledged their fault, and submitted themselves to banishment, during which space, if any layman expelled them, he was excommunicated; and if a clerk, he was made irregular. Mut. West. Ann. 187, 1 P. C. II. 2. cap. 38; Fleta, lib. 1. c. 29.

St. John's of Beverly in Yorkshire had an eminent sanctuary belonging to it in the time of the Saxons; and St. Burgo in Cornwall had the like granted by King Athelstan, Ann. 965; so had Westminster granted by King Edward the Confessor; and St. Martin le Grand in London, 21 Hen. 8. &c.

In Scotland the abbey of Holyrood house, the ancient palace of the Scottish kings, still possesses the privilege of giving sanctuary to a debtor. To retire to the abbey, is by statute one of the circumstances which, joined to insolvency, constitutes legal bankruptcy. The bounds of the abbey are extensive, and the whole is placed under the direction of a bailie appointed by the Duke of Hamilton, as heritable keeper of the palace. When a person retires to this sanctuary, he is secured against arrest from the instant he passes the confines, and this security continues for twenty-four hours: to enjoy it beyond that period he must enter his name in books kept by the bailie of the abbey. This sanctuary gives no protection to a criminal nor to a crown debtor, nor fraudulent debtor, nor to a person under an obligation to do an act within his own power; nor does it secure the debtor against such debts as he may contract during his residence in sanctuary, for the personal execution of which debts there is a prison within the bounds. Where a person claims the sanctuary who has no title to it, he may be arrested, with the concurrence of the bailie. Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Sanctuaries, it has been observed, did not gain the name of such till they had the pope's bull, though they had full privilege of exemption from temporal courts by the king's grant only; but no sanctuary granted by general words extended to high treason; though it extended to all felonies, except sacrilege, and to all inferior crimes, not committed by a sanctuary man; and it never was a protection against any action civil, any farther than to save the defendant from execution of his body, &c. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 32.

While this protection against justice remained in force, if a person accused of any crime (except treason, wherein the crown, and sacrilege, wherein the church was too nearly concerned) had fled to any church or churchyard and within forty days after went in sackcloth and confessed himself guilty before the coroner, and declared all the particular circumstances of the offence; and thereupon took the oath in that case provided, viz. that he abjured the realm, and would depart from thence forthwith, at the port that should be assigned him; and would never return without leave from the king; he by this means saved his life, if he observed the conditions of the oath, by going with a cross in his hand, and with all convenient speed, to the port assigned, and embarking. For if, during this forty days' privilege of sanctuary, or in his road to the sea-side, he was apprehended and arraigned in any court, for this felony, he might plead the privilege of sanctuary, and had a right to be remanded, if taken out against his will. But by this abjuration his blood was attainted, and he forfeited all his goods and chattels. The immunity of these privileged places was very much abridged by the 27 Hen. 8. c. 19; 32 Hen. 8. c. 12. And now, by the 21 Jac. 1. c. 28. all privilege of sanctuary, and abjuration consequent thereupon, is utterly taken away and abolished.

There were several statutes made relative to sanctuaries, whilst they existed, viz. Art. Cler. 9 Edw. 1. st. 1. c. 10, 15; 2 Rich. 1. st. 2. c. 3; 4 Hen. 8. c. 2; 21 Hen. 8. c. 2; 22 Hen. 8. c. 2. § 14. By 26 Hen. 8. c. 13. sanctuary was taken from offenders in high treason. SAURUS. A hawk of a year old. Bract. lib. 5. tr. 1. c. 2. part 1.

SAXON-LAGE, Saxon laga, lex Saxonum.] The law of the West Saxons, by which they were governed. See Merchenlege. 4 Comm. c. 33.

The reason why so many traces of the Saxon laws, language, and customs are to be found in England, are thus stated: Robertson, in his History of the Emperor Charles V., says, the Saxons carried on the conquest of that country with the same destructive spirit which distinguished the other barbarous nations. The ancient inhabitants of Britain were either exterminated or forced to take shelter among the mountains of Wales, or reduced into servitude. The Saxon government, laws, manners, and language were of consequence introduced into Britain, and were so perfectly established, that all memory of the institutions previous to their conquest, was abolished. Robertson, vol. i. p. 197. note IV. As to the laws of the Saxons for putting an end to private wars, see id. 285.

SCALAM, ad scalam, at the scale.] The old way of paying money into the exchequer. The sheriff, &c. is to make payment ad scalam, i. e. solvere, præter quamlibet numeratum librum, sex denarios. Stat. Westm. 1. And at that time sixpence superadded to the pound made up the full weight, and nearly the intrinsic value. This was agreed upon as a medium to be the common estimate for the defective weight of money, thereby to avoid the trouble of weighing it when brought to the exchequer. Lowndes's History of Coin, p. 4; Hale's Sher. Accounts, p. 21. See Pensam.

SCALINGA. A quarry or pit of stones, or rather slates, for covering houses: French escaliers, whence scaling of houses, &c. Mon. Angl. tom. 2. p. 130.

SCANDAL. A report or rumour, or an action whereby one is affronted in public. See Libel.

SCANDAL OR IMPERTINENCE IN BILLS IN EQUITY. If a bill in equity contain matter either scandalous or impertinent, the defendant may refuse to answer it till such scandal or impertinence is expunged, which is done upon an order to refer it to one of the masters. 3 Comm. 442. See Chancery, Libel, I.

SCANDALUM MAGNATUM.

Words spoken in derogation of a peer, a judge, or other great officer of the realm. These, though they would not be actionable in the case of a common person, yet when spoken in disgrace of such high and respectable characters, they amount to an atrocious injury, which is redressed by an action on the case, founded on the ancient statutes, as well on behalf of the crown to inflict the punishment of imprisonment on the offender, as on behalf of the party to recover damages for the injury sustained. 3 Comm. c. 8. p. 124.

The law on which this action is grounded is stat. Westm. 1. 3 Edm. 1. c. 34. which, after speaking of "devisors of false news and horrible lies of prelates, dukes, earls, barons, and other nobles and great men of the realm, and also of the chancellor, treasurer, clerk of the privy seal, steward of the king's house, justices of the one bench or of the other, and other great officers of the realm," enacts, "that none contrive or tell any false news, whereby discord or slander may grow between the king and his people, or contrive to tell any false things of prelates, lords, and of others aforesaid, whereof discord or slander might rise within, or any scandal to the realm; and he who doth the same shall be imprisoned till he have brought him forth that did speak the same." This statute is recited by 12 Rich. 2. c. 11. and thereby it is further provided, that the offender not producing his author shall be punished by the advice of the council. 4 Inst. 51; 4 Co. 12 b. See also 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 3. and 1 Eliz. c. 6.

At the time of making the law on which this action is founded, the constitution of this kingdom was martial, and given to arms; the very tenures were military, and so were the services, as knight-service, castle-guard, and escuage; so that all provocations by vilifying words were revenged by the sword, which often created factions in the commonwealth, and endangered the government itself; for in this kind of quarrels the great men, or peers of the realm, usually engaged their vassals, tenants, and friends, so that the laws were then made against wearing of liveries or badges, and against riding armed; therefore it is that the stat. Westm. 2. appoints that the offender shall suffer imprisonment until he produces the author of a false report. 2 Mod. 156.

This action or public prosecution for scan. mag. is totally different from the action of slander in the case of common persons. The scandalum magnatum is reduced to no rule or certain definition, but it may be whatever the courts in their discretion shall judge to be derogatory to the high character of the person of whom it is spoken; as to say of a peer, "that he was no more to be valued than a dog;" which words would have been perfectly harmless, if uttered of an inferior person. Bul. N. P. 4.

Though this action is now seldom or ever resorted to, it may be matter of some utility, as well as curiosity, to peruse the following determinations on the subject:

I. Who may bring this Action, and for what Words it lies.

II. Of the Proceedings in this Action.

I. It hath been held that the king is not included in the words "great men of the realm," as the statute begins with an enumeration of persons of an inferior rank, as prelates, dukes, &c. Crompt. Juris. 19, 35.

Scandalizing the marriage of King Henry VIII. with Anne Bullein, was declared treason by 25 Hen. 8. c. 22.

Also it is held, that a woman noble by birth is not entitled to this action. Crompt. Juris. 34.

It hath been adjudged, that though there was no viscount at the time of making this statute (the first viscount being John Beaumont, who was created viscount 18 Henry VI.) yet when created noble, though by a new title, he was entitled to his action on this statute. Cro. Car. 136; Palm. 563; Viscount Say and Sele v. Stephens.

Also it hath been adjudged, that since the Union a peer of Scotland may have an action on this statute, and that it is not necessary for him to allege that he hath a seat and voice in parliament; for by 5 Ann. c. 8. art. 23. all peers of Scotland, after the Union, shall be peers of Great Britain, and have rank and precedence, &c. be tried, &c. and enjoy all privileges of peers, as the peers of England now do or hereafter may enjoy, except the right and privilege of sitting in the House of Lords, and the privilege depending thereon. Com. 439, Lord Falkland v. Phipps.

It hath been contended, that no words of slander are punishable by this statute, unless they are actionable at common law, and that they are only aggravated by the statute, which in this respect is like the king's proclamation. 2 Mod. 161; Freem. 222.

But the contrary hereof seems to have been holden in most of the cases on this head, and not without reason, as it would be to no purpose to make a law, and thereby to give a peer an action for such words as a common person might have before the making of the statute, and for which the peer himself had equally a remedy by the common law, and therefore the design of the statute must be, not only to punish such things as import a great scandal in themselves, or such for which an action lay at the common law, but also such things as savoured of any contempt of the persons of the peers or great men, and brought them into disgrace with the commons, whereby they took occasion of provocation and revenge. 2 Mod. 156.

It hath been observed, that no action was brought on this statute till 100 years after the making thereof, the lords still continuing the military way of revenge to which they had been accustomed. 2 Mod. 156.

The first case on this statute said to be reported, is in Kielm., where the Lord Beauchamp brought an action of scan. mag. against Sir Richard Crofts, for that the said Richard had sued out a writ of forgery of false deeds against him; and it was held, that the taking out the writ, being done in a legal way, and in a course of justice, the action did not lie. Kielm. 26, 27; 3 Mod. 164, cited.

Scan. mag. brought for saying of a judge, "You are a corrupt judge," and held actionable. Crompt. Juris. 35, Lord Chief Justice Dyer's case. So for these words, "He imprisoned me till I gave him a release." 3 Leon. 376, Lord Winchester's case, cited Freem. 221. So these words, "You have writ a letter to me, which I have to show, which is against the word of God, against the queen's authority, and to the maintenance of superstition, and that I will stand to prove against you," were held actionable, and 500 marks damages given. Cro. Eliz. 1, Bishop of Norwich v. Pricke. So of these words, "My Lord Mordaunt did know that Prude robbed Shotbolt, and bid me compound with Shotbolt for the same, and said he would see me satisfied for the same, though it cost him 100*l.*, which I did for him, being my master, otherwise the evidence I could have given would have hanged Prude." Cro. Eliz. 67. For these words written in a letter, "I have heard that your lordship hath sought by uncharitable means to bereft of my life, lands, and liberty," an action lies. Moor. 142; Lord Lumley v. Fox, 4 Co. 16. That the action as well lies for words written as those spoken, see 2 Show. 505.

An action of scan. mag. was brought for these words: "There are more Jesuits come into England since the Earl of Northampton was lord of the Cinque Ports than ever there were before," and held actionable. 12 Co. 132. In scan. mag. for these words, spoken by a parson in the pulpit, "The Lord of Leicester is a wicked and cruel man, and an enemy to the reformation in England," adjudged actionable, and 500*l.* damages given. 2 Sid. 21.

So these words, "The Earl of Pembroke is of so little esteem in the country, that no man of reputation hath any esteem for him, and no man will take his word for two-pence, and no man of reputation values him more than I do the dirt under my feet," were held actionable, though said they would not be so in the case of a common person. Freem. 49.

If one says, "I met J. S. whom I do not know, but my Lord P. sent after me to take my purse," an action of scandalum magnatum lies, though not positively said my Lord P. sent him, or that it was to take the purse feloniously, which last, in case of an action by a common person, might be a good exception. 1 Lev. 277; 1 Sid. 434; 2 Keb. 537; Earl of Peterborough v. Sir John Mordant, see 1 Sid. 133; 1 Keb. 813; 1 Lev. 148, Marquis of Dorchester v. Proby. If one says of a peer, "He is an unworthy man, and acts against law and reason," an action of scan. mag. lies, notwithstanding the words are general, and charge him with nothing certain; and so adjudged by North, Wyndham, and Stoughton, against the opinion of Atkins, who said the statute extended not to words of so small and trivial a nature, but to such only which were of greater magnitude, by which discord might arise, &c. and therefore the words "horrible lies" were inserted in the statute. Note.—The rule laid down by the court in this case was, that words should not be construed either in a rigid or mild sense, but according to the general and natural meaning, and agreeable to the common understanding of all men. 2 Mod. 151, &c.; 1 Mod. 232; Freem. 220; Lord Townshend v. Dr. Hughes, which was the last action of scandalum magnatum.

II. It is now clearly agreed, that though there be no express words in the statute which give an action, yet the party injured may maintain one on this principle of law, that when a statute prohibits the doing of a thing which, if done, might be prejudicial to another, in such a case he may have an action on that very statute for his damages. 2 Mod. 152.

Though the action is to be brought tam pro domino rege quam pro seipso, yet the party is to recover all the damages. 1 P. Wms. 690. If the words are actionable at common law, the peer hath his election to proceed on the statute, or at common law. Freem. 49. It hath been held, that this being a general law, the plaintiff need not recite it particularly; and that if he sets forth so much thereof as shows his case to be within the statute, it is sufficient. Cro. Car. 139; 2 Sid. 21; Freem. 425. It is now settled that no new trial is to be granted in scan. mag. for excessive damages, which point seems to have been first determined in the case of Lord Townshend v. Dr. Hughes, where the jury gave 4000*l.* damages. 2 Mod. 151; 1 Mod. 231.

It has been ruled, that in scan. mag. the defendant cannot justify, let the words be ever so true, because the action is brought qui tam, in which the king is concerned; but it hath been held, that the defendant may explain the words by showing the occasion of speaking of them, and thereby extenuate the meaning of them, as was done in Lord Cromwell's case, 4 Co. 14; 2 Mod. 166; Freem. 220; Poph. 67.

In scan. mag. the court will never change the venue on the common affidavit that the words were spoken in another county, because a scandal raised on a peer of the realm reflects on him through the whole kingdom, and he is a person of so great notoriety that there is no necessity of his being tied down to try his cause among his neighbourhood. Cuth. 460; 2 Sulk. 668. See 1 Lev. 56; 1 Kcd. 514; 1 Sid. 185; 2 Mod. 216.

But in the case of Lord Shaftesbury v. Graham, the court, in scan. mag. on a special affidavit of the plaintiff's power and interest in the county where the action was laid, made a rule for changing the venue; but note, that the books which report and cite this case, mention it as a case of the times, and that it was owing to the great influence that lord had in the city of London that the court varied from the general rule, and which rule hath ever since, notwithstanding this case, been adhered to. 2 Jo. 198; 1 Vent. 383; Skin. 40; 2 Show. 200.

It hath been held that the 27 Eliz. c. 8. giving the writ of error in the Exchequer-chamber, does not extend to scan. mag. Cro. Car. 286, 385; 1 Sid. 143. That in an action of scan. mag. special bail is not required. 3 Mod. 41; Holt's Rep. 640. That no costs are to be given the plaintiff on his obtaining a verdict. 2 Show. 506.

SCAVAGE, SCEVAGE, or SCHEWAGE, from the Sax. schawian, i. e. ostendit. A kind of toll or custom exacted by mayors, sheriffs, &c. of merchant-straungers for wares showed or exposed to sale within their liberties; prohibited by the 19 Hen. 7. c. 8. But the city of London retained this ancient custom to a good yearly profit until a very recent period, when it was purchased by the Treasury and abolished. See Package.

SCAVIDUS. The officer who collected the scavage-money, which was sometimes done with great extortion. Cowell.

SCAVENGERS, from the Belg. schueren to scrape or carry away. Persons who are appointed to sweep the streets, and carry the dirt and filth thereof away. In Easter week yearly two ratmen in every parish within the weekly bills of mortality must be elected scavengers by the constables, churchwardens, and other inhabitants, who are to take upon them the office in seven days, under the penalty of 10*l.* These scavengers, every day, except Sundays or holidays, are to bring their carts into the streets, and give notice by a bell, or otherwise, of carrying away dirt, and to stay a convenient time, or shall forfeit 40*s.*; and justices of the peace in their petit sessions may give scavengers liberty to lodge their dirt in vacant places near the streets, satisfying the owner for the damage, &c. All persons within the weekly bills are to sweep the streets before their doors every Wednesday and Saturday, on pain of forfeiting 1*s.* 4*d.* Persons laying dirt or ashes before their houses, incur a forfeiture of 5*s.* Inhabitants and owners of houses are also to pave the streets before their own houses, on the penalty of 20*s.* for every perch. And constables, churchwardens, &c. may make a scavenger's tax, being allowed by two justices of the peace, not exceeding 4*d.* in the pound, &c. 2 W. & M. st. 2. c. 8; and see 3 W. & M. c. 12; 8 & 9 W. 3. c. 37; 6 Geo. 1. c. 6; 18 Geo. 2. c. 33. § 2, 3; and ante, tit. Police.

A scavenger's rate cannot be made for a division in which there is no churchwarden or overseer resident. 1 Str. 630.

SCEAT, Sax.] A small coin among the Saxons equal to four farthings.

SCEITHMAN, Sax.] A pirate or thief. LL. Ethelredi apud Brompton.

SCEPPA SALIS. An ancient measure of salt, the quantity now not known: sceppa, or scapp, was likewise a measure of corn, from the Lat. scapha; baskets, which were formerly the common standard of measure, being called ships or skips in the south parts of England, where a bee-hive is termed a bee-skip. Mon. Ang. p. 284; Paroch. Antig. 604.

SCHIAVA. A sheaf, as schiffa sagittarum, a sheaf of arrows. See Skene de verbor. signif. cod. verbo.

SCHARPENNY. A small duty or compensation: and some customary tenants were obliged to pen up their cattle at night in the pound or yard of the lord for the benefit of their dung; or if they did not so, they paid a small compensation called sharpenny or sharpenny, i. e. dung penny, or money in lieu of dung; the Scotch earn signifying muck or dung. In some parts of the north they still call cow-dung by the name of cow-skern; and in Westmoreland a skarney houghs is a nasty dirty dunghill-wench. Cowell.

SCHEDULE. A little roll, or long piece of paper or parchment, in which are contained particulars of goods in a house let by lease, &c. See Lease.

Schedules are likewise frequently annexed to answers in a Court of Equity or to acts of parliament, containing an account of estates or effects, monies, debts, &c. received or disposed of, or expended by the person putting in the answer, or being the subject of the act. Schedule is a term frequently used instead of inventory.

SCHETES. An ancient term for usury; and the Commons prayed that order might be taken against this horrible vice, practised by the clergy as well as the laity. Rot. Parl. 14 Rich. 2. Cowell.

SCHILLA. A little bell used in monasteries, mentioned in our histories. Faithner lib. 1. c. 8.

SCHIREMAN, Sax. scir-man.] A sheriff. LL. Ine Regis apud Brompton. The ancient name for an earl. See Piers of the Realm, I; Shireman; Sheriff.

SCHIRRENS-GELD, shirgeld.] A tax paid to sheriffs for keeping the shire or county court. Cartular. Abbat. St. Edmund, 37.

SCHISM, schisma.] A rent or division in the church. H. 1.

SCHOOLS. By the 51 Geo. 3. c. 33. tenants in tail or for life, and ecclesiastical persons, are empowered to grant land for endowing schools in Ireland. By the 53 Geo. 3. c. 107. commissioners are appointed for the regulation of endowed schools of public and private foundation in Ireland.

By 58 Geo. 3. c. 91. commissioners were appointed to inquire concerning charities in England for the education of the poor. By 59 Geo. 3. c. 81 and 91. the powers of these commissioners were extended to all charitable foundations in England and Wales, for whatever purpose (with the exception of the universities, &c.), and remedies provided for redress of abuses in all such charities.

The powers of the commissioners under the above acts were continued by several subsequent statutes, and lastly by the 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 34. until the end of the session of parliament in 1834, when they were suffered to expire.

See further, Charitable Uses, Uses.

SCHOOLMASTER. No person shall keep or maintain a schoolmaster who does not constantly go to church, or is not allowed by the ordinary, on pain of 10*l.* a month; and the schoolmaster shall be disabled, and suffer a year's imprisonment. 23 Eliz. c. 1. Recusants are not to be schoolmasters in any public grammar-school, nor any other, unless licensed by the bishop, under the penalty of forfeiting 40*s.* a day. 1 Jac. c. 6. Every schoolmaster keeping any public or private school, and every tutor in any private family, shall subscribe the declaration that he will conform to the liturgy of the Church of England as by law established, and be licensed by the ordinary, or he shall for the first offence suffer three months' imprisonment, &c. 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4. But see now, Dissenters, Roman Catholics.

The 12 Ann. st. 2. c. 7. which imposed the penalty of three months' imprisonment on persons keeping school without a licence from the bishop, was repealed by the 5 Geo. 1. c. 3.

By the canons, no man shall teach in a public school or private house but such as is examined and allowed by the bishop, and of sober life: and all schoolmasters are to teach the catechism of the church in English or Latin, and bring their scholars to church, and afterwards examine them how they are benefited by sermons, &c. Can. 77, 79. Though the Act of Uniformity obliges schoolmasters only to assent to and subscribe the declaration, yet it adds, according to the laws and statutes of this realm, which presupposes some necessary qualification. And therefore a bishop may take time to inquire into the character of an elected schoolmaster before he licenses him. 2 Strange, 1023.

Masters of grammar-schools must be licensed by the ordinary, who may examine the party applying for a licence as to his learning, morality, and religion. 6 T. R. 490.

As to the power of a schoolmaster in correcting his scholars, see Homicide, II. 1.

For regulating and making better provision for schoolmasters in Scotland, see Scotch Acts, 1693, c. 22; 1696. c. 26; and the 43 Geo. 3. c. 54.

SCILICET. An adverb signifying that is to say, to wit.

Hobart, in his exposition of this word, says, it is not a direct and separate clause, nor a direct and entire clause, in a conveyance, but intermedia; neither is it a substantive clause of itself, but it is rather to usher in the sentence of another, and to particularize that which was too general before, or distribute that which was too gross, or to explain that which was doubtful and obscure; and it must neither increase nor diminish the premises or habendum, for it gives nothing of itself; but it may make a restriction where the precedent words are not so very express but that they may be restrained. Hob 171, 172. See also 1 P. Wms 18; and the case of a bond to two with a scilicet, severing the money between them. Dy. 350. The word scilicet in a declaration shall not make any alteration of that which went before. Poph. 201, 204. And yet in some cases the scilicet which introduces a subsequent shall not be rejected. 2 Cro. 618.

Though where an allegation is material and necessary, it cannot be rendered immaterial by being laid under a scilicet, yet in some cases an allegation will become a material point of a scilicet, which could not have been so if it had been laid under one. See Bac. Ab. Pleas. (2d ed.)

SCIRE FACIAS.

A writ judicial, most commonly to call a man to show cause to the court whence it issues, why execution of judgment passed should not be made out. This writ is not granted until a year and a day be elapsed after judgment given. Old Nat. Brev. fol. 151. Scire facias upon a fine lay not but within the same time after the fine levied, otherwise it was the same with the writ of habere facias seisinam. West. Symbol. part 2. tit. Fines, § 137. See 25 Edw. 3. st. 5. cap. 2; 39 Eliz. c. 7.

Other diversities of this writ are in the table of the Register Judicial and Original. See also Rastall's Entries, verb. Scire facias. Cowell. And post, tit. Scire Facias against Bail; Ad audiendum errores; In detinue, &c.

All writs of execution must be sued out within a year and a day after the judgment is entered, otherwise the court concludes prima facie that the judgment is satisfied and extinct. But the court will grant a writ of scire facias in pursuance of Stat. Westm. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 45. for the defendant to show cause why the judgment should not be revived, and execution had against him; to which the defendant may plead such matter as he has to allege, in order to show why process of execution should not be issued. 3 Comm. 421.

- I. Of the Nature of the Writ, and in what Cases it is a proper Remedy.
- II. Of the Scire Facias to revive Judgment, and after what time necessary.
- III. Of the Scire Facias on Recognizances and Statutes.
- IV. Of the Pleadings and Proceedings on a Scire Facias, and herein of Ter-tenants. See ante, I.

I. A SCIRE FACIAS is deemed a judicial writ, (or action, 2 T. R. 46, 267,) and founded on some matter of record, as judgments for debt or damages where the party recovering the same hath not sued out execution within the year and day; or on recognizances and letters patent, on which it lies to enforce the execution of them, or to vacate or set them aside; and though it be a judicial writ of execution, yet it is so far in nature of an original, that the defendant may plead to it, and is in that respect considered as an action; and therefore it is held, that a release of all actions, or a release of all executions, is a good bar to a scire facias. Lut. § 505; Co. Litt. 290, b; 291, a; F. N. B. 267; Termes de la Ley.

But though it be held that a scire facias is in nature of an original, yet it hath been adjudged, that no writ of error lies into the Exchequer chamber on a judgment given in B. R. on a scire facias; the 27 Eliz. c. 8. which gives the writ of error, mentioning only suits or actions of debt, detinue, covenant, account, actions upon the case, ejectiones firmarum, or trespass. Cro. Car. 286, 300, 464; 1 Roll. Rep. 264; 1 Vent. 38; 1 Salk. 263.

If a bill of exceptions be tendered to a judge, and he signs it, and dies, a scire facias lies against his executors or administrators to certify it. 4 Inst. 438. See 2 Inst. 428.

A scire facias lies against a sheriff who levies money on a fi. fa. and retains it in his hands. Holt, 32; Cro. Jac. 514; 1 And. 247; Godb. 276.

So a scire facias will lie for a fine assessed on the party at the justice seat of a forest. Cro. Car. 409. It lies to have execution of damages recovered in an appeal. Cro. Jac. 519.

Upon an elongavit returned by the sheriff, a scire facias lies against the pledges in replevin, by the plaintiff in the sheriff's court, transmitted to the hustings, and so to B. R. by certiorari. Comb. 1. And a scire facias lies against the sheriff for taking insufficient pledges in replevin. Hutt. 77.

If one hath judgment in a quare impedit, and afterwards, before execution, the party is outlawed, the king may have a scire facias to execute the judgment; the king having privity enough in this case to show execution, because the thing, as it was in the plaintiff, vested in the king. Moor, 241, Cro. Plaz. 41, 35. Where having the thing gives a sufficient privity to maintain a scire facias, see K. br. 108, 169.

On a motion to discharge an outlawry which was pardoned by the act of oblivion, the court held that it could not be done on motion, but that the party must bring a scire facias on the act. Stil. 348. See Outlawry, IV.

Where one obtained judgment, and after had judgment on a scire facias thereupon, and then became a bankrupt, and the original judgment was assigned by the commissioners to S. S. upon motion, it was entered to entitle him to the benefit of the judgment on the scire facias without bringing a new one. 3 Mod. 88.

A scire facias brought by the successor of a president of the College of Physicians, in London, (upon a judgment in debt obtained by him upon the 14 & 15 Hen. 8. c. 5. against practising physic in London without a licence,) who died before execution; it was objected on demurrer, that the scire facias ought to have been brought by the executor or administrator of him who recovered. But without argument the court held, that the successor might well maintain the action; for the suit is given to the college by a private statute and the suit is to be brought by the president for the time being; and he having recovered in right of the corporation, the law shall transfer that duty to the successor of him who recovered. Cro. Jac. 159.

A scire facias was brought in the Court of C. B. to reverse a fine in ancient demesne; and it was ruled, that no such writ lay, but that the party ought to bring his writ of deceit. Salk. 210; 3 Salk. 35; 3 Lev. 419; 1 Ld. Raym. 177.

Where either party dies, between the verdict and the judgment, it is enacted, by the 17 Car. 2. c. 8. "that his death shall not be alleged for error, so as the judgment be entered within two terms after the verdict." In the construction of this statute, it has been holden that the death of either party before the assizes is not remedied; but if the party die after the assizes begin, though before the trial, that is within the remedy of the statute: for the assizes are considered but as one day in law, and this is a remedial act, which shall be construed favourably. The judgment upon this statute is entered by or against the party, as though he were alive; and it should be entered, or at least signed, within two terms after the verdict. But there must be a scire facias to revive it, before execution can be taken out: and such scire facias pursuing the form of the judgment should be general, as on a judgment recovered by or against the party himself. Tidd's Pract. K. B., and the authorities there cited.

By the 8 & 9 Wm. 3. c. 11. "in all actions to be commenced in any court of record, if the plaintiff or defendant happen to die after interlocutory and before final judgment, the action shall not abate by reason thereof, if such action may have been originally prosecuted or maintained, by or against the executors or administrators of the party dying; but the plaintiff, or if he be dead after such interlocutory judgment, his executors or administrators, shall and may have a scire facias against the defendant, if living after such interlocutory judgment, or if he died after, then against his executors or administrators, to show cause why damages in such action should not be assessed and recovered by him or them. And if such defendant, his executors or administrators, shall appear at the return of such writ, and not show or plead any matter sufficient to arrest the final judgment, or being returned warned, or, upon two writs of scire facias, it being returned that the defendant, his executors or administrators, had nothing whereby to be summoned, or could not be found in the county, shall make default, that thereupon a writ of inquiry of damages shall be awarded; which being executed and returned, judgment shall be given for the said plaintiff, his executors or administrators, prosecuting such writ or writs of scire facias, against such defendant, his executors or administrators, respectively." This statute has been held not to extend to cases, where the party dies before interlocutory judgment; though it be after the expiration of the rule to plead. 1 Wils. 315.

Where either party dies, after interlocutory judgment, and before the execution of the writ of inquiry, the scire facias upon this statute ought to be, for the defendant, or his executors or administrators, to show cause why the damages should not be assessed and recovered against them, and to bear the judgment of the court thereupon. Lill. Ent. 647; 6 Mod. 144. But where the death happens after the writ of inquiry is executed, and before the return, the scire facias must be to show cause why the damages assessed by the jury should not be adjudged to the plaintiff, or his executors or administrators. 1 Wils. 243. See 1 T. R. 388. And where the plaintiff dies, after interlocutory, and before final judgment, in an action against the executor, the defendant cannot plead to the scire facias a judgment upon bond against his testator, and no assets ultra; for the statute never intended that the executor should be in a better situation as to the assessing of damages upon the inquiry, than his testator, who could have pleaded nothing but a release, or other matter in bar, arising pais darrein continuance. 1 Salk. 315; 6 Mod. 142.

The judgment upon this statute is not entered by or against the party himself, as upon the 17 Car. 2. c. 8. but by or against his executors or administrators. 1 Salk. 42. And where the defendant dies after interlocutory and before final judgment, two writs of scire facias must be sued out by the plaintiff before he can have execution: one before the final judgment is signed, in order to make the executors or administrators parties to the record: the other after final judgment is signed, in order to give them an opportunity of pleading no assets, or any other matter in their defence; for it would be unreasonable that the executors or administrators should be in a worse situation, where their testator or intestate died before the final judgment was signed, than they would have been in if they had died afterwards. Say. 266. See Abatement, I. 6. c.

II. THERE have been different opinions, whether a scire facias lay at common law or not; but this doubt, says Coke, arose for want of distinguishing between personal and real actions. At common law, if after judgment given, or recognizance acknowledged, the plaintiff did not sue out execution within the year, the plaintiff, or his consuee, was driven to his original upon the judgment; and the scire facias in personal actions was given by the statute of Westm. 2. c. 45. But in real actions, or upon a fine, though no execution was sued out within a year after the judgment given, or fine levied; yet after the year a scire facias lay for the land, &c. because no new original lay upon the judgment or fine. 2 Inst. 469, 470.

A scire facias lay as well in mixed as real actions, and upon a judgment in assise. So it lay upon a judgment in a writ of annuity. Salk. 258, 600.

It hath been adjudged, that if there be judgment in ejectment, and no execution sued thereon in a year and a day, an habere facias possessionem cannot be sued out after, without a scire facias; and Holt, Ch. J. said, that as to the possession of the land an ejectment was real, and the only remedy a termor for years had, and that a recovery therein bound the right of inheritance. Salk. 258, 600; Comb. 250; 7 Mod. 64; and see 1 Sid. 307, 351; 2 Keb. 307; Skin. 161; 3 Lev. 100; Lutw. 1268.

But though, after a year and a day, there can be no execution of a judgment without a scire facias, yet if the plaintiff hath been delayed by a writ of error, he may take out execution within a year and a day after the judgment affirmed. 5 Co. 80; Moor, 566, pl. 772; Cro. Eliz. 706; Godb. 372; Palm. 44. See 1 Roll. Abr. 899; Lan. 20; Dennis v. Drake; Cro. Eliz. 416.

So, if after the year after the recovery the defendant brings a writ of error, and the judgment is affirmed, though before the writ of error brought the recoveror was put to his scire facias, yet this affirmation is a new judgment, and the recoveror may have, within the year after the affirmation, a feri facias, or capias without a scire facias. 1 Roll. Abr. 899. And see Palm. 449; Latch. 193.

So, if he be nonsuit in the writ of error, or if the writ of error be discontinued; for though in these cases there is not any new judgment given, yet the bringing of the writ of error revives the first judgment. Cro. Jac. 364; 1 Roll. Rep. 104, 113. Vide 1 Roll. Abr. 899.

If upon a judgment there be a cesset executio for a year after the judgment, the plaintiff within the subsequent year may take out execution without a scire facias. 6 Mod. 288; 7 Mod. 64.

Also it hath been held, that where execution hath been taken out after the year and day, it is not void, but voidable only. 3 Leon. 404; Salk. 273.

If the execution is staid by injunction, though the act of the defendant, yet the court will not take notice thereof. See Execution.

In such case there must be a scire facias; the staying the proceedings by injunction does not appear to the court by any record of its own: nor is the filing a bill in equity any revival of the judgment, as in the case of a writ of error. 6 Mod. 288; Salk. 322. See Injunction. But where it appeared that the whole delay had arisen, on the part of the defendant, by bills in Chancery for injunctions, and by obtaining time for payment, &c. the court were unanimous that this rule of reviving a judgment above a year old, by scire facias before execution, which was intended to prevent a surprise upon the defendant, ought not to be taken advantage of by one, who was so far from being surprised by the delay, that he himself had been trying all manner of methods, whereby he might delay the plaintiff, and therefore they discharge the rule for setting aside the execution, with costs. 2 Burr. 660.

If judgment be given in debt, and no execution sued out within the year, yet the plaintiff may, after an award of an elegit on the judgment roll, as of the same term with the judgment, continue it from thence by vicecomes non misit breve; so held on a motion to set aside the execution; and though the court said that an elegit ought to be actually taken out within the year, yet being informed by the clerks of the court, that it had been the practice for many years to make such entry, &c. it was said to be the law of the court, and they ordered the execution to stand. Carth. 283; 2 Show. 235; Comb. 232.

If the demandant, or plaintiff, taketh his process of execution within the year, though it be not served within the year, yet if he continue the same, he may have execution at any time after the year. 2 Inst. 471; Co. Litt. 290, b; and see 2 Leon. 77, 78, 87; 3 Leon. 259; 4 Leon. 44; 1 Sid. 59; 1 Keb. 159; 6 Mod. 288.

If the plaintiff delay the executing of a writ of inquiry till a year after the interlocutory judgment, he cannot execute it after without a scire facias.

In the case of the king there need not be any scire facias after the year and day. 2 Salk. 603.

After a judgment, if the plaintiff within a year sues a scire facias, he cannot have a capias, within the year, until he hath a new judgment on the scire facias. 1 Roll. Abr. 900; 3 Danv. 333, Q. p. 1.

Where there is any change or alteration of parties, a scire facias is in general necessary to warrant an execution, as in case of death, &c. Where there are two or more plaintiffs or defendants in a personal action, and one of them dies before judgment, his death should regularly be suggested on the roll, and judgment entered for or against the survivors. But where one of two plaintiffs died before interlocutory judgment, and the first notwithstanding went on to execution in the name of both; on a motion to set aside the proceedings for this irregularity, the court permitted the plaintiff to suggest the death of the other before interlocutory judgment on the roll, and to amend the ca. sa. without paying costs. And where one of several plaintiffs dies after judgment, execution may be had for or against the survivors, without a scire facias; but the execution in such case should be taken out in the joint names of all the plaintiffs or defendants, otherwise it will not be warranted by the judgment. Tidd's Pract. K. B. c. 41. and the authorities there cited. If proceedings are removed out of the county-court or other courts, not of record, by writ of false judgment, and the plaintiff is nonprossed, the execution shall issue out of the court above, and a scire facias seems to be necessary for this purpose. Tidd's Pract. K. B. c. 41. And see further, Abatement.

A scire facias seems necessary under the Lords' Act, 32 Geo. 2. c. 28. § 20, which gives execution against the future goods of an insolvent debtor taking the benefit of that act. 1 T. R. 80.

When a prisoner is charged in execution, the execution is considered as executed: and therefore though the plaintiff afterwards die, his executors are not bound to revive the judgment by scire facias, or even to charge the defendant in execution de novo. Tidd's Pract. K. B. 211, cites King v. Millet, Hil. 22 Geo. 3.

Judgment being entered on a bond to secure the quarterly payment of an annuity, and a fi. fa. having issued for the arrears of the last half year, a second fi. fa. may be taken out for the next quarter without reviving the judgment by scire facias. 1 H. Blackst. 297.

By one of the general rules of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. § 79. "a scire facias to revive a judgment more than ten years old shall not be allowed, without a motion for that purpose in term, or a judge's order in vacation; nor if more than fifteen without a rule to show cause."

III. RECOGNIZANCES and statutes are considered as judgments, being obligations solemnly acknowledged, and entered of record, and the scire facias on those is the judicial writ and proper remedy which the conusee hath; but herein we must distinguish between recognizances at common law and statutes-merchants, &c. for, upon the former, if the conusee did not take out execution within a year after the day of payment assigned in the recognizance, he was obliged to commence the suit again by original; the law presuming the debt might have been paid, if execution was not sued within the year after the money became payable; but this law is altered by stat. Westm. 2. c. 45. by which the conusee hath a scire facias given him to revive the judgment, and put it in execution; if the conusor cannot stop it by pleading such matter as the law judges sufficient for that end, such as a release, &c. But the conusee of a statute-merchant, &c. may at any time sue execution on them without the delay or charge of a scire facias. Lit. Rep. 89. That a capias lies not on a recognizance, but only a scire facias, see 1 Br. and 33; Co. Litt. 291; 2 Inst. 469; F. N. B. 296; Bro. Recog. 17.

Also as to recognizances at common law, and statutes and recognizances introduced by statute law, we must further distinguish, that if on the first the conusee dies before execution sued, his executor shall not sue it, even within the year, without bringing a scire facias against the conusor; the reason is, because the law presumes the debt might have been paid to the testator, and therefore will not suffer the debtor to be molested, unless it appear that he hath omitted to perform the judgment; and this is to be done by scire facias brought by the executor, for the alteration of the person altereth the process at common law; but this tending to delay, the scire facias is taken away in statutes and recognizances by statute law, by the several acts of parliament which introduced them; and therefore upon the death of the conusee of a statute-merchant, &c. his executors may come into chancery, and upon their producing the testament and the statute, shall have execution without a scire facias, as the testator himself might. 3 Inst. 395, 471; Bro. Stat. Merch. 16, 48, 50.

If a man be bound in a recognizance to the king, upon condition to be of good behaviour, &c. he cannot be indicted for breach of the good behaviour, by which he forfeits his recognizance, without a scire facias, for if a scire facias had been brought, he might have pleaded some matter in discharge thereof. 4 Inst. 181; 1 Rol. Abr. 900. What shall be said a breach, see Cro. Car. 498; and how to be assigned, see 3 Bulst. 220; Cro. Jac. 415; Stil. 369; and tit. Surety of the Peace.

If a man acknowledges a recognizance, to be paid at a day within the year after the date of the recognizance, in this case he may have execution by fi. facias or elegit within the year after the day of payment, though the year be past from the date of the recognizance. 21 Edw. 3. 22, b; 1 Rol. Abr. 899, 900; 2 Inst. 471. See 2 Rol. Abr. 468; Co. Lit. 292.

If a man recovers an annuity, he shall have execution for every time that occurs after by fi. facias or elegit within the year after the time incurred; though the year be past from the judgment; but not after the year without a scire facias. 1 Rol. Abr. 900; 2 Inst. 471; Salk. 258, 600.

If two acknowledge a recognizance of 100*l.* jointly and severally, the conusee may sue several scire facias against the conusors upon this recognizance. 2 Inst. 395.

Scire facias upon a recognizance in chancery may be sued out to extend lands, &c. If, upon a scire facias upon a recognizance in chancery, the record be transmitted into B. R. to try the issue, and the plaintiff is nonsuit, he may bring a new scire facias in B. R. upon the record there. 2 Saund. 27. Where a statute is acknowledged, and the cognisor afterwards confesseth a judgment, and the land is extended thereon; in this case the cognisee shall have a scire facias to avoid the extent of the lands; but if the judgment be on goods, it is otherwise. 1 Brownl. 37; 3 Nels. Abr. 186. Scire facias lies on recognizance of the peace, &c. removed into B. R. See Surety of the Peace.

IV. A scire facias on a judgment must pursue the terms of the judgment. 6 T. R. 1.

A scire facias may be pleaded to, before judgment given upon it; afterwards it is too late: though a writ of error may be brought to reverse the judgment on the scire facias, if that be not good on which the judgment was grounded. 2 Inst. 508. Payment was no plea at common law to a scire facias upon a judgment; because it is a debt upon record. 3 Lev. 120. But this was altered by 4 Ann. c. 16, § 12, which gives the defendant liberty to plead such payment.

Whatever is pleadable to the original action in abatement, shall not be pleaded to disable the plaintiff from having execution on a scire facias; because the defendant had admitted him able to have judgment. 1 Salk. 2. If a judgment be brought against an executor, and afterwards a scire facias is brought against him upon that judgment, he cannot plead a judgment recovered against his testator and that he hath not assets ultra, &c. because he might have pleaded it to the first action; for it is a settled rule that if a defendant hath a matter proper for his defence, and he neglects to plead it in bar to the action at the time he may, he shall never take advantage of it after. 2 Strange, 732.

Where an executor pleads plene administravit, and the plaintiff does not take issue on it, but takes a judgment of assets quando acciderint, the scire facias on that judgment must only pray execution of such assets as have come to the executor's hands since the former judgment; and if it pray execution of assets generally, without confining it to that time, it cannot be supported. 6 T. R. 1.

In scire facias on a judgment in debt, or other personal action, the defendant cannot plead non-tenure of the land generally, where it is contrary to the return of the sheriff: though he may plead a special non-tenure: but on a scire facias to have execution in a real action, the defendant may plead non-tenure generally, because the freehold is in question, and that is favoured in law; and the ter-tenants may plead there are other ter-tenants not named, and pray judgment if they ought to answer till the others are summoned, &c. though it would be otherwise if the scire facias had been against particular tenants by name. 2 Salk. 601.

On a scire facias to have execution upon a judgment in action of debt, every ter-tenant is to be contributory; and therefore one shall not answer, as long as he can show that another is liable and not warned: contra on a scire facias upon a judgment in a real action; for every tenant is to answer for that which he hath, and one may be contributory and the other not. 2 Cro. 507.

On a scire facias against the heir and ter-tenants to reverse a common recovery of lands, the scire facias is to issue against all the ter-tenants, for they are to gain or lose by the judgment in the recovery. Raym. 16; 3 Mod. 274. A scire facias to have execution of a fine shall not be sued against lessee for years; but against him who hath the freehold, who may have some matter to bar the execution. Cro. Eliz. 471; 2 Brownl. 144. In ejectment, it was adjudged, that a scire facias might be brought by the lessee, though he was but nominal, and that it may be had by the lessor himself: as either of them may have a writ of error on the judgment: and that it might be brought against those who were strangers to the judgment, and against the executors of the defendant, &c. 2 Lutw. 1267.

In the King's Bench, and in all cases, there must be either one scire facias, with a scire feci returned, or two scire facias with nihil. 2 Inst. 272; 2 Mod. 227. But in C. B. whenever the scire facias is to revive a judgment against the same defendant, who was party and privy to the judgment, one scire facias is sufficient, though a nihil be returned thereto. Dy. 186; Salk. 599. But not so where the defendant is not party to the record. The time, however, between the teste and return, in both courts, is in effect the same: for in C. B. the one scire facias must have fifteen days between the teste and return; whereas, in K. B. there must be fifteen days between the teste of the first and the return of the second scire facias. So, in C. B., where two scire facias are necessary. If only one scire facias and a scire feci in K. B. such scire facias should have fifteen days between the teste and return. So must every scire facias when the proceeding is by original: but if inclusive both of teste and return, it is good. Sellon's Pract.

Although the intent of the scire facias is to give the party, against whom execution is about to issue, notice or warning thereof, yet by the general practice it is wholly defeated, for the defendant may be summoned or not, as the party thinks fit: and, indeed, the usual way is to revive the judgment without giving the party any notice. Sellon's Pract. And it seems that the party may always search the office, and on finding a scire facias left there for a return, he may appear though he is not warned or summoned. A scire facias must lie in the sheriff's office the last four days before the return. 4 T. R. 583.

No alias scire facias must issue till the first writ of scire facias is returnable. R. T. 8 Hm. 3. And in C. B. not until the appearance day of the return of the first. The alias shall bear teste the day of the return of the first; Salk. 599. and in C. B. on the appearance day, as must the alias scire facias by original. Sellon's Pract.

A defendant being summoned upon a scire facias, and the summons returned, if he doth not appear, but lets judgment go by default, he is for ever barred. 1 Lev. 41, 42. If the sheriff hath returned him warned, he shall not have audita querela on a release, &c. for the defendant might have pleaded the same on the return of the scire facias; but if the sheriff return nihil, on which an execution is awarded, he shall have audita querela. New Nat. Br. 230. In the first case, he might have appeared and pleaded; in the other, not being warned, he was not bound to appear. Where there has been no scire feci, and only two nihils, the court will often relieve upon motion, and not put the party to an audita querela. Salk. 93, 264; 2 Strange, 1075.

Now by a rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. § 81. "no judgment shall be signed for non-appearance to a scire facias, without leave of the court or a judge, unless the defendant has been summoned; but such judgment may be signed by leave, after eight days from the return of one scire facias."

Where the plaintiff in the judgment releaseth the defendant of all judgments and executions, &c. the defendant may, upon his release, sue out a writ of scire facias against the plaintiff in the judgment ad cognoscendum scriptum suum relaxationis, and he need not sue out his audita querela. Hil. 5 W. & M. B. R.

Damages are not recoverable in a scire facias. 3 Burr. 1791. And it was formerly held that the plaintiff could not in a scire facias recover costs; but this is now remedied by 8 & 9 Wm. 3. c. 11. Dut. 95; 3 Bulst. 322.

But until recently the plaintiff was not entitled to costs unless the defendant had appeared and pleaded: and no costs were payable by the plaintiff, on moving to quash his own writ before plea, nor after a plea in abatement. Cas. Pract. C. B. 74; 1 Str. 638.

Now by a rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. § 18. a plaintiff shall not be allowed a rule to quash his own writ of scire facias after a defendant has appeared, except on payment of costs.

And by the 3 and 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 34. "in all writs of scire facias, the plaintiff obtaining judgment or an award of execution, shall recover his costs of suit upon a judgment by default, as well as upon a judgment after plea pleaded or demurrer joined."

As to the time within which a scire facias must be brought, see Limitation of Actions, II. 3.

For more learning on this subject, see 4 New Abr. 19; Vin. Abr. tit. scire facias; Wilson's Rep. par. 1. 98. 243; par. 2. 61. 572; the books of practice, and tit. Error, Execution, Judgment, &c.

SCIRE FACIAS AGAINST BAIL. If a capias ad satisfaciendum (see that title, and title Execution) is sued out against a defendant, and a non est inventus is returned thereon, the plaintiff may sue out a process against the bail (where bail were given); for they stipulate, in this triple alternative, that the defendant shall, if condemned in the suit, satisfy the plaintiff his debt and costs; or, that, he shall surrender himself a prisoner; or, that they will pay it for him. As therefore the two former branches of the alternative are neither of them complied with, the latter must immediately take place. In order to which a writ of scire facias may be sued out against the bail, commanding the sheriff to make known to them the judgment, and that they show cause why the plaintiff should not have execution against them for his debt and damages: and in such writ, if they show no sufficient cause, or the defendant does not surrender himself on the day of the return, or of showing cause, (for afterwards it is not sufficient,) the plaintiff may have judgment against the bail, and take out a writ of ca. sa. or other process of execution against them. 3 Comm. c. 26. p. 416. See Bail, I.

There is no attempt, in point of fact, to find the principal on this ca. sa. but it is merely as a warning that the plaintiff means to proceed against the bail; or rather, the ca. sa. against the principal, being left in the sheriff's office, is as notice to the bail, that the plaintiff will proceed against the person, and it is incumbent on the bail to search whether any ca. sa. is left in the office. 4 Burr. 1360.

In order to fix bail it is ordered by the general rule H. T. 2 Wm. 4. § 77. "that in actions commenced by bill a ca. sa. to fix bail shall have eight days between the teste and return; and in actions commenced by original fifteen; and must in London and Middlesex be entered four clear days in the public book at the sheriff's office."

By Reg. Gen. of Trinity Vacation, 17th June, 1833, it is ordered that "where the plaintiff proceeds by action of debt on the recognizance of bail in any of the courts at Westminster, the bail shall be at liberty to render their principal at any time within the space of fourteen days next after the service of process upon them, but not at any later period; and that upon such render being duly made, and notice thereof given, the proceedings shall be stayed upon the payment of the costs of the writ and service thereof only."

A writ of error is a supersedeas of execution from the time of its allowance, provided bail, when requisite, be put in thereon in due time. But it does not prevent the plaintiff from proceeding by action of debt, or scire facias on the judgment against the principal, or by scire facias, or action of debt on the recognizance, against the bail. In such cases, however, if the writ of error be not evidently brought for the mere purpose of delay, the court will stay the proceedings upon terms, pending the writ of error. But this is not a matter of course; and if it be apparent to the court, that the writ of error is brought merely for delay, they will not stay the proceedings. Tidd's Pract. K. B.

In order to stay the proceedings in an action of debt or scire facias on a judgment pending a writ of error, it is necessary that the defendant should be first in court by putting in bail. And where an action is brought upon a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, the Court of K. B. will not stay proceedings, pending a writ of error, without the defendant's giving judgment in the second action, and undertaking not to bring a writ of error upon that judgment. But if the action be brought upon a judgment of the Court of K. B. these terms make no part of the rule, because, in general, actions on judgments are vexatious, and the plaintiff might have his execution on the first judgment. Tidd's Pract. K. B. and the authorities there cited.

On a scire facias, or action of debt on recognizance, against bail, when a writ of error is allowed, and the bail apply within their time for surrendering the principal, the court will stay the proceedings until the writ of error is determined, the bail undertaking to pay the condemnation money, or surrender the defendant into the custody of the marshal, within four days next after the determination of the writ of error, in case the same shall be determined in favour of the defendant in error. And in one case, where the writ of error was allowed before the time was expired for surrendering the principal, though notice of such allowance was not given to the plaintiff's attorney, nor the application consequently made, till after the expiration of that time, the court gave the bail the same terms as are usual when they apply within the time granted, by the course of the court, for surrendering the principal. In a subsequent case proceedings were stayed, the bail undertaking to pay the condemnation-money and the costs on the scire facias in four days after affirmance; but in this case, there being no bail on the writ of error, the court made the bail also undertake to pay the costs on the writ of error, in case the judgment was affirmed; and said, it was a favour they were asking, and they would make them submit to equitable terms. 1 Str. 443; 2 Str. 887.

Now by a rule of H. T. 2 Will. 4. "to entitle bail to a stay of proceedings pending a writ of error, the application must be made before the time to surrender is out."

By the affirmance of the judgment, in these cases, is meant the final affirmance of it; and therefore, where the judgment on a writ of error was affirmed in the Exchequer-chamber, and afterwards another writ of error was brought, returnable in parliament, the proceedings against the bail were further staid till the determination of the second writ of error. 5 Burr. 2819.

Before judgment against the bail on the scire facias can be signed, there must be a rule to appear. By a rule of H. T. 2 Will. 4. "a notice in writing to the plaintiff or his attorney or agent shall be a sufficient appearance by the defendant on a scire facias."

The plaintiff got judgment on the scire facias against bail, pending error by the principal, and took them in execution; and on their moving to be discharged, the court said, though they might have applied, and had the proceedings staid, yet the court would not set them aside. 1 Stra. 526; Barnes, 202. But see 4 Burr. 2454; 3 T. R. 643; sem. contra.

There must be a particular warrant of attorney to a scire facias against the bail, for a warrant in the principal action is no warrant to the scire facias, because these are distinct actions; and the particular warrant is to be entered when the suit commences which is when the writ is returned. 2 Salk. 605. When a scire facias is brought against the bail, it must be in hac parte, and where it is brought against the defendant in the principal action, it is to be in hac parte. 2 Salk. 599.

In scire facias to have execution for damages and costs recovered against J. B. upon a recognizance of bail, conditioned in case the said J. B. and G. K. should be condemned, that J. B. and G. K. should pay, &c. or render themselves, the plaintiffs alleged that J. B. and G. K. had not paid, &c. or rendered themselves according to the form of the recognizance: the court of K. B. held, on special demurrer, the breach ill assigned; for non constat but that J. B. who was condemned had paid or rendered. 4 M. & S. 33. See further, Bail, Error, &c.

SCIRE FACIAS AD AUDIENDUM ERRORES, To hear the Errors assigned. Formerly when a writ of error was brought, as soon as the transcript was entered on record, and the plaintiff had also assigned his errors, and entered the same on record, if the defendant did not immediately plead or join in error, the plaintiff might have staid out this scire facias; and if the defendant in error did not come in, and plead or join to the assignment of errors, upon the return of this writ the plaintiff might have had an alias scire facias, and upon default thereto the plaintiff must have proceeded to argument, and was heard ex parte. But this writ of scire facias was seldom sued out, as the defendant usually appeared gratis: or the plaintiff in error, after his assignment of errors, took out a rule for defendant to appear thereto, and served a copy on the defendant. Curth. 40. And now this writ is no longer necessary, unless in case of a change of parties. See Error IV.

SCIRE FACIAS IN DETINUE. In detinue, after judgment, the plaintiff shall have a distress to compel the defendant to deliver the goods by repeated distress of his chattels; or else a scire facias against any third person in whose hands they may happen to be, to show cause why they should not be delivered. 3 Comm. 413. See ante, tit. Execution.

SCIRE FACIAS TO REMOVE AN USURPER'S CLERK. On a quare impedit in a parsonage, if the bishop, after receipt of the latter writ, admit any person, even though the parson's right may have been found in a jure patronatus, then the plaintiff, after he has obtained judgment in the quare impedit, may remove the incumbent, if the clerk of a stranger, by writ of scire facias. 2 Comm. 218. See Quare Impedit, Quam Incurat.

SCIRE FACIAS TO REPEAL LETTERS-PATENT AND GRANTS. Where the crown hath unadvisedly granted any thing by letters-patent which ought not to be granted, or where the patentee hath done an act that amounts to a forfeiture of the grant, the remedy to repeal the patent is by writ of scire facias in Chancery. This may be brought either on the part of the king, in order to resume the thing granted, or if the grant be injurious to a subject, the king is bound of right to permit him (upon his petition) to use his royal name for repealing the patent in a scire facias. And so, also, if upon an office untruly found for the king, he grants the land over to another, he who is grieved thereby, and traverses the office itself, is entitled, before issue joined, to a scire facias against the patentee, in order to record the grant. 3 Comm. c. 17. p. 260, 261. See Grant of the King, Inquest of Office.

A scire facias to repeal a patent may be brought where the record is, which is in Chancery; and there are to be two of these writs sued out of the Petty Bag Office directed to the sheriff of Middlesex, who, by a letter under the seal of his office, must send notice to the corporation, or person whose concern the patent is, that there is a scire facias issued out, returnable at such a time, and remaining with him, for the revocation of such a patent, and that if they do not appear thereunto, judgment will be had against them by default; and this letter to be delivered to the corporation, or person interested in such patent, by some person who can make oath thereof. Dalton's Sheriff. On a scire facias out of Chancery returnable in B. R. to repeal letters-patent, it was held, that if the letters-patent are granted to the prejudice of any person, as if a fair is granted to the damage of the fair of another, &c. he may have a scire facias on the enrolment of such grant in Chancery, as well as the king in other cases; but it may be a question, whether a scire facias upon a record in Chancery is returnable in B. R. though after it is made returnable into B. R. that court, and not the Chancery, hath the jurisdiction of it. Mod. Cas. 229.

A scire facias to repeal a patent may also be sued out in the Court of King's Bench. 4 Inst. 72.

In all cases at common law, where the king's title accrues by a judicial record, and he grants his estate over, the party grieved could not have a scire facias against the patentee, but was forced to his petition to the king; otherwise it is when his title is by conveyance on record, which is not judicial. 4 Rep. 59. The king hath a right to repeal a patent by scire facias, where he was deceived in his grant, or it is to the injury of the subject. 3 Lev. 220. And where a common person is obliged to bring his action, there, upon an inquisition or office found, the king is put to his scire facias, &c. 9 Rep. 96. A scire facias to repeal letters-patent doth not abate by the demise of the crown. 1 Strange, 43. See further, Patents for Inventions.

SCIRE FACIAS have issued to repeal the grants of offices, for conditions broken, non-attendance, &c. For disability, or in case of forfeiture, the offices may be seized without scire facias. 3 Nels. Abr. 201, 202. See Office, IV.

SCIRE FEE is the return of the sheriff on a scire facias, that he hath caused notice to be given to the party against whom the scire facias issued. See Scire Facias.

SCIREWYTE. The annual tax or prestation paid to the sheriff for holding the assizes or county courts. Paroch. Antig. p. 573.

SCITE, situs.] The setting or standing of any place; the seat or situation of a capital messuage, or the ground whereon it stood. Mon. Ang. tom. 2. fol. 278. The word in this sense is mentioned in the 32 Hen. 8. c. 20; 22 Car. 2. c. 11.

SCORNERS. See Sorners.

SCOLDS. In a legal sense, are troublesome and angry women, who, by their brawling and wrangling amongst their neighbours, break the public peace, increase discord, and become a public nuisance to the neighbourhood. They are indictable in the sheriff's tourn, and punished by the cucking-stool, &c. Kitch. 13; 6 Mod. 213. See Castigatory.

SCOT AND LOT, Sax. scot, pars, and lot, i. e. sors.] Signifies a customary contribution laid upon all subjects according to their ability. Spelm. Nor are these old words grown obsolete, for whoever in like manner (though not by equal proportion) are assessed to any contribution, are generally said to pay scot and lot. 33 Hen. 8. c. 9. See also 11 Geo. 1. c. 18. as to elections in London.

SCOTAL, or SCOTALE. An extortion prohibited by the Charter of the Forest, c. 7. It is where any officer of a forest keeps an alehouse within the forest by colour of his office, causing people to come to his house and there spend their money for fear of his displeasure. It is compounded of scot and ale, which, by transposition of the words, is otherwise called an aleshot. Manwood, 216. The chief justice in eyre of the forests used to grant licenses to keep alehouses within the forests.

SCOTTARE. Those tenants are said scottare whose lands are subject to pay scot. Mon. Ang. i. 875.

SCOTLAND.

THE KINGDOM OF SCOTLAND, notwithstanding the union of the crowns on the accession of their king, James VI. to that of England, continued an entirely separate and distinct kingdom for above a century more, though an union had been long projected; which was judged to be the more easy to be done, as both kingdoms were anciently under the same government, and still retained a very great resemblance, though far from an identity, in their laws. By an act of parliament, 1 Jac. 1. c. 1, it was declared that these two mighty, famous, and ancient kingdoms, were formerly one. And Sir Edward Coke observes, how marvellous a conformity there was, not only in the religion and language of the two nations, but also in their ancient laws, the descent of the crown, their parliaments, their titles of nobility, their offices of state and of justice, their writs, their customs, and even the language of their laws. Upon which account he supposes the common law of each to have been originally the same, especially as their most ancient and authentic book, called Regiam Majestatem, and containing the rules of their ancient common law, is extremely similar to that of Glanvil, which contains the principles of ours, as it stood in the reign of Henry II. 4 Inst. 345. The many diversities now subsisting between the two laws at present may be well enough accounted for from a diversity of practice in two large and uncommunicating jurisdictions, and from the acts of two distinct and independent parliaments, which have in many points altered and abrogated the old common law of both kingdoms. See 1 Comm. Intro. § 4. p. 95. and the note there.

In the reigns of King James II. and King Charles II. commissioners were appointed to treat with commissioners of Scotland concerning an union; but the bringing about this great work was reserved for the reign of Queen Anne. The 1 Ann. st. 1. c. 14. ordained articles to be settled by commissioners for the union of the two kingdoms, &c.; and by the 5 Ann. c. 8. the union was effected.

It has been said that the union ultimately effected was the first instance in history of the kind; for there never was, at any time, in any place, an example of two sovereign kingdoms incorporating themselves in such a manner. Lord Halifax's Letter to the Electress Sophia, 15th Oct. 1706. Macpherson's Original Papers relating to the Secret History of Great Britain.

By the above statute, 5 Ann. c. 8. the Twenty-five Articles of Union, agreed to by the parliaments of both nations, were ratified and confirmed; the purport of the most considerable being as follows:—

1. That on the first of May, 1707, and for ever after, the kingdoms of England and Scotland shall be united into one kingdom by the name of GREAT BRITAIN.

2. The succession to the monarchy of Great Britain shall be the same as was before settled with regard to that of England.

3. The United Kingdom shall be represented by one parliament.

4. There shall be a communication of all rights and privileges between the subjects of both kingdoms, except where it is otherwise agreed.

9. When England raises 2,000,000*l.* (accurately 1,997,763*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*) by a land-tax, Scotland shall raise 48,000*l.*

16, 17. The standards of the coin, of weights, and of measures, shall be reduced to those of England throughout the united kingdoms.

18. The laws relating to trade, customs, and the excise, shall be the same in Scotland as in England. But all the other laws of Scotland shall remain in force; though alterable by the parliament of Great Britain. Yet with this caution, that laws relating to public policy are alterable at the discretion of the parliament; laws relating to private right are not to be altered, but for the evident utility of the people of Scotland.

22. Sixteen peers are to be chosen to represent the peerage of Scotland in parliament, and forty-five members to sit in the House of Commons. See post.

23. The sixteen peers of Scotland shall have all privileges of parliament. And all peers of Scotland shall be peers of Great Britain, and rank next after those of the same degree at the time of the Union, and shall have all privileges of peers, except sitting in the House of Lords, and voting on the trial of a peer.

25. All laws and statutes in either kingdom, so far as they are contrary to these articles, shall cease and become void.

In the 5 Ann. c. 8. two acts of parliament were also recited; the one of Scotland, whereby the church of Scotland, and also the four universities of that kingdom, are established for ever, and all succeeding sovereigns are to take an oath inviolably to maintain the same; the other of England, 5 Ann. c. 6. whereby the acts of uniformity of 13 Eliz. and 13 Car. 2. (except as the same had been altered by parliament at that time) and all other acts then in force for the preservation of the church of England, are declared perpetual; and it is stipulated, that every subsequent king and queen shall take an oath inviolably to maintain the same within England, Ireland, Wales, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed. And it is enacted, that these two acts "shall for ever be observed as fundamental and essential conditions of the Union."

Upon these articles and act of union, it is to be observed, 1st, That the two kingdoms are now so inseparably united, that nothing can ever disunite them again; except the mutual consent of both, or the successful resistance of either, upon apprehending an infringement of those points which, when they were separate and independent nations, it was mutually stipulated should be fundamental and essential conditions of the Union. 2dly, That whatever else may be deemed fundamental and essential conditions, the preservation of the two churches, of England and Scotland, in the same state that they were in at the time of the Union, and the maintenance of the acts of uniformity which establish our common prayer, are expressly declared so to be. 3dly, That therefore any alteration in the constitution of either of those churches, or the liturgy of the church of England, (unless with the consent of the respective churches, collectively or representatively given,) would be an infringement of these fundamental and essential conditions, and greatly endanger the Union. 4thly, That the municipal laws of Scotland are ordained to be still observed in that part of the island, unless altered by parliament; and, as the parliament has not yet thought proper, except in a few instances, to alter them, they still (with regard to the particulars unaltered) continue in full force. Wherefore the municipal or common laws of England are, generally speaking, of no force or validity in Scotland. See 1 Comm. 97, 98, and the note there.

At the time of the Union it was agreed, that the mode of the election of the peers and commons should be settled by an act passed in the parliament of Scotland; which was afterwards recited, ratified, and made part of the act of Union. As to the election of the sixteen peers, see 6 Ann. c. 23. It was formerly resolved by the House of Lords, that a peer of Scotland claiming to sit in the British house of peers, by virtue of a patent, passed under the great seal of Great Britain, had no right to vote in the election of the sixteen Scotch peers; and that no patent of honour granted to any peer of Great Britain, who was a peer of Scotland at the time of the Union, should entitle him to sit in parliament. But in 1782, on the claim of the Duke of Hamilton to sit as Duke of Brandon, the question being referred to the judges, they were unanimously of opinion, that the peers of Scotland were not disabled from receiving, subsequently to the Union, a patent of peerage of Great Britain, with all the privileges usually incident thereto; and the house accordingly admitted the Duke of Hamilton to sit as Duke of Brandon. No objection was ever made to an English peer's taking a Scotch peerage by descent, and therefore, formerly, when it was designed to confer an English title on a noble family of Scotland, the eldest son of the Scotch peer was created in his father's lifetime an English peer, and this creation was not affected by the annexation by inheritance of the Scotch peerage. It seems now to be settled, that a Scotch peer, made a peer of Great Britain, has a right to vote in the election of the sixteen Scotch peers; and that if any of the sixteen Scotch peers are created peers of Great Britain, they thereby cease to sit as representatives of the Scotch peerage; and new Scotch peers must be elected in their room. See 1 Comm. 97. n. 7.

By the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 63. peers of Scotland, being in Ireland, may take the oaths required to qualify them to vote in the election of the Scottish representative peers in certain courts in that country.

With respect to the forty-five commoners, it was, by an act of the Scotch parliament, (and see 6 Ann. c. 6.) enacted, that of the forty-five, thirty should be elected by the shires, and fifteen by the boroughs; that the city of Edinburgh should elect one; and that the other royal boroughs should be divided into fourteen districts, and that each district should return one.

Now, by the Reform Act, the number of members for Scotland is increased to fifty-three. See Parliament, VI. (B.) I.

It was also provided by the above act of the Scotch parliament, that no person should elect or be elected one of the forty-five but who would have been capable of electing, or of being elected, a representative of a shire or borough to the parliament of Scotland: hence the eldest son of any Scotch peer could not be elected one of the forty-five; such eldest son being incapable, prior to the Union, of sitting in the Scotch parliament. Neither could such eldest son be entitled to be enrolled and vote as a freeholder for any commissioner of a shire, though otherwise qualified; as determined by the House of Peers in Lord Dairs case, 17th J. However, by the Scotch Reform Act, the restriction preventing the eldest sons of Scotch peers from being returned to parliament for places in Scotland, has been removed. The eldest sons of Scotch peers might, previous to the Reform Act, represent any place in England, as many did. 2 Hats. Pr. c. 19.

The two stats. 9 Ann. c. 5. 33 Geo. 2. c. 20. requiring knights of shires and members for boroughs to have respectively 400*l.* and 100*l.* a-year, are expressly confined to England; but a commissioner of a shire must be a freeholder; and it is a general rule, that none can be elected but those who can elect. And it was formerly supposed, that it was necessary that every representative of a borough should be admitted a burgess of one of the boroughs which he represented; till the contrary was determined by a committee of the House of Commons in the case of the borough of W. town. 2 D. & R. 131.

The provisions of the Scotch Reform Act (2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 45.) which has been amended with respect to the registration of electors by the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 88, have already been shortly noticed under the head Parliament, VI. (B.) I.

Acts of parliament, in general, passed since the Union, extend to Scotland; but where a statute is not applicable to Scotland, and where Scotland is not intended to be included, the method is to declare by proviso, that it does not extend to Scotland. 3 Burr. 853. As to Berwick, see that title.

Several acts of parliament have been passed, from time to time, for the internal regulation of various concerns of this part of the kingdom; the following acts are of public and general importance,

By 6 Ann. c. 26. a Court of Exchequer was erected in Scotland, to be a Court of Record, revenue, and judicature, for ever; and barons of the said court appointed, who should be judges there.

By the 1 Wm. 4. c. 69. the judges of the said Court of Exchequer were to be reduced as vacancies occurred, until they should consist of the chief baron, and one baron only. And by the 2 Wm. 4. c. 54. it is enacted that no successors shall be appointed to the present barons; but after the retirement or death of the last baron, the duties of the court shall be discharged by a judge of the Court of Session.

By 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 13. the powers and duties of the barons of the Exchequer in Scotland, as heretofore exercised with reference to the public revenue, &c. are vested in the commissioners for the Treasury; and the collection and management of the assessed taxes and the land tax are transferred to the commissioners for the affairs of taxes. See also 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 103, 112.

An act for disarming the Highlands of Scotland; and requiring bail of persons for their loyal and peaceable behaviour, &c. 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 54. Persons summoned were to bring in and deliver up their arms, or, refusing to do it, should be taken as listed soldiers to serve his majesty beyond the seas; and concealing their arms, were liable to penalties; also the lord-lieutenants, or justices of the peace, might appoint persons to search houses for arms, &c. 11 Geo. 1. c. 26.

By the 19 Geo. 2. c. 39; 20 Geo. 2. c. 51; 21 Geo. 2. c. 34; 26 Geo. 2. c. 29; 33 Geo. 2. c. 26. provisions were further made for disarming the Highlands, and restraining the use of the Highland dress; and the masters and teachers of private schools, chaplains, tutors, and governors of youth and children, were to take the oaths to his majesty.

By 20 Geo. 2. c. 43. the heritable jurisdictions are taken away and restored to the crown, and more effectual provision is made for the administration of justice by the king's courts and judges there; and all persons acting as procurators, writers or agents in the law, are to take the oaths. By 54 Geo. 3. c. 67. § 5. appeals to the Court of Justiciary are allowed in civil cases where the value does not exceed 25*l.* sterling.

By 20 Geo. 2. c. 50. the tenure of ward-holding is taken away, and converted into blanch and feu-holding. The casualties of single and liferent escheats, incurred by hording and denunciation for civil causes, are taken away. A summary process is given to heirs and successors against superiors. The attendance of vassals at head courts is discharged. Heirs and possessors of tailzied estates are empowered to sell to the crown.

By 25 Geo. 2. c. 20. certain doubts were obviated, that had arisen with regard to the admission of the vassals of the principality of Scotland, and payment of their rents and duties.

By 25 Geo. 2. c. 41. forfeited estates in Scotland were annexed to the crown inalienably, and satisfaction made to the lawful creditors thereupon; and the rents thereof applied for the better civilizing the Highlands.

Peers of Scotland, and all officers, civil and military, &c. are to take the oath of abjuration, &c. A peer committing high treason or felony in Scotland may be tried by commission under the great seal, constituting justices to inquire, &c. in Scotland; and the king may grant commissions ofoyer and terminer in Scotland, to determine such treason, &c. 6 Ann. c. 14; 7 Ann. c. 21.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 66, the 6 Ann. c. 23, so far as relates to the trial of peers for offences committed in Scotland, was explained and amended.

Persons having lands in Scotland, guilty of high treason by corresponding with, assisting, or remitting money, &c. to the Pretender, on conviction, were to be liable to the pains of treason; and their vassals, continuing in dutiful allegiance, should hold the said lands of his majesty in fee and heritage for ever, where the lands were so held of the crown by the offender; and tenants continuing peaceable, and occupying land, were to hold the same two years, rent-free. 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 20.

By 21 Geo. 2. c. 19, offences of high treason, committed in the shire of Dumbarton, Stirling, Perth, Kincardine, Aberdeen, Inverness, Nairn, Cromartie, Argyll, Forfar, Bamf, Sutherland, Caithness, Elgine, and Ross, or the shire or stewartry of Orkney, may be inquired of in any shire in Scotland, as shall be assigned by the king. Jurors may come out of adjoining counties. The practice of taking down evidence in writing, in crimes not affecting life or member, abrogated.

By the 22 Geo. 2. c. 48, the court before whom any indictment for high treason, or misprision of high treason, in Scotland, shall be found, may issue writs of capias, proclamation, and exigent against the party, if not in custody; whereon the defendant not appearing, shall be deemed outlawed and attainted of high treason, or misprision of high treason; persons out of the kingdom, and returning within a year, may traverse the indictment.

By 19 Geo. 2. c. 9, every juror for trial of high treason, or misprision of treason, shall be possessed in his own or his wife's right of lands, &c. as proprietor or life renter within the shire, &c. of the yearly value of 40*s.* sterling at least, or valued at 30*s.* sterling per ann. in the tax-roll.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 22, (amended by the 7 Geo. 4. c. 8.) regulations were made respecting the qualification and manner of enrolling jurors in Scotland, and for choosing jurors on criminal trials, and uniting counties for the purposes of trial in cases of high treason.

By 33 Geo. 3. c. 74, (continued by several subsequent acts,) regulations were made for rendering the payment of creditors in Scotland more equal and expeditious. This was more effectually provided for by 54 Geo. 3. c. 137, (made for seven years,) and which is further continued by 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 74.

By 35 Geo. 3. c. 128, regulations were made for the more easy and expeditious recovery of debts not exceeding 5*l.* sterling, and determining of causes to that amount, throughout Scotland, by the intervention of two justices of peace within their respective jurisdictions.

By 39 Geo. 3. c. 49, the magistrates and judges in Scotland are empowered to extend the amount of bail to be given in criminal cases to 1200*l.* sterling for a nobleman; 600*l.* for a landed gentleman; 300*l.* for any other gentleman, burgess, or householder, and 60*l.* for any inferior person. And on charges of sedition any judge of the Court of Justiciary, on application in the name of the king's advocate, may extend the bail beyond those sums.

By 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 55, and other acts, (see 50 Geo. 3. c. 31; 54 Geo. 3. c. 94.) the salaries of the judges were increased; and by 48 Geo. 3. c. 145, (see also 2 Wm. 4. c. 54.) his majesty is empowered to grant annuities to the judges on their resignation.

By 50 Geo. 3. c. 111, the amount of pensions out of the civil list of Scotland is limited to 800*l.* a year; no single pension to exceed 300*l.* and the surplus of the civil list of Scotland is to be applied in aid of the civil list of England.

By 55 Geo. 3. c. 97, fixed salaries are granted to the judges of the Commissary Court at Edinburgh in lieu of all former salaries, payments, and fees.

By 57 Geo. 3. c. 64, for abolishing certain offices, and regulating others in Scotland, the salary of the keeper of the great seal is limited in future to 2000*l.* a-year, and of the privy seal to 1200*l.* The duties of the office of keeper of the signet are to be discharged by the lord register, with a salary of 1200*l.* The office of cashier and receiver general of excise is to be exercised in person, with a salary of 1000*l.* The salaries of knight marshal, or vice-admiral, are abolished. The following offices are required to be exercised in person, under regulations to be made by the lords of the Treasury, viz. the office of auditor, king's remembrancer, lord treasurer's remembrancer, and presenter of signatures in the Exchequer, keeper of the general register of sessions, clerk to the admission of notaries, director of the Chancery, clerk of the Chancery, and clerk of the Admiralty. The following offices are to be abolished, viz. one of the clerks of the pipe, clerk assistant to inspectors and surveyors of taxes, comptroller general of the customs, receiver of bishop's rents, inspectors of wheel carriages, gazette writer, and inspector general of the roads.

By 57 Geo. 3. c. 67, § 4. 5. the offices of governor of the mint, and other officers of the mint in Scotland, are abolished, (on the termination of the existing interests,) and the treasury are empowered to direct the mint buildings to be sold, with a view to the consolidation with the English mint.

By the 4 and 5 Will. 4. c. 16, the office of recorder of the great roll, or clerk of the pipe in the exchequer in Scotland, is abolished: the powers heretofore exercised by him rested in the lord treasurer's remembrancer.

By 43 Geo. 3. c. 80, and other acts sums have been granted out of the British exchequer for the purpose of building and repairing bridges and making and repairing roads in the Highlands; and see 50 Geo. 3. c. 43; 53 Geo. 3. c. 117, (as to floating timber through bridges,) 54 Geo. 3. c. 104; 55 Geo. 3. c. 121. These two latter acts are repealed, and more effectual provision made by the 59 Geo. 3. c. 135, the title of which refers also to the regulation of ferries; but which are not noticed in the act, unless included in the provision of § 20. Public grants have also been made for the Caledonian and other canals. See 43 Geo. 3. c. 102. See also 46 Geo. 3. c. 155, 156, applying produce of forfeited estates in making canals and harbours, and in other public purposes, such as the fisheries, Lunatic Asylum, &c.

By 43 Geo. 3. c. 54, provision is made for the better support of parochial schoolmasters and for better governing the parish schools in Scotland.

When any ordinary place is vacant in the Court of Sessions in Scotland, the king may nominate a person, who is to be examined by the lords of the session, and then admitted, &c. 10 Geo. 1. c. 18.

By 30 Geo. 3. c. 17, regulations were made for altering the summer session in the Court of Session, the Whitsuntide and Lammas terms in the Court of Exchequer, and the spring circuits of the Court of Justiciary. By this act also, § 4. complaints were allowed to be presented to the Lord Ordinary in time of vacation, in the same manner as to the Court of Session while sitting.

By 48 Geo. 3. c. 151, some important regulations were made as to the internal regulation of the Court of Session (see Session, Court of.) and concerning appeals to the House of Lords. By this last act his majesty was empowered to appoint commissioners to inquire into the forms of process in the Court of Session, and to report in what cases trial by jury in civil cases might be usefully established in Scotland. By the 49 Geo. 3. c. 119, further time was allowed to these commissioners to make their report.

By 55 Geo. 3. c. 42 the trial by jury in civil causes was at length established, and further regulated by 59 Geo. 3. c. 35; 3 Geo. 4. c. 85; 6 Geo. 4. c. 22; 7 Geo. 4. c. 8; 1 Will. 4.

c. 69. From the reports made to parliament by the commissioners, and from the publication of the proceedings on several causes under these acts, the beneficial consequences of this measure are fully ascertained. See Session, Court of.

By 54 Geo. 3. c. 67. verdicts in criminal cases before the High Court of Justiciary and Circuit Courts are allowed to be returned vivd voce, instead of in writing according to ancient custom.

By the 9 Geo. 4. c. 29. additional Circuit Courts were authorized to be holden, and criminal trials facilitated; and this act was amended by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Will. 4. c. 57. which latter statute abridged the period previously required between the sentence and execution in capital cases.

By 50 Geo. 3. c. 24. provision is made for augmenting the stipends of parochial ministers: these stipends by 52 Geo. 3. c. 131. are exempted from the annual duty on offices; and see 52 Geo. 3. c. 56.

By the 4 and 5 Will. 4. c. 41. the appointment of ministers to churches in Scotland erected by voluntary contribution, is regulated.

Also by the 3 and 4 Will. 4. c. 46. burghs in Scotland were enabled to establish a general system of police.

SCOTIS. Assessments by commissioners of sewers are so called.

SCRIPTURE. All profane scoffing of the Holy Scripture, or exposing any part thereof to contempt and ridicule, is punished by fine and imprisonment. 1 Hawk. P. C. See Reading, &c.

SCRIVENERS. Are mentioned in the statute against usury and excessive interest of money. 12 Ann. st. 2. c. 16.

Money scriveners were understood to be those who received money to place it out at interest, and who supplied those who wanted to raise money on security; thus rendering themselves useful to, and receiving a profit from both parties. If a scrivener is entrusted with a bond, he may receive the interest; and if he fails, the obligee shall bear the loss; and so it is if he receive the principal, and deliver up the bond, for being entrusted with the security itself, it shall be presumed he is trusted with power to receive the principal and interest; and the giving up the bond on payment of the money is a discharge thereof. But if a scrivener be entrusted with a mortgage deed, he hath only authority to receive the interest, not the principal; the giving up the deed in this case not being sufficient to restore the estate, but there must be a reconveyance, &c. 1 Salk. 157. It is held, where a scrivener puts out his client's money on a bad security, which on inquiry might have been easily found so, yet he cannot be charged in equity to answer the money; for no one would venture to put out money of another upon a security, if he were obliged to warrant and make it good, in case a loss should happen, without any fraud in him. Preced. Chanc. 146. 149. See 19 Vin. Abr. 289—292.

When an attorney is the general depositary of money of his clients, and other persons who employ him, not simply in his character of attorney, but as a money agent to invest their money on securities at his discretion, allowing him procuration fees for any sum laid out on bond or mortgage as well as a fee or charge for preparing of the deeds: Mr. Baron Wood held that such a course of dealing was substantially the business of a scrivener. 1 Holt. 507; and see 3 Camp. 539. The last regular scrivener is said to have been a person of the name of Jack Ellis, a contemporary of Dr. Johnson, who is mentioned by him in Boswell's Life, vol. 3. p. 20. See further, Attorney, Bond, Mortgage, Trustee, &c.

SCULPTURE. By 54 Geo. 3. c. 56. every person who shall make any new and original sculpture or model, or copy or cast of the human figure, or of any bust or part of the human figure clothed in drapery or otherwise, or of any animal or part of any animal combined with the human figure or otherwise, or any subject being matter of invention in sculpture, or of any alto or basso relievo, or any cast from nature, of man, or animals, whether separate or combined, &c. shall have the sole right and property of the whole of such new and original sculpture, &c. for fourteen years, putting their name and date thereon; and this term is extended to models, &c. protected by a former act 38 Geo. 3. c. 71. Persons (not having purchased the property in the original,) making, importing, or selling pirated copies or casts of such sculptures, are made liable to damages in an action on the case. An additional term of fourteen years is given to the proprietor, if living, and not having assigned his property. These provisions are in analogy to the acts for protecting Literary Property. See that title.

SCUTAGE, scutagium, Sax. scutpenig. Was a tax or contribution, raised by those that held lands by knight's-service, towards furnishing the king's army, at one, two, or three marks for every knight's fee. Henry the Third, for his voyage to the Holy Land, had a tenth granted by the clergy, and scutage, three marks of every knight's fee, by the laity. Baronag. Angliæ, part 1. fol. 211, b. This was also levied by Henry II., Richard I., and King John. See Taxes, Tenures H. 8.

SCUTAGIO HABENDO. A writ that anciently lay against tenants by knight's service, to serve in the wars, or send sufficient persons, or to pay a certain sum, &c. F. N. B. 83. See Taxes, Tenures.

SCUTE. A French gold coin of 3s. 4d. In the reign of King Henry V., Catharine queen of England had an assurance made her of sundry castles, manors, lands, &c. valued at the sum of forty thousand scutes, every two whereof were worth a noble. Rot. Parl. 1 Hen. 6.

SCUTELLA, from scutum, Sax. scutel.] A scuttle; any thing of a flat and broad shape, like a shield.

SCUTELLA ELEEMOSYNARIA. An alms basket, or scuttle. Paroch. Antiq.

SCUTUM ARMORUM. A shield or coat of arms. See Seal.

SCYLDWIT, Sax. A mulct for any fault; from the Saxon scild, i. e. delictum, and wito, pœna. Leg. Hen. 1.

SCYRA. A fine imposed upon such as neglected to attend the scyre-gemot courts, which all tenants were bound to do. Mon. Ang. i. 52.

SCYRE-GEMOT, Sax. shiremote.] A court held by the Saxons twice every year by the bishop of the diocese and the earldorman, in shires that had earldormen; and by the bishop and sheriff where the counties were committed to the sheriff, &c. wherein both the ecclesiastical and temporal laws were given in charge to the county. Seld. Titles Hon. 628. This court was held three times in the year, in the reign of King Canute the Dane. Leg. Canut. c. 38. And Edward the Confessor appointed it to be held twelve times in a year. Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 35. See Term.

SEA, Mare.] By the 18 Edw. 3. c. 3. the sea is to be open to all merchants. The main sea, beneath the low water mark, and round England, is part of England; for the admiral hath jurisdiction. 1 Inst. 260; 5 Rep. 207. The seas which environ England are within the jurisdiction of the King of England. 1 Roll. Abr. 528. As to the sovereignty of the sea, see Navy.

SEA-BANKS, or walls. The 15 Geo. 2. c. 33. imposes penalties on persons cutting or pulling up star or bent on the sand hills on the north-west coast of England. See further, Malicious Injuries.

SEA-GREENS. Grounds overflowed by the sea in spring tides. These, on the idea that the sea-shore is that over which the tide flows, have been supposed to be inter Regalia. But by the custom of Scotland the sea-shore is not held to extend further than to that point which the sea reaches in common tides, and therefore sea-greens are held to be private property. Bell's Scotch Law Dict. See further, Alluvion.

SEAL, sigillum.] Is taken either for wax impressed with a device, and attached to deeds, &c. or for the instrument with which the wax is impressed. In law the former is the most usual sense. The first sealed charter we find extant in England is that of King Edward the Confessor upon his foundation of Westminster Abbey. Dugdale's Warwickshire, fol. 138, b. Yet we read of a seal in the manuscript history of Offa, king of the Mercians. And that seals were in use in the Saxons' time, see Taylor's History of Gavelkind, fol. 73. It was usual in the time of Henry II. and before, to seal all grants with the sign of the cross, made in gold, on the parchment. Monast. iii. fol. 7; Ordericus Vitalis, lib. 4. That most of the charters of the English Saxon kings were thus signed appears by Ingulphus, and in the Monasticon. But it was not so much used after the Conquest. Cowell.

The royal seal was most frequently in green, to signify (as it has been quaintly expressed rem in perpetuo vigore permansuram). Coats of arms on seals were introduced about the year 1218. We read of a charter sealed with the royal tooth, called his wang-tooth. Wang is the jaw. Chaucer. See Deed, II. 6; and see further as to the Great and Privy Seal, tit. Forgery, Grant of the King, Privy Seal, Quarter Seal, Signet, Treason, &c. As to seals of Corporation, see that title.

Writs touching the common law not to go out under any of the petty seals. 28 Edw. 1. st. 3. c. 6. See Writs.

SEA-LAWS. Laws relating to the sea; as the laws of Oleron, &c. See Oleron Laws.

SEALER, sigillator.] An officer in Chancery appointed by the lord chancellor, or lord keeper of the great seal of England, to seal the writs and instruments there made in his presence.

SEA-MARKS. See Beacons.

SEAMEN. With respect to the seamen in the Royal Navy, see Navy, particularly under Division II.

By 33 Geo. 3. c. 67. § 1. (made perpetual by a subsequent act) if any seamen or other persons, riotously assembled together to the number of three or more, shall unlawfully and with force prevent, hinder, or obstruct the loading or unloading or the sailing or the navigating of any ship or other vessel; or shall unlawfully and with force board any vessel, with intent to prevent, hinder, or obstruct the loading or unloading or the sailing or navigating of such vessel; the offenders are liable to be imprisoned to hard labour for any term not exceeding twelve calendar months. By § 8. the prosecution must be commenced within twelve calendar months after the commission of the offence.

By the 9 Geo. 4. c. 31. § 1. so much of the last-mentioned act as relates to assaults on seamen, is repealed. And by § 26. if any person shall unlawfully and with force prevent or obstruct any seaman, keelman, or caster, from exercising his lawful trade, business, or occupation, or shall beat, wound, or use any other violence to him, with intent to deter or hinder him from exercising the same, the offender is liable to imprisonment to hard labour for any term not exceeding twelve calendar months.

For the protection of sailors in the merchant-service, and to facilitate the settlement of disputes between them and masters of vessels, a summary jurisdiction is given by various statutes to justices of peace. Thus by the 2 Geo. 2. c. 26. § 1. (made perpetual by the 2 Geo. 3. c. 31.) masters of ships are prohibited from carrying any seaman, except their apprentices, to sea, without first coming to an agreement in writing as to what wages each seaman is to have during the voyage, and expressing the voyage to be performed, under the penalty of 5*l.* to Greenwich Hospital, recoverable on the oath of one witness before one justice, who may issue his warrant to bring the master before him. The penalty may be levied by distress, which, if not sufficient, the master may be committed till he pay the same.

By § 4. if a mariner desert or absent himself after signing such agreement, on application to any justice from the master, owner, or other person having charge of the ship, the justice may cause him to be apprehended; and if he refuse without sufficient reason to proceed on the voyage, he may be committed to hard labour not exceeding thirty days, nor less than fourteen. And a similar provision is made by the 31 Geo. 3. c. 39. § 3. and by the 45 Geo. 3. c. 81. as to the masters and mariners of vessels in the coasting trade.

By the 37 Geo. 3. c. 78. § 1. every seaman, mariner, or other person, who shall desert during the voyage, either out or home, from any British merchant-ship trading to or from his majesty's colonies in the West Indies, shall (over and above all other punishments and penalties) forfeit all the wages he may be entitled to from the master or owner of the ship on board of which he shall enter immediately after such desertion. And by § 2. every master of a ship who shall engage such person, knowing him to have deserted, incurs a penalty of 100*l.*

By § 3. no master shall hire any seaman or other person in any port of the said colonies at more than double the monthly wages contracted for with the other seamen hired to serve on board such ship at the time of her last departure from Great Britain—being in the same degree and station with the seaman so hired in the colonial port—unless authorized by the governor, chief magistrate, collector or controller of such port, under the penalty of 100*l.*

By § 4. masters of vessels are liable to a penalty of 10*l.* for not inrolling their apprentices' indentures at the custom-house.

By the 59 Geo. 3. c. 58. (continued for seven years by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 88.) justices are empowered, on the complaint of seamen in the merchant-service, to hear and settle disputes relative to wages not exceeding 20*l.* and may examine witnesses on oath. On a refusal for two days to pay the sums ordered by the justices, the amount, with costs, may be levied by a warrant under the hand and seal of such justice on the ship or any of the tackle, &c. thereof. The determination of the justice is final, unless an appeal is made to the admiralty within seven days.

By the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 34. the statutes requiring a contribution out of the wages of merchant-seamen towards the support of the Royal Naval Hospital at Greenwich, were repealed, and in lieu thereof an annual sum of 20,000*l.* was made payable out of the consolidated fund.

The 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 52. was passed to amend the provisions of an act of the 20 Geo. 2. c. 38. whereby a body corporate and politic was created by the name of "The Pres-sident and Governors for the Relief and Support of sick, maimed, and disabled Seamen, and of the Widows and Children of such as shall be killed, slain, or drowned in the Merchants' Service."

The following is an outline of its principal clauses:—

Parties signing the certificate are to make oath of the truth thereof. Certificates to be produced by seamen disabled by sickness, and by widows and children of seamen. But decrepit seamen are not entitled to the benefit of this act unless they have served five years, and contributed monthly.

§ 3. Persons forging, &c. certificates are liable to be punished as incorrigible rogues.

§ 20. The Guild of the Trinity House of Kingston-upon-Hull are appointed trustees for the duties, &c. received there.

§ 21. The ports of Glasgow, Greenock, and Port Glasgow, &c. are to be deemed one united port, and masters of ships belonging thereto are to elect trustees for collecting duties, &c.

§ 22. Trustees of outports are to transmit an account of the yearly receipts and expenditure to the president and governors

§ 23. Collectors appointed by the trustees or corporations aforesaid are not to send duplicate of muster-rolls to the president and assistants.

§ 32. President and governors to pay five per cent. out of the duties received by them from seamen in the port of London to the Seamen's Hospital Society in that port.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 9. the members of a society instituted in 1821 for the relief of sick and distressed seamen of all nations in the port of London, and commonly called "The Seamen's Hospital Society," were incorporated, and were enabled to possess property and receive bequests, and further empowered to purchase lands to the value of 12,000l. per annum.

As to the desertion of sailors on a foreign shore by masters of vessels, see Kidnapping. See also Impressing.

SEAMEN'S WAGES are one proper object of the admiralty jurisdiction, even though the contract be made for them upon the land. 11 Ventr. 146. Yet the courts of common law have jurisdiction; and an action may be maintained for work and labour. See the preceding article, and further, tit. Admiral and Admiralty.

SEAN-FISH. Seems to be that sort of fish which is taken with a large and long net, called a sean. 3 Jac. 1. c. 12.

SEARCHER. An officer of the customs, whose business it is to search and examine ships outward-bound if they have any prohibited or uncustomed goods on board, &c. This officer is mentioned in the (expired) 12 Car. 2. c. 8. And there were formerly searchers concerned in alnage duties, of leather, and in divers other cases.

SECONDARY USE. A use, though executed, may change from one to another by circumstances ex post facto; as if A.

makes a feoffment to the use of his intended wife and her eldest son for their lives, upon the marriage the wife takes the whole use in severalty; and upon the birth of a son, the use is executed jointly in them both. This is sometimes called a secondary, sometimes a shifting use. See Use.

SECOND DELIVERANCE, secundâ deliberatione.] Is a judicial writ that lies, after a nonsuit of the plaintiff in replevin, and a retorno habendo of the cattle replevied, adjudged to him that distrained them, commanding the sheriff to replevy the same cattle again, upon security given by the plaintiff in the replevin for the re-delivery of them, if the distress be justified. It is a second writ of replevin. F. N. B. 68. See Replevin.

SECOND SURCHARGE, Writ of. If after admeasurement of common, upon a writ of admeasurement of pasture, the same defendant surcharges the common again, the plaintiff may have this writ of second surcharge de secundâ superoneratione, which is given by the Stat. Westm. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 8. See Common, III.

SECRETARY, Secretarius, à Secretis.] A title given to him that is ab epistolis et scriptis secretis; as to the secretaries of state, &c. The secretaries of state have an extraordinary trust which renders them very considerable in the eyes of the king, and of the subject also, whose requests and petitions are for the most part lodged in their hands to be represented to his majesty, and to make despatches thereupon pursuant to his majesty's directions. They are privy councillors, and a council is seldom or never held without the presence of one of them; they wait by turns, and one of these secretaries always attends the court, and by the king's warrant prepares all bills or letters for the king to sign, not being matter of law. And depending on them is the office called the Paper Office, which contains all the public writings of state, negotiations, and despatches, all matters of state and council, &c.; and they have the keeping of the king's seal, called the signet, because the king's private letters are signed with it.

There was but one secretary of state in this kingdom till about the end of the reign of King Henry VIII. But then that great and weighty office was thought proper to be discharged by two persons, both of equal authority, and styled principal secretaries of state. There are now three principal secretaries of state; namely, for the home department, for foreign affairs, and for the colonies.

The chief secretary to the lord lieutenant of Ireland acts as secretary of state there, but under the principal secretary of state for the home department of the United Kingdom.

As to the power of secretaries of state, see Bail, Commitment, Justices, Privy Council, &c. Blackstone states shortly, that they are allowed the power of commitment in order to bring offenders to trial; and cites 1 Leon. 70; 2 Leon. 175; Comb. 143; 5 Mod. 84; Salk. 347; Carth. 291.

SECTA FACIENDA PER ILLAM QUÆ HABET ENICIAM PARTEM. Is a writ to compel the heir, who hath the elder's part of the coheirs, to perform suit and service for all the coparceners. Reg. Orig. fol. 177.

SECTA AD MOLENDINUM. A writ that lay where a man by usage, time out of mind, &c. had ground his corn at the mill of a certain person, and afterwards went to another mill with his corn, thereby withdrawing his suit to the former. And this writ lay especially for the lord against his tenant, who held of him to do suit at his mill. Reg. Orig. 153, F. N. B. 122. The count in this writ might be on the tenure of the land, or upon prescription, viz. that the tenant, and all those who held those lands, had used to do their suit at the plaintiff's mill, &c. New Nat. Br. 272. Secta ad molendinum, like assizes of nuisance, and many other old suits, have in modern times given way to actions of the case, to repair the party injured in damages, and are now abolished by the 8 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. § 36. See 3 Comm. c. 15. p. 235.

SECTA REGALIS, Suit Royal.] A service or suit by which all persons were bound twice in a year to attend the sheriff's tourn. It was called Regalis, because the sheriff's tourn was the king's leet, wherein the people were to be obliged by oath to bear true allegiance to the king, &c.

SECTA UNICA TANTUM FACIENDA PRO PLURIBUS HEREDITARIIS. A writ for an heir who was distrained by the lord to do more suits than one, that he should be allowed to do one suit only in respect of the land of divers heirs descended to him. Reg. Orig.

SECURITATEM INVENIENDI quod se non divertat ad partes externas sine licentiâ Regis; for finding surety that he shall not go to foreign parts without the king's licence.] An ancient writ lying for the king against any of his subjects, to stay them from going out of this kingdom to foreign parts; the ground whereof is, that every man is bound to serve and defend the commonwealth as the king shall think fit. F. N. B. 85. See Ne exeat Regno.

SECURITATIS PACIS, Surety of the Peace.] Is a writ that lies for one who is threatened with death or bodily harm by another against him which so threatens, and is issued out of the chancery directed to the sheriff, &c. Reg. Orig. 68. See Supplicavit, Surety of the Peace.

SECURITY FOR GOOD BEHAVIOUR, the PEACE, and of PERSON, &c. See Surety of the Peace.

SE DEFENDENDO. A plea for him that is charged with the death of another person, by allying that he was driven unto what he did in his own defence; and the other so assaulting him that if he had not done as he did, he must have been in danger of his own life; which danger ought to be so great, as that it appears to have been otherwise inevitable. Staudf. P. C. lib. 1. c. 7. See Homicide, II.

SEDERUNT, Acts of. Ordinances of the court of session in Scotland under authority of the statute 1540, c. 3; by which authority is given to the court to make such regulations as may be necessary for the ordering of processes and the expediting of justice. Bell's Scotch Law Dictionary.

SEDITION is understood to comprise within its meaning all offences against the king and the government, which are not capital, and do not amount to the crime of treason. Thus, where there is no actual design against the king or the government in contemplation, a charge of sedition against the king or of exciting sedition, or of speaking, writing, or doing any thing seditiously, will not amount to a charge of treason. Therefore, in the case of Mr. Selden, who, with other persons in the reign of Charles I, was committed by the privy council for stirring up sedition against the king, the prisoners were bailed in the Court of King's Bench, because this amounted to no charge of treason; for sedition, in its true legal signification, does not import treason. 1 Hale, 77; Rushworth's Collections, vol. i. p. 679; Appendix, p. 18; Selden Opera, vol. 6. p. 1938.

By the civil law, however, sedition was ranked as treason. Dig. Lib. 48. tit. 4; Ad Leg. Jul. Majestatis, l. 1. tit. 10. De perniis, l. 38. § 2. and also in many of our ancient common law writers, treason is sometimes expressed by the name of sedition. Bract. lib. 3. c. 2; Hengham, c. 2; Glanvil. lib. 1. c. 2. So when law proceedings were in Latin, seditio continued to be the technical word used in indictments for treason, until the terms proditio and proditore prevailed in its room; which last word is now indispensable in every indictment for treason. 3 Co. Inst. 4, 12, 15; 1 Hale, 77, n. (a)

Sedition includes all offences of the like tendency with treason, but without any such direct intent or overt act of the party formed or executed, so as to bring it within the more serious offence. All contempts against the king and his government, and riotous assemblies for political purposes, may be ranked under the head of sedition; though it has been held, that where the object of the riot is to redress a general grievance, as to pull down all inclosures, or to reform religion or the like; it may then amount to an overt act of treason, being in the nature of a levying of war against the king. And in general it may suffice to remark, that all contemptuous, indecent, or malicious observations upon the person of the king or his government, whether by writing or speaking, or by tokens, calculated to lessen him in the esteem of his subjects, to weaken his government, or to raise jealousies of him amongst the people, will fall under the notion of sedition; as well as all direct or indirect acts or threats tending to overcome his measures, or disturb the course of his government, not amounting to overt acts of high treason. All these contempts are highly criminal at common law, and are punishable by fine and imprisonment. 4 Bla. Com. 147; 1 Hawk. c. 65, § 6; 1 East's P. C. 76; 2 Deacon's Crim. Law, 1169.

There are some particular acts of sedition which are made more highly penal by the statute law. See the next title.

As to seditious papers, see Printers.

SEDITION, in the Scotch law, is defined to consist in attempts made by meetings, or by speeches or publications, to disturb the tranquillity of the state; and it is distinguished from leasing-making, which has in view to diminish or affect the king's private character. Sedition is stated to be punishable in Scotland by an arbitrary punishment. Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

SEDITIONOUS SOCIETIES. By 7 Geo. 3. c. 79, for the more effectual suppression of societies established for seditious and treasonable purposes, and for better preventing treasonable and seditious practices, certain societies, called Corresponding Societies, were suppressed, and it was enacted that all societies shall be deemed unlawful, the members whereof shall be required to take any oath declared unlawful by 97 Geo. 3. c. 123. (made expressly to prevent the administering or taking unlawful oaths,) or to take any oath or test not authorized by law; or which shall have any members, committees, &c. not known to the society at large; or the names of all the members whereof shall not be entered in regular books; or which shall act in separate or distinct branches. And all members of such societies, and all persons corresponding with or supporting them, are declared guilty of unlawful combination and confederacy; any persons convicted of such offence shall on conviction before a justice of peace forfeit 20*l.* or suffer three months' imprisonment, and if convicted on indictment, may be transported for seven years. Regular lodges of freemasons are excepted from the act under certain regulations, which required them to be registered with the clerk of the peace, subject to the discretion of the justices in session. Places for lecturing, debating, &c. are deemed disorderly houses, as under 36 Geo. 3. c. 8. (but which is expired) unless previously licensed. Justices may demand admittance into all such places; and may refuse licenses to such as are of an immoral or seditious tendency.

By 57 Geo. 3. c. 19, for more effectually preventing seditious meetings and assemblies, § 14, &c. the regulations of 54 Geo. 3. c. 8, as to places for lectures, &c. were re-enacted; but these provisions were also temporary. By § 24, of the same act (57 Geo. 3.) certain clubs or societies, calling themselves Spenceans, or Spencean Philanthropists, who professed for their object the confiscation and division of the land, and the extinction of the funded property of the kingdom, and all other societies or clubs holding or professing such doctrines, are suppressed and prohibited as unlawful combinations and confederacies against the government of the king, and the peace and security of the subjects. And the penalties of 39 Geo. 3. c. 79, are enforced against all clubs taking unlawful oaths (contrary to the acts 37 Geo. 3. c. 123, and 52 Geo. 3. c. 104.) or appointing committees or delegates to meet other clubs, &c. There are special exemptions for freemasons, quakers, and charitable or religious societies. See further, Oaths, Printers, Riots, Treason.

For the execution of the laws in Ireland, and the prevention of all illegal and seditious meetings and assemblies, see 54 Geo. 3. c. 131. (amended by 55 Geo. 3. c. 13.) authorizing the occasional appointment of superintending magistrates and constables in counties; and 54 Geo. 3. c. 180, which latter was only a temporary act, and contained severer measures, which were never carried into execution.

SEDITIONOUS MEETINGS and ASSEMBLIES. See Riots.

SEED-COD, from the Sax. seed, seed, and codde, a purse, or sack, like a continent. A basket or other vessel of wood, carried on one arm of the husbandman or sower of ground, to bear the seed or grain which he sows, and spreads abroad with the other hand. In Westmoreland, a bolster or pillow is called a cod; and in other northern parts a pincushion is termed a pin-cod. *Pro uno seed-cod empto 4*d.* Paroch. Antiq. 549; Kennett's Gloss.*

SEEDER. A seedsman, or one who sows the land. Blount.

SEIGNIOR, Fr. Seigneur, i. e. Dominus.] Is in general signification as much as lord; but particularly used for the lord of the fee, or of a manor, as Seigneur among the Feudists is he who grants a fee or benefit out of the land to another; and the reason is, because, having granted away the use and profit of the land, the property or dominium he still retains in himself. Hotom. ; F. N. B. 23.

SEIGNIOR, IN GROSS. Seemeth to be one that is a lord, but of no manor, and therefore can keep no court. F. N. B. fol. 3. See Seignory.

SEIGNIORAGE. A royalty or prerogative of the king, whereby he claims an allowance of gold and silver brought in the mass to be exchanged for coin. As seigniorage, out of every pound weight of gold, the king had for his coin 5*s.* of which he paid to the master of the mint for his work sometimes 1*s.* and sometimes 1*s.* 6*d.* Upon every pound weight of silver, the seigniorage answered to the king, in the time of Edward III. was eighteen penny-weights, which then amounted to about 1*s.*, out of which he sometimes paid 8*d.* at others 9*d.* to the master. In the reign of king Henry V. the king's seigniorage of every pound of silver was 15*d.* &c. Stat. Antiq. 9 Hen. 5. c. 1; Hale's Sher. Ac. p. 3.

SEIGNIORY, Dominium, from the French seigneurie, i. e. dominatus, imperium, principatus.] A manor or lordship, Seignory de Bokemans, Kitchin, fol. 80. Seignory in gross seems to be the title of him who is not lord by means of any manor, but immediately in his own person; as tenure in capite, whereby one holds of the king as of his crown, is seignory in gross. Kitchin, fol. 206. See Seignior.

SEISIN, Fr. seisine, Lat. seisin.] In the common law signifies possession. To seise is to take possession of a thing; and primer seisin is the first possession. Co. Litt. 152. There is a seisin in deed or in fact, and a seisin in law; a seisin in deed is when an actual possession is taken, and seisin in law is where lands descend, and one hath not actually entered on them, &c. Inst. 31. Seisin in law is a right to lands and tenements, though the owner is by wrong disseised of them. And he who hath an heir's actual possession quietly taken, hath seisin de droit et de claim, whereof no man may disseise him, but must be driven to his action. Perk. 457, 458. A seisin in law is sufficient to avow upon; but, to the bringing an assize, actual seisin was required, &c. 4 Rep. 9. Seisin of a superior service is seisin of all inferior services which are incident thereto. And seisin of homage is a seisin of all other services, because in the doing thereof the tenant takes upon himself to do all services. 4 Rep. 80; 1 Danv. Abr. 647. The seisin of rent, or other annual service, is a sufficient seisin of casual services. 4 Rep. 80. But seisin of one annual service is not seisin of another annual service; as if there be lord or tenant by fealty, ten shillings rent, and three days' work in the year; in this case seisin of the rent is no seisin of the work, nor is seisin of the rent seisin of the suit of court, which is annual. 4 Rep. 9; 1 Danv. Abr. 647; 2 Litt. 507. The seisin of the father held not sufficient for the heir; though if a fine were levied to one for life, the remainder to another in tail, and the tenant for life took seisin of the services, this was a good seisin for him in remainder; and the seisin of a lessee for years is sufficient for him in reversion. 2 Hen. 6. 7: 45 Ed. 3. 26; 1 Danv. 646, 805.

A. B. seised of lands in fee simple, (which at the time of her death were in the possession of a tenant from year to year,) died, leaving C. D. her heir at law. No rent was ever paid to him, it being supposed that the lands passed to a devisee under the will of A. B. After the death of C. D. his son and heir at law brought ejectment and recovered the lands. In debt against the son, as heir of C. D., on a bond given by C. D., the son pleaded "no assets by descent from his father." It was held that the father was seised in fact of the lands in question, that they descended to him from his son, and were therefore assets in the hands of the latter liable to the bond-debt. Bushby v. Dixon, 3 B. & C. 290.

Actual seisin is now no longer requisite to make a person the root or stock from which the inheritance is to be derived. See Descent.

Where a man is seised of a reversion, depending upon an estate for life, the pleading of it is that he was seised of it ut de feodo, leaving out the word dominio; but if it be a reversion in fee, expectant upon the determination of a lease for years, there he may plead that he was seised of it in dominio suo ut de feodo. Dyer, 185, 257; 1 Rep. 20, 27; 4 Rep. 62.

Seisin is never to be alleged but where it is traversable; and when a defendant allegeth a seisin in fee in any one under whom he claims, the plaintiff cannot allege a seisin in another, without traversing, confessing, or avoiding of the seisin alleged by the defendant. Cro. El. 30; 1 Brownl. 70. If a seisin in fee is alleged, it shall be intended a lawful seisin till the contrary appears. 2 Lutw. 1337. See further Livery of Seisin, Disseisin, Estate, &c.

In Scotland actual seisin, and the evidence thereof by a notarial instrument, is still absolutely necessary for the transmission of landed property.

SEISINA HABENDA, quia Rex habuit Annum, Diem et Fastum. A writ for delivery of seisin to the lord of lands or tenements, after the king, in right of his prerogative, hath had the year, day, and waste, on a felony committed, &c. Reg. Orig. 185.

SEISING or HERIOTS. Is the seising of the best beasts, &c. (where an heriot is due) on the death of the tenant. It is a species of self-remedy, not much unlike that of taking of cattle or goods in distress; only in the latter case they are seised as a pledge, in the former as the property of the person for whom seised. 3 Comm. c. 1. VI. See title Heriot.

SEISIN-OX. A perquisite formerly due to the sheriff in Scotland, when he gave infestment to an heir holding crown lands. It is now converted into a payment in money proportioned to the value of the estate.

SEISURE OF GOODS FOR OFFENCES. No goods of a felon or other offender can be seised to the use of the king, before forfeited. And there are two seizures, one verbal only, to make an inventory, and charge the town or place when the owner is indicted for the offence; and the other actual, which is the taking of them away afterwards on conviction, &c. 3 Inst. 103. See Forfeiture.

SEL. Denotes the bigness of a thing to which it is added, as Selwood is a great wood.

SELDA, from the Saxon selde, a seat or stool.] A shop, shed, or stall in a market. Assis. 9 Rich. 1. It is also made to signify a wood of willows or willows. And Sir Edward Coke takes selda for a salt-pit. Co. Lit. 4.

SELF-BANE, Saxon self-bana.] Self-murder. See Homicide, III. 1.

SELF-DEFENCE. See Homicide, II.

SELF-MURDER. See Homicide, III. 1.

SELF-PRESERVATION. See Homicide, I. 3., II.

SELION OF LAND, selio terræ, from the French seillon.] A ridge of ground rising between two furrows, containing no certain quantity, but sometimes more and sometimes less. Therefore Crompton says, that a selion of land cannot be in demand, because it is a thing uncertain. Crompt. Juris. 221. Termes de la Ley.

SEME, Saxon seam, i. e. onus.] A horse load or eight bushels of corn. Blount. A seme of glass is twenty-four stone, each stone five pounds weight.

SEMEBOLE. A pipe or half a ton of wine. Merch Dict.

SEMINARIES, POPISH. See Roman Catholics.

SENAGE, senagium, from senatus, sometimes used for synod.] Money paid for synodals.

SENATOR, Latin.] A member of parliament. In the laws of King Edward the Confessor, we are told that the Britons called those senators whom the Saxons afterwards termed aldermen and borough-masters, though not for their age but their wisdom, for some of them were young men, but very well skilled in the laws. Kenulph, king of it: Mercians, granted a charter, which ran thus, viz. Consilio et consensu episcoporum et senatorum gentis suæ largitus fuit dicto monasterio, &c. Staundf. P. C. cap. 18. The judges of the court of session in Scotland are entitled Senators of the College of Justice. Act 1540, c. 93.

SENDAL. A kind of thin fine silk, mentioned in the repealed stat. 2 Rich. 2. c. 1.

SENESCHAL, seneschallus, from the German sen, a house or place, and schale, an officer.] A steward, and signifies one who hath the dispensing of justice, in some particular cases; as the high seneschal or steward of England, seneschal de la hotel de roy, steward of the king's household, seneschal or steward of courts, &c. Co. Lit. 61. Croke's Jurisd. 102; Kitch. 83. See Steward.

SENESCHALLO ET MARSHALLO QUOD NON TENENT PLACITA DE LIBERO TENEMENTO. A writ directed to the steward and marshal of England, inhibiting them to take cognizance of an action in their court that concerns freehold. Reg. Orig. 185, 191.

SENEUCIA, widowhood. If a widow, having dower after the death of her husband, shall marry, vel filiam esse filiam in seneucui peperit, she shall forfeit and lose her dower in what place soever in Kent. Tenen. in Gavellkind. Pinc. Trin. 17 Edw. 3.

SENEY-DAYS. Play-days or times of pleasure and diversion. Regist. Eccl. Ebor. anno 1562.

SENTENCE OF A COURT. A definitive judgment pronounced in a cause or criminal proceeding.

SEPARATISTS. By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 82, after reciting that "there are in various places in Ireland, and in some parts of England, and elsewhere, certain dissenters from the United Church of England and Ireland, and from the Church of Scotland, commonly called Separatists, the members of which class or sect of dissenters, from conscientious scruples refuse to take an oath in courts of justice and other places, and in consequence thereof are exposed to great losses and inconveniences in their trades and concerns, and are subject to fines and to imprisonment for contempt of court, and the community at large are deprived of the benefit of their testimony, it is enacted, that every person for the time being belonging to the said sect called Separatists, who shall be required upon any lawful occasion to take an oath in any case where by law an oath is or may be required, shall, instead of the usual form, be permitted to make his or her solemn affirmation or declaration in these words following, viz.

"I, A. B. do, in the presence of Almighty God, solemnly, sincerely, and truly affirm and declare that I am a member of the religious sect called Separatists, and that the taking of any oath is contrary to my religious belief, as well as essentially opposed to the tenets of that sect; and I do also in the same solemn manner affirm and declare"

Which affirmation shall have the effect of an oath.

By § 2. persons making a false affirmation are subjected to the same punishment as for perjury.

SEPARIA, separaria. Several, or severed and divided from a larger ground. Paroch. Antiq. 336.

SEPARATION, separatio. Is the living asunder of man and wife. See Bar. and Em. Decree.

SEPTUAGESIMA. The third Sunday before Quinquagesima Sunday or Lent. It is called Septuagesima, because it is about the seventieth day before Easter, as Sexagesima and Quinquagesima, are thus denominated from their being the one about sixty, and the other about fifty days, before the same feast, which are all of these days appropriated by the church to acts of penance and mortification, preparatory to the days of Lent. Idem Septuagesima Sunday until the Octaves after Easter, the solemnizing of marriages forbidden by the canon law; and the laws of King Canutus ordained a vacancy from Septuagesima from pluagesima to Quinquagesima Pasche. See stat. Westm. 1. 3 Edw. 1. c. 51.

SEPTUAGINTI. The seventy interpreters of the Bible, who were in truth seventy-two, viz. six for every one of the twelve tribes. Lat. Diet.

SEPTUM. An inclosure; so called because it is encompassed cum spe et fossa, with a hedge and ditch, at least with a fence, and it signifies any place paled in.

SEPULCHRE, sepulchrum. The place where any body lies buried; but a monument is set up for the memorial of the deceased, though the corpse lie not there. Cowell.

SEPULTURA. An offering made to the priest for the burial of a dead body. Bracton. See Mon. Angl.

SEQUESTRATION SUB SCO PERICULO. Awarded to a person where a summons ad warrantandum is awarded, and the sheriff returns that the party hath nothing whereby he may be summoned; then goes forth an alias and a pluries; and if he come not in on the pluries, this writ shall issue. Old Nat. Brer. 163.

SEQUELA CAUSE. The process and depending issue of a cause for trial.

SEQUELA MOLENDINA. See Secta ad Molendinum.

SEQUELA CURIE. Suit of court. Mon. Angl. tom. 2. p. 253.

SEQUELA VILLANORUM. The family retinue and appurtenances to the goods and chattels of villeins, which were at the absolute disposal of the lord. In former times, when any lord sold his villein, it was said dedi B. nativum meum cum tota sequela sua, which included all the villein's offspring. Paroch. Antiq. 216, 288.

SEQUELS. Small allowances of meal or manufactured victuals made to the servants at a mill, where corn was ground, by the miller, in Scotland, for their work. See Thirlage.

SEQUENDUM ET PROSEQUENDUM. To follow a person, as where a guardian is admitted ad prosequendum for an infant, &c. 1 Vent. 74.

SEQUESTER, sequestrare. A term used in the civil and ecclesiastical law for renouncing; as when a widow comes into court, and disclaims having any thing to do, or to intermeddle with her husband's estate who is deceased, she is said to sequester. Now more usually to renounce. See Executor.

SEQUESTRATION,

SEQUESTRATIO. Signifies the separating or setting aside of a thing in controversy, from the possession of both the parties that contend for it; and it is two-fold, voluntary and necessary; voluntary is that which is done by consent of each party; necessary is what the judge of his authority doth, whether the party will or not. Fortes. c. 50; Dyer, 232, 256.

There is also a sequestration, in the nature of a distress infinite, on a person's standing out all the processes of contempt for non-appearance in Chancery, upon a bill exhibited; so where obedience is not yielded to a decree, the court will grant a sequestration of the lands of the party, &c.

A sequestration is also a kind of execution for debt, especially in the case of a beneficed clerk, of the profits of the benefice, to be paid over to him that hath judgment, till the debt is satisfied. 2 Inst. 472; 2 Roll. Abr. 474. See Execution, introductory part, Div. 3. But the most usual sequestration of a benefice is upon a vacancy, for the gathering up the fruits of the benefice to the use of the next incumbent. The profits of the church, being in abeyance, are to be received by the churchwardens by appointment of the bishop, to make provision for the cure during the vacancy, &c. 28 Hen. 8. c. 11.

Sequestration is also the act of the ordinary, disposing of the goods of one that is dead, whose estate no man will meddle with. See Kneel's Glossary in v. Sequestrare.

Sequestration in the Court of Chancery is a commission usually directed to seven persons therein named, and empowering them to seize the defendant's real and personal estate into their hands (or it may be some particular part or parcel of his lands), and to receive and sequester the rents and profits thereof, until the defendant shall have answered the plaintiff's bill, or performed some other matter which has been ordered and enjoined him by the court, for not doing whereof he is in contempt. Curs. Cance. 89.

If upon a commission of rebellion (see that title), a non est inventus is returned, the Court of Chancery sends a serjeant at arms in quest of the defendant; and if he eludes the search of the serjeant, a sequestration issues. 3 Comm. c. 27.

It appears that there were great struggles between the common law courts and courts of equity, before this process came to be established, the former holding that a court of conscience could only give remedy in personam, and not in rem; that sequestrators were trespassers, against whom an action lay; and in the case of Colston v. Gardiner, the chancellor cites a case where they ruled, that if a man killed a sequestrator in the execution of such process, it was no murder. Cro. Eliz. 651; Brograve v. Watts, 1 Mod. 259.

But these were such bloody and desperate resolutions, and so much against common justice and honesty, which requires that the decrees of this court, which preserved men from deceit, should not be rendered illusory, that they could not long stand; but this process got the better of these resolutions on this ground, 1st, that the extraordinary jurisdiction might punish contempts by the loss of estate as well as the imprisonment of the person, because that liberty being a greater benefit than property, if they had a power to commit the person, they might take from him his estate till he had answered his contempts. 2dly, to say that a court should have power to decree about things, and yet should have no jurisdiction in rem, is a perfect solecism in the constitution of the court itself. 2 P. Wms. (21); 2 Cha. Ca. 44.

And see 2 Mod. 258, that the chancellor having issued such sequestration, it will be as binding as any other process, according to the rules of the common law. 2 Cha. Ca. 44.

It has been said, that the first instance of a sequestration after a decree, was Sir Thomas Read's case, in Lord Coventry's time; and that it was afterwards awarded in chancery, in the case of Hyde v. Pitt, 1668, and affirmed in parliament; and by the Court of Exchequer, Graves v. Fountaine, 1687, and since, without scruple. The doubt formerly was, that lands were not liable to execution before the stat. West. 2. 13 Edw. 1. st. 1. c. 18; 1 Cha. Ca. 92; 2 Cha. Ca. 44.

Sequestrations were first introduced (according to the Commentaries) by Sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, before which, the court found some difficulty in enforcing its process and decrees. See 1 Vern. 421, 423. After an order for sequestration issued, the plaintiff's bill is to be taken pro confesso, and a decree to be made accordingly; so that this sequestration does not seem to be in the nature of process to bring in the defendant, but only intended to enforce the performance of the decree. 3 Comm. 444.

I. In what cases a Sequestration is to be awarded by the Court of Chancery.

II. The Power and Duty of the Sequestrators, and when a Sequestration is determined.

I. A sequestration nisi is the first process against a peer or member of the House of Commons. 2 P. Wms. 385; 1 Cha. Ca. 61, 138. A sequestration is also the first process against the menial servant of a peer, within the words and meaning of the 12 & 13 Wm. 3. c. 3. for that otherwise such servant would have greater privilege than his lord. 1 P. Wms. 535. If there be a sequestration nisi against a peer for want of an answer, and the peer puts in an answer that is insufficient; yet the order for a sequestration shall not be absolute, but a new sequestration nisi. 2 P. Wms. 385. See Privilege, III.

Notwithstanding the superintendent power formerly possessed by the courts in this kingdom over those in Ireland, and what is said in some of our books, it seems to have always been the better opinion that the Court of Chancery here could not award a sequestration against lands in Ireland. 1 Vern. 76; 2 Cha. Ca. 189; 2 P. Wms. 261.

It was said that such process had been awarded to the governor of North Carolina; but herein it was doubted whether such sequestration should not be directed by the king's council, to which alone an appeal lies from the decrees in the plantations. 2 P. Wms. 261.

Copyholds may be sequestered, though not extendible at common law, or under the stat. Westm. 2. for courts of equity have potestatem extraordin. et absolutam; but it seems a doubt whether such a sequestration can be revived against the heir of a copyholder; which arises from the difficulty of obliging the lord to admit, and depriving the lord of his fine, upon the death of his tenant. 2 Cha. Ca. 46. Vide 1 Barn. C. 431.

A sequestration out of chancery is more effectual than an execution by feri facias at law, for a sequestration may lie against the goods, though the party is in custody upon the attachment; whereas in law, if a capias ad satisfaciendum is executed, there can be no fi. fa. issue. Cases in Lord Talbot's time, 222.

Where the sequestrators seize the real estate of the party, any tenant or other person who claims title to the estate so sequestered, either by mortgage, judgment, lease, or otherwise, who hath a title paramount to the sequestration, shall not be obliged to bring a bill to contest such a title; but he shall be let in to contest such a title in a summary way. He may move by his counsel, as of course, to be examined pro interesse suo; and in this case the plaintiff is to exhibit interrogatories, in order to examine him for a discovery of his title to the estate, and he must be examined upon such interrogatories accordingly; and the master must state the matter to the court; and the parties may enter into proof touching the title to the estate in question; and when the master hath stated the whole matter, the court proceeds to give judgment therein upon the report; and if it appears that the party who is examined pro interesse suo hath a plain title to the estate, and is not affected with the sequestration, then it is to be discharged as against him, with or without costs, as the court shall determine upon the circumstances of the case, and so vice versâ. See Comm. 712; 1 P. Wms. 308.

The sequestration binds from the time of awarding the commission, and not only from the time of executing it and its being laid on by the commissioners; for if that should be admitted, then the inferior officer would have legandi et non legandi potestatem. 1 Vern. 58.

And the sequestration is not affected by the statute of frauds, and therefore is like an execution at common law, which bound from the teste. 4 East, 523.

A sequestration obtained by the assignees of an insolvent incumbent operates only from the time of publication, and does not entitle them to the arrears of composition for tithes due before publication. And lodging a writ of levari facias with the registrar of the diocese, does not bind the property of the incumbent from the time of lodging it. 1 C., M. & R. 507; 3 Dowl. P. C. 234; and see 1 Ad. & E. 171.

II. The sequestrators are officers of the court, and as such are amenable to the court, and are to act from time to time in the execution of their office as the court shall direct; they are to account for what comes to their hands, and are to bring the money into court as the court shall direct, to be put out at interest, or otherwise, as shall be found necessary; but this money is not usually paid to the plaintiff, but is to remain in court until the defendant hath appeared or answered, and cleared his contempt, and then whatsoever hath been seized shall be accounted for and paid over to him; however, the court hath the whole under their power, and may do therein as they please, and as shall be most agreeable to the justice and equity of the case. Dicit.

The plaintiff's counsel may move and obtain an order for tenants to attorn and pay their rents to the sequestrators, or for the sequestrators to sell and dispose of the goods of the party, and to keep the money in their hands, or to bring it into court, as shall be most advisable and discretionary, and fitting for the court to do. Dicit.

Sequestrators on mesne process are accountable for all the profits, and can retain only so far as to satisfy for contempt. 1 Vern. 248.

If sequestrators, having power to sell timber, dispose of 7000*l.* worth, and only bring 2000*l.* to account, they, as officers and agents of the court, are responsible, and not the plaintiff. 1 Vern. 161.

A sequestration is in nature of a levari at common law, and the party sequestering has neither jus in rem, vel in re; the legal estate of the premises remaining in every respect as before. 1 P. Wms. 307.

Sequestrators being in possession of a great house in St. James's Square, which was the defendant's for life, the court ordered that the master allow a tenant for the house, and the sequestrators to make a lease, and the tenant to enjoy 3 Ch. Rep. 87.

It was moved, that the irregularity of a sequestration might be referred to the deputy, which was taken out against the defendant for not appearing, by reason of its being taken out sooner than by the course of the court it could, and yet the sequestrators had taken the goods off the premises, and threatened to sell them; the chief baron said, that as to the carrying the goods off the premises, it was clear the sequestrators could do that, because a sequestration upon mesne process answers to a distringas at law; but, however, as to selling them, the court agreed in the present case it could not be lawful, and said it had lately been settled on debate; and observed further, that courts of equity could not authorize sequestrators to sell goods, even upon decree, until Lord Stamford's case, which makes decrees in this respect equivalent to a judgment; and even now, the counsel said, sequestrators cannot sell but by leave of the court; however, the court said this was a matter proper for them to consider upon another occasion, and therefore only referred the irregularity of the sequestration as to the point of time to the deputy. 1 Barn. Rep. in Scacc. 212.

But if the party at whose suit the sequestration issues takes no measure to compel its execution in due time, and the sequestrators never, in fact, possess themselves of the goods, the party issuing it loses the advantage of it by laches. And if a fi. fa. against the goods of the defendant in Chancery is delivered to the sheriff, after the sequestration has been suffered to remain dormant for a considerable time, (as eighteen months,) without being laid on, and the sheriff on seizing under the fi. fa. is informed of the sequestration, he is still bound to levy, and if he returns nil in bonis, he is liable to an action for a false return. When the sequestrator, however, is in possession, he cannot be disturbed without leave of the court. 9 Ves. 336; 1 Jac. & Walk. 178.

Irregularity in a sequestration may be waived by the party against whom it is issued, permitting the sequestrator to deal with the property. 2 Russ. 161.

A defendant has no right to have a writ of levari facias de bonis ecclesiasticis returned, but may have a return of the amount of profits received by the sequestrator. Dowl. 1 P. R. 434.

A sequestration that issues as a mesne process of the court will be discontinued and determined by the death of the party; but where a sequestration issues in pursuance of a decree, and to compel the execution of it, there, though the same be for a personal duty, it shall not be determined by the death of the party. 1 Vern. 58.

A sequestration was against the father, who appeared to be only a tenant for life, and on his death a sequestration was discharged. 1 Ch. Ca. 241; 2 Ch. Ca. 46.

SEQUESTRATION, IN LONDON, is made upon an action of debt; and the course of proceeding in it is thus: the action being entered, the officer goes to the shop or warehouse of the defendant, when there is no body within, and takes a padlock and hangs it upon the door, &c. using these words, viz. "I do sequester this warehouse, and the goods and merchandizes therein of the defendant in the action, to the use of the plaintiff, &c. and so puts on his seal, and makes return thereof at the Compter; then four court days being past, the next court after the plaintiff may have judgment to open the doors of the shop or warehouse, and to appraise the goods taken by a serjeant, who takes a bill of appraisement, having two freemen to appraise them, for which they are to be sworn at the next court holden for that Compter; and then the officer puts his hand to the bill of appraisement, and the court giveth judgment: though the defendant in the action may put in bail before satisfaction, and so dissolve the sequestration, and after satisfaction, may put in bail ad disprobandum debitum, &c. Pract. Scacc. 129.

SEQUESTRATION in the Scotch law, is two-fold; viz. the sequestration of landed estates, and the sequestration in a mercantile bankruptcy of the whole estate, both heritable and moveable of a bankrupt; the former is intended to preserve a disputed property for the right owner, the latter to distribute the estate equally among the creditors of the bankrupt. See Scotch Law Dict.

SEQUESTRATIO HABENDO. A writ granted for the discharging a sequestration of the profits of a church benefice granted by the bishop at the king's command, thereby to compel the parson to appear at the suit of another; upon his appearance, the parson may have this writ for the release of the sequestration. Reg. Judic. 36. See Execution; Sequestration.

SERJEANT, or SERGEANT, Lat. Serviens.] A word

diversely used in our law, and applied to sundry offices and callings. First, a serjeant at law (serviens ad legem), otherwise called serjeant counter, or of the coif, is the highest degree in the common law, as a doctor is in the civil law; but, according to Spelman, a doctor of law is superior to a serjeant, for the very name of a doctor is magisterial, but that of a serjeant is only ministerial. To these serjeants, as men best learned and experienced in the law and practice of the courts, one court is severed to plead in, by themselves, that of the Common Pleas (see post), where the common law of England, is most strictly observed; yet they are not so limited as to be restrained from pleading in any other court, where the judges call them brothers, and hear them with great respect; and of which one or more are styled the king's serjeants, being commonly chosen out of the rest, in respect of their great learning, to plead for the king in all his causes, especially upon indictments for treason, &c. In other kingdoms the king's serjeant is called advocatus regis; and here in England, in the time of King Edward the Sixth, Serjeant Benloe wrote himself solus serviens ad legem, there being for some time none but himself; and in Ireland at this day there is only a king's serjeant. Serjeants at law are made by the king's writ, directed unto such as are called, commanding them to take upon them that degree by a certain day; and by the writ or patent of creation it appears, that the honour of serjeant at law is a state and dignity of great respect: in conferring these degrees, much ceremony was anciently used; and the serjeants now make presents to the judges, &c. of gold rings to a considerable value, &c. Portescue, c. 50; 3 Cro. 1; Dyer, 72; 2 Inst. 213, 214. As to their privilege of being impleaded in C. B. &c. see Privilege.

In old times, it was necessary that serjeants should have been barristers for sixteen years previously to their being called to be serjeants, but it seems that no precise time is now necessary to qualify them. Serjeants at law are bound by a solemn oath to do their duty to their clients. 2 Inst. 214. And by custom, the judges of the courts of Westminster are always admitted into this venerable order before they are advanced to the bench; the original of which was probably to qualify the puisse barons of the exchequer to become justices of assize according to the exigence of the 14 Edw. 3. c. 16; 3 Comm. 27; and see Barrister; Precedence.

Cases out of Chancery, to be argued in the Court of Common Pleas, cannot be set down or heard there, unless they are signed by a serjeant, 7 Taunt. 85.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 95. his majesty, during any vacation, may cause a writ to be issued out of Chancery, directed to any barrister, commanding him to appear in the said court, and take upon him the dignity of serjeant, and such person appearing and taking the oaths shall be, without further ceremony, a serjeant at law.

The monopoly enjoyed by the serjeants in the Court of Common Pleas, during term time, has been recently abolished, and the court thrown open to the bar generally.

SERJEANTS AT ARMS. Their office is to attend the person of the king; to arrest persons of condition offending, and give attendance on the lord high steward of England, sitting in judgment on any traitor, &c. There may not be above thirty serjeants at arms in the realm, who shall not oppress the people, on pain to lose their offices, and be fined. 13 R. 2. st. 1. c. 6. Two of these, by the king's allowance, do attend on the two houses of parliament; the office of him in the house of commons is, the keeping of the doors, and the execution of such commands touching the apprehension and taking into custody of any offender, as that house shall enjoin him. Another of them attends on the lord chancellor in the Chancery; and one on the lord treasurer of England. Also one upon the lord mayor of London on extraordinary solemnities, &c. They are in the old books called virgatories, because they carried silver rods gilt with gold, as they now do maces, before the king. Crompt. Jur. 9; Fleta, lib. 2. c. 38.

SERJEANTS, OF A MORE INFERIOR KIND, are serjeants of the mace, whereof there is a great band in the city of London, and other corporate towns, that attend the mayor, or other head-officer, chiefly for matters of justice, &c. Kitch. 143. Formerly all the justices in eyre had certain officers attending them called serjeants, who were in the nature of tipstaves. See stat. Westm. 1, 3 Edw. 1. c. 30. And the word serjeant is used in Britton for an officer belonging to the county; which is the same with what Bracton calls serjeant of the hundred, being no more than bailiff of the hundred. Bract. lib. 5. c. 4. And we read of serjeants of manors, of the peace, &c.

SERJEANTS OF THE HOUSEHOLD, officers who execute several functions within the king's household, mentioned in the 33 Hen. 8. c. 12.

SERJEANTY, serjeantia.] A service that cannot be due from a tenant to any lord but to the king only; and this is either grand serjeanty, or petit; the first is a tenure whereby one holds his lands of the king by such services as he ought to do in person to the king at his coronation; and may also concern matters military, or services of honour in peace, as to be the king's butler, carver, &c. Petit serjeanty is where a man holds lands of the king, to furnish him yearly with some small things towards his wars, and in effect payable as rent. Though all tenures are turned into socage by 12 Car. 2. c. 24. yet the honorary services of grand serjeanty still remain, being therein excepted. Litt. § 153. 159; 1 Inst. 105, 108.

Knight-service proper, (see Tenures, III. 2.) consisted in attending the king in his wars. There were also some other species of knight-service, so called, though improperly, because the service or render was of a free and honourable nature, and equally uncertain as to the time of rendering as that of knight-service proper; and because they were attended with similar fruits and consequences. Such was the tenure by grand serjeanty, per magnum servitium: whereby the tenant was bound, instead of serving the king generally in his wars, to do some special honorary service to the king in person; as to carry his banner, his sword, or the like; or to be his butler, champion, or other officer, at his coronation. Litt. § 153. It was in most other respects like knight-service, only he was not bound to pay aid or escuage; and when tenant by knight-service paid al for a relief on every knight's fee, tenant by grand serjeanty paid one year's value of his land, were it much or little. Litt. § 154. 158; 2 Inst. 233. Tenure by cornage, which was to wind a horn, when the Scots or other enemies entered the land, in order to warn the king's subjects, was (like other services of the same nature) a species of grand serjeanty. Litt. § 156. See 2 Comm. c. 5.

Generally the service of grand serjeanty was of such a kind as necessarily to be within the realm; but some services which amount to grand serjeanty might be due out of the realm as well as within, and both Littleton and Coke give instances of such reservations. See 1 Inst. 105, b. to 108, b; and the notes there.

Petit serjeanty bears a great resemblance to grand serjeanty; for as that is a personal service, so this is a rent or render, both tending to some purpose relative to the king's person. Petit serjeanty, as defined by Littleton, consists in holding lands of the king, by the service of rendering to him annually some small implement of war, as a bow, a sword, a lance, an arrow, or the like. Litt. § 159. This, he says, (§ 160,) is but socage in effect, for it is no personal service but a certain rent; and it may be added, (says Blackstone,) it is clearly no predial service, or service of the plough, but in all respects liberum et commune socagium; only, being held of the king, it is by way of eminence dignified with the title of parvum servitium regis, or petit serjeanty. And Magna Carta respected it in this light, when, by c. 27, it enacted, that no wardship of the lands or body should be claimed by the king, in virtue of a tenure by petit serjeanty. 2 Comm. c. 6. p. 81, 82.

See further, Socage; Tenures.

SERMONIUM. Was an interlude or historical play, acted by the inferior orders of the clergy, assisted by youths, in the body of the church, suitable to the solemnity of some high procession day; and, before the improvements of the stage, these ruder sorts of performances were even a part of the unreformed religion.

SERVAGE. [Mentioned in 1 Rich. 2. c. 6.] That is, when each tenant, besides payment of a certain rent, finds one or more workmen for his lord's service. See Service. King John brought the crown of England in servage to the see of Rome. 2 Inst. 174.

SERVANTS.

Persons employed by men of trades and professions, under them, to assist them in their particular callings; or such persons as others retain to perform the work and business of their families, which comprehends both men and women. and servants are menial, or not so; menial, being domestics, living within the walls of the house. Wood's Inst. 51.

The first sort of servants acknowledged by the law of England, (to which slaves are unknown, see that title,) are menial servants; so called from their being infra manum or domestics. The contract between them and their masters arises upon the hiring; if the hiring be general, without any particular time limited, the law construes it to be a hiring for a year; upon a principle of natural equity, that the servant shall serve, and the master maintain him, throughout all the revolutions of the respective seasons; as well when there is work to be done, as when there is not: but the contract may be made for any longer or shorter period. 1 Comm. 42; See Poor, IV. 8.

All single men between twelve years old and sixty, and married ones under thirty years of age, and all single women between twelve and forty, not having any visible live shoon, are compellable, by two justices, to go out to service in husbandry, or certain specific trades, for the promotion of honest industry: and no master can put away his servant, or servant leave his master, after being so retained, either before or at the end of his term, without a quarter's warning, unless upon reasonable cause, to be allowed by a justice of the peace: but they may part by consent, or make a special bargain. See the 5 Eliz. c. 4. from which the following are extracts.

Every person under the age of thirty years, that has been brought up in handicraft trades, and hath not lands of inheritance, or for life, of the yearly value of forty shillings, or is not worth ten pounds in goods, and so allowed by two justices of peace; and not being retained with any person in husbandry, or in the said arts, not being lawfully hired as a servant with any nobleman or gentleman, or having any farm or other holding whereupon he may employ his labour, shall upon request made by any person using the mystery wherein such person hath been exercised, be obliged to serve him as a servant therein, on pain of imprisonment.

By the same statute, persons are compellable to serve in husbandry, by the year, with any person that keepeth or useth husbandry, and who will require any proper person to serve; and the justices of peace have authority hereon, and to assess the wages of such servants in husbandry, order payment, &c. Also two justices, and mayors or head officers of any city or town, may appoint any poor woman of the age of twelve years, and under forty, unmarried, to go to service by the year, &c. for such wages and in such manner as they think fit: and if any such woman shall refuse to go abroad as a servant, then the said justices, &c. may commit such woman until she is bound to service. If any master shall give more wages than assessed by the justice; or any servant takes more, or refuses to serve for the statute wages, they are punishable; but a master may reward his servant as he pleases, so as it be not by way of contract on the retainer: and a master cannot put away a servant, nor a servant depart before the end of his term, without some reasonable cause, to be allowed by one justice; nor after the end of the term, without a quarter's warning given before witnesses; if a master discharges a servant otherwise, he is liable to a penalty of forty shillings: and where servants quit their service, testimonials are to be given by two constables and two householders, &c. declaring their lawful departure; and a servant not producing such a testimonial to the constable where he designs to dwell, is to be imprisoned till he gets one; and in default thereof, he is whipped as a vagabond; masters retaining them without such a testimonial, shall forfeit five pounds. 5 Eliz. c. 4. and see Labourers.

So much of the above statute and of the 1 Jac. 1. c. 6. as authorized magistrates to fix the price of wages was repealed by the 53 Geo. 3. c. 40.

It was long doubted whether the 5 Eliz. c. 4. gave magistrates jurisdiction generally over servants or restricted their authority to those employed in husbandry; but it has been decided that the act extends only to the latter. 6 T. R. 583.

By the 4 Geo. 1. c. 34. the powers given to justices of the peace by the 20 Geo. 3. c. 19; 6 Geo. 3. c. 25. (for these statutes see Labourers) and the 4 Geo. 4. c. 29. are extended to all apprentices and servants in husbandry, handicraft manufactures, and mining.

By the 5 Geo. 4. c. 96. for the consolidation of the laws relative to arbitration of disputes between master and servant, it is enacted (§ 2.), that certain subjects of dispute arising between masters and workmen, or between workmen and those employed by them in any trade or manufacture, may be settled and adjusted by the justices in the manner therein-after mentioned.

But nothing is to authorize justices to establish a rate of wages or price of labour, or workmanship, unless with the mutual consent of both master and workmen.

All complaints by any workman as to bad materials must be made within three weeks of his receiving the same, and as to any matter within six days after the cause of complaint.

By the 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 36. all former acts prohibiting the payment of wages in goods were abolished, with a view to a consolidation of their provisions under the 1 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 37. which enacts, that contracts for the hiring of artificers must be made in the current coin of the realm, and (§ 2.) must not contain any stipulations as to the manner in which the wages shall be expended.

By § 3. all wages must be paid to workmen in coin, or in bank notes if the latter consent, and payment in goods is declared legal; and § 1. artificers may recover their wages if not paid in coin.

§ 5. in an action brought for wages no set off shall be allowed for goods supplied by the employer, or by any shop in which the employer is interested; and (§ 6.) no employer shall have an action against his artificer for goods supplied to him on account of his wages.

The act imposes certain penalties for any infraction of its provisions, which may be recovered by distress. § 10. specifies the trades to which the statute applies; and by § 20, it is not to extend to domestic servants, or servants in husbandry.

Servants of another sort are called apprentices, as to whom see this Dictionary under that title.

A third species of servants are labourers, who are only regulated by the day or the week, and do not live intra muros as part of the family, concerning whom the statutes have made many very good regulations: 1. directing that all persons who have no visible effects may be compelled to work: 2. defining how long they must continue at work in summer and in winter: 3. punishing such as leave or desert their work: 4. empowering the justices at sessions, or the sheriff of the county, to settle their wages: and, 5. inflicting penalties on such as either give, or exact, more wages than are so settled. 1 Comm. c. 14. See Labourers.

There is yet a fourth species of servants, if they may be so called, being rather in a superior, a ministerial capacity; such as stewards, factors, and bailiffs, whom however the law considers as servants pro tempore, with regard to such of their acts as affect their master's or employer's property. This leads to the consideration of the manner in which this relation of service affects either the master or servant. And, first, by hiring and service for a year, or apprenticeship under indentures, a person until recently gained a settlement in that parish wherein he last served forty days. See Poor, IV. In the next place, persons serving seven years as apprentices to any trade, had, by 5 Eliz. c. 4. § 31. an exclusive right to exercise that trade in any part of England. This law, with regard to the exclusive part of it, has by turns been looked upon as a hard law, or as a beneficial one, according to the prevailing humour of the times, which occasioned a great variety of resolutions in the courts of law concerning it, and at length it was repealed by 54 Geo. 3. c. 96. See Apprentice, III.

A master may by law correct his apprentice for negligence or other misbehaviour, so it be done with moderation: though if the master or master's wife beats any other servant of full age, it is good cause of departure; or at least of complaint to a magistrate, in order to be discharged. 5 Eliz. c. 4.

It has been held that a master is not liable on an implied assumpsit to pay for medical attendance on a servant, who has met with an accident in his service. 3 Bos. & Pul. 247.

Next as to frauds or robberies committed by servants.

Where a servant damages goods of his master, action lies against him; and being employed to sell goods in his master's shop, if the servant carries away and converts them to his own use, action of trespass may be brought by the master against the servant; for the servant cannot meddle with them in any other manner than to sell them. 5 Rep. 14; 1 Leon. 88; Moor, 244. But if a servant be robbed, without his default, &c. he shall be excused, and allowed it in his account. 1 Inst. 9.

By the common law it was not larceny in any servant to run away with the goods committed him to keep, but only a breach of civil trust. 4 Comm. c. 17. p. 230. But if the servant had not the possession, but only the care and oversight of the goods, as the butler of the plate, the shepherd of the sheep, and the like, the embezzling of them was felony, even at the common law. 1 Hal. P. C. 506. And it seems that now the judges, in every case, determine that the property of the master, delivered by him into the custody of the servant, still remains in the possession of the master; and if it is embezzled by the servant, or converted to his use, he is guilty of felony. And when servants are convicted of robbing their masters, as the security of families so much depends on their honesty, and as the violation of the confidence reposed in them is a high aggravation of the crime, they are always punished with the utmost rigour which the law admits. 4 Comm. c. 17. p. 230. n.

It was thought reasonable and consistent to consider the statute 21 Hen. 8. c. 7. (now repealed) as in the nature of a declaratory law: and this view of it seemed to be confirmed by the doctrines that, notwithstanding the exception contained in it as to apprentices and servants under eighteen, yet such persons taking their master's goods, delivered to them by way of charge, were guilty of felony at common law. 1 Hale, 667, 668.

Where a banker's clerk informed a customer of the house that he had paid in money to his credit, and thereby induced the customer to give him a check for the amount, which the clerk received, and then to prevent a discovery made fictutious entries in the books; this was holden to be larceny. Hammond's case, O. B. 1812; 2 Leach, 1083; 4 Taunt. 304.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 46. any clerk or servant stealing any chattel, money, or valuable security belonging to or in the possession or power of his master, may be transported not exceeding fourteen years, or be imprisoned, &c.

For the clauses of this act relating to embezzlements by clerks or servants, see Embezzlement. And see further Larceny.

If a servant receive money in the county of A. and being called upon to account in B. and there deny the receipt, he may be indicted for the embezzlement in the latter county. 3 Bos. & Pul. 596.

The repealed statute 29 Geo. 3. c. 86. was held to apply to the case of a servant embezzling money received from a person to whom the master gave marked money to be laid out in his shop, for the express purpose of trying the honesty of the servant. Whittingham's case, O. B. 1801, 2 Leach, 912. and more solemnly determined by the judges in Hedge's case, O. B. 1809, 2 Leach, 1033. But when the property taken has been delivered to the servant by the master himself, the embezzlement of it was not punishable under that act. Peck's case, MS. cited in Russell on Crimes, lib. 4. c. 15. where it is added, that it is usual in indictments on this statute to add a count for larceny at common law: that such counts may be joined in the same indictment, see R. v. Johnson, 3 Maul. & Selw. 549. the statute having made the embezzlement a larceny.

By 15 Geo. 2. c. 13. § 12. any officer or servant of the Bank of England, intrusted with or having any note, bill, dividend warrant or security, money or effects of the bank, or of any person lodged with the bank, and who shall secrete or embezzle the same, is declared guilty of felony without clergy. Paid notes on the file seem to be effects within this act. 2 Leach, 943. Exchequer bills, actually purchased by the bank, though informally signed by a person not duly authorized, are also effects within the meaning of this act. Aslett's case, 2 Leach, 958.

By 50 Geo. 3. c. 59. (amended and rendered more effectual by the 2 Wm. 4. c. 4.) for preventing the embezzlement of money or securities belonging to the public, by any collector, receiver, or other person intrusted with the receipt, care, or management thereof, all such persons misapplying any such money, or giving in false statements or returns, are punishable as for misdemeanors.

The embezzlement and stealing of letters or their contents (either whole or half bank notes, &c.) by servants of the post-office, is made felony without benefit of clergy by the 5 Geo. 3. c. 25. § 17; 7 Geo. 3. c. 50. § 1; 42 Geo. 3. c. 81. § 1; and 52 Geo. 3. c. 143. § 2; and their aiders and abettors by 52 Geo. 3. c. 143. § 4. are punishable in like manner, and may be tried either before or after the principal felon. By 5 Geo. 3. c. 25. § 19. and 7 Geo. 3. c. 50. § 3. Servants of the post-office receiving letters and money for postage, and destroying the letters, or taking more than due postage to their own use, are made guilty of single felony.

Several acts have been passed for punishing persons employed in manufactures embezzling materials entrusted to them to work up, the principal of which are shortly noticed under the title Manufactures.

Lastly, we come to consider how strangers may be affected by this relation of master and servant, or how a master may behave towards others on behalf of his servant, and what a servant may do on behalf of his master.

And first, the master may maintain, that is, abet and assist his servant in any action at law against a stranger; whereas in general it is an offence against public justice to encourage suits and animosities, by helping to bear the expense of them, and is called in law maintenance. 2 Roll. Abr. 115. A master may also bring an action against any man for beating, confining, or disabling his servant; but in such case he must assign, as a special reason for so doing, his own damage by the loss of his service; and this loss must be proved upon the trial. 9 Rep. 113.

This is an action on the case, generally called a per quod servitium amisit; and the servant may also maintain his action of battery or imprisonment against the aggressor. See 1 Comm. 429; 3 Comm. 142.

This action by a master for assault, &c. on his servant, has been contrived, by a species of fiction, to be extended to a parent, to enable him to recover a pecuniary compensation, under some circumstances, for the seduction of his daughter. See 3 Comm. 142, n.

A master likewise may justify an assault in defence of his servant, and a servant in defence of his master; the master, because he has an interest in his servant, not to be deprived of his service; the servant, because it is part of his duty, for which he receives his wages, to stand by and defend his master. 2 Roll. Abr. 546.

Also if any person do hire or retain any servant, being in my service, for which the servant departeth from me and goeth to serve the other, I may have an action for damages against both the new master and the servant, or either of them; but if the new master did not know that he is my servant, no action lies, unless he afterwards refuse to restore him upon information and demand. F. N. B. 167, 168; Winch, 51.

In case an action is brought for enticing away, or retaining or employing a servant, it is advisable to give notice to the intended defendant, that the party is servant to the plaintiff, and to demand him; and proving such notice and a subsequent employment during the time for which the plaintiff hired, retained, took, and engaged the servant, will entitle the plaintiff to a verdict. To this proof must be added proof of the contract between the plaintiff and the servant, and that the time was not expired. But if a man do retain another's servant, not knowing that he was in the service of the other, he shall not be punished for so doing, if he do not retain him after notice of his first service; and if a person do retain one to serve him forty days, and another do afterwards retain him to serve for a year, the first covenant is avoided, because the retainer was not according to the statute. New Nat. Brev. 314, 375.

An action will lie for continuing to employ the servant of another after notice, though the employer did not procure the servant to leave his master, or knew when he first employed him that he was the servant of another. 6 T. R. 221.

The master of an apprentice seduced to work for another may either sue in tort for the seduction, or may bring assumpsit for work and labour done by the apprentice for a person who seduced and employed him. 1 Taunt. 112; 3 M. & S. 191; 4 Taunt. 876.

The reason and foundation upon which all this doctrine is built, seem to be the property that every man has in the service of his domestics, acquired by the contract of hiring, and purchased by giving them wages. 1 Comm. 429.

As for those things which a servant may do on behalf of his master, they seem all to proceed upon this principle, that the master is answerable for the act of his servant, if done by his command, either expressly given or implied, nam qui facit per alium, facit per se. 4 Inst. 109. Therefore if the servant commit a trespass by the command or encouragement of his master, the master shall be guilty of it, though the servant is not thereby excused, for he is only to obey his master in matters that are honest and lawful. If an inn-keeper's servant rob his guests, the master is bound to restitution; for as there is a confidence reposed in him, that he will take care to provide honest servants, his negligence is a kind of implied consent to the robbery, nam qui non prohibet, cum prohibere possit, jubet. See Inns. So likewise if the drawer at a tavern sells a man bad wine, whereby his health is injured, he may bring an action against the master.

for although the master did not expressly order the servant to sell it to that person in particular, yet his permitting him to draw and sell it at all, is implied a general command. 1 Comm. 430.

In the same manner, whatever a servant is permitted to do in the usual course of his business, is equivalent to a general command. If I pay money to a banker's servant, the banker is answerable for it. If I pay it to a clergyman's or a physician's servant, whose usual business it is not to receive money for his master, and he embezzles it, I must pay it over again. If a steward lets a lease of a farm without the owner's knowledge, the owner must stand to the bargain, for this is the steward's business. A wife, a friend, a relation, that use to transact business for a man, are quoad hoc his servants, and the principal must answer for their conduct; for the law implies that they act under a general command, and without such a doctrine as this, no mutual intercourse between man and man could subsist with any tolerable convenience. If I casually deal with a tradesman by myself, or constantly pay him ready money, I am not answerable for what my servant takes up upon trust; for here is no implied order to the tradesman to trust my servant. But if I casually sell him upon trust, or sometimes on trust and sometimes with ready money, I am answerable for all he takes up; for the tradesman cannot possibly distinguish when he comes by my order, and when upon his own authority. 1 Comm. 430.

If a man has a servant known to be such, and he send him to fairs and markets to buy or sell, his master shall be charged if the thing come to his use; though if the servant makes a contract in his master's name, the contract will not be binding unless it were by the master's command or assent; and where a servant borrows money in his master's name, without order, that does not bind the master. Doct. & Stud. dial. 2. c. 42. A servant buys things in his own name, the master shall not be charged, except the things bought come to his use, and he have notice of it. Kitch. 371.

A master used to give his servant money every Saturday, to defray the charges of the foregoing week, and the servant kept the money; per Holt, C. J., the master is here chargeable; for the master at his per. ought to take care what servant he employs; and it is more reasonable that he should suffer for the debts of his servants, than strangers and tradesmen who do not employ them. 3 Salk. 234. Where a servant usually buys goods for his master upon tick, and takes up things in his master's name, but for his own use, the master is liable; but it is not so where the master usually gives him ready money. If the master gives the servant money to buy goods for him, and he converts the money to his own use, and buys the goods upon tick, yet the master is answerable if the goods come to his use, otherwise he is not. Also a note under the hand of an apprentice shall bind his master, where he is allowed to deliver out notes, though the money is never applied to the master's use; but if he be not allowed or accustomed to deliver out notes, his note shall not bind the master, if the money be not applied to the use of the master. 3 Salk. 234, 235.

The act of a servant shall not bind the master, unless he acts by authority of his master; and therefore if a master sends his servant to receive money, and the servant instead of money takes a bill, and the master as soon as told thereof disavows it, he is not bound by his payment; but acquiescence, or any small matter, will be proof of his master's consent, and that will make the act of the servant the act of his master. 2 Salk. 442. For what is within the compass of a servant's business the master shall be generally chargeable, and also have advantage of the same against others. Noy's Max. An assent of the servant, by order and appointment of the master, shall bind his master; and a promise to my servant is good to me. If my bailiff buy cattle to stock my ground, I shall be chargeable in debt for the money, and if he sell corn for me, I may have action in my own name against the buyer. Bro. 24; Godb. 360. If one owe me money, and I send my servant for it, and he pay it to him, this is a good payment and discharge, though the servant do not bring the same to me; but if I send him not, it is otherwise. Doct. & Stud. 138.

If a servant is cozened of his master's money, the master may have action on the case against the person that cozened him. 9 Rep. 113; 10 Rep. 130; 1 Roll. Abr. 98.

If a servant, lastly, by his negligence, does any damage to a stranger, the master shall answer for his neglect; if a smith's servant lames a horse while he is shoeing him, an action lies against the master and not against the servant. But in these cases the damage must be done while he is actually employed in the master's service, otherwise the servant shall answer for his own misbehaviour. Upon this principle, by the common law, if a servant kept his master's fire negligently, so that his neighbour's house was burned down thereby, an action lay against the master, because this negligence happened in his service; otherwise, if the servant going along the street with a torch, by negligence set fire to a house, for there he is not in his master's immediate service, and must himself answer the damage personally. But now the common law is, in the former case, altered by the 6 Ann. c. 31. which ordains that no action shall be maintained against any in whose house or chamber any fire shall accidentally begin, for their own loss is sufficient punishment for their own or their servant's carelessness. See Waste. But if such fire happens through negligence of any servant (whose loss is commonly very little), such servant shall forfeit 100*l.* to be distributed among the sufferers; and in default of payment shall be committed to some gaol or house of correction, and there kept to hard labour for eighteen months. See 14 Geo. 3. c. 78. and title Fire.

A master is also chargeable if any of his family layeth or casteth any thing out of his house into the street or common highway, to the damage of any individual, or the common nuisance of his majesty's liege people, for the master hath the superintendence and charge of all his household. 1 Comm. 431. See Nuisance.

A. having a house by the road-side, contracted with B. to repair it for a stipulated sum; B. contracted with C. to do the work, and C. with D. to furnish the materials; D.'s servant brought a quantity of lime to the house, and placed it in the road, by which the plaintiff's carriage was overturned: held that A. was answerable for the damage sustained. 1 B. & P. 404.

No action lies against a steward or agent for damage done by the negligence of those employed by him in the service of his principal; but the principal is liable. 6 T. R. 411. For in such cases the intermediate agents are not liable; the action must be brought either against the hand committing the injury, or against the superior for whom the act is done. See 4 Taunt. 649; 3 Camp. 402; 3 Taunt. 314.

A master is answerable for the actions and trespasses of his servant in many cases, but not for trespass of battery, &c. nor in criminal cases, unless done by his command. Noy's Maxims. 99. And if the master order his servant to distrain another man's cattle, and after he hath distrained he kills or abuses the distress, the master shall not answer it. Noy. 111.

An action of trespass, and not on the case, is the proper remedy for an injury done by the wilful act of a servant in driving his master's carriage against that of another; on the contrary, case, and not trespass, is the remedy when such act is done negligently; but if it be done wilfully, without the assent or knowledge of the master, no action can be supported against the master. 6 T. R. 125, 123, note; 2 H. Bla. 442, 443; 1 East. 106; and see 6 T. R. 659.

If a servant, in driving a carriage, in order to effect some purpose of his own, wantonly strike the horses of another person, and produce an accident, the master is not liable; and it is a question for the jury, whether the mischief arose from accident or mere negligence in the servant, or whether it arose from his wilful misconduct. 1 East, 106; Croft v. Alston, 4 B. & A. 590.

Where the carriage or horses are jobbed, as it is called, questions have arisen whether the hirer is answerable, as master, from mischief arising from the negligence of the coachman. When the party appoints the coachman, and furnishes the horses and hires the carriage, it has been held that he is well described as the owner and proprietor of the carriage; and there can be no doubt that he would be held liable, as master, for the negligence of the coachman in driving it. But where the owner of a carriage hired the horses for the day, to draw, and the owner of the horses appointed the coachman, in an action brought against the owner of the carriage, for damage occasioned by the negligence of the coachman, Abbott, C. J. and Littleale, J. held, that the defendant was not liable, since the coachman was not his servant. Bayley, J. and Holroyd, J. held, however, the contrary. 4 B. & A. 590; 5 B. & C. 547; and see 5 Esp. Ca. 95, 263; 12 Ves. 114. See further, Trespass.

A servant may be charged in trover, although the act of conversion be done by him for the benefit of his master. 4 M. & S. 259.

A master sends his servant with deceitful wares to market, and orders him to sell them, but says not to whom: if he sells them, no action will lie against the master. Though if he had bid the servant sell them to such a man in particular, and he had done so, the master would be chargeable in an action on the case. 11 Edw. 4; Kitch. 185. Where a carrier's servant loses things delivered to him, the master must answer it, and action lies against him; and if goods be undertaken to be carried safely for hire, but by negligence are spoiled, it has been held that whosoever employs another is answerable for him, and undertakes for his care to all that make use of him. 2 Salk. 440. See Carrier. If a surgeon undertakes the cure of a person, and, by sending medicines by his servant, the wound is hurt and made worse, the patient shall have action against the master, and not against the servant. 18 Hen. 8.

In all the cases here put, the master may be frequently a loser by the trust reposed in his servant, but never can be a gainer; he may frequently be answerable for his servant's misbehaviour, but never can shelter himself from punishment by laying the blame on his agent. The reason of this is still uniform and the same; that the wrong done by the servant is looked upon in law as the wrong of the master himself; and it is a standing maxim that no man shall be allowed to make any advantage of his own wrong. 1 Comm. 432.

The law which obliges masters to answer for the negligence and misconduct of their servants, though oftentimes apparently severe on an innocent person, is founded upon principles of public policy; in order to induce masters to be careful in the choice of their servants, upon whom both their own security and that of others so greatly depends. And to prevent masters from being imposed upon in the characters of their servants, it is enacted by 32 Geo. 3. c. 56. that if any person shall give a false character of a servant, or a false account of his former service; or if any servant shall give such false account, or shall bring a false character, or shall alter a certificate of a character, he shall, upon conviction before a justice of the peace, forfeit 20*l.* with 10*s.* costs. The informer is a competent witness; but if any servant will inform against an accomplice, he shall be acquitted.

An action was tried at the sittings after Trinity term, 1799, at Guildhall, against a person who had knowingly given a false character of a man to the plaintiff, who was thereby induced to take him into his service. But this servant soon afterwards robbed his master of property to a great amount, for which he was executed. And the plaintiff recovered damages against the defendant to the extent of his loss. This was an action of great importance to the public, and there can be no doubt but it was founded in strict principles of law and justice. 1 Comm. 432, in n.

As to how far an action for libel or slander may be maintained against a master for giving a character of a servant, see Libel, 1.

SERVI. Bondmen, or servile tenants. Our northern Servi had always a much easier condition than the Roman slaves. Servi non in nostrum morem descriptis per familiam ministeriis utuntur. Snam quisque sedem, suos penates regit. Frumenti modum dominus, aut pecoris, aut vestis, colono, injungit, et servus hactenus paret.—Tacitus de Moribus Germanorum. Which plainly describes the condition of our Saxon and Norman servants, natives, and villains, whose servitude did more respect their tenure than their persons. No author has fixed the distinction between Servi and Villains; though undoubtedly their servile state was different, for they are all along in the Domesday-book distinguished from each other. So in Burcester there were, Quinquus Servi, et viginti octo Villani, &c. It is supposed the Servi were those whom our lawyers have since called pure villains, and villains in gross, who, without any determined tenure of land, were at the arbitrary pleasure of the lord appointed to such servile work, and received their wages or maintenance at the discretion of the lord. The other were of a superior degree, and were called villani, because they were villæ et glebæ adscripti, i. e. held some cottage and lands, for which they were burdened with such stated servile offices, and were conveyed as appurtenant to the manor or estate to which they belonged. See Kennett's Glossary.

The name and quality of their bondage do often occur in Domesday register; and their condition, no doubt, was worse than that of the Bordarii or Cotseti, who performed likewise some servile offices for their lord, and yet as to their persons and goods were not obnoxious to servitude as the proper Servi were. These were of four sorts: 1. Such as sold themselves for a livelihood. 2. Debtors that were to be sold for being incapable to pay their debts. 3. Captives in war, retained and employed as perfect slaves. 4. Nativi, such as were born servants, and by such descent belonged to the sole property of the lord. All these had their persons, their children, and their goods, at the disposal of their lord, incapable of making any wills, or giving away any thing. Cowell. There are also said to be servi testamentales, those which we now call covenant servants. Leg. Athelst. c. 31. See Slaves, Villain.

SERVICE, servitium.] That duty which the tenant, by reason of his fee or estate, oweth unto the lord.

Our ancient law books make many divisions of it; as into personal and real, free and base, continual or annual, casual and accidental, intrinsic and extrinsic, &c. Bract. lib. 2. Brit. c. 66; 4 Co. Rep. 9.

Personal service is where something is to be done by the person of the tenant, as homage and fealty; and real was subject to wards and marriages, when in use.

Annual and certain service is rent, suit of court to the lord, &c.

Accidental services are heriots, reliefs, and the like. And some services are only for the lord's benefit, and some pro bono publico. Co. Copyhold, 22; Co. Litt. 222; 22 H. 4. 5.

Also services are said to be entire; of chattels valuable such as an ox; or things pleasurable, as a hawk, &c. A. 3. so are those personal, and consisting of manual work, or exercise some office, &c.

Magna Charta, 9 Hen. 3. c. 32. ordains, that no freeman shall sell so much of his lands, but that of the residue the lord may have his services. In feoffments to a man and his heirs, the feoffee shall hold the land of the lord by the same service as the feoffer, &c. 18 Ed. 1. And where services are entire, and cannot be divided, upon the alienation of parcel of the lands by the tenant, the services shall be multiplied, and every alienee render the whole service; though by the purchase of parcel by the lord, the whole is extinct, except in case of fealty and heriot custom. 6 Rep. 1; Wood's Inst. 139. See further, Tenures.

Personal services of hosting and hunting, anciently due to superiors in Scotland, were abolished by 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 54. Personal services relative to agriculture or lawful business, stipulated and expressed, may be demanded; but where annual, and not exacted within the year, are lost for that year. Services by tenants used and wont, excepting what relates to mill services, were abolished by 20 Geo. 2. c. 50.

SERVICE OF AN HEIR. By the law of Scotland, before an heir can regularly acquire a right to the estate of the ancestor, he ought to be served heir; which is one of the old forms of the law of Scotland proceeding upon a writ, and including in it the decision of a jury fixing the right and character of the heir to the estate of the ancestor.

SERVICE AND SACRAMENTS. The blessed sacrament to be administered in both kinds. 1 Edm. 6. c. 1. For the uniformity of the service and administration of sacraments. 2 & 3 Edm. 6. c. 1; 5 & 6 Edm. 6. c. 1; 1 Eliz. c. 1; 3 Eliz. c. 1; 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4. The penalty of disturbing a preacher or priest saying divine service, or pulling down an altar, &c. 1 Mar. st. 2. c. 3. The penalty of not repairing to church on Sundays and holidays. 1 Eliz. c. 2. See Sunday. The bible and divine service shall be translated into the Welch tongue. 5 Eliz. c. 23. All ecclesiastical persons shall read and subscribe to the book of common prayer, &c. 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 14; 15 Car. 2. c. 6. See Parson. Allowance of impediments for not rendering the service extended to the certificate of subscription. Reading the articles to indemnify against neglect in point of time. 23 Geo. 2. c. 28. See further, Religion, and the references there.

SERVITIUM. Certain writs touching servants and domestics, violating the statutes made against their abuses; which see in Reg. Orig. fol. 189, 190, 191.

SERVITIUM TENEMENT. The estate in respect of which a service is owing; as the Dominant Tenement is that to which the service is due. See Tenure.

SERVITIUM FEODALE ET PREBIALE. Was not a personal service, but only by reason of the lands which were held in fee. Bracton, lib. 2. c. 10. par. 7. See Tenure.

SERVITIUM LORICIS. A service which did not belong to the chief lord, but to the king. It was called foriscom and franchum, because it was done foris et extra servitium quod fit domino capitali. And we find several grants of liberties with the appurtenances, salvo forensi servitio, &c. Mon. Ang. 1. 48.

SERVITIUM INTRINSECUM. That service which was due to the chief lord alone from his tenants within his manor. Bracton, lib. 2; Fleta, lib. 3.

SERVITIUM LIBERUM. A service to be done by feudatory tenants, who were called liberi homines, and distinguished from vassals, as was their service; for they were not bound to any of the base services of ploughing the lord's land, &c. but were to find a man and a horse, or go with the lord into the army, or to attend his court, &c. and sometimes it was called servitium liberum armorum; as in an old rental of the manor of South Malling, in Essex, mentioned by Somner in his treatise of Gavelkind, p. 56. See Tenure.

SERVITIUM REGALE. Royal service, or the prerogatives that within a royal manor belonged to the lord of it; which were generally reckoned to be the following, viz. power of jurisdiction in matters of property; and of life and death in felonies and murders; right to waifs and estrays; minting of money; assize of bread and beer; and weights and measures. All which privileges, it is said, were annexed to some manors by grants from the king. Paroch. Antiq. 60. See Manor.

SERVI TESTAMENTALES. Covenant servants; mentioned in the laws of King Athelstan, c. 31. See Servant.

SERVITIUS ACQUIETANDIS. A writ judicial for a man distrained for services to one, when he owes and performs them to another for the acquittal of such services. Reg. Judic. 27.

SERVITOR, servulus.] A serving man; particularly applied to scholars in the colleges of the universities, who are upon the foundation.

SERVITORS OF BILLS. Such servants or messengers of the marshal of the King's Bench as were sent abroad with bills or writs to summon men to that court. 2 H. 4. c. 23.

SERVITUDES. Burdens affecting property and rights. Scotch Dict. See Tenures.

They nearly correspond with easements in the English law.

SESSION, COURT OF, in Scotland. The highest civil court in Scotland. The judges are styled lords of council and session. The title of the court is derived from those formerly intrusted with the highest civil jurisdiction. By the act 1425, c. 65, the court of session was established, and continued till 1469, when its jurisdiction was restored to the king and council; and in 1503, the king's daily council was ordered to sit in Edinburgh; and the jurisdiction of those two courts, as well as their respective titles of council and session, were by the acts 1532 and 1537, c. 36, transferred to the present court, which with its members and officers was incorporated under the title of the college of justice. The judges consisted originally of seven churchmen and seven laymen, and a president; the abbot of Canbuskenneth being the first president.

By the articles of union between Scotland and England, no person can be appointed a judge who has not served as an advocate or principal clerk of session for five years, or as a writer to the signet for ten years. The judge must be at least 25 years of age. Besides the 15 ordinary lords, it was anciently the practice for the crown to name extraordinary lords; but this power was renounced by the act 10 Geo. 1. c. 19, by which the trial and admission of the ordinary lords is regulated. Of this court of 15, nine were a quorum. But see post.

By 48 Geo. 3. c. 151, it was enacted, that the judges or lords of session shall usually sit in two divisions, the lord president of the whole court and seven of the ordinary lords forming the first division, and the lord justice clerk and the six other ordinary lords making the second division; four judges in each division to be a quorum: the judges in each division to exercise the same powers as before. Judges of each division may state questions of law to the judges of the other. Regulations for transacting the business to be made by acts of sederunt by the whole court of session. Regulations are also introduced with respect to appeals to the House of Lords. His majesty was empowered to appoint a commission to inquire into the forms of process in the court of session, and to report in what civil causes trial by jury might be usefully established.

By 55 Geo. 3. c. 42, to facilitate the administration of justice in Scotland, by the extending trial by jury to civil causes, his majesty was empowered to commission one chief judge, and two other judges, before whom the trial of issues may be had, to be called "Lords Commissioners of the Jury Court in civil causes." To this jury court, either division of the court of session in all cases brought before them wherein matters of fact were to be proved, were authorized to order and direct, by special interlocutor, such issues to be sent as might appear to them expedient for the due administration of justice, in order that such issues might be there tried by a jury according to the directions of the act. By § 44. of this act, the commissioners or judges of the jury court were required to make annual reports to parliament; and by § 45.

the act was declared in force for seven years. But by 59 Geo. 3. c. 35. the reports were declared no longer requisite, (§ 55); and (by § 36.) the jury court under the act 55 Geo. 3. was declared permanent, and that it should remain in all time coming a part of the judicial establishment of Scotland, and of the college of justice therein, subject to regulations by parliament.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 120. certain provisions were made relative to the constitution of the jury court, which were to continue in force for a limited period; and in the meanwhile his majesty was authorized to appoint persons to inquire, among other things, at what time and in what manner the union of the benefit of jury trial in civil causes, with the jurisdiction of the court of session, might be best accomplished.

Finally, by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 69. it was enacted, that trial by jury in civil causes should be united with the ordinary administration of justice in the court of session in Scotland, and that the jury court should after such union cease.

§ 20. enacts, that when vacancies shall occur, the permanent lords ordinary shall be reduced to five, so that the total number of judges comprising the court of session, including the lord president and lord justice clerk, shall be limited to 13.

By § 21. the high court of admiralty is abolished, and its jurisdiction transferred to the court of session.

By the 2 Wm. 4. c. 5. the judges of the court of session are empowered to make regulations for carrying on the business of the court when interrupted by the death or necessary absence of any of the judges thereof.

By 55 Geo. 3. c. 70. the formation and arrangement of the judicial and other records of the court of session are regulated under an officer to be appointed by the lord president of the college of justice, to be keeper of the records of the court.

SESSION, sessio.] A sitting of justices in court upon their commission; as the sessions of oyer and terminer, &c.

SESSION OF PARLIAMENT, sessio parliamenti.] The sitting of the parliament; the session of parliament continues till it be prorogued or dissolved, and breaks not off by adjournment. 4 Inst. 27. See Parliament.

SESSION, GREAT, of Wales. By the 1 Will. 4. c. 70. the Courts of Great Session in Wales are abolished, and the proceedings in Wales now issue out of the courts at Westminster, and two of the judges of the superior courts hold the circuits in Wales and Cheshire, as in other English counties.

SESSION OF GAOL DELIVERY. A session held for delivering a gaol of the prisoners therein being. See Gaol Delivery; Justices.

SESSIONS OF THE PEACE.

There are three different kinds of sessions holden by justices of peace: 1. General sessions, which may be holden at any time of the year, for the general execution of the authority of the justices; 2. The general quarter sessions, which are holden at stated times in the four quarters of the year, as appointed by statute; and 3. A special or petty sessions, which is holden on any special occasion for the execution of some particular branch of the authority of the justice. 2 Hawk. c. 8. § 47.

By the 1 Will. 4. c. 70. § 35. in the year 1831, and afterwards, the justices of the peace in every county, riding, or division, (in England and Wales, see the title of the statute,) for which quarter sessions of the peace, by law, ought to be held, shall hold such sessions in the first week after the 11th of October, in the first week after the 28th of December, and the first week after 31st of March, and in the first week after 24th of June.

But by the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 47. in order to prevent the interference of the Spring assizes with the April quarter sessions, it is enacted, that the justices in every county, at the Epiphany sessions, may name, if they see occasion, two of their body as soon as may be, after the time for holding the assizes shall be appointed, to fix the day for holding the next quarter sessions for such county, so as such time shall not be earlier than the 7th of March, or later than the 22d of May.

In the county of Middlesex the justices are directed by the 14 Hen. 6. c. 4. to keep their sessions twice in a year, at least, and more often (if need be) for any riot, or forcible entry. And it has long been customary, on account of the multiplicity of business in this county, to hold eight sessions every year, viz. four general quarter and four general sessions.

And it was held in a recent case that the justices of Middlesex having, in addition to the four general quarter and four quarter sessions they had been in the habit of holding appointed other original intermediate sessions; that they had a right to do so, and that an indictment found at one of such sessions was valid. 6 C. & P. 96.

If a sufficient number of justices do not appear on the day appointed for holding the quarter sessions, they may still be legally held, if a proper number meet on any day during the week after any of the days specified in the act of parliament. For though there is not time within that week to summon a sessions de novo, yet a sessions may be holden without a previous summons; and the justices, when once assembled during the proper sessions week, may then adjourn to another day, and issue their precept to the sheriff against the day of adjournment. But when a sessions is holden by the justices without a previous summons, no man shall lose any thing for his default of appearance there because no man had a proper notice of their sitting. Lamb. 380; 2 Hawk. c. 8. § 41. In large and populous counties as in Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Surrey, it is the custom to hold the sessions by adjournment at different places in the county. Thus in Surrey, when the justices meet at the general quarter sessions, a day of adjournment is fixed by the justices, such a day having been generally agreed upon before; and notice is given to all the magistrates by the clerk of the peace, as well as advertised in the newspapers. The grand jury and the petit jury, before they are dismissed from their attendance, are informed that their attendance will be required at the day to which the court intend to adjourn; and they are again summoned for that purpose by the sheriff. 3 Chit. Burn's J. 204, note. The adjournment, however, ought never to be beyond the time of meeting of the next quarter sessions; for the justices cannot continue one sessions to a day subsequent to the time appointed by the statute for holding another original sessions. Re v. Grince, 19 L. M. Ab. 358. Therefore, if the justices were to hold a general sessions of the peace, pending a continuation of the general quarter sessions by adjournment, it seems, that such general sessions would supersede and put an end to the adjourned quarter sessions, 5 Burn's J. 204, note.

The sessions may be held at any place within the county for which they purport to be holden, and before any two justices of the same county, one of them being of the quorum. And any two such justices may direct their precept under their teste, directed to the sheriff, for the summons of the sessions thereby commanding him to return a grand jury before them or their fellow-justices, at a certain place, and to give notice to all stewards, constables, and bailiffs of liberties, to be present and to do their duties at such day and place, and to proclaim in proper places throughout his bailwick, that such sessions will be holden at such day and place, and to attend there himself to do his duty. 2 Hawk. c. 8. § 12. This precept should be tested fifteen days before the return, and ought forthwith to be delivered to the sheriff, that he may have sufficient time to fulfil its requisitions.

The Sessions of the Peace is a court of record, and is held before two or more justices of the peace, one of which must be of the quorum. The jurisdiction of this court, by 34 Edw. 3. c. 1. extends to the trying and determining all felonies and trespasses whatsoever; though they seldom, if ever, try any capital offence; their commission providing that, if any case of difficulty arises, they shall not proceed to judgment, but in the presence of one of the justices of the Courts of King's Bench or Common Pleas, or one of the judges of assize. And therefore murders, and other capital felonies, are usually remitted for a more solemn trial to the assizes.

The sessions have cognizance of all offences which tend to a breach of the peace, except forgery and perjury. 2 East, 18. The general words in the commission of the peace including all trespasses, this comprehends not only direct breaches of the peace, but also all such offences as have a tendency thereto; and on this ground, conspiracies and libels, or any illegal solicitations, attempts or endeavours to commit crimes, have been holden to be cognizable by the sessions. 2 East, 28; 3 Salk. 194; 3 Burr. 1320; 1 Bl. 369.

They cannot take cognizance of forgery as a cheat; but over other cheats in general their jurisdiction is undoubted. 1 East, 173. 183. To solicit a servant to steal his master's goods is a misdemeanor indictable at the sessions, although no theft were actually committed. 2 East, 5.

An indictment lies at the quarter sessions, for lighting fires in the croft contrary to 47 Geo. 3. st. 2. c. 98. and if it be removed, and the defendants be tried, and convicted before a judge ad nisi prius, the Court of King's Bench shall award sentence. 4 M. & S. 71.

The justices cannot try any new-created offence, as usury, without express power given them by the statute which creates it. 4 Mod. 379; Salk. 400; Ld. Raym. 1144. But there are many offences, and particular matters, which by particular statutes belong properly to this jurisdiction, and ought to be prosecuted in this court: as, the smaller misdemeanors against the public or commonwealth, not amounting to felony; and especially offences relating to the game, highways, alehouses, bastard children, the settlement and provision for the poor, vagrants, servants' wages, and apprentices. Some of these are proceeded upon by indictment, and others in a summary way by motion and order thereupon; which order may for the most part, unless guarded against by particular statutes, be removed into the Court of King's Bench, by writ of certiorari facias, and be there either quashed or confirmed.

The sessions have, like every other court, the power to fine for a contempt committed in the face of the court. 4 B. & A. 334. But they cannot award an attachment for a contempt in disobeying any of their orders; the ordinary and proper method being by indictment. 2 Sess. Cas. 176; 2 Burr. 800; 8 East, 41; 5 Burn's J. 214.

Where a power is given to the sessions to inquire of, hear and determine any offence, it must be understood to mean, by the common law mode of proceeding, viz. either by indictment, or presentment. 4 T. R. 409; Dalt. 469.

The justices at sessions are not obliged any more than other courts to give any reason for their judgment in the orders made by them. 4 Burr. 2102; 2 Salk. 607.

The whole of the sessions, like the term of the courts at Westminster, is considered but as one day in law, consequently the justices may alter and set aside their own judgments, or orders, at any time during the sessions. 2 Salk. 608; 1 Str. 383. But they cannot do so at any subsequent sessions. See 1 M. & S. 442.

When the sessions are authorized to try any appeal, they have an incidental authority to adjourn it, after it is once properly lodged, if the adjournment be necessary for the advancement or convenience of justice; and the sessions are to judge of the proper occasion for doing so. 13 East, 352.

The Court of King's Bench has no jurisdiction to review the judgment of the sessions, except in a case sent up for their consideration. 4 B. & A. 86. Notwithstanding the judgment may be in some respects erroneous. 4 B. & C. 844; 8 B. & C. 137.

Neither are the justices punishable for what they do at sessions, if it arise only from an error in judgment. Staud. 173. But if they are guilty of some manifest act of oppression, or wilful abuse of power, or if there are flagrant proof of their having acted from corrupt motives: a criminal information will be granted against them. 2 Barnard. 249; 1 Bl. 432; 7 T. R. 374. See Information, II.

The records or rolls of the sessions are committed to the custody of a special officer, denominated the custos rotulorum, who is always a justice of the quorum. The nomination of this custos rotulorum (who is the principal civil officer in the county, as the lord lieutenant is the chief in military command) is by the king's sign manual. And to him the nomination of the clerk of the peace belongs, which office he is expressly forbidden to sell for money. See Custos, &c.; Clerk, &c.

In most corporation towns there are quarter sessions kept before justices of their own, within their respective limits; which have exactly the same authority as the general quarter sessions of the county, except in a very few instances; one of the most considerable of which is the matter of appeals from orders of removal of the poor, which, though they be from the orders of corporation justices, must be to the sessions of the county, by 8 & 9 Will. 3. c. 30. In both corporations and counties at large, there is sometimes kept a special or petty session, by a few justices, for despatching smaller business in the neighbourhood between the times of the general sessions; as for licensing alehouses, passing the accounts of parish officers, and the like.

By the 59 Geo. 3. c. 28. for remedying the inconveniences resulting from the great increase of business at the quarter sessions, it is enacted that whenever any court of quarter sessions, or general session of the peace, shall be assembled for despatch of business, the justices present at the first day of the session may take into their consideration the state of the business likely to be brought before them; and if it is likely to occupy more than three days, they may appoint two justices, one being of the quorum, to sit apart in some place near the court, and determine such business as shall be referred to them, while the other justices proceed in despatching other business; and all such proceedings shall be valid and enrolled: and the clerk of the peace shall appoint a person to record the proceedings of such two separate justices, as part of the records of the session, who shall be paid by the treasurer: an extra-cryer may be appointed by the justices.

As to the jurisdiction of the sessions, in points relative to the poor-laws, the following summary of decisions is taken from Const's edition of Bott's Poor Laws. For its contents with the subject, see Poor.

The sessions cannot make an original order of removal; but they may adjudge the pauper to be settled in any of the parishes that are parties to the order, although they cannot appoint a new place of settlement, for they can only affirm or quash the order in the whole or in part. Nor can they review an order, on which they have determined at a preceding sessions; but they may make a new order, vacating a former order made the same sessions: and it seems that on quashing an order of removal, they can only direct the pauper to be sent back to the respondent parish, and cannot adjudge his settlement in a third parish. If the magistrates present are equally divided, no order can be made; but whatever a majority decides is, as to matters of fact, conclusive, and also as to matters of law, unless they consent to a special case; but this they are not compellable to grant, nor a bill of exceptions lie.

In stating a special case, the sessions must state their conclusion from the facts, and not refer the evidence to the opinion of the superior court. But they need not set forth the reason for their judgment, nor even state the evidence upon which their judgment is founded; but if they do state all the evidence, the court will thereupon examine whether they have drawn a right conclusion; except in the case of fraud, for that is a fact that must be expressly found by the sessions; and the court will not infer it from the strongest evidence. But the court may send the case back, and order the sessions to inquire into that fact; as well as they may any other defective case, to be amended by stating a particular fact: but the sessions are not in this case obliged to hear new evidence, although they should proceed in it as if it were a new business. The court, however, will not send a case to be re-stated because the sessions have admitted hearsay evidence; or on affidavit that the clerk of the peace has not stated the case truly. Justices of both the contending parishes, who are rated to the poor, are excluded from voting at sessions, upon any question relating to the removal of a pauper belonging to either parish. 4 T. R. 81.

Not only the pauper removed, but the parish, or any of the parishioners, may appeal against an order of removal. The reasonable notice which the 9 Geo. 1. c. 7. requires to be given, before an appeal can be heard, means such notice as is usual in the practice of the particular session where the appeal is brought; but they cannot quash an order for want of notice, but must adjourn it to the next session, unless it clearly appears to the court that there has been sufficient time since the removal for the appellants to give notice, and come prepared, to try the appeal at the sessions where it is lodged. And it has been determined that this clause does not relate to the receiving, but to the hearing, of the appeal; and therefore they are bound to receive an appeal, though no notice has been given. The appeal must be to the next sessions after the order of removal is served, or the parties are aggrieved, whether it be an original or an adjourned session; but as to the time which shall intervene between the order and the appeal, respecting what shall be considered the next sessions, it must depend upon the special circumstances of the case; for if, from the distance between the parish to which the pauper has been removed and the place where the sessions are held, there is not time to lodge an appeal at the sessions held immediately subsequent to the removal, the first sessions ensuing are to be considered as the next sessions, and the justices are bound to receive the appeal at such sessions. It must however be so short an interval that the reasonable notice required cannot be given. This time of appealing to the next sessions is not suspended by the matter being referred to arbitration; for the consent of the parties that the sessions shall delegate their authority, concludes such parties, and gives validity to all acts of the sessions in consequence of such consent. The sessions however may, if they think proper, adjourn the appeal; but it cannot be to a time beyond that within which it is required by 2 Hen. 5. c. 4. that a sessions should be held; and every order made at such adjourned session must state when the original session commenced; and on adjourning a session, the continuance of it by the adjournment must be regularly entered, for unless the session be regularly adjourned they cannot hear the appeal. The allowance of costs is in the discretion of the sessions; and they need not state the particular sum; but they cannot direct costs to attend the event of a presumed appeal; nor order costs on a mere adjournment of an appeal.

Where an order of removal was served on the appellant-parish on Saturday, and the sessions were holden on the following Tuesday, and the appellant-parish was thirty-seven miles distant from the place where the sessions were holden, but there was no appeal to those sessions, and the justices refused to receive the appeal at the next sessions, the Court of King's Bench granted a mandamus to compel them so to do. 1 B. & A. 210.

But the Court of King's Bench will not compel the sessions by mandamus to try an appeal dismissed for want of notice of trial, where the sessions have granted a case upon the question, whether it had been rightly dismissed, and which case has been abandoned by the party applying for the mandamus. 3 N. & M. 757.

Where the sessions have improperly refused the hearing of an appeal upon a preliminary objection, the Court of King's Bench will interfere by mandamus; but where an objection has been taken during the trial of an appeal to the reception of a particular piece of evidence, and the sessions considering the objection valid dismissed the appeal, the court will not interfere, unless the sessions send up a case. 5 B. & Ad. 597.

See the provisions of the recent statutes for the amendment of the poor laws, with respect to appeals, Poor, VII.

The proceedings, as has been already noticed, may be removed from the sessions into the Court of King's Bench by certiorari. But by the 18 Geo. 2. c. 18. "No certiorari shall be granted to remove any conviction, judgment, order, or other proceedings before any justice of the peace, or sessions, unless it be applied for in six calendar months after such proceedings had or made; and unless it be duly proved on oath, that the party suing forth the same hath given six days notice in writing to the justice or justices, or two of them, before whom such proceedings have been; to the end that such justices, or the parties therein concerned, may show cause, if they think fit, against issuing the certiorari."

By 5 Geo. 2. c. 19. "no such certiorari shall be allowed unless the party enter into a recognizance of 50*l*. with condition to prosecute the same at his own costs and charges with effect and without delay; and to pay the party, in whose favour the judgment or order was made, within a month after the same shall be confirmed, his full costs: and if he shall not enter into such recognizance, or shall not perform the condition, the justice may proceed, and make such further order for the benefit of the party for whom judgment shall be given, as if no certiorari had been granted. And if the order shall be confirmed by the court, the person entitled to the costs, for the recovery thereof, within ten days after demand made, upon oath of such demand and refusal of payment, shall have an attachment granted for the contempt; and the recognizance not to be discharged till the costs are paid, and the order complied with."

This writ of certiorari cannot be applied for until after the appeal is allowed; but if it be granted before, and the writ be filed, it is too late to object. It may be directed to the session, and returned by them. If a session's case, removed by certiorari into the King's Bench, be sent down again to the sessions to be re-stated, and the prosecutor abandon it when it is returned, the court will discharge his recognizance for the costs; but not if he dispute the amended order. See further, Certiorari, Justices of the Peace.

SESSIONS FOR WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. In London, for justices, from among the mayor, recorder, and aldermen, (which the mayor or recorder to be one,) may hold a sessions to inquire into offences of selling by false weights and measures, contrary to the statutes, and to receive indictments to punish the offenders, &c. Char. K. Cha. 1.

SET-OFF. A mode of defence, whereby the defendant acknowledges the justice of the plaintiff's demand on the one hand, but on the other sets up a demand of his own to counterbalance it, either in the whole or in part.

At common law, if the plaintiff was as much, or even more, indebted to the defendant, than the defendant was to him, yet he had no method of striking a balance: the only way of obtaining relief was by going into a court of equity. To remedy this inconvenience, it was enacted by the 2 Geo. 2. c. 22. § 13. "That where there are mutual debts between the plaintiff and defendant, or if either party sue or be sued as executor or administrator, where there are mutual debts between the testator or intestate and either party, one debt may be set against the other; and such matter may be given in evidence upon the general issue, or pleaded in bar, as the nature of the case shall require; so as at the time of his pleading the general issue, where any such debt of the plaintiff, his testator or intestate, is intended to be insisted on in evidence, notice shall be given of the particular sum or debt so intended to be insisted on, and upon what account it became due; or otherwise such matter shall not be allowed in evidence, upon the general issue." This clause was made perpetual by the 8 Geo. 2. c. 24. § 4; and it having been doubted, whether mutual debts of a different nature could be set against each other, it was by the last-mentioned statute, (§ 5.) further enacted, "That, by virtue of the said clause, mutual debts may be set against each other, either by being pleaded in bar, or given in evidence on the general issue, in the manner therein mentioned, notwithstanding that such debts are deemed in law to be of a different nature, as in cases where either of the said debts shall accrue by reason of a penalty, contained in any bond or specialty; and in all cases, where either the debt for which the action hath been, or shall be brought, or the debt intended to be set against the same, hath accrued or shall accrue by reason of any such penalty, the debt intended to be set off shall be pleaded in bar, in which plea shall be shown how much is truly and justly due on either side; and in case the plaintiff shall recover in any such action, or suit, judgment shall be entered for no more than shall appear to be truly and justly due to the plaintiff, after one debt being set against the other as aforesaid." And where the debt due to the defendant is less than that due from him, he must, on pleading such set-off, pay the remaining balance into court. 3 Comm. c. 20. p. 304.

The actions in which a set-off is allowable upon these statutes are debt, covenant, and assumpsit, for the non-payment of money; and the demand intended to be set off must be such as might have been made the subject of one or other of these actions. A set-off, therefore, is never allowed in actions upon the case, trespass, or replevin, &c.; nor of a penalty, in debt on bond, conditioned for the performance of covenants, &c.; nor against an avowry for rent; nor of general damages in covenant or assumpsit; but where a bond is conditioned for the payment of an annuity, or of liquidated damages, a set-off may be allowed. A debt barred by the statute of limitations cannot be set off, and if it be pleaded in bar to the action, the plaintiff may reply the statute of limitations; or if given in evidence, on a notice of set-off, it may be objected to at the trial. Tidd's Pract. K. B. and the authorities there cited.

The debts sued for, and intended to be set off, must be mutual, and due in the same right; therefore a joint debt cannot be set off against a separate demand, nor a separate debt against a joint one; but a debt due to a defendant, as surviving partner, may be set off against a demand on him in his own right. In an action of debt against a man on his own bond, he cannot set off a debt due to him in right of his wife. Neither, for the same reason, can a defendant, sued as executor or administrator, set off a debt due to himself personally, nor if sued for his own debt, can he set off what is due to him as executor or administrator.

So a defendant cannot set off a debt due on a bond made by the plaintiff to a third party, and by him assigned to the defendant; for the legal debt is due to the obligee, and not to the defendant. 16 East, 86. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said the doctrine of Bottomley v. Brook, and Rudge v. Birch, was rather to be restrained than extended.

And although the bond in this case was a chose in action, not assignable, and therefore not legally vested in the defendant; yet the principle is the same in the case of a bill of exchange accepted by the plaintiff (which is legally assignable), if the bill is in fact vested in a third party, and only transferred to the defendant for the purpose of being set off against a sum due from the defendant to the plaintiff, for goods bought by the defendant of the plaintiff, with the intention of setting off his acceptance; for in such case the defendant holds the acceptance only as a trustee for the real owner, and no debt is bond fide due upon it to the defendant. Fair v. M'Iver, 16 East, 130.

So in an action by a trustee to recover a debt for the benefit of the cestui que trust, a debt due from the cestui que trust cannot be set off. 1 N. & M. 477. The cases of Bottomley v. Brook, quoted above, and Rudge v. Birch, 1 T. R. 621, were much questioned by the court.

A judgment recovered against a person, for which he is charged in execution, cannot be pleaded as a set-off to an action brought by him against the party at whose suit he is in execution. 5 M. & S. 103.

So the amount of a verdict cannot be set off against the amount of a judgment. 2 D. P. C. 157.

The general rule is, that the debts must be mutual, and the debt claimed to be set-off must be legally due from the plaintiff on the record. There are however some cases in which the defendant may have a right to set off against the plaintiff's claim a debt due to the defendant from a third party. These are principally where factors and agents, in dealing for their principals, do not disclose their representative character. Under these circumstances, a person dealing with them, and ignorant of their representative character, may, in general, set-off against the demand of the principal a debt due from the factor to himself. George v. Claget, 7 T. R. 359; Rabone v. Williams, 7 T. R. 360, n.; Curr v. Hinckley, 4 B. & C. 547.

But circumstances which show collusion between the factor and buyer, as the insolvency of the factor known to the buyer, will deprive the latter of his right of set-off. 7 T. R. 361, (b.)

And this right does not arise in dealing with a broker, for his character is materially different from that of a factor; as he has not the possession of the goods, he does not appear to the world as owner; and if he sells without disclosing his principal, he acts beyond the scope of his authority; the buyer, therefore, cannot set off against the principal's demand a debt due from the broker. It follows, therefore, that in dealing with a person known to be in the habit of acting as a broker, a buyer should presume he is a mere agent, until the contrary appears; whereas in dealing with a factor, the mere general knowledge that he is a factor will not deprive a buyer of the privileges arising from his acting as a principal, unless the buyer knows that he acts only as a factor in that particular transaction. The buyer however need not have this knowledge at the time of the sale of the goods; if he has it at any time before the completion of the delivery, he cannot set off the factor's debt. 2 B. & A. 137; 2 Camp. 22. Ibid.

As the buyer's right of set-off of a factor's debt arises from the presumed deception to which he is subjected, by the principal's suffering the factor to deal with the goods as his own, the buyer cannot of course have any such right to set off against the owner of goods a debt due to the buyer from his own broker employed to purchase them; since such broker is the agent of the buyer, and not of the owner. 1 Camp. 85.

Upon the above principle, viz. that a party dealing with an individual suffered to hold himself out as dealing on his own account, is not to be prejudiced by the appearance of another party to the transaction of whom he was ignorant, it is decided that where a person becomes indebted for goods sold to an ostensible partner, who appears to the world as trading alone, the debtor may set-off a debt due from such partner alone, against an action for the goods brought by him and his dormant partner. 7 T. R. 361, n., et vide Peake's Ca. 197.

The distinction above stated between brokers and factors, must be understood in reference to the class of brokers alluded to in Baring v. Corrie, viz. sworn brokers for buying and selling merchandize; for insurance brokers do not appear to be in the same manner distinguishable from factors.

The insurance broker, in effecting a policy with underwriters, is now held in all cases to be so far in the situation of a principal, that he is personally liable to the underwriter for the premium; and this, whether he effect the policy as agent, or in his own name; for the custom of dealing is, for the underwriters to look to him, not to the assured; and the receipt for the premium contained in every policy is conclusive as between the underwriter and the insured. Hence it follows that, in an action by the assured against the underwriters for a total loss, the underwriter cannot set off the amount of premium, although, in fact, it have never been paid him by the broker. It would seem, however, that if it were agreed between the broker and underwriter, that the loss should be paid out of premiums due to the underwriter in the broker's hands, that would be an answer to the claim of the assured. Airey v. Bland, Park, Ins. (7th ed.) 36; 1 Camp. 532; 4 Taunt. 217, et vide, id. 775; 12 East, 507.

The cases as to set-off, between the underwriter and insurance-broker are very numerous; most of them arise upon claims by brokers, in actions brought against them for premiums, to stand in the situation of principals, and to set off sums due from the underwriters for losses or for returns of premiums. In the earlier cases on the subject, great stress was laid upon the circumstance of the broker guaranteeing the losses to the assured, in consideration of a del credere commission; but the courts have since held, that this circumstance is a matter entirely between the broker and his principal, and cannot confer on the former any rights against third parties. And the more recent decisions rest on the sounder ground of the character in which the broker appears in effecting the insurance, viz. whether he appears as principal or as agent. The result of the cases seem to be, that where the broker effects the insurance in the name of his principal, the broker appears merely as an agent, he is so considered by the underwriters, and consequently is not entitled to the rights of a principal: he cannot sue on the policy in his own name, and cannot, in an action against him for premiums, set off sums due for losses, and this whether he acts under a del credere commission or not; but that, where the policy is effected in the broker's name, he there appears as a principal, he may sue in his own name, and is entitled to the right of set-off, provided he has an interest; which interest may be acquired either by his guaranteeing the losses to his principal for del credere, or by his advancing money on the goods insured. 1 T. R. 112, id. 287; 1 M. & S. 494; 2 M. & S. 112; id. 423; 4 M. & S. 568; 6 Taunt. 519; 4 Bing. 575.

It was formerly holden, that the statutes of set-off did not extend to assignees of a bankrupt; but it has since been determined, that in an action at their suit, the defendant may set-off a debt due to him at the time of the bankruptcy; but a note indorsed to him afterwards cannot be set-off.

And in actions by or against the assignees of a bankrupt, the sum really due may be recovered without either pleading or giving notice of a set-off. 1 T. R. 115; 3 Comm. c. 20, n.

In cases of bankruptcy, not only mutual debts between the bankrupt and any other person, but mutual credits may be set one against another. The term mutual credit is more extensive than the term mutual debt; and under it sums may be set off which had not been actually due at the time of the bankruptcy. So also may unliquidated damages for breach of a contract, and the time and credit given need not be of money on both sides; for if one party entrusts the other with goods or value, it will fall within the statute. See § 50 of the Bankrupt Act, 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. Under the language of this section, debts and credits are made the subject of set-off, notwithstanding the credit be given, or the debt contracted after an act of bankruptcy; provided that the party had not notice of such act of bankruptcy, and notwithstanding he may have had notice of the bankrupt stopping payment, or being insolvent. See Bac. Ab. Set-off, C. (7th ed.)

The same mutuality is requisite to constitute a mutual credit under the bankrupt laws, which is required to make mutual debts under the statute of set-off. Thus, where three partners, A., B., and C., delivered bills to D. for a special purpose, and A. and B. became bankrupts, in an action by their assignees against D. for the proceeds of the bills, it was held that C., not having become bankrupt, this was not a case of mutual credit, within the bankrupt law, so as to entitle the defendant to set off against the bills a debt due to him from A., B., and C. Staniforth v. Fellowes, 1 Marsh. R. 184.

Where a broker, indebted for premiums of insurance on policies, subscribed by an underwriter who afterwards became bankrupt, had a del credere commission on one of the policies, effected in the name, not of the broker, but of the person expressed in the body thereof, the broker not being intrusted with the custody of the policy, whereon a loss happened before the bankruptcy, though the broker paid the loss to the assured before the bankruptcy, the Court of C. P. held, that he could not set off that loss against the premium due to the assignees of the bankrupt. 7 Taunt. 478.

Where either of the debts accrues by reason of penalty, the debt intended to be set off must, by the 8 Geo. 2. c. 24. be pleaded in bar; and the defendant, in his plea, must aver what is really due; which averment has been held to be traversable: but, in most other cases, the defendant might until recently, have pleaded or given notice of set-off at his election.

Now, by the rules of H. T. 4. Wm. 4. a set-off must be pleaded.

By a rule of T. T. 1. Wm. 4. the particulars (if any) of the defendant's set-off shall be annexed, by the plaintiff's attorney, to every record.

SEVERAL ACTION. See Action.

SEVERAL COVENANT. A covenant by two or more severally; i. e. separately. See Covenant.

SEVERAL FISHERY. See FISHERY, Right of.

SEVERAL INHERITANCE. An inheritance conveyed, so as to descend or come to two persons severally by moieties, &c. See Estate, Limitation, Inheritances.

SEVERAL TAIL. Is that whereby land is given and entailed severally to two. Co. Litt. See Limitation, Tail.

SEVERAL TENANCY, tenura separatis.] A plea or exception taken to a writ that is laid against two persons as joint-tenants, who are several. Bro. 273. See further, Joint-tenants.

SEVERALTY, Estates in. He that holds lands or tenements in severalty, or is sole tenant thereof, is he that holds them in his own right only, without any other person being joined or connected with him in point of interest during his estate therein. 2 Comm. c. 12. p. 179.

SEVERANCE. The separating or severing of two or more, joined in one writ or action. There was a severance of the tenants in an assise, when one of two disseisees appeared upon the writ, and not the other. Lib. Intr. 81. A severance in debet, where two executors, &c. are plaintiffs, and one refuseth to act or prosecute. Ibid. 220. Severance in quare impedit, &c. 5 Rep. 97. And it lies in real as well as personal actions; and on writs of error. F. N. B. 78; 10 Rep. 135. In writ of error, if three defendants in the action bring error, and one releases the errors, he may be summoned and served, and then the other two shall proceed to reverse the judgment. 6 Rep. 26. And if in error where there are several plaintiffs, one only appears and signs errors, this is not good, without summoning and severing the rest, Cro. Eliz. 893.

It has been held, that summons and severance lies in partition; yet he who has severed shall have his part; for partition must be made of the whole. Jenk. Cent. 211. And in case of joint-tenants of lands by severance, the prosecution of the suit is severed, but not the parties; for where one of them recovers afterwards, the other may enter into the moiety recovered. Ibid. 40. Summons and severance is usually before appearance, as nonsuit is after appearance. 10 Rep. 194. But, according to Hale, there are two sorts of severances, one when a plaintiff will not appear; and the other when several plaintiffs appear, but some will not proceed and prosecute. Hard 347; 5 N. L. Abr. 575. If a plaintiff or defendant on a writ of summons and severance, sued out against him by another, doth not come in upon it, judgment shall be had ad prosequendum solum; and this hath been done in B. R. by giving a rule to appear and come in. 2 Lill. Abr. 539. See Summons and Severance.

SEVERANCE OF CURS. The cutting and carrying it from off the ground, and sometimes the setting out the titles from the rest of the curus, is called severance. Cro. Jac. 5. See Tithes. Where executors of tenants for life, &c. dying before severance, shall have curus sown, see Pathens.

SEVERANCE OF JOINT-TENANCY. See Joint-tenants.

SEWARD, rather SEA-WARD. See Sea-Reeve.] A Saxon word for him who guards the sea-costs; it signifies custos maris.

SEWER, seweria; query, from sevoir, to sit, and eau, water. Termes de la Ley. A fresh water trench, or little river, or channel, passed with banks on both sides, to carry the water into the sea, and thereby preserve the lands against inundations, &c.

The court of sewers is a temporary tribunal, erected by virtue of a commission under the great seal.

The kings of England used to grant commissions of sewers long before any statute was enacted in parliament for the purpose; and during the reigns of King Henry VI., Edward IV., and Henry VII., several statutes were made for appointing commissions of sewers in all parts of the realm, and others five years, &c. with certain powers to the commissioners; which commissions, by 23 Hen. 8. c. 5. were to be settled by the lord chancellor, lord treasurer, and the two chief justices, or any three of them, whereof the lord chancellor to be one; and by this law, the commissioners ought to be appointed; they were to be qualified as to estates, by law, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, in fee for life, worth forty marks per annum, besides reprises; (except they were resident in and free of a corporation; and had moveables worth 100 l.) and, if they executed the commission, not being qualified, or before sworn, they incurred a forfeiture of 40 l.

Now see the recent statute, post.

The said 23 Hen. 8. c. 5. § 17. directed that laws, acts, decrees, and ordinances made by commissioners of sewers should stand good and be put in execution so long as the commission endured and no longer; except the said laws and ordinances were engrossed in parchment, and certified under the seals of the commissioners into Chancery, and had the royal assent: and the 13 Eliz. c. 9. directed that all commissions of sewers should continue in force for ten years, unless sooner determined by supersedeas or new commission; and that all laws, ordinances, and constitutions made by force of such commission, being written in parchment, indented and under seal, should without such certificate or royal assent continue in force notwithstanding the determination of the commission by supersedeas until repealed or altered by new commissioners; and that all laws so sealed should without certificate or royal assent, be in force for one year after the determination of such commission by the expiration of ten years from its teste. But see now the recent statute, post.

The court of commissioners of sewers is classed by Blackstone among those whose jurisdiction is private and special; their jurisdiction being confined to such county or particular district as the commission expressly names. The commissioners are a court of record, and may fine and imprison for contempts. 1 Sid. 145. And in the execution of their duty may proceed by a jury (who may amerce for neglects) or upon their own view; and may take order for the removal of any annoyances, or the safeguard and conservation of the sewers within their commission, either according to the laws and customs of Romney Marsh (see that title), or otherwise at their own discretion; but they may not imprison persons for disobedience to their orders; nor can they intermeddle where there is not a public prejudice. Laws Sew.; 3 Comm. c. 6.

The sea, creeks, and bays on the coasts, are all within the statutes of sewers, in point of extent; but they and the shores and the relinquished grounds are out of the commission of sewers to be determined thereby; but ports and havens, as well as the walls and banks of waters, are within the commission of sewers; and the shore and grounds left by the sea, when they are put in gainage and made profitable, are then within the power of commission of sewers; and though before the ground left by the sea is not, as to defence, within the commission of sewers; yet a wall or bank may be thereon raised for the succour of the country, although not for any private commodity, the commission of sewers aiming at the general good. Callis, 31, 32.

The commissioners of sewers have jurisdiction over a sewer communicating with a navigable stream, or with the sea above the point where the tide ebbs and flows, if it be useful for navigation, and if the place over which the jurisdiction is exercised, is, or is likely to be, benefited by it. 2 T. R. 358.

The business of the commissioners of sewers is to repair sea-banks and walls, survey rivers, public streams, ditches, &c. and make orders for that purpose. They have authority grounded on the statute to inquire of all nuisances and offences committed by the stopping of rivers, erecting mills, not repairing of banks and bridges, &c. and to tax and assess all whom it may concern, for the amending of defaults, which tend to the obstruction or hindrance of the free passage of the water through its ancient courses: and they may arrest carts and horses, and take trees, paying a reasonable price for them, for reparations; appoint workmen, bailiffs, surveyors, and other officers, &c. Termes de la Ley, 541; 4 Inst. 275; Laws Sew. 86, 96.

Upon the 23 Hen. 8. c. 5. the commissioners decreed that a new river should be made out of another large river through the main land for seven miles unto another part of the old river; and for that purpose they laid a tax of a shilling gross upon several towns: adjudged that the commissioners have no power to make a new river, or any new invention to cast out water, &c., for such things are to be done in parliament; but they may order an old bank to be new made, or alter a sewer upon any inevitable necessity. The tax of a sum in gross was not warranted by their commission, they being to tax every owner or possessor of the lands according to the quality of their lands, rents, and number of acres, and their respective portions and profits, whether of pasture, fishing, &c. 10 Rep. 141. See the powers given to the commissioners by the late statute, post.

The commissioners of sewers cannot assess a person, in respect of drains which communicate with other drains that fall into the great sewer, if the level of his drain is so much above the sewer that the stopping of the sewer could not possibly throw back the water so as to injure his premises, and if he be not, and it does not appear that he is, likely to be benefited by the works done upon the sewer. 3 M. & S. 147.

There are several causes and considerations for which persons may be obliged to repair and maintain sewers, as frontagers were bound to the repairs of the walls and banks, &c. by reason of frontage. 37 Lib. Assis. pl. 10. The being owner of a bank, wall, or other defence, is a sufficient inducement to impose the charge of the repairs thereof upon such owner. 1 Hen. 7. Prescription and custom are much of the same nature, and the law takes notice of them in this case; but prescription doth not bind a man to the repairs, except it be ratione tenuræ. 21 Edw. 4. 38; 19 Hen. 7. By tenure of land, a person may be bound to repair a wall, bank, or defence, mentioned in the statute of sewers. 12 Hen. 4. A man may bind himself and his heirs by covenant expressly to repair a bank, wall, or sewer, and be good; yet this shall not bind the heir after his death, where assets are not left from the ancestor, who entered into the covenant. Callis's Reading on Sewers. That this is a good authority on the subject of sewers, see 2 T. R. 365.

The use of defences may tie a man to the reparation thereof, if one and his ancestors have had the use of a river by sailing up and down the same, or have used a ferry on or over it, &c. If no person or grounds can be known, who ought to make repairs by tenure, prescription, custom, or otherwise, then the commissioners are to tax the level. Laws Sewers, 57, 67, 68.

If a sea-bank or wall, which the owners of particular lands are bound to repair, be destroyed by tempest, without any default in such owners, the commissioners of sewers may order a new one, even in a different form, if necessary, to be erected at the expense of the whole level. 8 T. R. 312.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 22. the laws relating to sewers have been amended. The following is an outline of the principal provisions of the act.

By § 1. the qualification of the commissioners is increased.

And § 2. Quakers may act as commissioners, upon making an affirmation.

§ 3. imposes an oath of qualification to be taken by other commissioners before acting, in addition to the oath prescribed by the 23 Hen. 8.

§ 4. imposes a penalty of 100*l*. on persons acting not qualified. But proceedings are not to be impeached on account of disqualification.

By § 5. ex-officio commissioners are not required to qualify.

By § 6. every commission of sewers is to continue for ten years, unless renewed or repealed by writ of superseas.

By § 7. all laws, decrees, and ordinances, made by any court of sewers, and duly registered in the rolls of such court, are to continue in force notwithstanding the expiration of the commission, and although not ingrossed in parchment, or not certified into the Court of Chancery.

§ 8, 9. regulate the meetings of the commissioners.

§ 10. after reciting that doubts have arisen as to the extent of the jurisdiction of commissioners of sewers, enacts, that all walls, banks, culverts, and other defences whatsoever, whether natural or artificial, situate or being by the coasts of the sea, and all rivers, streams, sewers, and watercourses, which now are or hereafter shall be navigable, or in which the tide now does or hereafter shall or may ebb and flow, or which now do or hereafter shall or may directly or indirectly communicate with any such navigable or tide river, stream, or sewer, and all walls, banks, culverts, bridges, dams, floodgates, and other works erected or to be erected upon or adjoining to any such river, streams, sewers, or watercourses, shall be within and subject to the jurisdiction of commissioners of sewers: provided, that nothing therein contained shall empower any commissioners of sewers to exercise authority over any dams, floodgates, or other works erected for ornament, previous to the act, in, upon, or over any rivers, streams, ditches, gutters, sewers, or watercourses near or contiguous to any house or building, or in any garden, yard, paddock, park, planted walk, or avenue to a house, without the consent in writing of the owner or proprietor thereof respectively first obtained.

§ 11 & 12. specify the manner in which juries are to be summoned to make inquiries or presentments either under the old law or that act.

§ 13. declares that a presentment of a jury shall not be necessary upon each occasion to repair.

By § 14. rates are to be made for every distinct level or district.

But (§ 15.) nothing therein contained is to discharge persons from liability by tenure, &c.

And by § 17. nothing contained in the act is to preclude courts of sewers from causing inquiry and presentment by jury as before.

By § 18. rates are to be apportioned between outgoing and incoming tenants.

By § 19. any court of sewers may decree and ordain any new walls, banks, sewers, guts, gotes, calcies, bridges, tunnels, culverts, sluices, floodgates, tumbling bays, cuts, or other works, aids, and defences, or any alteration in the gauge, dimension, course, direction, or situation of any old or existing wall, &c. to be constructed, for the more effectually defending any lands and premises within the jurisdiction of such court against the irruption of the sea, or for carrying off the superfluous fresh waters, and also, in like manner and at the discretion, may decree any former walls or defences against the sea, or against any rivers, streams, sewers, or watercourses, within their commission, to be abandoned and given up, and new defences and walls, banks, sluices, floodgates, tumbling bays, cuts, and other works to be made and continued in lieu thereof; and in every such case may direct by inquiry and presentment of a jury, in what manner and proportions the same shall thereafter be repaired and maintained by the person, body politic or corporate, deriving advantage or avoiding damage thereby or therefrom, having regard to previous liabilities in respect of the walls and defences so to be abandoned.

Provided (§ 21.) that no new works are to be made without the consent of the owners and occupiers of three-fourth parts in value of the lands to be charged.

§ 22. Occupiers of land adjoining sewers may take away soil and weeds from the banks for their own use.

And (§ 23.) upon neglect of occupiers to remove soil, surveyors may remove it.

By § 24. the commissioners are authorized to contract for the purchase of lands, &c.

And (§ 26.) where persons shall neglect or refuse to treat &c. commissioners are to issue their warrants to the sheriff to impanel a jury. The jury may be challenged. Witnesses are to be summoned and examined upon oath; and the jury are to assess damages, and their verdict to be binding.

By § 27. commissioners may impose a fine on the sheriff witnesses, &c. making default.

§ 39. enables commissioners to sell lands, &c. which are not wanted; and the first offer is to be given to the owners of adjoining grounds.

§ 41. empowers the courts of sewers to borrow and take up money at interest for making and maintaining works.

And (§ 42.) the courts of sewers may grant securities to persons advancing money in the form therein set forth.

And (§ 43.) such securities may be transferred.

By § 44. courts of sewers may be held out of the limits of the commission, at any place not exceeding five miles from such limits.

And by § 45. all acts of commissioners done without the district of the commission, but within five miles thereof, are declared valid.

By § 46. several defaults may be included in one presentment, and separately traversed.

By § 52. constables, &c. are to obey orders of commissioners.

And (§ 53.) fines, &c. may be levied by warrant of commissioners of sewers.

§ 55. Commissioners may decree and assess costs; and in default of distress may raise the same upon the lands of the defaulters.

§ 57. Commissioners of sewers may sue and be sued in the name of their clerk.

By § 61. the act is not to prejudice any local act.

And by § 62. the rights of the city of London are saved.

The 3 Jac. 1. c. 14. ordains that all ditches, banks, bridges, streams, and watercourses, within two miles of London, falling into the Thames, shall be subject to a commission of sewers; and the lord mayor, &c. is to appoint persons who have power of commissioners of sewers.

The conduct of commissioners of sewers is under the control of the Court of King's Bench, which will prevent or punish any illegal or arbitrary proceedings. Cro. Jac. 336. And yet in the reign of King James I. (8th Nov. 1616) the privy council took upon them to order that no action or complaint should be prosecuted against the commissioners unless before that board, and committed several to prison who had brought such actions at common law, till they had released the same; and one of the reasons for discharging Sir Edward Coke from his office of lord chief justice was for countenancing those proceedings at law. Moor. 825, 826; see 3 Comm. 55, 74. But now it is clearly established that this (like other inferior jurisdictions) is subject to the discretion or coercion of the Court of King's Bench. 1 Vent. 66, 67; Salk. 146.

If it is found before commissioners of sewers that a certain person ought to repair a bank, and this is removed into B. R., the court will not quash the inquisition, or grant a new trial, except he repair it; and if afterwards he is acquitted, he shall be reimbursed. Sid. 78. In case of sewers the Court of King's Bench inquire into the nature of the fact before they grant a certiorari to remove orders, that no mischief may happen by inundations in the mean time, which is a discretionary execution of their power. 1 Salk. 146.

The court commonly hears counsel on both sides, where orders of commissioners of sewers are removed by certiorari, before such orders are filed; for if good, the court will grant a procedendo, which cannot be done after they are filed; but they will file them in any case where there is no danger likely to ensue. 1 Salk. 145. If commissioners of sewers proceed after a certiorari delivered out of B. R. attachment will issue against them, and they may be fined. 3 Nels. Abr. 218.

Orders of sewers being removed by certiorari, the court would not file the orders till they had heard the objections debated, so as to have it in their power to send the orders back again. 2 Str. 1263. The court held, that a certiorari bringing up an order made by the commissioners for the removal of their own clerk, was of common right, and not discretionary, as in the case of other orders, where great inconveniences may follow by inundations. 1 Str. 609.

SEXAGESIMA SUNDAY. The sixtieth day before Easter. See Septuagesima.

SEXHINDENI, or SEXHINDMEN, Sax.] The middle thanes, valued at 600 shillings. See Hinden Homines.

SEXTARY, sextarius.] Was an ancient measure containing about our pint and a half. The town of Leicester paid, among other things, to the king yearly, twenty-five measures, called sextaries, of honey, as we read in Domesday. See Mon. Angl. ii. 849 b; and i. 136 b; in which latter place it seems to have been used for a much greater quantity. A sextary of ale contained sixteen lagenas. Cowell. See Tolsester.

SEXTERY LANDS. Lands given to a church or religious house for maintenance of the sexton or sacristan. Cowell.

SEXTONS. Parish clerks and sextons are regarded by the common law as persons who have freeholds in their offices; and therefore, though they may be punished, yet they cannot be deprived by ecclesiastical censures. 2 Roll. Abr. 224; 1 Comm. c. 11. See Mandamus, Office.

Gloss.* in v. Drenges; where it is mentioned as quidam bellus of the family of Sharnburne, in Norfolk. See Wright's Tenures, 62, who also mentions pleas held at Pinenden for the same purpose. Hume says, "There is a paper or record of the family of Sharnborne, which pretends that that family, which was Saxon, was restored upon proving their innocence. Though this paper was able to impose on such great antiquaries as Spelman and Dugdale, it is proved by Dr. Brady (Ans. to Petyt, p. 11, 12) to have been a forgery." *Hume's Hist. SHAWALDRES. Soldiers. Cowell.

SHEADING. A riding, uthing, or division in the Isle of Man, where the whole island is divided into six sheadings, one of which there is a coroner, or chief constable, appointed by delivery of a rod at the Trowld Court, or annual convention. King's Descrip. Isle of Man, 17.

SHEARMAN'S CRAFT. A craft or occupation used at Norwich and elsewhere, the artificers whereof do shear worsteds, fustians, and all woollen cloth. See 19 Hen. 7. c. 17; 22 & 23 Car. 2. c. 8.

SHEEP. By an ancient and obsolete statute, no person shall keep at one time above two thousand sheep, on pain of 3s. 4d. per sheep above that number; but lambs are not to be accounted as sheep till they are a year old. 25 Hen. 8. c. 13. SHERIFF; SHIRE-REEVE; or SHIRIFF.

THE Reeve, bailiff, or officer of the shire; Lat. Viccomes; Sax. Sere gersa, from the Sax. sciran, to divide.] The chief officer under the king in every shire or county, being so called from the first division of the kingdom into counties. Cand. Brit.

The Scotch sheriff differs very considerably from the English sheriff. The Scotch sheriff is properly a judge; and by the 20 Geo. 2. c. 43. he must be a lawyer of three years' standing; and is declared incapable of acting in any cause for the county of which he is sheriff. He is called Sheriff Depute (so called as being deputed by the crown, in contradistinction to the sheriff principal, or high-sheriff, the officer who formerly enjoyed jurisdiction as attached to patrimony); he must reside within the county four months in the year: he holds his office ad vitam aut culpam. He may appoint substitutes, who as well as himself receive stated salaries. The king may appoint a High Sheriff for the term of one year only. The civil jurisdiction of the sheriff depute extends to all personal actions on contract, bond, or obligation, to the greatest extent, and generally in all civil matters not especially committed to other courts. His criminal jurisdiction extends to the trial of murder, though the regular circuits of the Court of Justiciary prevent such trials occurring before him. He takes cognizance of theft and other felonies, and all offences against the police. His ministerial duties are similar to those of sheriffs in England.

What follows relates to sheriffs in England and Wales.

- I. Of Sheriff's generally.
 - II. Who are qualified for, or exempt from, serving the Office of Sheriff. And see III.
 - III. Of the Appointment and continuance in Office of Sheriffs.
 - IV. Of their Duties, Powers, and Jurisdiction.
 - V. Of the Under-Sheriff, &c.
- As to fees of sheriffs, see Fees.

I. It seems that anciently the government of the county was by the king lodged in the earl or count, who was the immediate officer to the crown; and this high office was granted by the king at will; sometimes for life, and afterwards in fee; but when it became too burdensome, and could not be commodiously executed by a person of so high rank and quality, it was thought necessary to constitute a person duly qualified to officiate in his room and stead; from hence he is called in Latin Vice-comes, as being deputy of the Earl or Comes; and sheriff from Shire-reeve, i. e. governor of the shire or county. He is likewise considered in our books as bailiff to the crown; and his county, of which he hath the care, and in which he is to execute the king's writs, is called a baithwick. Dac. 60; Sutcl. 43; 1 Roll. Rep. 274; Co. Litt. 168. See Pref. to 9 Rep. 33.

It is said by Coke and by Dalton, that earls, by reason of their high employments and attendance upon the king, being not able to follow all the business of the county, were delivered of all that burthen, and only enjoyed the honour as they now do, and that labour was laid upon the sheriff; so that now the sheriff doth all the king's business in the county; and the sheriff, though he be still called Viccomes, yet all he doth, and all his authority, is entirely independent of and not subject to the earl, being immediately from and under the king, and not from or under the earl; so that, at this day, the sheriff hath all the authority for the administration and execution of justice, which the count or earl had; the king, by his letters-patent, now committing to the sheriff custodiam comitatus. 9 Co. 49; Dalt. Sher. 2.

He is at this day considered as an officer of great antiquity, trust, and authority; having, as Dalton observes, from the king the custody, keeping, command, and government (in some sort) of the whole county committed to his charge and care; and, according to Coke, he is said to have triplicem custodiam, viz. vitæ justitiæ, vitæ legis, et vitæ reipublicæ, &c. Vitæ justitiæ, to serve process, and to return indifferent juries for the trial of men's lives, liberties, lands, and goods; vitæ legis, to execute process and make execution, which is the life of the law; and vitæ reipublicæ, to keep the peace. Co. Litt. 168; Dalt. Sher. 5.

It seems that, anciently, sheriffs were elected by the freeholders of the county, as the coroners are at this day; and, consequently, that their offices did not determine by the death of the king. 2 Inst. 558; 2 Brownl. 282. See post, III.

And though at this day the king hath the sole appointment of sheriffs, except in counties palatine, and where there are jura regalia, yet it hath been adjudged, that the office of sheriff is an entire thing, and that therefore the king cannot apportion or divide it; that is, he cannot determine it in part, as for one town or one hundred; neither can he abridge the sheriff of any thing incident to or belonging to his office. Dac. 60; 4 Co. 33; Milton's case; Dalt. Sher. 6; Hob. 13 Raym. 369.

The lord mayor and citizens of London have the shrievalty of London and Middlesex in fee by charter; and two sheriffs are annually elected by them, for whom they are to be answerable. If one of these sheriffs dies, the other cannot act till another is made; and there must be two sheriffs of London, which is a city and county; though they make but one sheriff of the county of Middlesex: they are several as to plaints in their respective courts. 3 Rep. 72; Show. Rep. 289. See post, III.

Where there are two sheriffs, and one of them is a party interested in any suit, process must go to the other sheriff and not to the coroner. 5 M. & S. 144.

II. It is provided by several acts of parliament, that no man shall be sheriff in any county, except he have sufficient lands within the same county where he shall be sheriff, whereof to answer the king and his people, in case that any person shall complain against them; and that none (that is steward or bailiff to a great lord shall be made sheriff. 9 Edw. 2. st. 2; 2 Edw. 3. c. 4; 4 Edw. 3. c. 9; 5 Edw. 3. c. 4; 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 1. § 7.

This is the only qualification required from a sheriff that it was the intention of our ancestors, that the lands of a sheriff should be considerable, abundantly appears from their law. If this provision so frequently repeated; and at the same time that they obtained a confirmation of Magna Carta and their most valuable liberties. As the sheriff, both in criminal and civil cases, may have the custody of men of the greatest property in the county, his own estate ought certainly to be large, that he may be above all temptation to permit them to escape, or to join them in their flight. In ancient times, this office was frequently executed by the nobility, and persons of the highest rank in the kingdom. Spelm. Gloss. in v. Viccomes. Bishops also were not unfrequently sheriffs. Richard Duke of Gloucester (afterwards Richard III.) was sheriff of Cumberland five years together. It does not appear that there is any express law to exclude the nobility from the execution of this office; though it has long been appropriated to commoners. 1 Comm. c. 9. p. 346, a.

By 1 Rich. 2. c. 11. none that hath been sheriff of any county a year, shall be within two years next chosen again, or put in the same office, if there be other sufficient.

And by 1 Hen. 5. c. 4. they that be bailiffs of sheriffs one year, shall be in no such office by three years next following, except bailiffs of sheriffs which inherit in their office.

It is holden that the king hath an interest in every subject, and a right to his service; and that no man can be exempt from the office of sheriff, but by act of parliament, or letters patent. Sav. 43; 9 Co. 46; 1 Ld. Raym. 29.

And on this foundation, it was adjudged, in Sir John Read's case, who was made high sheriff of Hertfordshire at the time he was excommunicated for non-payment of alimony, that an information properly lay against him for not executing the office; though it was objected, on his behalf, that the oath and sacrament enjoined by act of parliament are necessary qualifications for all sheriffs, which he was disabled to take by reason of the excommunication: but the court held, that he was punishable for not removing the disability, it being in his power to get himself absolved from the excommunication; and that therefore it could be no excuse. 2 Mod. 299.

Though, in the above case, it was admitted that the subject was bound to serve the king in such capacity as he is in at the time of the service commanded, yet it was insisted upon, that he was not obliged to qualify himself to serve in every capacity; and that therefore a prisoner for debt is not bound nor compellable to be sheriff, no more than a person is bound to purchase lands to qualify himself to be either a coroner or justice of the peace: and it was likewise said that, by statute, every recusant is disabled; he may conform, but he is not bound to it; for if he submits to the penalty, it is as much as is required by law. 2 Mod. 301.

Previous to the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts it was settled that dissenters were not compellable to serve the office of sheriff. Harrison (chamberlain of London) v. Evans, in the House of Lords, 1766: but now that the sacramental test is abolished as a qualification for office there is no longer any reason why they should be exempt.

If a man is disabled by a judgment in law to bear an office, he is excused; an judicium reddere in officio; for though his fault or neglect was the occasion of such judgment, yet it is a mark set upon him by the government. Salk. 108. 4 Mod. 27.

Barristers and practising attorneys are exempt from serving the office of sheriff. 1 Burr. 2109. And by the militia act 42 Geo. 3. c. 30. § 172. no officer of the militia can be compell'd to serve the office.

And as nothing but an extreme necessity can exempt a person from serving the office of sheriff, &c. on this foundation a bye-law made in London, that no freeman chosen sheriff, &c. shall be excused unless he voluntarily swears he is not worth 10,000*l.*, &c. (now 15,000*l.*) and that if he openly refuses to take the office, then to forfeit the sum of 40*l.* was adjudged good. Salk. 142; Carth. 489, 5 Mod. 438. City of London v. Lumsden. In the year 1748, the corporation of London made a bye-law, imposing a fine of 800*l.* on persons refusing to serve the office of sheriff.

The vast expense, which custom had introduced in serving the office of high sheriff, was grown such a burthen to the subject, that it was enacted, by 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 21. that no sheriff (except of London, Westmoreland, and towns which are counties of themselves) should keep any table at the assizes, except for his own family, or give any presents to the judges or their servants, or have more than forty men in livery. Yet, for the sake of safety and decency, he may not have less than twenty men in England and twelve in Wales; upon forfeiture, in any of these cases, of 200*l.*

III. The high sheriff hath his authority given him by two patents; by the one the king commits to him the custody of the county; by the other the king commands all other his subjects within that county to be aiding and assisting to him in all things belonging to his office. Dalt. Sher. 7. where see the form of such patents.

Sheriffs were formerly chosen by the inhabitants of the several counties. In confirmation of which it was ordained by 28 Edw. 1. c. 8. that the people should have election of sheriffs in every shire, where the shrievalty is not of inheritance. For anciently in some counties the sheriffs were hereditary: as it seems they were in Scotland till the 20 Geo. 2. c. 43; and still continue in the county of Westmoreland to this day: the city of London have also the inheritance of the shrievalty of Middlesex vested in their body by charter. 3 Rep. 72.

The Earl of Thanet is hereditary sheriff of Westmoreland, which office may descend to and be executed by a female, for Anne Countess of Pembroke had the office, and exercised it in person; and at the assizes at Appleby sat with the judges on the bench. 1 Inst. 326, n. The election of the sheriffs of London and Middlesex was granted to the citizens of London, in consideration of their paying 300*l.* a year to the king's exchequer. 1 Comm. c. 9, n.

The reason of these popular elections is assigned in 28 Edw. 1. c. 13. "that the commons might choose such as would not be a burthen to them." And herein appears plainly a strong trace of the democratical part of our constitution; in which form of government it is an indispensable requisite, that the people should choose their own magistrates. This election was in all probability not absolutely vested in the commons, but required the royal approbation. For, in the Gothic constitution, the judges of the county courts (which office is executed by our sheriff) were elected by the people, but confirmed by the king; and the form of their election was thus managed: the people, or incolæ territorii, chose twelve electors, and they nominated three persons, ex quibus rex unum confirmabat. But with us in England these popular elections, growing tumultuous, were put an end to by the 9 Edw. 2. st. 2. which enacted, that the sheriffs should from thenceforth be assigned by the chancellor, treasurer, and the judges; as being persons in whom the same trust might with confidence be reposed. By 14 Edw. 3. c. 7; 23 Hen. 6. c. 7. the chancellor, treasurer, president of the king's council, chief justices, and chief baron, are to make this election, and that on the morrow of All Souls in the exchequer. And the king's letters patent, appointing the new sheriffs, used commonly to bear date the sixth day of November. 12 Edw. 4. c. 1. The 12 Rich. 2. c. 2. ordains that the chancellor, treasurer, keeper of the privy seal, steward of the king's house, the king's chamberlain, clerk of the rolls, the justices of the one bench and the other, barons of the exchequer, and all other that shall be called to ordain, name, or make justices of the peace, sheriffs, and other officers of the king, shall be sworn to act indifferently, and to appoint no man that sueth either privily or openly to be put in office, but such only as they shall judge to be the best and most sufficient. And the custom now is and has been at least ever since the time of Fortescue, who was chief justice and chancellor to Henry the Sixth that all the judges, together with the other great officers and privy councillors, meet in the Exchequer on the morrow of All Souls yearly, (which day is now altered to the morrow of St. Martin by the last act for abbreviating Michaelmas term,) and then and there the judges propose three persons, to be reported (if approved of) to the king, who afterwards appoints one of them to be sheriff. See 1 Comm. c. 9. p. 340, 341; Fort. de LL. c. 24.

The following is the present mode of nominating sheriffs in the Exchequer, on the morrow of St. Martin.

The chancellor, chancellor of the exchequer, the judges and several of the privy council assemble, and an officer of the court administers an oath to them, in old French, that they will nominate no one from favour, partiality, or any improper motive: this done, the same officer, having the list of the counties in alphabetical order, and of those who were nominated the year preceding, reads over the three names, and the last of the three he pronounces to be the present sheriff: but where there has been a pocket-sheriff (see post), he reads the three names upon the list, and then declares who is the present sheriff. If any of the ministry or judges has any objection to a person named, he mentions it, and another gentleman is nominated in his room: if no objection is made, some one rises and says, "To the two gentlemen I know no objection, and I recommend A. B. esq. in the room of the present sheriff."

Another officer has a paper, with a number of names, given him by the clerk of assize for each county, which paper generally contains the names of the gentlemen upon the former list, and also of gentlemen who are likely to be nominated; and whilst the three are nominated, he prefixes 1, 2, or 3 to their names according to the order in which they are placed; which, for greater certainty, he afterwards reads over twice. Several objections are made to gentlemen: some perhaps at their own request; such as, that they are abroad, that their estates are small and incumbered, that they have no equipage, that they are practising barristers, or officers in the militia, &c.

The new sheriff is generally appointed about the end of the following Hilary Term: this extension of the time was probably in consequence of the 17 Edw. 4. c. 7. which enables the old sheriffs to hold his office over Michaelmas and Hilary Terms. 1 Comm. c. 9. p. 341. n.

This custom, of the twelve judges proposing three persons, seems borrowed from the Gothic constitution before mentioned; with this difference, that, among the Goths, the twelve nominors were first elected by the people themselves. And this usage, it is suggested by Blackstone, was, at its first introduction, founded upon some statute, though not now to be found among our printed laws: first, because it is materially different from the direction of all the statutes before mentioned; which it is hard to conceive that the judges would have countenanced by their concurrence, or that Fortescue would have inserted in his book, unless by the authority of some statute: and also, because a statute is expressly referred to in the record, which Sir Edward Coke says he transcribed from the Council-book of 3d March, 34 Hen. VI. and which is in substance as follows:—The king had of his own authority appointed a man sheriff of Lincolnshire, which office he refused to take upon him; whereupon the opinions of the judges were taken, what should be done in this behalf: and the two chief justices, Sir John Fortescue and Sir John Prisot, delivered the unanimous opinion of them all; "that the king did an error, when he made a person sheriff that was not chosen and presented to him according to the statute; that the person refusing was liable to no fine for disobedience, as if he had been one of the three persons chosen according to the tenor of the statute; that they would advise the king to have recourse to the three persons that were chosen according to the statute, or that some other thrifty man be entreated to occupy the office for this year; and that, the next year, to eschew such inconveniences, the order of the statute, in this behalf made, be observed." 1 Comm. c. 9.

Mr. Christian expresses his dissent from the foregoing opinion of the learned commentator, that the present practice originated from a statute which cannot now be found; because, if such a statute ever existed, it must have been passed between the date of this record, 34 Hen. 6. and the 23 Hen. 6. c. 7. before referred to; for that statute recites and ratifies the 14 Edw. 3. st. 1. c. 7. which provides only for the nomination of one person to fill the office when vacant: yet the former statute, 9 Edw. 2. st. 2. leaves the number indefinite; viz. sheriffs shall be assigned by the chancellor, &c.; and if such a statute had passed in the course of those eleven years, it is probable that it would have been referred to by subsequent statutes. Mr. Christian conceives that the practice originated from the consideration, that as the king was to confirm the nomination by his patent, it was more convenient and respectful to present three to him than only one; and though this proceeding did not exactly correspond with the directions of the statute, yet it was not contrary to its spirit, or, in strictness, to its letter; and therefore the judges might perhaps think themselves warranted in saying, that the three persons were chosen according to the tenor of the statute. 1 Comm. c. 9. p. 342. n.

Notwithstanding the unanimous resolution of all the judges of England, entered, as before mentioned, in the council book, and the 34 and 35 Hen. 8. c. 26. § 61. which expressly recognizes this to be the law of the land; some have affirmed that the king, by his prerogative, may name whom he pleases to be sheriff, whether chosen by the judges or not. Jenk. 229. This is grounded on a very particular case in the fifth year of Queen Elizabeth, when, by reason of the plague, there was no Michaelmas term kept at Westminster, so that the judges could not meet there in Crastino Animarum, to nominate the sheriffs; whereupon the queen named them herself, without such previous assembly, appointing for the most part one of the two remaining in the last year's list. Dyer, 225. And this case, thus circumstanced, is the only authority in our books for the making these extraordinary sheriffs. It is true, the reporter adds, that it was held that the queen by her prerogative might make a sheriff without the election of the judges non obstante aliquo statuto in contrarium: but the doctrine of non obstante's, which sets the prerogative above the laws, was effectually demolished by the Bill of Rights at the revolution and abdicated Westminster Hall when King James abdicated the kingdom. However, it must be acknowledged, that the practice of occasionally naming what are called Pocket-Sheriffs, by the sole authority of the crown, hath uniformly continued to the reign of his present Majesty, in which, few (if any) compulsory instances have occurred. 1 Comm. c. 9.

They were called Pocket-Sheriffs who were appointed by the king, not being one of the three nominated in the Exchequer. The unanimous opinion of the judges above referred to, from 2 Inst. 359. seems to preclude the possibility of a compulsory appointment. 1 Comm. 342. n.

Where the appointment is legal, and there is no sufficient excuse for not accepting it, it is a misdemeanour to refuse to serve, and the court of K. B. would probably grant permission to proceed by criminal information against a person so refusing. See Rex. v. Woodrow, 2 T. R. 731.

The sheriffs in every of the shires of Wales shall be nominated yearly by the lord president, council, and justices of Wales, and shall be certified up by them; and after, appointed and elected by the king, as other sheriffs be. 34 Hen. 8. c. 26; Dalt. Sh. 6. See 1 Wm. 4. c. 70; and title Wales.

Formerly the sheriff, before he exercised any part of his office, and before his patent was made out, was to give security in the King's Remembrancer's Office in the Exchequer, under pain of 100*l.* for the payment of his proffers, and all other profits of the sheriffwick: but these securities were never sued, unless there was a deficiency in the sheriff's effects. Dalt. Sh. 7.

But now by 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 89. § 2. it is no longer necessary for any sheriff in England or Wales to sue out any patent or writ of assistance, or to make or pay proffers, nor shall any bailiff or bailiffs of liberties in England or Wales be required to make or pay any proffers, nor shall he or they have any day of prefixion, or be apposed, or take any oath or oath before the cursitor baron to account, or account, or be cast out of court, as theretofore in use in his majesty's Court of Exchequer.

And by § 3. whenever any person shall be duly pricked or nominated by his majesty to be sheriff of any county in England or Wales, except the county palatine of Lancaster, the same shall be forthwith notified in the London Gazette, and a warrant in the form set forth in the schedule to the act shall be made out and signed by the clerk of the Privy Council, and transmitted to the person so appointed sheriff; and the appointment of sheriff thereby made shall be as effectual as if the same had been made by patent under the great seal of Great Britain, or by any ways and means theretofore in use; and the sheriffs so appointed shall thereupon, and upon taking the oath of office, thereafter mentioned, have and exercise all powers, privileges, and authorities whatsoever usually exercised and enjoyed by sheriffs of counties in England and Wales, without any patent, writ of assistance, or other writ whatsoever, or entering into any recognizance by himself or sureties, and without payment of or being liable to pay any fees whatsoever for the same.

§ 4. provides that a duplicate of the said warrant shall, within ten days next after the date of the same warrant, be transmitted by the said clerk of the Privy Council to the clerk of the peace of the county for which such person shall be appointed sheriff, to be by the said clerk of the peace enrolled, without fee or reward.

The sheriff, before he takes upon him the exercise of his office, must not only take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, enjoined to all officers by divers acts of Parliament, but all sheriffs, except those of Wales, and the counties palatine, must take the oath appointed by 8 Geo. 1. c. 15. § 18. for the due execution of their office.

As to the exceptions taken by Sir Edward Coke to the oath in the case of the sheriffs of Berks, see Bac. Abr. Sheriffs, G. (edit. by Gmillin & Dodd.)

By the 3 and 4 Will. 4. c. 90. § 5. every person appointed sheriff and under sheriff, except the sheriffs of London and Middlesex and their under sheriffs, shall, before he enter upon the execution of his office, take the oath of office now required by law, which oath shall be fairly written on parchment (without being subject to any stamp duty) and signed by him, and may be sworn before the barons of his majesty's exchequer, or any justice of the peace for the county of which he shall be appointed sheriff or under sheriff; and the same shall be thereupon transmitted to the clerk of the peace for the same county, who is thereby required to file the same among the records of his office.

If a person refused to take upon him the office of sheriff, it was usual to punish him in the Star-chamber; and he may now be proceeded against by information in the Court of King's Bench. Also if he refuses to take the oaths enjoined him, or officiates in the office before he hath thus qualified himself, the court, which hath a general superintendency over all officers and ministers of justice, will grant an information against him, and it hath been held, that a refusal of oaths required to be taken, amounts to a refusal of the office. Dalt. Sh. 15; Dyer, 167; 3 Lev. 116; Carth. 307.

The office of sheriff doth not determine by the party's becoming a peer on the death of his father, but that he still remains sheriff ad voluntatem Regis. Cro. Eliz. 12. Sir Lewis Morant's case.

When a sheriff is chosen, the old sheriff continues sheriff of the county till the new is sworn, which completes him in his office; but the office of the old sheriff ceases and is at an end when the writ of discharge comes to him.

By 14 Edw. 3. c. 7. no sheriff shall tarry or abide in his office above one year, upon pain to forfeit 200l. a year as long as he occupieth the office; and every pardon made for such offence or forfeiture shall be void: and see 43 Edw. 3. c. 9. post, V. London, Middlesex, &c. are not within these statutes. See 3 Geo. 1. c. 15. § 21.

Notwithstanding these old statutes, it hath been said, 4 Rep. 32. that a sheriff may be appointed durante bene placito, or during the king's pleasure: and so is the form of the royal writ. Therefore till a new sheriff be named, his office cannot be determined, unless by his own death or the demise of the king; in which last case, it was usual for the successor to send a new writ to the old sheriff; but now by 1 Ann. st. 1. c. 8. all officers appointed by the preceding king may hold their offices for six months after the king's demise, unless sooner displaced by the successor. See Dalt. 7, 8.

IV. A SHERIFF cannot be elected knight of the shire for that county for which he is sheriff. 4 Inst. 48; Litt. Rep. 326. See Parliament.

By 4 Hen. 4. c. 5. every sheriff shall be dwelling in proper person within his bailiwick, for the time he shall be such officer; and that the sheriff shall be sworn to do the same.

Hence it is clear that a sheriff hath no jurisdiction in any other county, nor can he do a judicial act, in which his personal presence is required, out of his county; but it is held, that he may do a ministerial act, as make a panel, or return a writ out of his county, unless he is beyond sea. Dalt. Sher. 22; 9 Hen. 4. 1. See further Plowd. 37; Dalt. Sher. 23.

By 23 Hen. 6. c. 9. it is provided, "that no sheriff shall let to farm, in any manner, his county, nor any of his bailiwicks, hundreds, or wapentakes."

In the construction hereof it hath been holden, that this is a particular law, and must be pleaded, otherwise the judges cannot take notice of it. 3 Keb. 678.

It hath been held, that a lease of the county, though no rent was ever received, is within the statute: the intent thereof being that sheriffs should keep their counties in their own hands. 20 Hen. 7. 19. See Dalt. Sher. 23, 24; Plowd. 87; Moor, 781.

Although the same persons are sheriffs of London and sheriffs of Middlesex, yet in a writ directed to them as sheriffs of London, they have no authority to execute it in Middlesex; and so è converso. 3 Barn. & A. 408.

A sheriff may make and deliver the return of a writ anywhere. 1 Wils. 328. A sheriff gives out a blank warrant upon a writ which is filled up by an attorney, this is ill. 2 Wils. 47. See Commitment.

Until a different regulation was made by 8 Eliz. c. 16. in a great many instances two counties had one and the same sheriff: this is still the case in the counties of Cambridge and Huntingdon.

It will appear to be of the utmost importance to have the sheriff appointed according to law, when we consider his power and duty. These are either as a judge, as the keeper of the king's peace, as a ministerial officer of the superior courts of justice, or as the king's bailiff. 1 Comm. c. 9.

In his judicial capacity he has a jurisdiction both in civil and criminal cases; and for this purpose he hath two courts,—his tourn for criminal cases, which is therefore the king's court, and his county court for civil cases, which last is the court of the sheriff himself. 3 Salk. 322.

He is to hear and determine all causes of 40s. value, and under, in his county court; and he has also a judicial power in divers other civil cases. Dalt. c. 4. He is likewise to decide the elections of knights of the shire, subject to the control of the House of Commons, of coroners, and of verderers; to judge of the qualification of voters, and to return such as he shall determine to be duly elected. 1 Comm. c. 9.

A sheriff has authority to order a freeholder into custody and to take him before a justice of peace, if he interrupt the proceedings at a county court held for the election of knights of the shire, by making a noise and disturbance. 1 Taunt. 146.

As the keeper of the king's peace both by common law and special commission, he is the first man in the county, and superior in rank to any nobleman therein during his office. 1 Roll. Rep. 237. He may apprehend and commit to prison all persons who break the peace, or attempt to break it; and may bind any one in a recognizance to keep the king's peace. He may, and is bound, ex officio to pursue and take all traitors, murderers, felons, and other misdoers, and commit them to gaol for safe custody. He is also to defend his county against any of the king's enemies, when they come into the land; and for this purpose, as well as for keeping the peace and pursuing felons, he may command all the people of his county to attend him; which is called the posse comitatús, or power of the county: and this summons every person above fifteen years old, and under the degree of a peer, is bound to attend, upon warning, under pain of fine and imprisonment. Stat. 2 Hen. 5. st. 1. c. 8. See Riot. But though the sheriff is thus the principal conservator of the peace in his county, yet, by the express directions of the great charter, (c. 17.) he, together with the constable, coroner, and certain other officers of the king, are forbidden to hold any pleas of the crown; or, in other words, to try any criminal offence. For it would be highly unbecoming, that the executioners of justice should be also the judges; should impose, as well as levy, fines and amercements; should one day condemn a man to death, and personally execute him the next. Neither may he act as an ordinary justice of the peace during the time of his office: for this would be equally inconsistent; he being in many respects the servant of the justices. Stat. 1 Mar. st. 2. c. 8.

In his ministerial capacity the sheriff is bound to execute all process issuing from the king's courts of justice. In the commencement of civil causes, he is to serve the writ, to arrest, and to take bail; when the cause comes to trial, he must summon and return the jury; when it is determined, he must see the judgment of the court carried into execution. In criminal matters, he also arrests and imprisons, he returns the jury, he has the custody of the delinquent, and he executes the sentence of the court, though it extends to death itself. See Execution.

By the interpleader act, 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 58. § 6. an important provision is enacted for indemnifying sheriffs where the property of goods seized is disputed. See Interpleader.

He is also compelled to execute the warrant of a justice of the peace, if upon any extraordinary occasion it should be directed to him; though magistrates' warrants are usually directed to constables and other inferior officers: but he need not go in person to execute it, but may authorize another to do so. 2 Hawk. c. 13. § 29.

He is also bound to attend the sessions of the peace, there to return his precepts, to take charge of the prisoners, to receive fines for the king and the like. 2 Hawk. c. 8. § 45. And for any default in executing the writs or precepts of the sessions, he is punishable by the justices in sessions as for a contempt. Id. c. 22. § 2.

The sheriff has also the keeping of the gaols within the county, and is answerable for all escapes suffered by the gaolers; to the king, if it be a criminal matter; or in a civil case, to the party injured; though if a gaoler suffer a felon voluntarily to escape, this, inasmuch as it reacheth to life, is felony only in the gaoler, but the sheriff may nevertheless be indicted, fined, and imprisoned. 1 Hale, 597.

As the king's bailiff, it is his business to preserve the rights of the king within his bailiwick; for so his county is frequently called in the writs: a word introduced by the princes of the Norman line; in imitation of the French, whose territory is divided into bailiwicks, as that of England into counties. Fortesc. de L. L. c. 24. He must seize to the king's use all lands devolved to the crown by attainder or escheat; must levy all fines and forfeitures; must seize and keep all waifs, wrecks, estrays, and the like, unless they be granted to some subject; and must also collect the king's rents within the bailiwick, if commanded by process from the Exchequer. Dalt. c. 9; but see post.

By st. 57 Geo. 3. c. 68. for amending the laws relating to sheriffs in Ireland, sheriffs are empowered to make like returns of writs against former sheriffs, as against any other persons; and to recover double costs in actions against their under-sheriffs, &c. for breach of duty.

The same act provides, that if the sheriff pays money for which he is accountable before the time required by law, he shall receive a discount; and, on the other hand, if he neglects to pay it in due time, he shall pay interest; and after attachment for non-payment, double interest.

V. To execute his various duties, the sheriff has under him many inferior officers; an under-sheriff, bailiffs, and gaolers.

The high-sheriff may execute the office himself; and the under-sheriff hath not, nor ought to have, any estate or interest in the office itself; neither may he do any thing in his own name, but only in the name of the high-sheriff, who is answerable for him. Dalt. Sher. 3; Salk. 96.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 99. § 7. prisoners and writs not wholly executed are to be turned over by sheriffs at the expiration of their office to the incoming sheriff.

By § 8. sheriffs' accounts are to be audited by commissioners for auditing public accounts.

§ 9. Sheriffs going out of office (except those of Chester, Lancaster, and Durham) are to transmit these accounts to commissioners. And the sheriff of Westmoreland is to transmit like accounts yearly.

§ 10. In case it shall be necessary, the oath or affidavit of sheriff, relative to such accounts, may be taken before a judge, commissioner, or magistrate.

§ 11. The sheriff's claim for certain allowances, usually called the bill of cravings, is to be settled by the Treasury.

By § 12. no sheriff or sheriffs shall receive or shall be chargeable with the collection and receipt of quit-rents, viccomital or viscontiel rents, and other rents or payments issuing out of or payable to his majesty in respect of any honors, manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments in England or Wales; but the same (except such as shall be released pursuant to the provision next hereinafter contained) shall thereafter be considered as parcel of the land revenue of the crown, and shall be under the management and direction of his majesty's commissioners of woods, forests, and land revenue.

§ 13. empowers the Treasury to release certain rents. By § 15. sheriffs are not to be chargeable with pre-fines or post-fines.

But by § 16. this provision is not to extend to the county palatine of Lancaster.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 99. § 5. every person appointed sheriff shall, within one calendar month next after the notification of his appointment in the London Gazette, by writing under his hand, nominate and appoint some fit person to be his under-sheriff, and shall transmit a duplicate thereof to the clerk of the peace for the county, to be by him filed among the records of his office, and for which he shall be entitled to demand from such under-sheriff five shillings, and no more; and such appointment and duplicate shall not be liable to any stamp duty whatever.

By stat. 3 Geo. 1. c. 15. "it shall not be lawful for any person to buy, sell, let, or take to farm, the office of under-sheriff or deputy-sheriff, seal-keeper, county-clerk, shire-clerk, gaoler, bailiff, or any other office pertaining to the office of high-sheriff, or to contract for any of the said offices, on forfeiture of 500*l.*, one moiety to his majesty, the other to such as shall sue in any court at Westminster, within two years after the offence." § 10.

"Provided, that nothing in this act shall hinder any high-sheriff from constituting an under-sheriff or deputy sheriff, as by law he may, nor to hinder the under-sheriff in any case of the high-sheriff's death, when he acts as high-sheriff, from constituting a deputy; nor to hinder the receipt of, or accounting to the sheriff, &c. for legal fees." See Dalt. c. 5. s. 3. Hob. 13; 2 Brownl. 281.

By § 8. if any sheriff shall die before the expiration of his year, or before he be superseded, the under-sheriff shall nevertheless continue in his office, and execute the same in the name of the deceased, till another sheriff be appointed and sworn; and the under-sheriff shall be answerable for the execution of the office during such interval, as the high-sheriff would have been; and the security given by the under-sheriff, and his pledges, shall stand a security to the king, and all persons whatsoever, for the performing of his office during such interval."

The under-sheriff, before he intermeddle with the office, is to be sworn; this was first enjoined by 27 Eliz. c. 12. and the form of the oath there prescribed. Before this statute, the under-sheriff was never sworn. 1 Rot. Rep. 274, per Coke. And by 3 Geo. 1. c. 15. § 19. it was enacted, that all under-sheriffs of any counties in South Britain, except the counties in Wales, and county palatine of Chester, before they enter upon their offices, should take an oath appointed by that act, for the execution of their office. And see 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 99. § 6; ante, III.

A sheriff cannot appoint two deputy-sheriffs extraordinary. 2 Wils. 378.

The under-sheriff usually performs all the duties of the office, a very few only excepted, where the personal presence of the high-sheriff is necessary. But no under-sheriff shall abide in his office above one year; 42 Edw. 3. c. 9; and if he does, by 29 Hen. 6. c. 8. he forfeits 200*l.*, a very large penalty in those early days. And no under-sheriff or sheriff's officer shall practice as an attorney, during the time he continues in such office; for this would be a great inlet to partiality and oppression. 1 Hen. 5. c. 4. But these salutary regulations are evaded by practising in the names of other attorneys, and putting in short deputies by way of nominal under-sheriffs; by reason of which, says Dalton, the under-sheriffs and bailiffs do grow so cunning in their several places that they are able to deceive; and it may well be feared that many of them do deceive both the king, the high-sheriff, and the county. Dalt. c. 115.

The under-sheriff is bound, without delay, to pay obedience to all the king's writs delivered to him, and he cannot refuse to execute process until he has his fees. 1 Salk. 330.

Sheriff's officers or bailiffs are either bailiffs of hundreds or special bailiffs. See Bailiff.

By 57 Geo. 3. c. 68. § 3. actions for neglect in the office of sheriffs in Ireland, may be brought against the under-sheriff, unless in case of the immediate act or default of the high-sheriff.

SHIP-MONEY. An imposition charged upon the ports, towns, cities, boroughs, and counties of this realm, in the time of King Charles I., by writs commonly called ship-writs, under the great seal of England, in the years 1635 and 1636, for the providing and furnishing certain ships for the king's service, &c.; which was declared to be contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm, the petition of right, and liberty of the subject, by 17 Car. 1. c. 14.

SHIPPER. Is a Dutch word signifying the master of a ship, mentioned in some of our statutes. We use it for any common seamen, and generally say skipper.

SHIPS AND SHIPPING. Nautical men apply the term ship to distinguish a vessel having three masts, each consisting of a lower-mast, a top-mast, and a top-gallant-mast, with their appropriate rigging. In familiar language, it is usually employed to distinguish any large vessel, however rigged; but it is also frequently used as a general designation for all vessels navigated with sails; and it is in this sense that it is here employed.

As to what are to be termed British and what foreign ships, and how the former are to be navigated, see Navigation Acts.

As a master or owner of a ship may have an action for the freight; either the one or the other are answerable, where goods are damaged in the ship. But where there are several owners, and one disagrees to the voyage, he shall not be liable to any action after for a miscarriage, &c. Comb. 116.

Where the owner, and not the freighter, is liable for a loss of gold sent by the ship, see 2 Stra. 1251. Owners of ships are liable for the goods on account of the freight, though robbed of them, and for default of the master. Annot. 86. See Carrier.

An action doth not lie against a man as owner, but as he hath the benefit of the freight; for when there are several owners, and one dissents from the voyage, he shall not be liable afterwards for a miscarriage, &c. Ann. 90; Comb. 117. See 2 Stra. 816. where it was held, that prout facie the repairer of a ship has his election to sue the master who employs him, or the owners; but if he undertakes it on a special promise from either, the other is discharged.

The owner of a vessel has no lien for the hire stipulated by charter-party for a voyage, upon goods shipped by the charterer, because the latter is the owner of the ship for the voyage; and the first owner has no possession of the ship or goods, without which there can be no lien. 7 Taunt. 74.

No owner of a ship shall be liable to answer loss, by reason of embezzling any gold, silver, jewels, &c. taken in or put on board, or for any forfeiture incurred, without the privity or knowledge of such owner, further than the value of the ship and freight due. But other remedies against the master and seamen of such ships are not taken away. 7 Geo. 2. c. 15; 26 Geo. 2. c. 86.

By the 53 Geo. 3. c. 159. reciting that it is of the utmost importance to promote the increase of shipping, and to prevent discouragement to merchants and others from being interested therein, it is enacted, that no owner or part owner of any vessel shall be liable to answer for any loss or damage arising from any act or neglect committed or occasioned without the fault or privity of such owner, to the ship or the goods laden on board, beyond the value of the ship and the freight due or to grow due for the voyage in which the loss shall happen. Lighters, &c. on rivers are excepted from the act; which also reserves the responsibility of the master and mariners, and makes provision for ascertaining and liquidating losses to several persons, the whole amount of which may exceed the value of the ship and freight, by proceedings in equity.

In an action against several defendants, as ship-owners, for damage sustained by the loss of goods laden on board their ship, it was held, that under the last-mentioned act, § 1, they were not liable in that character beyond the value of the ship and freight due, or to grow due, although the loss was occasioned by the misconduct of one of the defendants, who was both master and part owner, and that the value of the ship was to be calculated at the time of the loss, and not at the time of the commencement of the voyage; and that in calculating the freight due, or to grow due, money actually paid in advance was to be included. 2 B. & A. 2.

By 54 Geo. 3. c. 159. several regulations are made for the mooring, breasting, ballasting, &c. of ships in the several ports, harbours, roadsteads, sands, channels, bays, and navigable rivers in the United Kingdom. See Harbours.

By 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 75. § 1. pilots and others are to deposit anchors, cables, and other ships' materials, whether the same ship shall have been in distress or otherwise, parted with, cut from, or left by any ship within any harbours, rivers, or bays, or on any of the coasts of this kingdom, or any goods or merchandize taken possession of by them, in the places to be appointed by the act: concealing such articles, forfeits the claim to salvage, and subjects the offender to punishment.

§ 2. Every deputy vice-admiral is to send a report of goods deposited, to the Trinity House; but no report is to be made until the articles amount to 20*l*.

§ 3. Any deputy vice-admiral may seize goods not reported and deposited, and shall make report thereof to the Trinity House, on penalty of 20*l*., and double value of the seizure: one-third of the value of goods to be allowed on being claimed by the owner.

§ 5. If the deputy-vice admiral seize by previous information, he and informer to divide two-sixth parts.

§ 6. If the articles are not claimed within a limited time, they are to be sold according to 12 Ann. c. 18; and if they shall have been seized, the deputy vice-admiral seizing, and the person informing, shall be equally entitled to salvage.

§ 7. If the owners and salvors cannot agree respecting the salvage, three justices shall determine the difference: if the justices cannot agree, they shall nominate a person conversant in maritime affairs, who shall determine.

§ 8. Justices may in like manner determine upon remuneration to be made for services rendered to ships in distress or otherwise, and their decision shall be final, unless an appeal within thirty days is made to the Court of Admiralty.

§ 9. Persons dissatisfied may appeal to the High Court of Admiralty; but the goods to be restored to the owners on giving bail: bail to be taken by a commissioner in prize cases, if there is one in the place, otherwise by a justice.

By § 11. persons cutting away, casting adrift, removing, altering, defacing, or destroying any buoy, buoy rope, or mark belonging to any ship, or attached to any anchor or cable belonging to any ship whatever, whether in distress or otherwise, shall, on being convicted, be guilty of felony, and be liable to be transported for not exceeding seven years, or to be imprisoned for any number of years, at the discretion of the court in which the conviction shall be made.

§ 13. Masters of ships bound to parts beyond the seas, finding or taking on board anchors and other articles, shall make an entry in the log-book, and report the same to the Trinity House, and on their arrival in England deposit the articles: if not claimed, the articles are to be sold and disposed of according to the law with respect to unclaimed property: penalty for making default, not exceeding 100*l*. nor less than 30*l*.

§ 15. Every pilot, hoveller, boatman, or the master of any vessel, who shall convey any anchor or cable taken possession of by them, to any foreign port, harbour, creek, or bay, and there sell and dispose of the same, shall be guilty of felony, and be transported for not exceeding seven years.

§ 16. imposes a penalty not exceeding 20*l*. on dealers in marine stores for not having their names, with the words "Dealer in Marine Stores," painted on their store-houses, or for cutting up any cable, exceeding five fathoms in length, without a permit from a magistrate.

§ 17. Such dealers are to keep an account of old stores bought by them, and to advertise before they cut up the cordage: persons may demand inspection of their books, which are to be produced, under a penalty, for refusing inspection, of not exceeding 20*l*. for the first, and not exceeding 50*l*. for the second or further offence.

By § 18. manufacturers of anchors are to place marks on anchors and kedge anchors, under a penalty, on neglect, of 5*l*.

§ 22. Offences under the act may be tried in the county where articles are found, or if sold in foreign parts, where offenders reside.

§ 42. When any transfer of any ship, or of any share thereof, shall be made only as a security for the payment of debts, either by mortgage, or of assignment to trustees for the purpose of selling the same for the payment of debts, in every such case the collector and controller of the port where the ship is registered shall, in the entry in the book of registry, and also in the indorsement on the certificate of registry, in manner thereinbefore directed, state that such transfer was made only as a security for the payment of debts, or by way of mortgage; and the person to whom such transfer shall be made, or any other persons claiming under him as a mortgagee or mortgagees, or a trustee or trustees only, shall not be deemed to be the owner or owners of such ship, or shares thereof, nor shall the person making such transfer be deemed by reason thereof to have ceased to be an owner of such ship, except so far as may be necessary for rendering the ship, or shares so transferred, available by sale or otherwise for the payment of the debts, for securing the payment of which such transfer shall have been made.

§ 43. On transfers of ships for security of debts being registered, the rights of mortgagee shall not be affected by any act of bankruptcy of mortgagee or after such registry, notwithstanding such mortgagee, at the time he shall so become bankrupt, shall have in his possession, and shall be the reputed owner of, the said ships.

§ 44. Governors of colonies, &c. may cause proceedings in relation to the force and effect of any register granted to any ship to be stayed until his majesty's pleasure shall be certified to them by his majesty, by and with the advice of his majesty's privy council; and such governors are thereby required to transmit to a secretary of state, to be laid before his majesty in council, an authenticated copy of the proceedings in every such case, with their reasons for causing the same to be stayed, and such documents (properly verified) as they may judge necessary for the information of his majesty.

Where A., having contracted for a ship to be built for him in the East Indies, agreed, during the time of building, to sell a share to B., and B. paid a part of the price in pursuance of the agreement, and afterwards on the ship's arrival in England, A. caused her to be registered, and accounted with B. as part owner, but B.'s name was never on the register as owner, it was determined that B. had no legal interest in the ship. 2 B. & A. 218.

SHIP'S PAPERS. The papers or documents required for the manifestation of the property of the ship and cargo, &c.

They are of two sorts, viz. 1st. Those required by the law of a particular country; as the certificate of registry, licence, charter-party, bills of lading, bill of health, &c. required by the law of England to be on board British ships; and 2dly. Those required by the law of nations to be on board neutral ships, to vindicate their title to that character. Mr. Serjeant Marshall, following Mr. Hubner, In la Suisse des Batiments Neutres, tome 1. pp. 241—252, has given the following description of the latter class of documents:—

1. The Passport, Sea Brief, or Sea Letter.—This is a permission from the neutral state to the captain or master of the ship to proceed on the voyage proposed, and usually contains his name and residence; the name, property, description, tonnage, and destination of the ship; the nature and quantity of the cargo; the place whence it comes, and its destination. This document is indispensably necessary for the safety of every neutral ship. Hubner says that it is the only paper rigorously insisted on by the Barbary corsairs; by the production of which alone their friends are protected from insult.

2. Proofs of Property.—These ought to show that the ship really belongs to the subjects of a neutral state. If she appear to either belligerent to have been built in the enemy's country, proof is generally required that she was purchased by the neutral before, or captured and legally condemned and sold to the neutral after, the declaration of war; and, in the latter case, the bill of sale, properly authenticated, ought to be produced. M. Hubner admits that these proofs are so essential to every neutral vessel for the prevention of frauds, that such as sail without them have no reason to complain if they be interrupted in their voyages, and their neutrality disputed.

3. The Muster-Roll.—This, which the French call rôle d'équipage, contains the names, ages, quality, place of residence, and, above all, the place of birth, of every person of the ship's company. This document is of great use in ascertaining a ship's neutrality. It must naturally excite a strong suspicion if the majority of the crew be found to consist of foreigners; still more, if they be natives of the enemy's country.

4. The Charter-Party.—Where the ship is chartered, this instrument serves to authenticate many of the facts on which the truth of her neutrality must rest, and should therefore be always found on board chartered ships.

5. The Bills of Lading.—By these the captain acknowledges the receipt of the goods specified therein, and promises to deliver them to the consignee or his order. Of these there are usually several duplicates, one of which is kept by the captain, one by the shipper of the goods, and one transmitted to the consignee. This instrument being only the evidence of a private transaction between the owner of the goods and the captain, does not carry with it the same degree of authenticity as the charter-party.

6. The Invoices.—These contain the particulars and prices of each parcel of goods, with the amount of the freight, duties, and other charges thereon, which are usually transmitted from the shippers to their factors or consignees. These invoices prove by whom the goods were shipped, and to whom consigned. They carry with them, however, but little authenticity, being easily fabricated where fraud is intended.

7. The Log Book, or Ship's Journal.—This contains a minute account of the ship's course, with a short history of every occurrence during the voyage; if this be faithfully kept it will throw great light on the question of neutrality; if it be in any respect fabricated, the fraud may in general be easily detected.

8. The Bill of Health.—This is a certificate, properly authenticated, that the ship comes from a place where no contagious distemper prevails, and that none of the crew, at the time of her departure, were infected with any such disorder. It is generally found on board ships coming from the Levant, or from the coast of Barbary, where the plague so frequently prevails.

A ship using false or simulated papers is liable to confiscation. 1 Marshall on Insurance, c. 9. § 6.

SHIRE, comitatus, from the Sax. scýran, to part or divide. Is well known to be a part or portion of this kingdom, called also county. The old Latin word was scyra; and scyræ, provinciæ indicabantur. Brompt. 659. King Alfred first divided this land; and his division was in satrapias, now called shires, in centurias, now called hundreds, and decennas, now called tithings. Leg. Alfred. See Brompton, 956; and tit. County.

SHORLING AND MORLING, or MORTLING. Words to distinguish fells of sheep; shorling being the fells after the fleeces are shorn off the sheep's back; and morlings the fells flayed off after they die or are killed. In some parts of England they understand by shorling a sheep whose face is shorn off; and by a morling, a sheep that dies. 45 Ed. 4. c. 1.

SHORTFORD. The ancient custom of the city of Exeter is, when the lord of the fee cannot be answered rent due to him out of his tenement, and no distress can be levied for the same, the lord is to come to the tenement, and there take a stone or some other dead thing of the said tenement, and bring it before the mayor and bailiffs; and thus he must do seven quarter-days successively; and if, on the seventh quarter-day, the lord is not satisfied his rent and arrears, then the tenement shall be adjudged to the lord to hold the same a year and a day; and forthwith proclamation is to be made in the court, that if any man claims any title to the said tenement, he must appear within the year and a day next following, and satisfy the lord of the said rent and arrears. But if no appearance be made, and the rent not paid, the lord comes again to the court, and prays that, according to the custom, the said tenement be adjudged to him in his demesne as of fee, which is done accordingly; so as the lord hath from thenceforth the said tenement, with the appurtenances, to him and his heirs. And this custom is called shortford. Izack's Antiq. Exet. 48.

A like custom in London, by the ancient statute of Gavelet, attributed to 10 Ed. 2. is called forschot, or forschoke. See Gavelet.

SIGLA, from the Sax. seget.] A sail, mentioned in the laws of King Etheldred, c. 24.

SIGNAL STATIONS. See 53 Geo. 3. c. 128. to enable his majesty to acquire ground necessary for signal and telegraph stations; by which the Admiralty were empowered from time to time to procure and take land, &c. for the purpose of such stations, and of making and maintaining an uninterrupted communication between the respective signals or telegraphs thereon, and of preventing and removing any obstructions by buildings, trees, or otherwise, with all ways necessary up to and from the same.

SIGNATURES. Writings presented to the barons of the Exchequer in Scotland as the grounds of royal grants, which, after being passed by the barons in some instances, have the sign manual of his majesty; in others, being authenticated by the cashet (privy seal), become the warrants of grants under one or other of the seals, according to the nature of the subject, or the object in view. Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

SIGNET, Fr.] One of the king's seals in England, used in sealing his private letters, and all such grants as pass his majesty's hand by bill signed; which seal is always in the custody of the king's secretaries, and there are four clerks of the Signet Office attending them. 2 Inst. 556. The law takes notice of the sign-manual and privy signet. See Grant of the King, Privy Seal.

By 57 Geo. 3. c. 63. the offices of the clerks of the signet and privy seal shall be executed in person under the regulation of the Treasury; and persons holding such offices shall be incapable of sitting in parliament as members of the House of Commons.

SIGNET, in Scotland, is the seal by which the king's letters or writs, for the purpose of private justice, are now authenticated.

Clerks to the signet or writers to the signet, in Scotland, are nearly the same as attornies in England. They were anciently clerks in the office of the secretary of state, by whom writs passing the king's signet were prepared. When, a consequence of the change of the ancient forms of judicial procedure, the signet was applied to writs, summonses, and process in private causes, the new writs which became requisite were prepared by the writers to the signet, who have also the privilege of acting as agents or attornies in causes before the court of session. The society is now under the keeper of his majesty's signet, who acts by his deputy. Persons who are qualified to be writers to the signet must be articulated for five years, and other regulations are adopted for securing the respectability of the members of this society.

SIGNIFICAVIT. A writ issuing out of the Chancery upon certificate given by the ordinary of a man's standing excommunicate by the space of forty days, for the laying him up in prison till he submit himself to the authority of the church. And it is so called, because significavit is the emphatical word in the writ. Reg. Orig. There is also another writ of this name in the register, directed to the justices of the bench, commanding them to stay any suit depending between such and such parties, by reason of an excommunication alleged against the plaintiff, &c. Reg. Orig. 7. And in Fitzherbert we find writs of significavit in other cases; as significavit pro corporis deliberatione, &c. F. N. B. 62, 66. The common writ of significavit is the same with the writ excommunicato capiendo. See that title.

SIGN-MANUAL. The subscription of the king at the top of grants or letters-patent, which first pass by bill. See further, Forgery, Grant of the King.

SIGNUM. A cross prefixed as a sign of assent and approbation to a charter or deed, used by the Saxons. See Seals.

SILENTARIUS. One of the privy council; and silentium was formerly taken for conventus privatus. Matt. 1. anno 1171.

According to Littleton, it is an usher, who seeth good rule and silence kept in court. Litt. Dict.

SILK. In 1697 an act of parliament was passed prohibiting the importation of all French and other European silk goods, which in 1701 was extended to those of India and China. This prohibition was continued down to the year 1826, when it was taken off, and foreign silks were allowed to be imported on the payment of an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 52. silk goods, the manufacture of Europe, are not to be imported except into the port of London, or into the port of Dublin, direct from Bourdeaux, or the port of Dover, direct from Calais; and not in any vessel under 70 tons burden, except by licence from the commissioners of customs to vessels belonging to Dover, to import such manufactures direct from Calais, though such vessels may not exceed 60 tons burden.

See further, Malicious Injuries, 2; Manufactures, Navigation Acts, Servants.

SILK-THROWER, and THROWSTER. The trade or mystery of those who wind, twist, and spin or throw silk, thereby fitting it for use. They are incorporated by statute, and mention is made of silk-winders and doublers, who are members of the same trade. 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 15. None shall exercise the silk-throwers' trade but such as have served seven years' apprenticeship to it, on pain of forfeiting 40s. a month. Ibid. Silk-winders, &c. embezzling or detaining silk delivered by silk-throwers, shall pay such damage as a justice shall order, or not doing it shall be whipt and set in the stocks; and the receivers are to be committed to prison by a justice of peace till satisfaction is made the party injured. 20 Car. 2. c. 6; 8 & 9 Wm. 3. c. 36. See Manufactures, Weavers.

SILVA-CÆDUA. Wood under twenty years' growth, or coppice-wood. 45 Ed. 3. c. 3. See Tithes.

SILVER-COINAGE. See Coin, Money.

SIMNEL, or SIMINELL, siminellus, vel simnellus. Is mentioned in the assize of bread, and is still in use, especially in Lent. The English simnel is panis purior, or the purest white bread. 51 Hen. 3. st. 1; Ord. pro pistor' incerti temp. c. 1.

It is said to come from the Lat. simila, which signifies the finest part of the flour; panis similageneus, simnell-bread. It is mentioned in stat. assise panis, bread made into a simnell shall weigh two shillings less than wastell-bread. Cowell.

SIMONY,

SIMONIA, venditio rei sacræ.] An unlawful contract for the presenting a clergyman to a benefice. So called from the resemblance it is said to bear to the sin of Simon Magus. Though the purchasing of holy orders seems to approach nearer to this offence. See Parson, II.

I. Of Simony generally: what shall be deemed Simony; and the Penalty on this Offence.

II. Of Bonds of Resignation; and of the interference of the Court of Chancery in respect of such bonds. See also tit. Resignation.

I. SIMONY is defined to be studiosa voluntas emendi vel vendendi aliquid spirituale aut spirituali alicuius opere subsecuto. Also venditio rei sacræ. And some authors mention simony per munus triplex; as per munus à manu, i. e. by bribery, where money is paid down for a benefice; per munus à lingua, by favour and flattery; per munus ab obsequio, i. e. by a sordid subjection to the patron, or doing services. To which has been added, the making of presents, without taking any notice of expecting a church benefice.

Some authors tell us of a person who took off the cap of Grosulan, an archbishop of Milan, and taking it, told the people. Iste Grosulanus qui est sub istâ cappâ (et non de alio dicitur, est simoniacus, &c.

Simony is defined by Blackstone to be the corrupt presentation of any one to an ecclesiastical benefice for money, gift, or reward [or benefit.] It was, by the canon law, a very grievous crime; and is so much the more odious, because, as Coke observes, it is ever accompanied with perjury, for the presentee is sworn to have committed no simony. 3 Inst. 156, 176. However, it was not an offence punishable in a criminal way at the common law, it being thought sufficient to leave the clerk to ecclesiastical censures. But as these did not affect the simoniacal patron, nor were efficacious enough to repel the notorious practice of the thing, divers acts of parliament have been made to restrain it by means of civil forfeitures; which the modern prevailing usage, with regard to spiritual preferments, calls aloud to put in execution. 2 Comm. c. 18.

Simony is generally said to be the buying or selling holy orders, or some ecclesiastical benefice. An ecclesiastical benefice, in the larger sense of it in which it is here used, comprehends not only parochial benefices, but all ecclesiastical dignities and promotions. As by this offence worthy and learned men are kept out of the church, and a door is, to the great scandal of religion and prejudice of morality, opened to persons by no means qualified to discharge the duties of the sacred function, it is of the utmost consequence to society that it be prevented. With a view to this, canons were anciently made, by which a very strict oath was enjoined; and it was punished with deprivation or disability, as the case required.

Simony is mentioned as a thing so detestable in the eye of the common law, that a plaintiff in quare impedit could not, before the statute of West. 2. recover damages for the loss of his presentation, it being considered as a thing of no value; nor could a guardian in soccage present to an advowson in the right of his heir, because, as he could take nothing for it, he could not bring it to account. 1 Inst. 17 b; 89 a.

In Cro. Ch. 353. it is said that this has, by the law of God and of the land, been always accounted a great offence. In Hob. 167. it is laid down, that a bond on a simoniacal contract is against law, because ex turpi causâ, and contra bonos mores; nay, that it is void as an usurious bond, which, if paid by an executor, is a devastavit. The same is held in Cro. Car. 425. In Cart. 252. such bonds are said to be void as being against law, although they are not so declared by the statute. But, as has been already remarked, since neither the consideration of the heinousness of the offence, nor the provision made against it by the canon or common law, was sufficient to put a stop to this mischief, it was at length restrained by the statute law.

By the 31 Eliz. c. 6. it is, for avoiding of simony, enacted, that if any patron for any corrupt consideration, by gift or promise, directly or indirectly, shall present or collate any person to an ecclesiastical benefice or dignity; such presentation shall be void, and the presentee be rendered incapable of ever enjoying the same benefice; and the crown shall present to it for that turn only. The words of the statute are, "that if any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, shall, for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit, or by reason of any promise, agreement, grant, bond, or covenant, of or for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit, present or collate any person to any benefice, &c. every such presentation, collation, &c. shall be utterly void, and it shall be lawful for the queen, her heirs and successors, to present, &c. unto such benefice, &c.; and that every person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, that shall give or take any such sum of money, &c. or take or make any such promise, &c. shall forfeit the double value of one year's profit of every such benefice, &c. and the person so corruptly taking, &c. such benefice, &c. shall be adjudged a disabled person in law to enjoy the same." § 5.

"If any person shall, for any sum of money, reward, &c. admit, institute, instal, induct, invest, or place any person in or to any benefice, &c. every such person shall forfeit the double value of one year's profit of every such benefice, and the same shall be void; and the patron collate thereto as if the party admitted were dead." § 6.

But if the presentee dies, without being convicted of such simony in his life-time, by the 1 W. & M. st. 1. c. 16. the simoniacal contract shall not prejudice any other innocent patron on pretence of lapse to the crown or otherwise.

Also by the 12 Ann. st. 2. c. 12. if any person for money or profit shall procure, in his own name, or the name of any other, the next presentation to any living ecclesiastical, and shall be presented thereupon, this is declared to be a simoniacal contract; and the party is subjected to all the ecclesiastical penalties of simony, is disabled from holding the benefice, and the presentation devolves to the crown. Before this statute, it was doubted whether it was simony for a clerk to purchase the next turn in a living for himself.

Upon these statutes many questions have arisen with regard to what is and what is not simony. And, among others, these points seem to be clearly settled:

1. That to purchase a presentation, the living being actually vacant, is open and notorious simony; this being expressly in the face of the statute. Cro. Eliz. 788; Moor, 914. Lord Hardwick was of opinion, that the sale of an advowson, during a vacancy, is not within the statute of simony, as the sale of the next presentation is; but it is void by the common law. Ambl. 268. See 2 Comm. 22, in n.

2. For a clerk to bargain for the next presentation, the incumbent being sick and about to die, was held to be simony, even before the statute of Queen Anne. Hob. 165. And now, by that statute, to purchase, either in his own name or another's, the next presentation, and to be thereupon presented at any future time to the living, is direct and palpable simony.

An agreement entered into by a clergyman by which he is restrained during his incumbency from asserting a claim to tithes by due course of law, as furnishing evidence against his successors, if it is the consideration of his being appointed or presented, is simoniacal. 7 East, 600.

3. For a father to purchase such a presentation in order to provide for his son, is not simony; for the son is not concerned in the bargain, and the father is by nature bound to make a provision for him. Cro. Eliz. 686; Moor, 916. But where a father, the church being void, contracts with the grantee of the void turn to permit the grantor to present his son, and it is done, this is a simoniacal promotion. Cro. Jac. 533. So if a father, in consideration of a clerk's marrying his daughter, doth covenant with the father of the clerk, to procure for him a presentation to a certain church when it shall become void, and he is afterwards thereto presented, it is a simoniacal promotion. Cro. Car. 425.

By § 8. of the 31 Eliz. c. 6. if persons also corruptly resign or exchange their benefices, both the giver and taker shall forfeit double the value of the money, or other corrupt consideration. Under this clause it has been held, that any resignation or exchange for money is corrupt, however apparently fair the transaction: as where a father, wishing that his son in orders should be employed in the duties of his profession, agreed to secure by bond the payment of an annuity exactly equal to the annual produce of a benefice, in consideration of the incumbent's resigning in favour of his son. The annuity being afterwards in arrear, the bond was put in suit, and the defendant pleaded the simoniacal resignation in bar. The court, though they declared that it was an unconscientious defence, yet as the resignation had been made for money, determined that it was corrupt and simoniacal, and in consequence that the bond was void. Young v. Jones, E. T. 1782, cited 4 Comm. c. 4. p. 62, n.

4. If a simoniacal contract be made with the patron, the clerk not being privy thereto, the presentation for that turn shall indeed devolve to the crown as a punishment of the guilty patron; but the clerk, who is innocent, does not incur any disability or forfeiture. 3 Inst. 154; Cro. Jac. 385.

5. Bonds given to pay money to charitable uses, on receiving a presentation to a living, are not simoniacal, provided the patron or his relations be not benefited thereby; for this is no corrupt consideration, moving to the patron. Noy, 142; Stra. 534.

The following determinations will further elucidate this part of the subject.

It was agreed by all the justices, Trin. 8 Jac. that if the patron present any person to a benefice with cure, for money, that such presentation, &c. is simoniacal, though the presentee were not privy to it. 12 Rep. 74. Simony may be by compact between strangers, without the privy of the incumbent or patron. 1 Cro. 331; Hob. 165; Noy, 22; 3 Inst. 153.

A donative is not within the words of the statute; yet, as a corrupt presentation thereto is within the mischief intended to be thereby remedied, it is within the meaning of it. Cro. Car. 331. For the same reason the corrupt promoting to or obtaining of a curacy, has been held to be simony. Curth. 185.

This offence is more frequently committed when a church is void; but it may be committed when it is full. If a contract be, when a church is full, to give a sum of money for a presentation to it, when it shall become void, this is a simoniacal contract. 1 Brownl. 7. So the buying when a church is full, with intent to present a certain person, and the presenting that person when the living becomes void, is simony. Lane, 102; Noy, 25. So the purchase of the next avoidance of a church when the incumbent is sick or near dying, with intent to present a certain person, and the presenting him, is simony. Winch. 63; Noy, 25; Hughes, 330. But the purchase of an advowson in fee, when the incumbent was on his death-bed, without any privy of the clerk afterwards presented, has been held not to be simoniacal, and not to vacate the next presentation. 2 Black. Rep. 1352.

Where a contract was made for the sale of the next presentation to a living, the incumbent being at the time afflicted with a mortal disease and at the point of death, within the knowledge of the parties, this was held simoniacal and void within the 31 Eliz. c. 6. although the purchaser had no intention of presenting any particular individual: and a clerk having been presented by the purchaser, it was held that the presentation was void, although the clerk was not privy to the corrupt contract. Fos v. Chester, (Bp.), in Error, 4 D & R. 93; 2 B. & C. 635. But these decisions were reversed in Dow. Proc. where it was determined that this was not simony, as it is to authorize the bishop to reject the clerk. 1 Dow, 416; Bingham, 1.

From all these authorities it appears, that although it be lawful, except in the cases excepted, to purchase the next avoidance, when a church is full, there is great danger of being guilty, at least in foro conscientiae, of this offence. It is fit it should be so, else men would be for ever purchasing for their sons and friends; and the almost necessary consequence of such a traffic in livings would be the filling the church with very improper persons. 4 New Abr. 469.

It is equally simony where the presentation is by a person usurping the right to present, as if it had been by the person having a good right. 3 Inst. 153. So if a presentation be by one usurping the right of patronage, and pending a quarrel impedit for removing his clerk, who is after removed, the living is sold; this is simony, for the church was never free of that clerk. And by this means the statute might be eluded, for it would only be getting an usurper to present while the living was void, and then selling it. 7 Ler. 111; 2 Vent. 32. A corrupt contract with the wife of the patron is simoniacal, although the patron is not privy to it. 1 Black. Rep. 25; Cro. Jac. 381. If a clerk contracts to give money for being presented to a church, and is after presented gratis statute had declared the presentation to be simoniacal and void. Such a bond is so manifestly intended by the parties to be a benefit to the patron, that it seems surprising that it should have been ever argued and decided, that it was not a benefit within the meaning of the statute. Yet many learned men have expressed themselves dissatisfied with this determination of the lords, and are of opinion that their judgment would be different if the question were brought before them a second time. But it is generally understood that the lords, from a regard to their dignity, and to preserve a consistency in their judgments, will never permit a question, which they have once decided, to be again debated in their House. See 2 Comm. c. 18. p. 280, n.; and Bro. P. C. 8vo ed. title Clergy, ca. 3. where it appears that six judges delivered their opinions in favour of the bond, and only two against it. The decision of the House was made by a division of nineteen to eighteen.

In a subsequent case it was determined, that a bond given by an incumbent to the patron on presentation, to reside on the living, or to resign if he did not return to it after notice, and also not to commit waste, &c. on the parsonage-house, was good. 4 T. R. 78. And where a bond was given to resign a rectory when the patron's son came of age, and before that time to reside and keep the chancel and rectory-house in repair; it was decided by the Court of King's Bench in favour of the bond, without argument. 4 T. R. 359.

But it was afterwards decided by the House of Lords, that there was no distinction between a bond conditioned for resigning generally on the request of the patron, and a bond conditioned to resign in favour of a particular relation of the patron; and a bond for resigning in favour of one of two brothers of the patron was held simoniacal and void. Fletcher v. Lord Sondes, 3 Bing. 501; 1 Bligh. (new series) 144.

In consequence of this decision, two statutes were passed, the one retrospective and the other prospective, rendering such bonds valid to a certain extent and under certain regulations.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 25. § 1. it was enacted, that no presentation to any spiritual office, made before the 9th April, 1827, shall be void on account of any engagement to resign when another person, or one of two persons, specially named, shall become qualified to take the same. And persons having made any such engagement, shall not be subject to any penalty on account thereof.

§ 2. declares all such engagements entered into before 9th April, 1827, valid and effectual in law.

§ 3. Provided, that nothing in the act contained shall extend to the case of any engagement which shall not have been entered into really and bond fide to the intent aforesaid, and no other: provided also, that nothing therein contained shall be deemed compulsory upon the ordinary to accept the resignation.

§ 4. Provided, that if the person, &c. so specially named be not presented to such spiritual office within six months, the resignation shall be void.

By the 9 Geo. 4. c. 94. § 1. every engagement bond fide made, after the passing of the act, for the resignation of any spiritual office, being a benefice with cure of souls, dignity, prebend, or living ecclesiastical, to the intent, that any one person whosoever, or one of two persons to be specially named and described therein, being such persons as are therein-after mentioned, shall be presented, collated, nominated, or appointed to such spiritual office, or that the same shall be bestowed upon him, shall be valid in law, and the performance of the same may also be enforced in equity: provided, that such engagement shall be so entered into before the presentation, &c. of the party so entering into the same.

§ 2. Provided, that where two persons shall be so specially named and described in such engagement, each of them shall be, either by blood or marriage, an uncle, son, grandson, brother, nephew, or grand nephew of the patron or of one of the patrons of such spiritual office, not being merely a trustee or trustees of the patronage of the same, or of the person or one of the persons for whom the patron or patrons shall be a trustee or trustees, or of the person or one of the persons by whose direction such presentation, collation, gift, or bestowing shall be intended to be made, or of any married woman whose husband in her right shall be the patron or one of the patrons of such spiritual office, or of any other person in whose right such presentation, &c. shall be intended to be made.

§ 3. No presentation to any spiritual office shall be void by reason of such agreement to resign. And persons making such agreement not to be liable to penalty, but such presentations to be valid.

Provided (§ 4.) that the act shall not extend to any engagements, unless the deed be deposited within two months with the registrar of the diocese or peculiar jurisdiction wherein the benefice is situated: and the deed shall be open to inspection; and a certified copy be admitted to evidence.

§ 5. Every resignation shall state the engagement, and name of person for whom made, and shall be void, unless the person be presented within six months: provided (§ 6.) that nothing therein shall extend to presentations made by the king, or by any archbishop, bishop, or other ecclesiastical person, or by any other body politic or corporate, whether aggregate or sole, or by any other persons, in right of any office or dignity; or by any company, or any feoffees or trustees for charitable or other public purposes; or by any other person or persons not entitled to the patronage of such spiritual office as private property.

If a bond of resignation, which ought only to be made use of to keep the incumbent to residence or good behaviour, be made an improper use of, the Court of Chancery will interpose. Chan. Prac. 513; 2 Chan. Rep. 399. A perpetual injunction was granted against such a bond, because it appeared, on hearing the cause, that the patron had made use of it to prevent the incumbent from demanding his tithes. 1 Vern. 411.

An injunction has been granted where an ill use has been made of the bond, i. e. by taking an annuity from the incumbent for the use of the nephew, for whom the living was intended. Str. 534.

A bill being brought to be relieved against a judgment obtained on a bond to resign upon request, it appeared to have been offered to the incumbent, that if he would give 700*l.* he should not be sued upon it. Satisfaction was ordered to be entered upon the judgment, and a perpetual injunction was granted. A new bond of resignation in a penalty of 200*l.*, a much less sum, was indeed decreed; but no action was to be brought on it without leave of the court. And the lord keeper said, he did not know that such bonds were used before the statute; that they had been since allowed only to preserve the benefice for the patron himself, or some child or friend of his, or to prevent non-residence or a vicious course of life in an incumbent; and that though a bond be to resign generally, he would not allow it to be put in suit, unless some such reason was shown for requiring a resignation, because a door would be thereby opened for simony. Eq. Cases Abr. 86.

On a bill to be relieved against a judgment on such a bond, the defendant proved misbehaviour, and it was for that reason dismissed. Eq. Cases Abr. 228. So a bond to resign on request shall not be made use of to turn out the incumbent, unless there be non-residence or gross misbehaviour, and if any other use be made of it, the court will grant an injunction. Chan. Prec. 513.

SIMPLE-CONTRACT, DEBT BY. Debts by simple contract are such, where the contract upon which the obligation arises, is neither ascertained by matter of record, nor yet by deed or special instrument, but by mere oral evidence, the most simple of any; or by notes unsealed, which are capable of a more easy proof, and (therefore only) better than a verbal promise. 2 Comm. c. 30. p. 466. See Assumpsit, Fraud, &c., Real Estate.

SIMPLE DESTINATION, the settlement by the proprietor of an estate in Scotland, by which he substitutes the persons who are to succeed one to another. Scotch Dict.

SIMPLE LARCENY. See Larceny.

SIMPLE WARRANTICE, an obligation to warrant or secure from all subsequent or future deeds of the grantor. Scotch Dict.

SIMPLEX. Simple, or single; as charta simplex is a deed-poll, or single deed.

SIMPLEX BENEFICIUM. A minor dignity in a cathedral or collegiate church, or any other ecclesiastical benefice opposed to a cure of souls; and which, therefore, is consistent with any parochial cure, without coming under the name of pluralities.

SIMPLEX JUSTICIARIUS. This style was anciently used for any puisne judge that was not chief in any court, and there is a form of a writ in the Register beginning thus:—I, John Wood, a simple judge of the Court of Common Pleas, &c.

SIMUL CUM, [together with.] Words used in indictments, and declarations of trespass against several persons, where some of them are known, and others not known: as, the plaintiff declares against A. B. the defendant, together with C. D., E. F. and divers others unknown, for that they committed such a trespass, &c. 2 Lil. Abr. 469. If a writ is generally against two or more persons, the plaintiff may declare against one of them, with a simul cum; but if a man bring an original writ against one only, and declares with a simul cum, he abates his own writ. Comber. 260. See Action, Joinder in Action.

SINE ASSENSU CAPITULI. A writ where a bishop, dean, prebendary, or master of an hospital, aliened the lands holden in right of his bishopric, deanery, house, &c. without the assent of the chapter, or fraternity; in which case his successor should have this writ. F. N. B. 195. And if a bishop or prebendary was disseised, and afterwards released to the disseisor, this was an alienation, upon which might be brought a writ de sine assensu capituli. But the successor might enter upon the disseisor, if he did not die seised, notwithstanding the release of his predecessor; for, by the release, no more passed than he might rightfully release. A person might have had this writ of lands upon demises of several predecessors, &c. New Nat. Br. 432.

This writ is now abolished.

SINE-CURE. Is where a rector of a parish hath a vicar under him, endowed and charged with the cure; so that the rector is not obliged either to duty or residence. And when a church is fallen down, and the parish becomes destitute of parishoners, it is said to be a sine cure. Wood's Inst. 153. See Purson, I.

SINE DIE, without day. Where judgment is given against a plaintiff, he is in mercy for his false claim; but when it is given for the defendant, it is said eat inde sine die, let him go thereof without day; that is, he is dismissed out of Court.

SINGLE AVAIL OF MARRIAGE. The value of the betroth or marriage portion of the vassal's wife, which is modified to two years' rent of the vassal's free estate. Scotch Dict. See Marriage.

SINGLE-BOND, [simplex obligatio.] A deed whereby the obligor obliges himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators to pay a certain sum of money to another at a day appointed. See Bond.

SINGLE COMBAT, trial by. See Duel, Hager of Battle.

SINGLE ESCHEAT. When all a man's moveables fall to the king as a casualty, because of his being declared rebel. Scotch Dict.

SINGULAR SUCCESSOR. A purchaser is so termed in the Scotch law in contradistinction to the heir of a landed proprietor, who succeeds to the whole heritage by regular title of succession or universal representation; whereas the purchaser acquires right solely by the singular title acquired by the disposition of the former proprietor.

SI NON OMNES. A writ on association of justices, by which, if all in commission cannot meet at the day assigned, it is allowed that two or more of them may finish the business. Reg. Orig. 202; F. N. B. 185. And after the writ of association, it is usual to make out a writ of si non omnes, directed to the first justices, and also to those who are associated to them; which, reciting the purport of the two former commissions, commands the justices, that if all of them cannot conveniently be present, such a number of them may proceed, &c. F. N. B. 111. See Assizes, &c.

SINKING FUND. See National Debt.

SIPESSOCNA. A franchise, liberty, or hundred. Leg. Hen. 1. cap. 6; Rot. Parl. 16 Hen. 2. Sithesoca.

SI RECOGNOSCAT. A writ that, according to the old books, lay for a creditor against his debtor who had acknowledged before the sheriff in the county-court, that he owed his creditor such a sum received of him. Old Nat. Br. 68.

SITHCUNDMAN, [Sax.] Such a man as had the office to lead the men of a town or parish. Leg. Inæ, cap. 56. Dugdale says, that in Warwickshire the hundreds were formerly called sithesoca; and that sithsoccundman and sithcundman was the chief officer within such a division, i. e. the high constable of the hundred. Dugdale Antiq. Warm.

SIX CLERKS IN CHANCERY. Officers in Chancery of ancient continuance; they are appointed by the Master of the Rolls and were heretofore spiritual persons, as appears by the 14 & 15 Hen. 8. which was made to enable them to marry. They receive and file all proceedings by bill and answer; and also issue some patents that pass the great seal, as patents for ambassadors, and some others. They likewise sign all office copies of pleadings made by the sworn clerks in order to be read in court, and also certificates; and attend upon the court in term, by two at a time, at Westminster, and there read the pleadings.

The disposal of the offices of the six clerks in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, is regulated by the 55 Geo. 3. c. 114.

See titles Chancellor, Chancery, Office.

SIXHINDI. Servants of the same nature with rod-knights, viz. bound to attend their lord wherever he went; but they were accounted among the English Saxons as freemen, because they had lands in fee subject only to such tenure. Leg. Inæ, cap. 26. See Hindeni.

SIZEL. Where pieces of money are cut out from the flat bars of silver, after being drawn through a mill into the respective sizes or dimensions of the money to be made; the residue is called by this name, and is melted down again. Lowndes's Essay upon Coin. p. 96.

SLAINS, [letters of, in Scotland.] Letters heretofore subscribed by the relation of a person slain, declaring that they had received an assignment or recompense, and concerning an application to the crown for a pardon to the murderer. See Act, 1474, c. 74; 1528, c. 7.

SLANDER. The maliciously defaming of a man in his reputation, profession or livelihood, by words; as a libel is by writing; which is actionable, &c. See Action, II. 1, Libel.

By the 58 Geo. 3. c. 80, in actions for slander in inferior courts there shall, in certain cases, be no more costs than damages; and such costs shall not be increased.

SLAVES AND SLAVERY. Pure and proper slavery does not, nay cannot, subsist in England; such, that is, whereby an absolute and unlimited power is given to the master over the life and fortune of the slave. And, indeed, it is repugnant to reason, that such a state should subsist any where; and the law of England abhors, and will not endure, the existence of slavery within this nation: so that when an attempt was made to introduce it, by 1 Edw. 6. c. 3, which ordained, that all idle vagabonds should be made slaves and fed on bread and water, or small drink, and refuse meat, should wear a ring of iron round their necks, arms, or legs; and should be compelled by beating, chaining, or otherwise, to perform the work assigned them, were it never so vile: the spirit of the nation could not brook this condition, even in the most abandoned rogues; and therefore this statute was repealed in two years afterwards, by 3 & 4 Edw. 6. c. 16. And now it is laid down, that a slave or negro, the instant he lands in England, becomes a freeman; that is, the law will protect him in the enjoyment of his person and his property. Salk. 666. Yet, with regard to any right which the master may have lawfully acquired to the perpetual service of John or Thomas, this, says Blackstone, will remain exactly in the same state as before: [what that right is now, we shall presently see:] hence too it follows, that the infamous and unchristian practice of withholding baptism from negro servants, lest they should thereby gain their liberty, is totally without foundation, as well as without excuse. The law of England acts upon general and extensive principles; it gives liberty, rightly understood, that is, protection, to a Jew, a Turk, or a Heathen, as well as to those who profess the true religion of Christ; and it will not dissolve a civil obligation between master and servant, on account of the alteration of faith in either of the parties; but the slave is entitled to the same protection in England before, as after, baptism; and, whatever service the heathen negro owed of right to his American master, by general, not by local law, the same (whatever it be) is he bound to render when brought to England and made a Christian. See 1 Comm. c. 14.

Liberty, by the English law, depends not on the complexion; and what was said even in the time of Queen Elizabeth is now substantially true, that the air of England is too pure for a slave to breathe in. 2 Rushw. 468.

In the celebrated case of James Somersett, it was decided, that a heathen negro, when brought to England, owes no service to an American, or any other master. James Somersett had been made a slave in Africa, and was sold there: from thence he was carried to Virginia, where he was bought, and brought by his master to England: here he ran away from his master, who seized him and carried him on board a ship, where he was confined in order to be sent to Jamaica to be sold as a slave. Whilst he was thus confined, a habeas corpus was granted, ordering the captain of the ship "to bring up the body of James Somersett, with the cause of his detainer." The above-mentioned circumstances being stated on the return to the writ, after much discussion in the Court of King's Bench, the court were unanimously of opinion, that the return was insufficient, and that Somersett ought to be discharged. See Mr. Hargrave's argument for the negro. 11 St. Tr. 340; and Lofft's Reports, 1.

In consequence of this decision, if a ship laden with slaves was obliged to put into an English harbour, all the slaves on board might (and Mr. Christian says ought to) be set at liberty. Though there are acts of parliament which recognise and regulate the slavery of negroes (but now see post), yet it exists not in the contemplation of the common law; and the reason they are not declared free before they reach an English harbour is only because their complaints cannot sooner be heard and redressed by the process of an English court of justice. 1 Comm. c. 14. p. 425, n.

Before this determination in the case of Somersett, a case had occurred in Chancery, in 1762, before Lord Chancellor Northington, on a disputed gift to a slave by his mistress on her death-bed, which was unsuccessfully claimed by her administrators. The lord chancellor, in dismissing the bill with costs, said that, "as soon as a man sets foot on English ground he is free." Stanley v. Harvey. In the year 1778, in the case of Knight v. Widderburn, the Scotch judges determined, on consideration of the case of Somersett, "that the dominion exercised over a negro by the law of Jamaica could not be exercised in Scotland." In the case of Keane v. Roycott, 2 H. Blackst. 511, an infant slave in the West Indies had executed an indenture, by which he covenanted to serve B. for a certain term of years as his servant. B. came to England with the slave; and in an action against a person for seducing the slave from B.'s service, the defendant was not permitted to allege that the contract with B. was void; for the Court of C. P. held that the effects of such a contract might be the manumission of the slave, and consequently that it was for his benefit. In Williams v. Brown, 3 Bos. & Pul. 69, a negro had agreed to serve as seaman during a voyage to the West Indies and back. On his arrival at Grenada he was claimed as a runaway slave, and delivered up to his master. Whereupon it was agreed between the master, the negro, and the captain, that upon payment of a sum of money by the captain to the master, the latter should manumit the negro; he covenanting to serve the captain for three years, at certain and stipulated wages. He was accordingly manumitted; and having served the captain on the homeward voyage, brought an action against him to recover wages for that voyage on a quantum meruit. The court held that he was estopped by his covenant from claiming more than the sum stipulated. And in that case it was agreed, "that the plaintiff (the negro) being free while in England, became again a slave on his arrival at the place from whence he had run away; and, without the manumission, must have remained so." In the case of the slave, Grace, before Lord Stowell, in the Admiralty Court, (Nov. 1827), his lordship cited the case of Williams and Brown, as deciding the principle, that "one having been a slave, returning to the place where he was so, returned to a state of slavery." His lordship also cited the case of Forbes v. Cochrane; as tending, though perhaps not so directly, to the same conclusion. In that case many of the slaves of a British merchant, residing in East Florida, deserted from his plantation, and were found on board a British man-of-war, not lying in the East Florida waters. The merchant claimed them, and was allowed to see them, and attempted to persuade them to return; but he was not permitted to use force. They refused to go, and he brought an action against the British commander for harbouring them. It was held not to be maintainable, even upon the admission that the laws of East Florida permitted slavery; which was not expressly stated in the plaintiff's declaration, claiming only a general right of property in the slaves. The principle of the decision was, that slavery is not a state recognized by the law of nations generally, or the law of England, locally; and that wherever it legally exists, it does so only by the force of some local law. Whenever, therefore, a slave comes from a place where slavery is recognized into a place under the English law, he ceases to be a slave; because the local law of slavery loses its force, and the English law neither itself suffers the relation, nor will, by the comitas inter communitates, enforce any local law contrary to the law of nature. An English ship, (or a territory newly discovered by Englishmen,) are for this purpose the same as England; because the English law of freedom will apply equally in each, and be the right of every one there. 2 B. & Cr. 448; 3 D. & R. 229.

By a provision in the recent act for the abolition of slavery, slaves or apprenticed labourers brought into the United Kingdom from the West India colonies, became absolutely free; and slavery no longer exists in any part of the British dominions, (see post), except in the East Indies, where, by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 85, § 88. slavery is to be extinguished as soon as it is practicable and safe. See East India Company, X.

By 30 Geo. 3. c. 33. (continued and amended by 31 Geo. 3. c. 54; 32 Geo. 3. c. 52; 33 Geo. 3. c. 73; 34 Geo. 3. c. 80; 35 Geo. 3. c. 90; 37 Geo. 3. c. 104, & c. 118; 38 Geo. 3. c. 88, and 39 Geo. 3. c. 80, and subsequent acts; and explaining and amending a former statute of 29 Geo. 3. c. 66.) several humane provisions were made to restrain the cruelties practised in the African slave trade. Bounties were given to the masters and surgeons of ships delivering slaves well at their destined port, &c.

By 46 Geo. 3. c. 52. the exportation of slaves by British subjects into foreign colonies, and the fitting out of foreign slave ships in British ports, was prohibited. By 46 Geo. 3. c. 119. it was enacted that no ship should clear out from any port in Great Britain to the coast of Africa, for taking negroes on board, unless such ship had been previously employed in the African trade.

At length an end was put to this detestable traffic by the 47 Geo. 3. st. 1. c. 36, which enacted, that from May 1, 1807, the slave trade should be abolished; and a penalty of 100*l.* per head was imposed in all cases of trading or purchasing slaves. All vessels concerned in the traffic became forfeited, and all insurances relating to such trade were declared void. Subjects of Africa, &c. unlawfully carried away, and imported into any British colony as slaves, became forfeited to his majesty; and also slaves taken as prizes of war, whose slavery was declared to cease; and they might be enlisted to serve the king.

Further measures being found necessary, by the 31 Geo. 3. c. 23. the penalty of felony was imposed on all British subjects engaged in the slave trade. Petty officers, servants, or seamen on board ships engaged therein, and masters underwriting them, were made guilty of misdemeanors. Governors and commanders-in-chief of the colonies are authorized to cause all forfeited vessels, &c. to be seized. By 53 Geo.

vessels, &c. to be seized. By 5 Geo. 3. c. 112. forfeitures under 46 Geo. 3. c. 52; 47 Geo. 3. c. 36, might be prosecuted at any time within three years after the offence committed. By 54 Geo. 3. c. 59. vessels condemned for breach of laws relating to the slave trade were entitled to the privilege of prize ships, and to be registered accordingly. By 55 Geo. 3. c. 172. provision was made for the support of captured slaves during the period of adjudication.

By 58 Geo. 3. c. 59. regulations were made as to importing slaves into certain British possessions in South America from the Bahamas, &c. By 50 Geo. 3. c. 58. felonies and misdemeanors under 51 Geo. 3. c. 23. committed on the 1st & 2^d seas might be tried under commissions issued under the 46 Geo. 3. c. 54. for the trial of other offences at sea.

By the 59 G. L. C. 120 provisions were made for the establishing, in Great Britain, a society and slaves in its colonies, according to be made and be made, and to be made to be made in a society.

By the 18th century, slaves were being registered and sent to the exportation and importation of slaves, were provisions have been superseded by the recent statute for the extinction of slavery.

By § 9 of the act, it is provided that any person who shall be convicted of piracy and who shall be sentenced to death shall be executed by hanging.

by § 10, persons taking, selling, or receiving on board any ship, or embarking capital in the outfitting, or guaranteeing slave adventures, or serving on board any such ships, as captain, master, mate, surgeon, or surgeon's mate, were declared guilty of felony, and punishable by seven years transportation.

SLAVES.

By § 11, seamen, &c. serving on board such ships were guilty of a misdemeanor, and punishable with not exceeding two years' imprisonment.

By this act various bounties were granted upon the seizure of slaves by the British ships of war, stationed off the coast of Africa, for suppressing the slave trade; which bounties are reduced by the 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Wm. 4. c. 55.

It was not however until the year 1833, nearly thirty years after the slave trade itself was put an end to, that the friends of emancipation succeeded in carrying an act of parliament, abolishing slavery throughout the British colonies; and although this great measure has been obtained at the expense of twenty millions, the nation has most cheerfully submitted to a sacrifice which has removed so foul a blot from the page of its history.

The following is a sketch of some of the principal provisions of this important statute :—

By § 1. all persons who on the 1st August, 1834, shall have been registered as slaves, and shall appear on the registry to be six years' old, or upwards, shall from that day become apprenticed labourers.

§ 2. During the continuance of the apprenticeship of any such apprenticed labourer, such person shall be entitled to the services of such apprenticed labourer as would have been entitled to his or her services as a slave.

§ 3. All slaves who may at any time previous to the passing of the act have been brought with the consent of their possessors, and all apprenticed labourers who may hereafter, with the like consent, be brought into the United Kingdom, shall be absolutely free.

§ 5. Apprenticeship of the prædial labourers not to continue beyond 1st August, 1840. And (§ 6.) of the non-prædial labourers not beyond 1st August, 1838.

By § 7. before the apprenticeship is expired, the labourer may be discharged by the voluntary act of his employer. But in case of the voluntary discharge of aged or infirm apprenticed labourers, the employer to continue liable for their support.

§ 8. An apprenticed labourer may purchase his discharge against the will of his employer, on payment of the value of his services, to be appraised as therein mentioned.

By § 9, apprenticed labourers are not removable from the colony; and pre-dial apprenticed labourers are not removable from the plantation except by consent of two special justices. Such consent not to be given till the justices have ascertained that the removal will not separate the members of families.

By § 10, the right to the services of apprenticed labourers is to be transferable property; but such labourer shall not be separated from wife, husband, parent, or child.

§ 11. The employer to supply the labourer with such food, &c. as the law at present requires in case of slaves, and where the preclial labourer shall be maintained by the cultivation of provision grounds, a proper quantity of ground, with leisure time, to be set apart by the employer.

§ 12. Subject to the obligations imposed hereby, all slaves in the British colonies shall be emancipated from the 1st August, 1834; from which time slavery shall be abolished throughout the British dominions.

§ 18. Children below the age of six on 1st August, 1834, or born after that time, to any female apprentice, if destitute, may be bound out by any special magistrate as an apprentice to the person entitled to the services of the mother; but at the date of such indentures the apprentice must be under twelve years of age. Such indentures to continue in force until the child has completed his or her twenty-first year and no longer.

§ 14. His majesty, or any governor by his authority, may appoint justices of the peace by special commission to give effect to this act, and to all colonial laws to be made in pursuance of the act; and no other qualification shall be necessary. And such justices may also be included in the general commission of the peace.

§ 15. His majesty may grant salaries to special justices, not exceeding 300*l.* per annum. Lists of such persons to be laid annually before parliament.

§ 16. after the recital of various regulations necessary for giving effect to the act, declares that it shall not prevent the enactment, by the colonial assemblies or by his majesty in council, of the laws necessary for establishing such regulations. But provisions repugnant to the act contained in any such colonial law are void.

§ 17. Such colonial acts may not authorize the whipping or other punishment of the labourer by the employer's authority.

§ 18. Colonial acts or orders in council not to authorize any justices, except those having special commissions, to act in execution thereof.

But by § 19. the justices having special commissions are to exercise exclusive jurisdiction between apprenticed labourers and their employers.

§ 20. Apprenticed labourers not to be subjected to a prolongation or renewal of their apprenticeship, nor to more than fifteen hours extra labour in any week for their employers' benefit.

And § 21. not to be compelled to work on Sundays, nor prevented from attending religious worship on Sundays.

§ 22. Nothing herein to interfere with any colonial laws, by which apprenticed labourers may be exempted or disqualified for certain military or civil services and franchises.

§ 23. Acts passed by local legislatures, with similar but improved enactments to the act, to supersede the act on being confirmed by his majesty in council.

§ 24. The Treasury may raise loans, not exceeding twenty millions, for a compensation to the persons entitled to the services of the slaves to be manumitted.

And § 33. commissioners to be appointed for distributing the compensation provided by the act.

§ 40. Commissioners may compel the attendance and examination of witnesses.

And § 41. are authorized to take examinations on oath.

§ 44. No part of the compensation to be applicable to any colony, unless his majesty by order in council shall have first declared that adequate provision has been made by the legislature thereof, for giving effect to the act by such supplementary enactments as aforesaid. Such orders to be published, and laid before parliament.

§ 45. The commissioners to apportion the compensation fund into nineteen shares; being one share for each colony. In making such apportionment, regard to be had to the number of registered slaves, &c.

§ 47. Commissioners to institute inquiries to ascertain the facts to be taken into account in effecting the apportionment of the compensation fund between the proprietors in each colony. And having made the inquiries, commissioners to frame general rules for the equitable distribution of the fund assigned to each colony. Such rules to be laid before his majesty in council.

§ 48. Rules to be published in the London Gazette, with a notice that appeals will be received against their establishment.

And § 49. his majesty in council may hear such appeals, and thereupon confirm or disallow any general rule so appealed against.

§ 50. In absence of appeal, his majesty in council may confirm, rescind, or amend such rules.

§ 51. Rules when confirmed by his majesty shall be recited in the confirmatory order in council, and enrolled in Chancery.

But § 52. rules so enrolled may be revoked or amended.

§ 53. Rules when confirmed and enrolled shall be of the same validity as if enacted by parliament.

And § 54. shall be observed by the commissioners in making their awards.

§ 55. Persons interested in any slaves manumitted by the act may prefer claims before the commissioners, who are to make rules for the conduct of all proceedings under the commission.

§ 56. Commissioners to adjudicate on all claims preferred to them; but an appeal may be made against adjudication. His majesty in council may make rules for the regulation of such appeals. In adverse claims, any claimant interested in the adjudication may undertake its defence.

§ 57. His majesty in council may confirm or disallow, or alter or remit adjudication appealed against.

But § 58. failing any appeal, the award of the commissioners final.

§ 62. His majesty in council may make all necessary laws for giving effect to the act in the settlement of Honduras.

§ 64. Act not to extend to East Indies, &c. or to the Island of Ceylon, or St. Helena.

A variety of acts of parliament have been, from time to time, passed, for carrying into effect treaties entered into with foreign powers for the suppression of the slave trade; notwithstanding these treaties, and the activity of the British cruisers, it is still continued to a very considerable extent.

See 58 Geo. 3. c. 36. for carrying into effect a treaty with Spain, for the suppression of the slave trade; 58 Geo. 3. c. 35. & 59 Geo. 3. c. 17. for a like treaty with Portugal; and 59 Geo. 3. c. 16. for a like treaty with the Netherlands. By these acts, for the purpose of more effectually putting an end to this detestable traffic, the ships of those powers laden with slaves may be searched by British ships of war.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 72. an act was passed for carrying into effect two conventions with the king of the French for suppressing the slave trade. By those conventions, a mutual right of search is given to the ships of war of each nation; whose commanders have at least the rank of lieutenants in the navy, within certain specified limits.

Under the 31 Geo. 3. c. 55. an African company was established at Sierra Leone; the possessions and rights of which were vested in the crown by 47 Geo. 3. st. 2. c. 44.

Since the abolition of the slave trade, the negroes taken on captured vessels, and liberated by the mixed commissions courts, have been carried to this colony, and form the greater part of its population. Great doubts are entertained of the expediency of maintaining it: as hitherto it has been kept at an immense expense, both of money and lives; and it seems to have failed in checking the illicit traffic in slaves.

A foreigner who is not prohibited from carrying on the slave trade by the laws of his own country, may, in an English court of judicature, recover damages which may have been sustained by him in respect of a wrongful seizure by a British subject of a cargo of slaves on board a ship employed by him in carrying on the African slave trade. Madram v. Willes, 3 B. & A. 353.

SLEDGE. A sledge or hurdle is generally allowed to draw offenders guilty of high treason to the gallows, to preserve them from the extreme torture of being dragged on the ground or pavement. 1 Hal. P. C. 82. See Execution of Criminals, Treason.

SLIPPA. A stirrup; and there is a tenure of land for holding the king's stirrup, in Cambridgeshire. Carl. 6. H. 6.

SLOUGH-SILVER. A rent paid to the castle of Worcester, in lieu of certain days' work in harvest, heretofore reserved to the lord from his tenants. Pat. 48 Eliz.

SLUICE, exclusa.] A frame to keep or let water out of a ground. See Malicious Injuries.

SMALL DEBTS, Courts for. See Courts of Co. 100.

SMALT, Ital. smalto.] That of which painters made their blue colouring; mentioned in 21 Jac. 1. c. 3. A sort of glass. 58 Geo. 3. c. 21. § 3.

SMOKE-FARTHINGS. The pentecostals, or customary oblations offered by the dispersed inhabitants within a diocese, when they made their procession to the mother cathedral church, came by degrees into a standing annual rent, called smoke-farthings. Cowell.

SMOKE-SILVER. Lands were holden in some places by the payment of the sum of 6d. yearly to the sheriff, called smoke-silver. Pat. 4 Edw. 6. Smoke-silver and smoke-penny are to be paid to the ministers of divers parishes, as a modus in lieu of tithe-wood: and in some manors formerly belonging to religious houses there is still paid, as appendant to the said manors, the ancient Peter-pence, by the name of smoke-money. Twisd. Hist. Vindicat. 77.

SMUGGLING. Is the offence of importing or exporting goods, without paying the duties imposed thereon by the custom or excise laws, whereby the revenue is defrauded. Numerous statutes were formerly passed to put down this offence, all of which were repealed, and the law consolidated by the 6 Geo. 4. c. 108; but which, with several subsequent acts, is now superseded by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 53.

The following is an outline of its most important enactments:—

SNOTTERING-SILVER. There was a custom in the village of Wylegh, that all the servile tenants should pay for their tenements a small duty called snottering-silver, to the abbot of Colchester. Placit. 18 Edw. 1.

SNUFF, or SNUSH. One of the many articles subject to the excise. See Excise; Tobacco.

SOCAGE, or SOCCAGE, socagium; from Fr. soc, comer, a coulter or plough-share.] A tenure of lands by or for certain inferior services of husbandry, to be performed to the lord of the fee. See further, Tenures, III. 3.

Skene de Feudor. Signif. says, socage is a tenure of lands, when a man is enfeoffed freely, without any service, writ, relief, or marriage; and pays to his lord such duty as is called petit serjeanty, &c.

This was a tenure of so large an extent, that Littleton tells us, all the lands in England, which were not held in knights-service, were held in socage. So that it seems the land was divided between these two tenures; and as they were of different natures, so the descent of these lands was in a different manner; for the lands held in knights-service descended to the eldest son; but these held in villano socagio, equally among all the sons; yet if there was but one messuage, the eldest son was to have it, so as the rest had the value of that messuage to be divided between them. Bracton, l. 2. c. 35, ibi.

It is not easy to decide between the two derivations of the words socage and socmen. (The Saxon soc, a franchise; or the French soc, a plough-share.) On the one hand, the frequent recurrence in Domesday-book of the expression socmanni de socd A. &c. serve to lead us to infer that these words, so near in sound, were related to each other. Socmanor (on Gavelkind B.) is clearly for this derivation. But Bracton (l. ii. c. 35.) derives socage from the French soc, and this etymology is curiously illustrated by a passage in Blomefield's History of Norfolk, (vol. iii. p. 538. fol.) In the manor of Cawston a mace, with a brazen hand holding a plough-share, was carried before the steward, as a sign that it was held in socage of the Duchy of Lancaster. Hallam. See Tenures, III. 3, &c.

SOCAGERS, SOCKMANS, SOCMEN, or SOKEMANS, socmanni.] Such tenants as hold their lands and tenements by socage-tenure. Kitchin. fol. 81. Sokemans of base tenures, ibid.; and sokemans of ancient demesne; which last seem most properly to be styled sockmans. Cowell. See Tenures.

The husbandmen among our Saxon ancestors were of two sorts; one, that hired the lord's outland, or tenementary land, like our farmers; the other that tilled and manured no land, like our husbandmen; (yielding operam, non censum, work, not rent;) and were thereupon called his sockmen, or ploughmen. Spelman of Feuds, cap. 7. But after the Conquest, the proper socmanni, or sokemanni, often mentioned in Domesday, were those tenants who held by no servile tenure, but commonly paid their rent as a soke or sign of freedom to the lord, though they were sometimes obliged to customary duties for the service and honour of their lords. Cowell. See also Britton, c. 66; Fleta, l. 1. c. 8.

The sokemanni, or socmens, says Nichols, were those inferior landowners who had lands in the soc or franchise of a great baron; privileged villains, who, though their tenures were absolutely copyhold, yet had an interest equal to a freehold. Their services were fixed and determined. They could not be compelled to relinquish these tenements at their lord's will, nor against their own, et idco, says Bracton, denominantur liberi. It seems idle, Nichols adds, to suppose that they took their name from the soca or plough, for it nowhere appears that they held by plough-service. Such men were actual freeholders, and a certain number of them were necessary in every manor to hold the pleas of the manor court. Socmen were, of consequence, those who owed suit and service to the lord's court; and it is from the word soc, which gave them their name, that we must derive our tenures in fee and common socage. Hist. Leic. Introd. 46.

Domesday, however, exhibits different conditions of socmen; sometimes enjoying the usufruct within the soke freely, and sometimes performing certain inferior services of husbandry. See 1 Ellis's Domesday, 69.

SOCIETY. See Corporation, Partners.

SOCOME. A custom of grinding corn at the lord's mill; and bond socome is where the tenants are bound to it. Blount.

SODOR AND MAN, BISHOPRIC OF, was formerly within the province of Canterbury, but annexed to that of York, by 28 Hen. 8, c. 31. See Man, Isle of.

SOJOURNERS. See Sorners. To sojourn horse is to quarter horse. Old Scotch Dict.

SOKL, SOK, SOC, SOCA. Liberty or privilege of tenants exercised from customary burdens and impositions. Soka, or soke, also signifies the power of administering justice, and the territory or precinct in which the chief lord did exercise his soc, soka, or soka, his liberty of keeping court, or holding trials within his own soke or jurisdiction.

In the second volume of the Domesday Survey, soca falds, the privilege of the lord's fold, occurs in numerous instances, that is, the privilege of the lord to take the profits within his manor.

Sometimes it signified a payment or rent to the lord for using his land with such liberty and privilege as made the tenant a soeman or freeholder, upon no other conditions than a quit-rent. Cowell. Vide Bract. lib. 3; Lamb. Leg. H. 1. 244; Fleta, lib. 1, cap. 47.

SOKEMANS. See Socagers; Tenures; Villenage.

SOKEMANRIES. The tenures of socagers.

SOKE REEVE. The lord's rent-gatherer in the soke or soke. Fleta.

SOLARIUM. A solar, upper room, or garret.

SOLDIERS.

THE MILITARY STATE of the kingdom includes the whole of the soldiery; or such persons as are peculiarly appointed among the rest of the people for the safeguard and defence of the realm.

In a land of liberty it is extremely dangerous to make a despotic order of the profession of arms. In a despotic monarchy this is necessary to the safety of the prince, and arises from the nature of the constitution, which is that of government by fear. But in the states the profession of a soldier is taken singly and merely as a profession, is just a trade, and is not a duty. In the Norman state the soldier is not off the citizen, and would wish to continue so, that he makes himself for awhile a soldier. The laws, therefore, and constitution of these kingdoms know no such state as that of a perpetual standing soldier, bred up to no other profession than that of war: and it was not till the reign of Henry VII. that the Kings of England had so much as a guard about their persons.

In the time of our Saxon ancestors, as appears from Edward the Confessor's laws, the military force of this kingdom was in the hands of the dukes or hercticks, who were constituted through every province and county in the kingdom; being taken out of the principal nobility, and such as were most remarkable for being "sapientes, fideles, et animosi." Their duty was to lead and regulate the English armies, with a very unlimited power; and because of this great power they were elected by the people in their full assembly, or folk-mote, in the same manner as sheriffs were elected. But it appears from history, that this large share of power, thus conferred by the people, though intended to preserve the liberty of the subject, was unreasonably detrimental to the prerogative of the crown.

Upon the Norman conquest the feudal law was introduced here in all its rigour, the whole of which is built on military plan. It is not necessary here to enter into the particulars of that constitution; it is sufficient to observe, that in consequence thereof, all the lands in the kingdom were divided into what were called knights' fees, in number above sixty thousand; and, for every knight's fee, a knight or soldier, miles, was bound to attend the king in his wars, for forty days in a year; in which space of time, before war was reduced to a science, the campaign was generally finished, and the kingdom either conquered or victorious. By this means the king had, without any expense, an army of sixty thousand men always ready at his command. This personal service, however, as early as the reign of Henry II., degenerated into pecuniary commutations or aids; and at length all military tenures were entirely abolished by 12 Car. 2, c. 24.

Other measures were also pursued for the internal defence of the kingdom; which terminated in the establishment of the militia, as at present regulated by our statute law. See Militia.

When the nation was engaged in war, more veteran troops and more regular discipline were esteemed to be necessary, than could be expected from a mere militia. And therefore at such times more rigorous methods were put in use for the raising of armies, and the due regulation and discipline of the soldiery; which are to be looked upon only as temporary excrescences bred out of the distemper of the state, and not as any part of the permanent and perpetual laws of the kingdom. Martial law has been said to be, in truth and reality, no law, but something indulged rather than allowed as a law. The necessity of order and discipline in an army is the only thing which can give it countenance; and therefore it ought not to be permitted in time of peace, when the king's courts are open for all persons to receive justice according to the laws of the land. Wherefore, Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, being condemned at Pontefract, 15 Edw. 2., by martial law, his attainer was reversed (1 Edw. 3.) because it was done in time of peace. The petition of right (3 Car. 1.) enacted, that no soldier shall be quartered on the subject without his own consent; and that no commission should issue to proceed within this land according to the martial law. And after the Restitution, King Charles II. kept up above five thousand regular troops, by his own authority, for guards and garrisons; which King James II. having by degrees increased to no less than thirty thousand, all paid from his own civil list; it was made one of the articles of the Bill of Rights, that the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of parliament, is against law. 1 W. & M. st. 2, c. 2.

The following account of the origin and progress of the military force of the country is extracted from Hallam's Constitutional History of England, from Henry VII. to George II., chap. ix.:

The military force which our ancient constitution had placed in the hands of the chief magistrate, and those deriving authority from him, may be classed under two descriptions. One principally designed to maintain the king's and nation's rights abroad; the other to protect them at home from attack or disturbance. The first comprehends the tenures by knights' service which, according to the constant principles of a feudal monarchy, bound the owners of lands thus held from the crown to attend the king in war, within or without the realm, mounted and armed during the regular term of service. Their own vassals were bound by the same law to accompany them. But the feudal service was limited to forty days, beyond which time they could be retained only by their own consent, and at the king's expense. The military tenants were frequently called upon in expeditions against Scotland, and last of all in that of 1640. But the short duration of their legal service rendered it, of course, nearly useless in continental warfare. Even when they formed the battle, or line of heavy-armed cavalry, it was necessary to complete the army by recruits of foot soldiers, whom feudal tenure did not regularly supply, and whose importance was soon made sensible by their skill in our then national weapon, the bow. What was the extent of the king's lawful prerogative, for two centuries or more after the Conquest, as to compelling any of his subjects to serve him in foreign war, independently of the obligations of tenure, is a question scarcely to be answered: since, knowing so imperfectly the bounds of constitutional law in that period, we have little to guide us but precedents, and precedents in such times are apt to be much more records of power than right. We find certainly several instances under Edward I. and II.; sometimes of proclamations to the sheriffs, directing them to certify to all persons of sufficient estate that they must hold themselves ready to attend the king whenever he should call on them; sometimes of commissions to particular persons in different counties, who are enjoined to choose and array a competent number of horse and foot for the king's service. (Rymer, sub Edward I. & II. passim.) But these levies being, of course, vexatious to the people, and contrary to the spirit at least of those communities which under the shadow of the great charter they were entitled to enjoy, in the first parliament of Edward III. (judging that such compulsory service either was or ought to be rendered illegal) an act was passed, 1 Edw. 3. c. 2. c. 5. "That no man be charged to arm himself otherwise than he was wont in the time of the king's progenitors, kings of England; and that no man be compelled to go out of his shire but where necessity requireth, and sudden coming of strange enemies into the realm: and then it shall be done as hath been used in times past for the defence of the realm." This statute, by no means of inconsiderable importance in our constitutional history, put a stop for some ages to those arbitrary conscriptions. But Edward had recourse to another means of levying men without his own cost—by calling on the counties and principal towns to furnish a certain number of troops: against this the parliament provided a remedy in the 25th year of his reign, by enacting, (25 Edw. 3. c. 8.) "That no man shall be constrained to find men at arms, hobblers, nor archers, other than those who held by such service, if it be not by common assent and grant in parliament." Both these statutes of Edward III. were recited and confirmed in the fourth year of Henry IV. 4 Hen. 4. c. 18.

The successful resistance thus made by parliament appears to have produced the discontinuance of compulsory levies for foreign warfare. Edward III. and his successors, in their long contention with France, resorted to the mode of recruiting by contracts with men of high rank or military estimation, whose influence was probably greater than that of the crown, towards procuring voluntary enlistments. Their pay, as stipulated in some of those contracts which are extant, was extremely high; but it secured the service of a brave and vigorous yeomanry. Under the House of Tudor, in conformity to their more despotic system of government, the salutary enactments of former times came to be disregarded. Henry VIII., and Elizabeth, sometimes compelling the counties to furnish soldiers: and the prerogative of pressing men for military service, even out of the kingdom, having not only become as much established as undisputed usage could make it, but acquiring no slight degree of sanction by an act passed under Philip and Mary, (4 & 5 P. & M. c. 3.) which, without repealing or adverting to the statutes of Edw. 3. and Hen. 4., appeared (or attempted) to recognize the right of the crown to levy men for service in war; and imposed penalties on persons absenting themselves from musters, commanded by the royal authority to be held for that purpose.

In fact, there had never been kept up any regular army in England. Henry VII. established the Yeomen of the Guard in 1485, solely for the defence of his person; and rather perhaps, even at that time, to be considered as the king's domestic servants than as soldiers. Their number was at first fifty, and seems never to have exceeded two hundred. A kind of regular troops, however, chiefly accustomed to the care of artillery, were maintained in the very few fortified places where it was thought necessary or practicable to keep up the show of defence. The Tower of London, Portsmouth, the castle of Dover, the fort of Tilbury; (and before the union of the crowns, Berwick, and some other places on the Scotch border); but very little is to be met with on the nature of these garrisons: their whole number must have been insignificant, and probably at no time capable of resisting any serious attack.

Care must be taken not to confound this strictly military force, serving, whether by virtue of tenure or engagement, whosoever it should be called, with that of a mere domestic and defensive character, to which alone the name of Militia was usually applied. By the Anglo-Saxon laws, or rather by one of the primary and indispensable conditions of political society, every freeholder, (if not freeman,) was bound to defend his country against hostile invasion. It appears that the alderman, or earl, while those titles continued to imply the government of a county, was the proper commander of the militia. Henry II., in order to render it more effective in cases of emergency, and perhaps with a view to extend its service, enacted by consent of parliament, (27 Hen. 2. Assize of Arms;) that every freeman, according to the value of his estate or moveables, should hold himself constantly furnished with suitable arms and equipments; see Wilkin's Leg. Anglo-Sax. p. 333; Lyttleton's Hen. II. 364. By the statute of Winton, 13 Edw. 1. c. 6. these provisions were enforced and extended. Every man between the ages of fifteen and sixty was to be assessed and sworn to keep armour, according to the value of his lands and goods. For 15*l.* and upwards in rent, or 40 marks in goods, a hauberk, an iron helmet, a sword, a knife, and a horse; for smaller property less expensive arms. A view of this armour was to be taken twice in the year by the constables chosen in every hundred. These regulations appear by the context of the whole statute to have more immediate regard to the preservation of internal peace, by suppressing tumults and apprehending robbers, than to the actual defence of the realm against hostile invasion, a danger not at that time very imminent. The sheriff, as chief conservator of the public peace and minister of the law, had always possessed the right of summoning the posse comitatus; that is, of calling on all the king's liege subjects, within his jurisdiction, for their assistance, in case of any rebellion or tumultuous rising, or when bands of robbers infested the public ways; or when, as occurred very frequently, the execution of legal process was forcibly obstructed. It seems to have been the policy of that wise prince, Edward I., to whom we are indebted for so many signal improvements in our law, to give a more effective and permanent energy to this power of the sheriff. The provisions, however, of the statute of Winton, so far as they obliged every proprietor to possess suitable arms, were, of course, applicable to national defence. In seasons of public danger, threatening invasion from the side of Scotland or France, it became customary to issue commissions of array, empowering those to whom they were addressed to muster and train all men capable of bearing arms in the counties to which the commissions extended, and hold them in readiness to defend the kingdom. The earliest of these commissions, in Rymer, is of 1324, and the latest 1557.

The obligation of keeping arms according to each man's estate was enforced by a statute of Philip and Mary, (5 P. & M. c. 2), which made some changes in the rate and proportion, as well as the kind of arms. But these ancient provisions were repealed by 1 Jac. 1. c. 25. § 46. The nation, become for ever secure from invasion on the quarter where the militia service had been most required, and freed from the other dangers which had menaced the throne of Elizabeth, gladly saw itself released from an expensive obligation. The government also may be presumed to have thought that weapons of offence were safer in its hands than in those of its subjects. Magazines of arms were formed in different places, and generally in each county (Rymer, xix. 310); but (if we may reason from the absence of documents) there was little regard to military array and preparation, save that the citizens of London mustered their trained bands on holidays; an institution which is said to have sprung out of a voluntary association called the artillery company, formed in the reign of Henry VIII., for the encouragement of archery, and acquiring a more respectable and national character at the time of the Spanish Armada. Grose's Military Antiquities.

The word artillery was at that time used for the long-bow. The Artillery Company still exists in London, and may be considered as the origin of those volunteer military associations which were so honourable and serviceable to the country in the French revolutionary war, from 1793 to 1814.

The power of calling into arms, and mustering the population of each county given a career times to the sheriff or justices of the peace, or to special commissioners of array, began (about the reign of Henry VIII. or his daughter Mary) to be entrusted to a new officer, entitled the lieutenant, or lord-lieutenant of the county, (who is mentioned as a known officer in 4 & 5 P. & M. c. 1.) This lord lieutenant was usually a peer, or at least a gentleman of large estate within the county, whose office gave him the command of the militia, and rendered him the chief viceregent of his sovereign, responsible for the maintenance of public order. This institution may be considered as a revival of the ancient local earldom; and it certainly took away from the sheriff a great part of the dignity and importance which he had acquired since the discontinuance of such local earldom: yet the lord-lieutenant has so peculiarly military an authority, that it does not in any degree control the civil authority of the sheriff, as the executive minister of the law. In certain cases, such as a tumultuous obstruction of legal authority, each may be said to possess an equal power; the sheriff being still undoubtedly competent to call out the posse comitatus, in order to enforce obedience. Practically, however, in all serious circumstances, the lord-lieutenant is reckoned the efficient and responsible guardian of public tranquillity.

In Ireland a similar office is exercised by the governors of counties; and, in cases of exigency, the militia may be called out under the acts regulating that national force. See Militia.

As the fashion of keeping standing armies has of late years universally prevailed over Europe, it has also, for many years past, been annually judged necessary by our legislature, to maintain, even in time of peace, a standing body of troops under the command of the crown; who are, however, ipso facto disbanded at the expiration of every year, unless continued by parliament.

To keep this body of troops in order, an annual act of parliament passes, "to punish mutiny and desertion, and for the better payment of the army and their quarters." This regulates the manner in which they are to be dispersed among the several unkeepers and victuallers throughout the kingdom; and establishes a law martial for their government. By this, among other things, it is enacted, that if any officer or soldier shall excite or join any mutiny, or, knowing of it, shall not give notice to the commanding officer; or shall desert, or list in any other regiment, or sleep upon his post, or leave it before he is relieved, or hold correspondence with a rebel or enemy, or strike or use violence to his superior officer, or shall disobey his lawful commands; such offender shall suffer such punishment as a court martial shall inflict, though it extend to death itself. See Court Martial.

However expedient the most strict regulations may be in time of actual war; yet, in times of profound peace, a little relaxation of military rigour would not, one should hope, be productive of much inconvenience. And, upon this principle, though by our statute laws (still remaining in force, though not attended to,) desertion in time of war is made felony, without benefit of clergy, and the offence is triable by a jury, and before justices at the common law; yet, by our militia laws, a much lighter punishment is inflicted for desertion in time of peace. But our mutiny act makes no such distinction: for any of the faults above mentioned are equally at all times punishable with death itself, if a court martial shall think proper. This discretionary power of the court martial is indeed to be guided by the directions of the crown; which, with regard to military offences, has almost an absolute legislative power. "His majesty," says the act, "may form articles of war, and constitute courts martial, with power to try any crime by such articles, and inflict penalties by sentence or judgment of the same."

But as soldiers, by this annual act, are in some respects put in a worse condition than any other subjects; so by the humanity of our standing laws, they are in other cases put in a much better. By 43 Eliz. c. 3, a weekly allowance is to be raised in every county, for the relief of soldiers that are sick, hurt, and maimed; and the royal hospital at Chelsea is established for such as are worn out in their duty. Officers and soldiers that have been in the king's service, are, by several statutes enacted at the close, or during the continuance of wars, at liberty to use any trade or occupation they are fit for, in any town in the kingdom, (except the two universities, notwithstanding any statute, custom, or charter to the contrary. And soldiers in actual military service may make nuncupative wills, and dispose of their goods, wages, and other personal chattels, without those forms, solemnities, and expenses, which the law requires in other cases. 29 Car. 2. c. 3; 5 Wm. 3. c. 21. § 6. See Wills.

By the annual mutiny acts no soldier shall be taken out of the service by any process, except it be for some criminal matter, or for a real debt amounting to 30*l*. of which affidavit is to be made; and if any soldier be otherwise arrested, one judge by a warrant under his hand and seal shall discharge him: but the plaintiff may file an appearance in an action of debt, upon notice thereof given, and proceed to judgment and execution, other than against the body of such soldier. Soldiers, while confined for debt, shall not receive pay.

By 31 Car. 2. c. 1, no soldier shall be quartered on any persons without their consent: and inhabitants of places may refuse to quarter any soldier, notwithstanding any order whatsoever.

By the 43 Geo. 3. c. 61. § 1, every soldier or marine duly discharged out of any regiment, and every sailor duly discharged from the navy, upon carrying his discharge to the mayor or chief magistrate of the nearest town, may receive a certificate, stating the place to which he is desirous of going, being his home or last legal settlement, together with the time to be fixed, not exceeding ten days for every 100 miles. And such person producing such discharge and certificate, when lawfully demanded, and being in his proper route, shall not, by asking relief, be deemed a rogue and vagabond.

And by § 2. the wife of any soldier ordered for foreign service, making due proof of her not being allowed to embark with her husband, may receive a like certificate.

By the 37 Geo. 3. c. 70. (made perpetual by the 57 Geo. 3. c. 7.) any one maliciously and advisedly endeavouring to seduce any person serving in his majesty's forces by sea or land from his duty and allegiance, or inciting him to commit any act of mutiny, or to make, or endeavour to make any mutinous assembly, or to commit any traitorous or mutinous practice whatsoever, is guilty of felony, punishable with death.

During the war foreign soldiers were occasionally admitted into the British service, and in such cases commissions were allowed to be granted by his majesty to foreign officers. See the acts, 45 Geo. 3. c. 75; 46 Geo. 3. c. 23.

By the 7 Geo. 4. c. 16. the several acts relating to Chelsea Hospital were consolidated and amended. This act contains a variety of regulations for the payment of pensions to disabled soldiers, which are placed under the management of the commissioners of the hospital.

By the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 106. the officers in the army, and their representatives and widows, and persons on the compassionate list, and also civil officers on retired or superannuation allowances, are empowered to draw bills of exchange for their half pay or pensions upon the paymaster general of the forces.

SOLE CORPORATIONS. See Corporations.

SOLET ET DEBET. Vide Debet et Solet.

SOLE TENANT, solus tenens. He that holds lands by his own right only, without any other joined; and if a man and his wife hold lands for their lives, with remainder to their son for life; here the man dying, the lord shall not have an heriot, because he dies not sole tenant. Kitch. 134.

SOLICITATIONS. It is an indictable offence to solicit and incite another to commit a felony, although no felony be in fact committed; and the sessions have cognizance of such an offence as having a tendency to a breach of the peace. 2 East, 5.

SOLICITOR, solicitor. A person employed to follow and take care of suits depending in courts of equity. Solicitors are to be sworn and admitted by the judges, like unto attornies, before they shall practise in the common law courts; attornies may be admitted solicitors in the courts of equity, &c. 2 Geo. 2. c. 23. See Attorney.

There is also a solicitor-general to the king, who is a great officer next to the attorney-general.

SOLIDATUM. Used in the neuter gender, is taken for that absolute right or property which a man hath in any thing. Malmsh. lib. 1.

SOLIDUM. To be bound in solidum is to be bound for the whole debt jointly and severally with others. Where each is bound for his share, they are said to be bound pro rata parte. Scotch Dict.

SOLINUS TERRÆ. In Domesday Book this word is only used in Kent, and no other county. Septem solini terræ sunt 17 carucatæ. 1 Inst. fol. 15. According to this computation solinus terræ is about 160 acres, and 7 solini are about 1120 acres, which is less than 17 carucatæ, for at the lowest carucata terræ is 100 acres. But Lord Coke was of opinion that it did not consist of any certain number of acres. This word solinus was probably from the Sax. sulk, a plough; but what quantity of land this solk, sulking, or swoling, did contain, is not so easily determined. It seems to have been the same with a plough-land; so that in Domesday se defendit pro uno solino is, it is taxed for one carucate or plough-land. Conell.

SOLITARY CONFINEMENT. This punishment has been only recently introduced into the criminal law of this country.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 28. § 9. the Consolidation Larceny Act, it is enacted that where any person shall be convicted of any offence punishable under that statute, for which imprisonment may be awarded, the court may direct that the offender shall be kept in solitary confinement for the whole or any portion of such imprisonment. And a similar provision is also contained in the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 4. and 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 30. § 27. with respect to felonies or misdemeanors punishable under those acts.

SOLLER, or SOLAR, solarium. A chamber or upper room. Conell.

SOLVENDO ESSE. A term of art, signifying that a man hath wherewith to pay, or is a person solvent.

SOLVERE PŒNAS. To pay the penalty, or undergo the punishment inflicted for offences. 3 Salk. 32.

SOLVIT AD DIEM. A plea in an action of debt on bond, &c. that the money was paid at the day limited. See Bond, Payment.

SOLUTIONE feodi militis parliamenti, and solutione feodi burgens. parliamenti. Writes whereby knights of the shire and burgesses might recover their wages or allowance, if it were denied. 35 Hen. 8. c. 11. See Parliament.

SON ASSAULT DEMESNE, his own assault. A justification in an action of assault and battery; because the plaintiff made the first assault, and what the defendant did was in his own defence. 2 Litt. Abr. 523. See Assault, Pleading.

SONTAGE. A tax of forty shillings heretofore laid upon every knight's fee. Stor. p. 284.

SORCLRY. See Conjurat.

SORNORS (sojourners). Such as masterfully (forcibly) take meat and drink from the king's people without payment. An offence formerly punishable with death. Scotch Dict.

SORS. In sums of money lent upon usury the principal was anciently called sors, to distinguish it from the interest. Pryn's Collect. ii. 161.

SORUS ACCIPITER. A sor, or soar hawk. King John granted to Robert de Hese land in Berton, of the honor of Nottingham, to be held by the service of yielding the king yearly one soar-hawk, &c. Cartular. S. Edmund. MS.

SOTHSAGA, or SOTHSAGE. An old word signifying history; from the Sax. soth, verum, and sagu, testimonium, for all histories should be true, or true sayings; from hence we derived our English word soothsayer. Conell.

SOVERAIGN, or SOVEREIGN. A chief or supreme person; one highest of all; as a king, &c. See King.

SOVEREIGN. A piece of gold coin current at 22s anno 1 Hen. 8. when, by indenture of the Mint, a pound weight of gold of the old standard was to be coined into twenty-five sovereigns. Anno 34 Hen. 8. sovereigns were coined at 20s. a-piece, and half sovereigns at 10s. But anno 4 Edw. 6. the sovereign of gold passed for 24s. and anno 6 Edw. 6. at 30s.

By the 36 Geo. 3. c. 68. § 11. declaring the gold coin to be the only legal tender, (but see now, Tender), and that the same should be of the weight and fineness of the Mint indenture as to the denominations then in use, it was provided that gold coins of any new denomination should be of the standard in fineness, and proportionate weight. Sovereigns to pass for 20s., and half sovereigns to pass for 10s., were accordingly coined, weighing 20-21th parts of a guinea and half guinea respectively.

SOVEREIGN POWER, or SOVEREIGNTY. By this is truly meant the power of making laws; for whomever the power resides, all others must conform to and be directed by it, whatever appearance the outward form and administration of the government may put on. For it is at any time in the option of the legislature to alter that form and administration by a new edict or rule, and to put the execution of the laws into whatever hands it pleases. And all the other powers of the state must obey the legislative power in the execution of their several functions, or else the constitution is at an end. 1 Comm. 49. In our constitution the law ascribes to the king the attribute of sovereignty; but that is to be understood in a qualified sense, i. e. as supreme magistrate, not as sole legislator, as the legislative power is vested in the king, lords, and commons, not in any one of the three estates alone. See Parliament.

SOUL-SCOT. A mortuary is so called in the laws of King Canute, c. 13. See Mortuary.

SOUND. A narrow sea; as Mare Balticum, the sound; and to sound is to make trial how many fathom a sea is deep. Merch. Dict.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA. By the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 95. his majesty is empowered to erect South Australia into one or more British provinces; and all persons settling within the same are to be subject only to such laws as shall be made as thereafter directed for the government of such province or provinces.

§ 2. authorizes his majesty, with the advice of his privy council, to empower persons resident in any of such provinces to make laws, constitute courts, appoint officers and clergymen, and impose taxes, &c., but the laws so made are as soon as may be laid before the king in council.

By § 22. his majesty is empowered to frame a constitution of local government for any of the provinces possessing a population of 50,000 souls.

The act contains a variety of provisions for the sale of lands, and for the conveyance of emigrants from this country, and also a clause forbidding convicts to be transported to the colony.

SOUTH SEA COMPANY. A company of merchants trading to the South Sea. They were incorporated on lending the government ten millions of money towards paying the debts of the army, &c. They might purchase lands not exceeding 10000. per annum; and besides an interest for the money advanced the government, 50000. a year was to be paid them out of the funds towards the management of this company. But see 24 Geo. 2. c. 11. The corporation were granted the sole trade from the river Orinoko called Aranoka in the act, on the east side of America, to the southernmost part of Terra del Fuego, and from thence through the South Sea, &c. And the company were to be owners of all islands, ports, &c. they could discover. 9 Ann. c. 21.

Their privileges were first narrowed by the 12 Geo. 2. c. 77. by which act British-built ships were permitted to carry on fisheries in the Pacific Ocean without licence by the South Sea Company (or East India Company). By 47 Geo. 3. st. 1. c. 28. so much of the 9 Ann. c. 21. as vested in the company the exclusive trade was repealed as to all places which then were, or should at any time thereafter, be belonging to, or in the possession, or under the dominion or protection of his majesty, his heirs and successors.

Finally, by the 50 Geo. 3. c. 57. 141. amended by 56 Geo. 3. c. 77. so much of 9 Ann. c. 21. as vested in the said company the sole and exclusive privilege of trade into the territories within the limits of their charter as described in the said act, and all powers, rights, privileges, penalties, and forfeitures, for securing such exclusive trade, and for preventing other persons from trading, were repealed. A guarantee fund of 610,000. was established by the act, to be produced by a custom duty of 1. per cent. on goods with certain exceptions imported from the countries within the limits of the exclusive trade, as a consideration for the surrender by the company of such exclusive trade.

A duty of 1s. 6d. per ton was also imposed on all vessels (except in ballast, or importing the produce of the fishery of British subjects) entering inwards or clearing outwards from or to places within the said limits. The duties are to cease when the guarantee fund is completed.

See also 10 Ann. c. 80; 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 21; 3 Geo. 1.

c. 9; 5 Geo. 1. c. 19; 6 Geo. 1. c. 4; 7 Geo. 1. c. 5; 8 Geo. 1. c. 22. as to the establishment of the company and regulation of its stock. And further, the 24 Geo. 2. c. 11. for reducing the interest upon the capital stock of the South Sea Company from the time and upon the terms therein mentioned, and for preventing of frauds committed by the officers and servants of the said company; and the 26 Geo. 2. c. 16. for reducing the number of directors of the said company, and for regulating the election of the governors and directors of the said company.

Redemption of South Sea annuities out of sinking-fund, 4 Geo. 2. c. 5; 6 Geo. 2. c. 25; 9 Geo. 2. c. 34; 10 Geo. 2. c. 17. § 35. New South Sea annuities created 6 Geo. 2. c. 28. Restrained from issuing bonds without a general court, 6 Geo. 2. c. 28. § 26; 7 Geo. 2. c. 17. The company continued till the annuities should be redeemed, 24 Geo. 2. c. 2. § 31. The first and second subscribed South Sea annuities to be consolidated, 25 Geo. 2. c. 27. § 26. See further, National Debt.

SOWNE, from the Fr. souvenue, remembered.] A word of art formerly used in the Exchequer, where estreats that sowne not, were those that the sheriff could not levy, viz. such estreats and casualties were not to be remembered, and ran not in demand; and estreats that sowne were such as he might gather, and were leviable. 4 Hen. 5. c. 2; 4 Inst. 107.

SPECIFIC LEGACIES. See Legacy, 2.

SPENCEAN SOCIETIES. See Seditious Societies.

SPIGURNEL, spigurnellus.] The sealer of the king's writ; from the Sax. spicurrān, to shut up or inclose; but the following original has been given of this word, that Galfridus Spigurnel being by King Henry III. appointed to be sealer of his writs, was the first in that office, and therefore in after-times the persons that enjoyed the office were called spigurnels. Pat. 11 Hen. 3; 4 Edw. 1. This office was also known by the name of spicurnantia, or espicurnantia, and Oliver de Stanford held lands in Nettlebed in *Com. SPITTLE HOUSE. A corruption from hospital; or it may be taken from the Teuton. spital, an hospital or almshouse. It is mentioned in 15 Car. 2. c. 9.

SPOILIATION, spoliatio] A writ or suit for the fruits of a church, or the church itself, to be sued in the Spiritual Court, and not in the temporal, that lies for one incumbent against another, where they both claim by one patron, and the right of patronage doth not come in question. As if a parson be created a bishop, and hath dispensation to hold his benefice, and afterwards the patron presents another incumbent, who is instituted and inducted; now the bishop may have a spoliation in the spiritual court against the new incumbent, because they both claim by one patron, and the right of patronage doth not come in debate; and for that the other incumbent came to the possession of the benefice by the course of the spiritual law, viz. by institution and induction; for otherwise, if he be not instituted and inducted, a spoliation lies not against him, but writ of trespass, or assize of novel disseisin (now abolished). F. N. B. 36, 37. So it is where a parson that hath a plurality accepts of another benefice, by reason whereof the patron presents another clerk, who is instituted and inducted; in this case one of them may have spoliation against the other, and then shall come in question, whether he hath a sufficient plurality or not: and it is the same of deprivation, &c. Terms de la Ley. And see 3 Comm. c. 7. p. 90.

STABILIA. A writ called by that name, on a custom in Normandy that where a man in power claimed lands in the possession of an inferior, he petitioned the prince that it might be put into his hands till the right was decided, whereupon he had this writ, Breve de Stabilia. To this a charter of King Henry I. alludes in Pryn's Lib. Angl. tom. 1. p. 120 l.

STAFF-HERDING. The following of cattle within a forest. And where persons claim common in any forest, it must be inquired by the ministers whether they use staff-herding, for it is not allowable of common right; because by that means the deer, which would otherwise come and feed with the cattle, are frightened away, and the keeper or follower will drive the cattle into the best grounds, so that the deer shall only have their leavings; therefore, if any man who hath right of common, under colour thereof use staff-herding, it is a cause of seizing his common till he pay a fine for the abuse. 1 Jon. Rep. 282.

Eccles. Paulin. MS. 44*. Stagiaria, the residence to which he was obliged; stagiari, to keep residence.

STALLARIUS. Is mentioned in our historians, and signifies praefectus stabuli; he was the same officer which we now call master of the horse. Speim. Sometimes it hath been used for him who hath a stall in a market. Fleta, lib. 2. c. 28.

STAMP-DUTIES. A branch of the perpetual revenue of this kingdom. (See Taxes.) They are a tax imposed upon all parchment and paper whereon many legal proceedings or private instruments are written; and also upon licences for retailing wines, letting horses to hire, and various other purposes; and upon all newspapers, advertisements, cards, and dice. These imposts are very varied according to the nature of the thing stamped or taxed, rising gradually from one penny to ten pounds (and indeed, in many cases, as legacies, administrations, conveyances, &c. to an amount proportioned to the property conveyed). The institution of the stamp-duties was by the 5 & 6 H. 8. c. 21; and they have since been increased to an amount which nothing but the absolute necessity of their being imposed could prevent us from styling enormous. These duties are managed by commissioners appointed for the purpose. They now extend to such an astonishing variety of articles, and depend on such a multiplicity of statutes, which are continually varying the amount, that no table or compendium which could be framed would probably be of any service to the reader after one session of parliament.

Of late years the stamp duties on many articles have been lessened or altogether repealed; and by a recent act (the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 60.) the board of stamps and taxes have been consolidated.

STANDARD, from the Fr. estandard, &c. signum, vexillum.] In the general signification, is an ensign in war. And it is used for the standing measure of the king, to the scantling whereof all the measures in the land are or ought to be framed by the clerks of markets, aulnagers, or other officers, according to Magna Carta and divers statutes. This is not without good reason called a standard, because it standeth constant and immoveable, having all measures coming towards it for their conformity: even soldiers in the field have their standard or colours for their direction in their march, &c. to repair to. Britton, c. 30. See Measure.

There is a standard of money, directing what quantity of fine silver and gold, and how much alloy, are to be contained in coin of old sterling, &c.; and standard of plate, and silver manufactures. 6 Geo. 1. c. 11. See Alloy, Gold, Money, &c.

STANDARDUS. True standard, or legal weight or measure. Cartular. S. Edmund. MS. 268.

STANDLI. A young store oak-tree, which in time may make timber, and twelve such young trees were to be left standing in every acre of wood at the felling thereof, by the (repealed) 35 Hen. 8. c. 17. And see (repealed) 19 Eliz. c. 25. § 18. and post, tit. Wood.

STANDING ARMY, not to be kept in time of peace without consent of parliament. 1 W. & M. sess. 2. c. 2. See Soldiers.

STANNARIES, stannaria, from the Lat. stannum, tin.] The mines and works where tin metal is got and purified; as in Cornwall, Devonshire, &c. Camden Britt. 109. The tanners are called stannary men.

The stannary courts in Devonshire and Cornwall, for the administration of justice among the tanners therein, are courts of record, but of a private and exclusive nature. They are held before the lord warden and his substitutes; in virtue of a privilege granted to the workers in the tin-mines there, to sue and be sued only in their own courts, that they may not be drawn from their business, which is highly profitable to the public, by attending their law-suits in other courts, 4 Inst. 32. The privileges of the tanners are confirmed by a charter 35 Edw. 1. and fully expounded by a private statute, 50 Edw. 1. given at length in 1 Inst. 232. which has since been explained by a public act, 16 Car. 1. c. 1.

All tanners and labourers in and about the stannaries shall, during the time of their working therein, ~~be~~ be privileged & freed from suits of other courts, and be only amenable in the stannary court, in all matters, excepting pleas of land, tithes, and mortgag. No writ of error lies from hence to any court in Westminster-hall: but an appeal lies from the steward of the court to the under-warden, and from thence to the lord-warden, and thence to the privy council of the Prince of Wales, as Duke of Cornwall, when he hath and lives; or next of kin of the same; and from thence the appeals to the king himself in the last resort. 3 Comm. c. 6. p. 79, 80. cites 4 Inst. 230, 231; 3 Bulst. 183; Dodr. Hist. Corn. 94.

Transitory actions between tinner and tinner, &c. though not concerning the stannaries, or arising therein, if the defendant be found within the stannaries, may be brought into these courts, or at common law; but if one party alone is a tinner, such transitory actions which concern not the stannaries, nor arise therein, cannot be brought in the stannary courts. 4 Inst. 251.

By the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 42. commissioners for taking affidavits in the common law courts at Westminster, or masters extraordinary in Chancery, having commissions from the vice-warden of the stannaries, are empowered to take affidavits in the courts of the vice-warden.

Labourers in the stannaries may recover their wages before justices of peace. 27 Geo. 2. c. 6.

STANNARIUS. A pewterer or dealer in tin; of or belonging to tin. Lit. Dict.

STAPLE, stapulum.] From the Fr. estape, i. e. forum vinarium, a market or staple for wines, which formed the principal commodity of France; or rather from the Germ. stapulen, which signifies to gather or heap any thing together: in an old French book it is written a Calais Estape de la Laine, &c. i. e. the staple for wool: and with us it hath been a public mart appointed by law to be kept at the following places, viz. Westminster, York, Lincoln, Newcastle, Norwich, Canterbury, Chichester, Winchester, Exeter, and Bristol, &c. A staple court was held at the Wool Staple in Westminster, the bounds whereof began at Temple-Bar and reached to Tuthill; in other cities and towns, the bounds are within the walls; and where there are no walls, they extend through all the towns: and the courts of the mayor of the staple is governed by the law merchant in a summary way, which is the law of the staple, 4 Inst. 235. See the Statute of the Staple, or Ordinance of the Staples, 27 Edw. 3. st. 2. The staple goods of England are wool, wool-fels, (or skins,) leather, lead, tin, cloth, butter, cheese, &c. as appears by the statute 14 R. 2. c. 1. Though some allow only the five first; and yet of late staple goods are generally understood to be such as are vendible, of any kind, and not subject to perish.

The acts above referred to are repealed. But that there is still a company of the merchants of the staple of England, see Petition, No. 246, Appendix to Votes of House of Commons, A. D. 1824, under the seal of the mayor, constables and commonalty. See further Customs on Merchandise, Statute Staple.

STAR, starrum, a contraction from the Hebr. shetar, a deed or contract.] All the deeds, obligations, &c. of the Jews, were anciently called stars, and written for the most part in Hebrew alone, or in Hebrew and Latin, one of which yet remains in the treasury of the Exchequer, written in Hebrew without points, the substance whereof is expressed in Latin just under it, like an English condition under a Latin obligation: this bears date in the reign of King John; and many stars, as well as of grant and release, as obligatory, and by way of mortgage, are pleaded and recited at large in the Plea-rolls. Pusch, 9 Edw. 1. See Star-Chamber.

In one of the statutes of the university of Cambridge, the antiquity of which is not known, the word starrum is twice used for a schedule or inventory. 4 Comm. c. 19. p. 266, n.

STAR AND BENT. See Sea Baul.

STARCH AND STARCH POWDER. Were articles subject to the duties and controul of the Excise, but by the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 77. these duties were repealed.

STAR-CHAMBER, camera stellata, otherwise called Chambre des estoilles. A chamber at Westminster so called, (as Sir Thomas Smith, de Rep. Anglor. lib. 1. c. 1 conjectures,) because at first the ceiling thereof was adorned with images of gilded stars. And in the 25 Hen. 8. c. 1. it is written the Starred Chamber. It was ordained by 9 Hen. 7. c. 1; and 21 Hen. 8. c. 2. that the chancellor, assisted by others there named, should have power to punish routs, riots, forgeries, maintenances, embraceries, perjuries, and other such misdemeanors as were not sufficiently provided for by the common law, and for which the inferior judges were not so proper to give correction.

But by 16 Car. 1. c. 10. this Court, commonly called the Star-chamber, and all jurisdiction, power, and authority thereto belonging, are abolished. Cowell.

Molly and Blackstone seem to think it was called the Star-Chamber, because the recognizances which the Jews formerly entered into to the crown, and which were called stars, were kept in that chamber. See ante, Star.

See 4 Comm. c. 19. in the notes, for some particulars relative to this court. Hudson's Treatise of the Court of Star-

Chamber, there referred to, is now published at the beginning of the second volume of Collectanea Juridica.

STATED DAMAGES. See Bonds, Covenants, Damages, &c.

STATICS, staticæ, scientia ponderum.] Knowledge of weights and measures; or the art of balancing or weighing in scales. Merch. Dict.

STATIONARIUS. The same as Stagarius.

STATUARIUM. A tomb adorned with statues. In-gulph. 853.

STATUS DE MANERIO. The state of a manor: all the tenants within the manor, met in the court of their lord to do their customary suit, and enjoy their rights and usages, were termed omnis Status de manerio. Pursh. Antiq. 156.

STATUTE.

STATUTUM.] Has divers significations: first, it signifies an act of parliament; and, secondly, it is a short writing called a statute-merchant, or statute staple, (see those titles,) which are in the nature of bonds, &c. and called statutes, as they are made according to the form expressly provided in certain statutes.

The acts of parliament, statutes, or edicts, made by the king's majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons in parliament assembled, (see 8 Rep. 20.) compose the Leges Scriptæ, the written laws of the kingdom. The earliest statute, of which any record exists, is the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. 1. which is entered on a statute roll at the tower. There are six of these rolls, the latest containing the statutes of 12 Edw. 1. The previous statutes of Merton, 20 Hen. 3.; Marleberge, 52 Hen. 3. and Westminster the first, 3 Edw. 1. are found in all printed collections, and in numerous ancient manuscripts of the statutes. The general printed collections of the statutes are preceded by Magna Carta, 9 Hen. 3. as confirmed and entered on the statute roll of 25 Edw. 1. or the charter roll, 28 Edw. 1. and that charter has now the force of a statute, and had such force, if not at the time of its being granted, certainly very soon after.

After the parliament of 14 Edw. 3. a certain number of prelates, barons and councillors, with twelve knights and six burgesses, were appointed to sit from day to day, in order to turn such petitions and answers as were fit to be perpetual into a statute; but for such as were of a temporary nature, the king issued his letters patent. Rot. Parl. (Edw. 3., p. 113. This reluctance to innovation without necessity, and to swell the number of laws which all were bound to know and obey, with an accumulation of trifling enactments, led apparently to the distinction between statutes and ordinances. The latter are indeed defined by some lawyers to be regulations proceeding from the king and lords without concurrence of the commons. But if this be applicable to some ordinances, it is certain that the term, even when opposed to statute, with which it is often synonymous, sometimes denotes an act of the whole legislature. In 37 Edw. 3. where divers temporary regulations against excess of apparel were made in full parliament, "it was demanded of the lords and commons, inasmuch as the matter of their petition were novel and unheard of before, whether they would have them granted by way of ordinance or of statute?" They awarded that it would be left to him than by way of ordinance and not of statute, in order that any thing which should need amendment might be awarded at the next parliament." So much scruple did they entertain about tampering with the statute law of the land. R. P. p. 280. And see R. P. iii. 17, iv. 35, and the ordinances of the staple, 27 Edw. 3. confirmed as a statute in the subsequent parliament.

If there be any difference between an ordinance and a statute, as some have called it, it is but only this, that an ordinance is but temporary till confirmed and made perpetual, but a statute is perpetual at first, and so have some ordinances also

The mode in which statutes are made is stated under title Parliament, Div. VII.—To what is there said we may here only add, that the royal assent, when given, is written upon the several acts by the clerk of the parliament.

In the reigns of Hen. 6. and Edw. 4. the language of the statutes was sometimes English, but more commonly French, but were framed and entered on the parliament roll in English. After receiving the royal assent the public acts were translated out of English into French or Latin, and having been so entered on the statute roll were promulgated in those languages. The statutes of Hen. 7. were the first that were all drawn in English.

The method of citing these acts of parliament is various. Many of our ancient statutes are called after the name of the place where the parliament was held that made them; as the statutes of Merton and Marleberge (Marlborough), of Westminster, Gloucester, and Winchester. Others are denominated entirely from their subject; as the statutes of Wales and Ireland, the Articula Cleri, and the Prærogativa Regis. Some are distinguished by their initial words, a method of citing very ancient, as the statute of Quia Emptores, and that of Cursum Spectat Agatus. But the most usual method of citing them, especially since the time of Edw. 2. is by naming the year of the king's reign in which the statute was made, together with the chapter, or particular act, according to the numeral order. All the acts of one session of parliament taken together make properly but one statute: and therefore when two sessions have been held in one year, we usually mention stat. 1. or stat. 2. Thus the Bill of Rights is cited, as 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. signifying that it is the second chapter or act, of the second statute, (or the laws made in the second session of parliament,) in the first year of King William and Queen Mary.

These statutes, or acts of parliament, were anciently promulgated by means of exemplifications thereof under the great seal, which were sent to the sheriffs of the several counties, with writs requiring them to be published in such places of the county as the sheriffs thought fit. Writs of this nature appear annexed to the statutes on the statute rolls in the Tower from 6 Edw. 1. down to the reign of Hen. 5. Not very long after that time printing came into use, and then the statutes of each session were printed at the end of the session, and thus made known to the public; though proclamations were not entirely superseded in particular instances till a much later date. See the 25 Hen. 8. c. 22. The earliest sessional publication of statutes was that of the acts passed at the first and only parliament of Rich. 3. From that time until the year 1796, these sessional publications were the only mode of promulgation adopted, and these were not generally obtainable, except by private purchase, the delivery of them being confined to about 1100 copies (assisted at the public cost) to the members of each house of parliament, the privy council, and some great officers of state. In consequence of several reports made by committees of the House of Commons specially appointed to consider of the promulgation of the statutes, 5000 copies are now distributed throughout the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to the Houses of Parliament, great officers and departments of state, public libraries, courts of justice, sheriffs, municipal magistrates, and clerks of the peace.

By 41 Geo. 3. c. 90. it is enacted, that the statutes printed by the king's printer, in Great Britain and Ireland respectively, shall be evidence of all such statutes prior to the 1st Jan. 1801.

By 33 Geo. 3. c. 13. it is enacted, that when the operation of an act of parliament is not directed to commence from any time specified within it, the clerk of the parliaments shall endorse upon it the day upon which it receives the royal assent, and which since this act is added in the printed statutes immediately after the title; and that day shall be the date of its commencement.—The statute has obviated much inconvenience (not to say injustice) which arose from the former maxim, that an act of parliament operated from the first day of the session, the whole session, like the whole term, being considered as one day, and thus many statutes had the force of ex post facto laws.

By 48 Geo. 3. c. 106. when bills for continuing temporary acts shall not pass before such acts expire, such acts shall be continued from the time of their expiration, except as to penalties, &c.

An edition of the Statutes of the Realm, from original records and authentic manuscripts, was undertaken in the year 1801, under the authority of the commissioners on the public records in Great Britain. The first volume, containing the statutes from 20 Hen. 3. to the end of the reign of Edw. 3. preceded by a complete collection of the Charters of Liberties, from Hen. 1. to Edw. 3. was published in 1811. The second volume, including the statutes from Rich. 2. to the end of Hen. 7. appeared in 1816. These two volumes contain the whole of what may be termed the ancient part of the statute law. A long introduction with an appendix thereto, prefixed to the first volume, and the notes throughout that and the second volume, afford information on the subject of statute law, not much known even to the best lawyers of the present day. The preface to the quarto edition of the statutes, (i. Geo. 3. &c.) published by the king's printer, subsequent to the Union between Great Britain and Ireland, and two prefaces prefixed to the first volume of the Collection of Statutes, in ten volumes quarto, from Magna Charta to 1801, also published by the king's printer, will be found useful, with reference to the history of former printed editions of the statutes. The authentic collection has been continued by the commissioners on the records, by subsequent volumes, to the reign of Hen. 3.; from which time the sessional collections printed by the king's printers are sufficiently accessible. Two volumes of the acts of parliament of Scotland have also been printed by the same commissioners. The commissioners on the records of Ireland, are about in like manner to publish an authentic collection of the acts of the parliaments of Ireland.

A good law, says a celebrated author, who, however his principles of arbitrary non-right, as applied to the British constitution, are far from correct, was yet a true reasoner, is that which is needful for the good of the people, and withall perspicuous. "The perspicuity, (he sagaciously adds,) consisted just so much in the words of the law itself, as in a declaration of the causes and motives for which it was made. That it is which shows us the meaning of the legislature; and that meaning once known, the law is more easily understood by few than by many words; for all words are subject to ambiguity and a future and pleader's words in the body of the law is an implication of ambiguity. Besides, it seems to imply by too much diligence that was observed in evading the words, is without the compass of the law; and this is a cause of many unnecessary processes. For when I consider how short were the laws of ancient times, and how by degrees they grow still longer, methinks I see a contention between the framers and pleaders of the law, the former seeking to circumscribe the law, and the latter to evade their circumscriptions, and that the pleaders have got the victory. It belongeth therefore to the office of a legislator to make the reasons perspicuous why the law was made, and the body of the law itself is short, but in as significant terms as may be." Hobbes's Leviathan, part 2. ch. 30. ed. 1651, p. 182.

We are now to consider,

I. The different kinds of statutes.

II. Some general rules with regard to their construction.

I. The first division of statutes is obviously into ancient and modern. The statutes from Magna Charta down to the end of Edw. 2. including also some which (because it is doubtful to which of the three reigns of Hen. 1. Edw. 1., or Edw. 2., to assign them) are termed incerti temporis, compose what have been called the vetera statuta; those from the beginning of the reign of Edw. 3. being contradistinguished by the appellation of the nova statuta. The former also, from some accidental circumstance of collection or publication, are sometimes spoken of as prima aut secunda pars veterum statutorum. Dunbar on Stat. 626.

Statutes are either general or special, public or private. A general or public act is an universal rule, that regards the whole community: and of this the courts of law are bound to take notice judicially and ex officio without the statute being particularly pleaded, or formerly set forth by the party who claims an advantage under it. Special or private acts are rather exceptions than rules, being those which only operate upon particular persons, and private concerns: and of these (which are not promulgated with the same notoriety as the former) the judges are not bound to take notice, unless they be formerly shewn and pleaded. Thus, to shew the distinction, the 13 Eliz. c. 10. to prevent spiritual persons from making leases for longer terms than twenty-one years, or three lives, is a public act; it being a rule prescribed to the whole body of spiritual persons in the nation: but an act to enable the bishop of Chester to make a lease to A. B. for sixty years, is an exception to this rule: it concerns only the parties and the bishop's successors; and is therefore a private act. 1 Comm. Introd. § 3. p. 85, 86.

Some statutes (says another authority) are general, and some are special: and they are called general from the genus, and special from the species; as for instance: the whole body of the spirituality is the genus, but a bishop, dean, and chapter, &c. are the species: therefore statutes which concern all the clergy are general laws, but those which concern bishops only are special. 4 Rep. 76. The 21 Hen. 8. c. 13. which makes the acceptance of a second living by clergymen an avoidance of the first, is a general law, because it concerns all spiritual persons.

All statutes concerning mysteries and trades in general are general or public acts; though an act which relates to one particular trade is a private statute. Dyer, 75. A statute which concerns the king is a public act; and yet the 23 Hen. 8. concerning sheriffs, &c. is a private act, Plond. 38; Dyer, 119. It is a rule in law, that the courts at Westminster ought to take notice in a general statute, without pleading it; but they are not bound to take notice of particular or private statutes unless they are pleaded. 1 Inst. 98.

All difficulties respecting the distinction of modern statutes, as public or private, are prevented by regulations of both houses of parliament, under which the statutes are at present classed in four series: 1. Public general acts: 2. Local and personal acts to be judicially noticed: 3. Private acts printed: 4. Private acts not printed. The first of these are, in the largest sense of the word, public acts. The nature of those in the second series is defined by the clauses respectively annexed to them. Road acts and others of an extensive nature are made public acts by a clause in each act enacting, "That this act shall be deemed and taken to be a public act, and shall be judicially taken notice of as such by all judges, justices, and others without being specially pleaded." Inclosure Acts, Estate Acts, and such others in the third series, the persons concerned wherein choose to be at the expense of printing them, have a clause annexed to each act, "That this act shall be printed by the printer to the king's most excellent majesty, and a copy thereof, so printed, shall be admitted as evidence thereof by all judges, justices, and others." These may be called quasi-public acts. The acts classed in the fourth series are strictly private: being either naturalization acts, divorce acts, &c. or, though relating to inclosures or estates, not having the clause last quoted annexed to them.

Statutes are also either declaratory of the common law, or remedial of some defects therein; or, to speak more strictly, they are either declaratory of the old law, or introductory of a new law; remedial statutes being generally mentioned in contradistinction to penal statutes; declaratory, where the old custom of the kingdom is almost fallen into disuse, or become disputable; in which case the parliament has thought proper, in perpetuum rei testimonium, and for avoiding all doubts and difficulties, to declare what the common law is and ever hath been. Thus the statute of treasons, 25 Edw. 3. st. 5. c. 2. doth not make any new species of treasons; but only for the benefit of the subject, declares and enumerates those several kinds of offence, which before were treason at the common law.

Remedial, or introductory, statutes, are those which are made to supply defects, and abridge such superfluities in the common law, as arise either from the general imperfection of all human laws, from change of time and circumstances, from the mistakes and unadvised determinations of unlearned (or even learned) judges, or from any other cause whatsoever. And this being done, either by enlarging the common law where it was too narrow and circumscribed, or by restraining it where it was too lax and luxuriant, hath occasioned another subordinate division of these remedial introductory acts of parliament, into enlarging and restraining statutes. To instance again in the case of treason. Clipping the current coin of the kingdom was an offence not sufficiently guarded against by the common law; therefore it was thought expedient by 5 Eliz. c. 11. (now repealed) to make it high treason, which it was not at the common law. So that this was an enlarging statute. At common law also spiritual corporations might lease out their estates for any term of years, till prevented by the 13 Eliz. c. 10. before mentioned. This was therefore a restraining statute. 1 Comm. 86, 87.

It is remarked by Mr. Christian that the 5 Eliz. c. 11. above referred to, hardly corresponds with the general notion either of a remedial or an enlarging statute. In ordinary legal language, remedial statutes are (as has been already noticed) contradistinguished to penal statutes. An enlarging or an enabling statute is one which increases, not restrains, the power of action. As the 32 Hen. 8. c. 28. which gave bishops and all other sole ecclesiastical corporations, except parsons and vicars, a power of making leases which they did not possess before, is always called an enabling statute. The 19 Eliz. c. 10. which afterwards limited that power, is on the contrary styled a restraining or disabling statute. 1 Comm. 87, n. See also 2 Comm. c. 20; and tit. Lease, II.

Penal statutes are acts of parliament that impose a forfeiture on such as transgress the provisions therein contained.

A penal statute may also be a remedial law, 1 Wils. 126; and a statute may be penal in one part, and remedial in another part. Dougl. 702.

But where an act of parliament only gives a remedy to the party grieved, it shall not be considered as a penal statute. Wilson, par. 1. fol. 412.

Statutes may also be considered as permanent or temporary. Of the former sort are such as are passed for the establishing of general regulations of law, or for the imposing such taxes as are in their nature intended to be permanent, being applicable to the payment of permanent national burthens. Of the latter are the annual acts for regulating the army, for granting duties on malt and pensions, for funding particular loans, &c. also such acts, the policy of which depends on temporary circumstances, as the duration of war, &c. or the utility of which may be at first uncertain, and which therefore are made for a time only, in order that they may come under the frequent review of the legislature, to be continued, and if necessary amended, until at last they are made permanent or perpetual. To secure a regularity in the continuance of those temporary acts, a committee is appointed at the commencement of every session of parliament, who report the state of all expiring laws; and on such report these laws are continued and amended, or suffered to expire, as the nature of their purposes requires.

II. THE rules to be observed with regard to the construction of statutes are principally these which follow:—

1. There are three points to be considered in the construction of all remedial statutes; the old law, the mischief, and the remedy: that is, how the common law stood at the making of the act; what the mischief was for which the common law did not provide; and what remedy the parliament hath provided to cure this mischief. And it is the business of the judges so to construe the act, as to suppress the mischief, and advance the remedy. 3 Rep. 7; Co. Litt. 11. 42. Let us instance again in the same restraining statute, 13 Eliz. c. 10. By the common law ecclesiastical corporations might let as long leases as they thought proper: the mischief was, that they let long and unreasonable leases to the impoverishment of their successors. The remedy applied by the statute was, by making void all leases by ecclesiastical bodies for longer terms than three lives or twenty one years. Now in the construction of this statute it is held, that leases, though for a longer term, if made by a bishop, are not void during the bishop's continuance in his see; or if made by a dean and chapter, they are not void during the continuance of the dean; for the act was made for the benefit and protection of the successor. Co. Litt. 45; 3 Rep. 60; 10 Rep. 58. The mischief is therefore sufficiently suppressed by vacating them after the determination of the interest of the grantors; but the leases, during the continuance of that interest, being not within the mischief, are not within the remedy. 1 Comm. 87.

The construction of statutes, though relating to matters of an ecclesiastical nature, belongs to the superior courts of common law. 5 East, 345.

2. A statute which treats of things or persons of an inferior rank, cannot, by any general words, be extended to those of a superior. So a statute, treating of "deans, prebendaries, parsons, vicars, and others having spiritual promotion," is held not to extend to bishops, though they have spiritual promotion, deans being the highest persons named, and bishops being of a still higher order. 2 Rep. 46.

3. Penal statutes must be construed strictly. Thus (to instance several statutes, all of which are now repealed) the 1 Edw. 6. c. 12. having enacted that those who are convicted of stealing horses should not have the benefit of clergy, the judges conceived that this did not extend to him that should steal but one horse, and therefore procured a new act for that purpose in the following year, 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 33; Bac. Elem. c. 12. Though Lord Hale states the true reason of the difficulty to have arisen from the circumstance of a doubt as to the benefit of clergy attaching where only one horse was stolen, on account of the words in the old stat. 37 Hen. 8. c. 8. respecting stealing a horse. 2 H. P. C. 365. To mention a more modern and a more applicable instance; by the 14 Geo. 2. c. 6. stealing sheep, or other cattle, was made felony without benefit of clergy. But these general words, "or other cattle," being looked upon as much too loose to create a capital offence, the act was held to extend to nothing but mere sheep. And therefore, in the next sessions, it was found necessary to make another statute, (15 Geo. 2. c. 11) extending the former to bulls, cows, oxen, steers, bullocks, heifers, calves, and lambs by name.

Where by the enacting clause of an act an offence is created and a penalty given, and in the same clause there follows a distinct and substantive proviso containing an exemption not incorporated with the enacting part of the clause by any words of reference, it is not necessary, in an action for the penalty, to negative such proviso in the declaration. 1 B. & A. 94. But see 7 T. R. 27, 141.

So acts of parliament which take away the trial by jury and abridges the liberty of the subject, ought to receive the strictest construction. 4 Bing. 183.

So also it is a well settled rule of law, that every charge upon the subject must be imposed by clear and unambiguous terms. See 2 B. & B. 30; 2 B. & C. 515; 4 B. & C. 248.

4. Statutes against frauds are to be liberally and beneficially expounded. These are generally called remedial statutes. And it is a fundamental rule of construction, that penal statutes shall be construed strictly, and these remedial statutes liberally. See 1 Comm. 88, & n. This may seem a contradiction to the last rule, most statutes against frauds being in their consequences penal. But this difference is here to be taken; where the statute acts upon the offender, and inflicts a penalty, as the pillory or a fine, it is then to be taken strictly; but when the statute acts upon the offence, by setting aside the fraudulent transaction, here it is to be construed liberally. Upon this footing, the 13 Eliz. c. 5. which avoids all gifts of goods, &c. made to defraud creditors and others, was held to extend, by the general words, to a gift made to defraud the queen of a forfeiture. 3 Rep. 82. It has also been held, that the same words of the same statute will bear different determinations, according to the nature of the suit or prosecution instituted upon them. For example, the 9 Ann. c. 11. against gaming, enacts, that if any person shall lose at any one time or sitting 10*l.* and shall pay it to the winner, he may recover it back within three months; and if the loser does not within that time, any other person may sue for it, and treble the value besides. In a case where an action was brought to recover back fourteen guineas which had been won and paid after a game of play, except an interposition during dinner, the court held the statute was repealed, as far as it prevented the effects of gaming, without inflicting a penalty; and therefore, in this action, they considered it one time or sitting. But they said, if an action had been brought by a common informer for the penalty, they would have construed it strictly, in favour of the defendant, and would have held that the money had been lost at two sittings. 2 Black. R. 1226; 1 Comm. 88, 89, & n.

5. One part of a statute must be so construed by another, that the whole may, if possible, stand; ut res magis valeat, quam pereat. As if land be vested in the king and his heirs by act of parliament, saving the right of A.; and A. has at that time a lease of it for three years: here A. shall hold it for his term of three years, and afterwards it shall go to the king. For this interpretation furnishes matter for every clause of the statute to work and operate upon. But,

6. A saving, totally repugnant to the body of the act, is void. If, therefore, an act of parliament vests land in the king and his heirs, saving the right of B. prisoners who ever creates the land of A. in the king, saving the right of A.: in either of these cases the saving is totally repugnant to the body of the statute, and (if good) would render the statute of no effect or operation; and therefore the saving is void, and the land vests absolutely in the king. 1 Rep. 47; 1 Comm. 80.

Where a continuing act is cited the later of the act contradicted, it was held sufficient to repeal the former. For the legislature in continuing an act is not bound to use any particular form of words. Longnead's case, 2 Leuch. 694.

7. Where the common law and a statute conflict, the common law gives place to the statute, and the old statute gives place to a new one. And this is a general principle of universal law, leg posterior derogat legi priori. But this is to be understood only when the latter statute is contained in negative terms, or where its matter is so clearly repugnant that it necessarily implies a negative. As if a former act says, that a juror upon such a trial shall have twenty pounds a-year, and a new statute afterwards enacts that he shall have twenty marks; here the latter statute, though it does not express, yet necessarily implies a negative, and virtually repeals the former. For if twenty marks be made qualification sufficient, the former statute which requires twenty pounds is at an end. Jenk. Cent. 2. 73. But if both acts be merely affirmative, and the substance such as both may stand together, here the latter does not repeal the former, but they shall both have a concurrent efficacy. If, by a former law, an offence be indictable at the quarter sessions, and the latter law makes the offence indictable at the assizes; here the jurisdiction of the sessions is not taken away, but both have a concurrent jurisdiction, and the offender may be prosecuted at either; unless the new statute subjoins express negative words, as, that the offence shall be indictable at the assizes, and not elsewhere. 11 Rep. 63; 1 Comm. 89, 90.

8. If a statute that repeals another is itself repealed afterwards, the first statute is hereby revived, without any formal words for that purpose. So when the statutes of 26 Hen. 8. c. 1; 35 Hen. 8. c. 3. declaring the king to be the supreme head of the church, were repealed by a statute 1 & 2 P. & M. and this latter statute was afterwards repealed by an act of 1 Eliz. there needed not any express words of revival in Queen Elizabeth's statute, but these acts of King Henry were implied and virtually revived. 4 Inst. 325; 1 Comm. 90.

But when a statute professes to repeal absolutely a prior law, and substitutes other provisions on the same subject, which are limited to continue only till a certain time, the prior law does not revive after the repealing statute is spent, unless the intention of the legislature to that effect be expressed. 3 East, 205.

A statute introductive of a new qualification, or additional condition, respecting any subject, though penned in the affirmative, repeals a former less extensive or contrary statute concerning the same matter. 9 East, 44.

A contract declared by statute to be illegal, is not made good by a subsequent repeal of the statute. 1 H. Bla. 65.

9. Acts of parliament derogatory from the power of subsequent parliaments bind not. So the 11 Hen. 7. c. 1. which directs that no person for assisting a king de facto shall be attainted of treason by act of parliament or otherwise, is held to be good only as to common prosecutions for high treason, but will not restrain or clog any parliamentary attainder. 4 Inst. 43. Because the legislature, being in truth the sovereign power, is always of equal, always of absolute authority; it acknowledges no superior upon earth, which the prior legislature must have been, if its ordinances could bind a subsequent parliament. 1 Comm. 90.

Statutes against the power of subsequent parliaments are not binding, notwithstanding the statute 42 Edw. 3. c. 3. declares that any statute made against Magna Charta shall be void; and thus saving, saving many parts of Magna Charta have been repealed and altered by subsequent acts. Read, on Stat. vol. 4. p. 340. And the law has been mistaken on this point, for the statutes which intervene between the 9 Hen. 3. and 12 Edw. 3. are not repealed, though they vary from and are contrary to Magna Charta. Jenk. Cent. 2.

10. Lastly, acts of parliament that are impossible to be performed are of no validity; and if there arise out of them collaterally any absurd consequences, manifestly contradictory to common reason, they are, with regard to collateral consequences, void. Blackstone lays down the rule with these restrictions, though he allows it is generally laid down more largely, that acts of parliament contrary to reason are void: but if the parliament will positively enact a thing to be done which is unreasonable, I know of no power (says the commentator) in the ordinary forms of the constitution, that is vested with authority to control it; and the examples usually alleged in support of this sense of the rule do none of them prove that where the main object of a statute is unreasonable, the judges are at liberty to reject it; for that were to set the judicial power above that of the legislature, which would be subversive of all government. But where some collateral matter arises out of the general words, and happens to be unreasonable, there the judges are in decency to conclude that this consequence was not foreseen by the parliament, and therefore they are at liberty to expound the statute by equity, and only quoad hoc disregard it [or to state it perhaps more correctly, it will not be presumed that any construction can be agreeable to the intention of the legislature, the consequences of which are unreasonable.] Thus, if an act of parliament gives a man a power to try all causes that arise within his manor of Dale, yet if a cause should arise in which he himself is party, that act is construed not to extend to that, because it is unreasonable that any man should determine his own quarrel. 8 Rep. 118. But if we could conceive it possible for the parliament to enact that he should try as well his own causes as those of other persons, there is no court that has power to defeat the intent of the legislature, when couched in such evident and express words as leave no doubt whether it was the intent of the legislature or no. 1 Comm. 91, and note.

The following general notes may assist the student in his further researches on this subject:

It is the general rule, that to statutes enacted in parliament there must be the assent of the king, lords, and commons, without which there can be no good act of parliament; but there are many acts in force, though these three assents are not mentioned therein, as Dominus rex statuit in parlamento, and Dominus res in parlamento suo statuta edit, and de communi concilio statuit, &c. Plowd. 97; 2 Bulet. 186. And Sir Edward Coke says, that several statutes are penned like charters, in the king's name only, though they were made by lawful authority. 4 Inst. 25. Before the invention of printing, all statutes were proclaimed by the sheriff in every county, by virtue of the king's writ. 2 Inst. 526, 644.

Statutes continue in force, although the records of them are destroyed by the injury of time, &c. 2 Inst. 587.

Statutes consist of two parts, the words and the sense, and it is the office of an expositor to put such a sense upon the words of the statute as is agreeable to equity and right reason. Equity must necessarily take place in the exposition of statutes; but explanatory acts are to be construed according to the words, and not by any manner of intendment; for it is incongruous for an explanation to be explained. Plowd. 363, 465; Cro. Car. 23.

An act made to correct an error, by omission, in a former act of the same session, was construed to relate back to the time when the first act passed, that they might be taken together as if they were one and the same act. 2 Price, 381.

The preamble of a statute, which is the beginning thereof, going before, is, as it were, a key to the knowledge of it, and to open the intent of the makers of the act, it shall be deemed true, and therefore good arguments may be drawn from the same. 1 Inst. 11.

But the preamble has been held to be no part of the statute. 6 Mod. 62, 144. And the true meaning of the statute is generally and properly to be sought from the purview or body of the act. The preamble is no more than a recital of some inconveniences which by no means exclude any other for which a remedy is given by the enacting part of the statute. Great doubts have existed how far the preamble should control the enacting part; but abundant cases have established that where the words in the enacting part are strong enough to take in the mischief intended to be prevented, they shall be extended for that purpose, though the preamble does not warrant it; in other words, the enacting part of the statute may extend the act beyond the preamble. 3 Atk. 304. Comp. 543.

It is the most natural and genuine exposition of a statute, to construe one part by another part of the same statute, for that best expresses the meaning of the makers; the words of an act of parliament are to be taken in a lawful and rightful sense; and though as has been already said, the construction of statutes in general must be made in suppression of the mischief, and for the advancement of the remedy intended by the statute, but so that no innocent person by a literal construction shall receive any damage. 1 Inst. 21, 381.

The best way to expound a statute is to consider what answer the lawyers would probably have given to the question made, if proposed to them. Plowd. 465; 2 Nels. Abr. 245.

Where a statute gives a remedy for any thing, it shall be presumed there was no remedy before at common law. And the rules to construe acts of parliament are different from the strict rules of the common law; though in the construction of a statute, the reason of the common law gives great light. Raym. 191, 355; 2 Inst. 301. If an act of parliament is dubious, long usage may be good to expound it by; and the meaning of things spoken and written must be as hath been constantly received; but where usage is against the obvious meaning of a statute, by the vulgar and common acceptation of words, then it is rather an oppression than an exposition of the statute. Vaugh. 169, 170. An election committee refused to admit evidence of usage to explain the words of a stamp act, on the question whether deeds were valid, which conveyed several freeholds to several voters, which had only one stamp. 3 Lud. 177.

A statute which alters the common law shall not be strained beyond the words, except in cases of public utility, where the end and design of the act appears to be larger than the words themselves. Vaugh. 179. Relative words in any statute may make a thing pass as well as if particularly expressed; and cases of the same nature shall be within the same remedy. Raym. 54.

Statutes made for the public good are to be expounded so as to attain their end. 1 Stra. 253, 258.

Such statutes as are beneficial to the people shall be expounded largely, and not with restriction. Style, 502. The exposition of statutes concerning the ecclesiastical courts belongs to the common law courts; and a statute made in imitation of the common law is to be expounded by it. Hoar. 83, 97.

The affirmative words of statutes do not change the common law without negative words added therein. Thus the Statute of Wills, being in the affirmative, doth not take away the custom to devise land in places where it existed before the statute. Jonk. Cent. 212; Dyer, 155; 1 Inst. 111; and see 7 T. R. 628. So though the 54 Geo. 3. c. 84. enacted that the Michaelmas quarter sessions should be held in the week after 11th October, it was decided to be merely directory and that those sessions might be held at another time; but negative words would have made the statute imperative and see Dougl. 188; Bac. Abr. Statute G. (7th ed.)

If a statute be made only in affirmance of the ancient common law, and doth not enact any thing new, but what was before provided for, it is nevertheless a statute, and may be pleaded, but the defendant hath a plea at common law. Style, Reg. 301. An act of parliament, in affirmance of the common law, extends to all times after, though it mentions only to give remedy for the present; and where a thing is granted by statute, all necessary incidents are granted with it. 1 Inst. 235.

Wherever a statute gives or provides a thing, the common law supplies all manner of requisites. Hard. 62. Every statute made against an injury gives a remedy by action, expressly or implicitly. 2 Inst. 55, 74. And besides an action upon the statute, as the subject's private remedy, the offender may be punished for contempt at the king's suit, by fine, &c. 2 Co. Inst. 131, 163.

Keble's edition of the statutes and Rastall's differed, and they who were for adhering to Keble, proved they had examined him with the parliament roll. The chief justice ruled it was enough, and Keble was read. 1 Stra. 446.

STATUTE-MERCHANT. A bond of record, acknowledged before the clerk of the statutes-merchant, and lord mayor of the city of London, or two merchants assigned for that purpose; and before the mayors of other cities and towns, or the bailiff of any borough, &c., sealed with the seal of the debtor and the king, upon condition that if the obligor pays not the debt at the day, execution may be awarded against his body, lands, and goods; and the obligee shall hold the lands to him, his heirs and assigns, till the debt is levied. Terms de la Ley.

Estates by statute-merchant and statute-staple are classed by Blackst. among the species of estates defeasible on condition subsequent, and are said to be very nearly related to the vivum vadium, or estate held till the profits thereof shall discharge a debt liquidated or ascertained. For both the statute-merchant and statute-staple are securities for money, the one entered into before the chief magistrate of some trading town, pursuant to the 13 Edm. 1. st. 3. de mercatoribus, and thence called a statute-merchant; the other pursuant to the 27 Edm. 3. st. 2. c. 9. before the mayor of the staple, that is to say, the grand mart for the principal commodities or manufactures of the kingdom, formerly held by act of parliament in certain trading towns, from whence this security is called a statute-staple. They are both securities for debts acknowledged to be due, and originally permitted only among traders, for the benefit of commerce, whereby not only the body of the debtor may be imprisoned, and his goods seized in satisfaction of the debt, but also his lands may be delivered to the creditor, till out of the rents and profits of them the debt may be satisfied. And during such time as the creditor so holds the lands, he is tenant by statute-merchant or statute-staple. There is also a similar security, the recognizance in the nature of a statute-staple, acknowledged before either of the chief justices, or (out of term) before their substitutes, the mayor of the staple at Westminster, and the recorder of London, whereby the benefit of this mercantile transaction is extended to all the king's subjects in general, by virtue of the statute 23 Hen. 8. c. 6. amended by 8 Geo. 1. c. 22. which direct such recognizances to be enrolled and certified into Chancery. But these, by the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2. c. 3. are only binding upon the lands in the hands of bona fide purchasers, from the day of their enrolment, which is ordered to be marked on the record. 2 Comm. c. 10. p. 160. See further, Execution, Recognizance.

These estates, though sometimes referred to in argument, seem now nearly unknown in practice; but as the law relating to them is in force, and as it may serve to elucidate other subjects by analogy, the following information on the subject has been preserved, as useful to the student, if not to the practitioner.

11. Statute of Acton Burnel, 11 Edm. 1. and statute de mercatoribus, 13 Edm. 1. st. 3. enact, that the merchant shall cause his debtor to appear before the mayor of the city of London, or other city or town, and there acknowledge the debt &c. by recognizance, which is to be enrolled, the roll whereof must be double, one part to remain with the mayor, and the other with the clerk appointed by the king; and then one of the clerks is to write the obligation, which shall be sealed with the debtor's seal, and that of the king, &c.

By these statutes, if the debt be acknowledged at the day upon the merchant's account, the mayor is to cause the debtor to be imprisoned, if to be found, and in prison to remain until he hath agreed the debt; and if the debtor cannot be found, the mayor shall send the recognizance into the Chancery, from whence a writ shall issue to the sheriff of the county where the debtor is to arrest his body, and keep him in prison till he agree the debt; and within a quarter of a year his lands and goods shall be delivered to him to pay the debt; but if the debtor do not satisfy the debt within that time, all his lands and goods shall be delivered to the merchant by a reasonable extent, to hold until the debt is levied thereby; and in the mean time he shall remain in prison; but when the debt is satisfied, the body of the debtor is to be delivered, together with his lands. If the sheriff return a non est inventus, &c. the merchant may have writs to all the sheriffs where he hath any land; and they shall deliver all the goods and lands of the debtor by extent; and the merchant shall be allowed his damage, and all reasonable costs, &c.

All the lands in the hands of the debtor at the time of the recognizance acknowledged, are chargeable (but see 29 Car. 2. c. 3. before referred to), though after the debt is paid, they shall return to grantees, if they are granted away, as shall the rest to the debtor. The debtor or his sureties dying, the merchant shall not take the body of the heir, &c. but shall have his lands until the debt is levied. If the debtor have sureties, they shall be proceeded against in like manner as the debtor; but so long as the debt may be levied of the goods of the debtor, the sureties are to be without damage. Also the merchant shall, besides the payment of his debt, be satisfied for his stay and detainer from his business. In London, out of the commonalty two merchants are to be chosen and sworn, by this statute, and the seal shall be opened before them, whereof one piece is to be delivered to the said merchants, and the other remain with the clerk; and before these merchants, &c. recognizances may be taken. A fee of 1d. per pound is allowed to the clerk for fixing the king's seal, and a seal is to be provided that shall serve for fairs, &c.; but the statute extends not to Jews. Cro. Car. 440, 457.

Statutes-merchant were contrived for the security of merchants only, to provide a speedy remedy to recover their debts, but at this day they are used by others who follow not merchandize, and are become one of the common assurances of the kingdom. Bridg. 21; Owen, 82. And all obligations made to the king are of the nature of these statutes-merchant. 12 Rep. 2, 3.

STATUTE-STAPLE. A bond of record, acknowledged before the mayor of the staple, in the presence of all or one of the constables; to this end, says the statute, there shall be a seal ordained, which shall be affixed to all obligations made on such recognizance acknowledged in the staple. This seal of the staple is the only seal the statutes requires to attest this contract; but it is no more under the power or disposal of the mayor, than that appointed by the statute-merchant; for though the statute appoints him the custody of it, yet it is in such a manner that he cannot affix it to any obligation without their consent, it being to remain in the mayor's hands, under the security of their own seals. 2 Roll. Abr. 460; 27 Edm. 3. c. 9. See Statute-Merchant.

To understand a little of the original and constitution of the staple, and the advantage the nation had by this establishment, we must observe that the place of residence, whither the merchants resorted with their staple commodities, was anciently called Etaple, which signifies no more than mart or market; and this was formerly appointed out of the realm, as at Calais, Antwerp, &c. and other ports on the continent, which were nearest to us, and whither the merchants might with safety coast it. 4 Inst. 238. See Staple.

But besides these staple ports appointed abroad, there were others appointed at home, whither all the staple commodities were carried in order to their exportation, such as London, Westminster, Hull, &c. This was found to be of great use and consequence to the prince in particular, and to the interest and credit of the nation in general; for at these staple ports were the king's customs easily collected, and were by the officers of the staple, at two several payments, returned into the Exchequer; besides, at these staples, all merchant's goods were carefully viewed and marked by the proper officers of the staple; and this necessarily avoided the exportation of decayed goods, or ill-wrought manufactures, and consequently fixed a stamp of credit on the merchandizes exported, which, upon the view, always answered the expectation of the buyer. Maline's Lex Merc. 337, 338.

The staple merchandizes, according to Lord Coke, are only wool, woolfells, leather, lead, and tin; others, butter, cheese, and cloths; but whatever they were, the mayor and constables had not only consance of all contracts and debts relating to them, but they had likewise jurisdiction over the people, and all manner of things touching the staple. This power was given them lest the merchants should be diverted and drawn from their business and trade, by applying to the common law, and running through the tedious forms of it, for a determination of their differences; and for the greater encouragement of merchants, that they might have all imaginable security in their contracts and dealings, and the most expeditious method of recovering their debts, without going out of the bounds of the staple. 4 Inst. 238; Maline's Lex Merc. 337.

By this it appears that this security was only designed for the merchants of the staple, and for debts only on the sale of merchandizes brought thither; yet in time others began to apply it to their own ends, and the mayor and constable would take recognizances from strangers, surmising it was made for the payment of money for merchandizes brought to the staple. To prevent this mischief, the parliament, in 23 Hen. 8. reduced the statute-staple to its former channel, and laid a penalty of 40*l.* on the mayor and constables who should extend the benefit of the statute to any but those of the staple. But though the 23 Hen. 8. c. 6. (amended by the 8 Geo. 1. c. 25.) deprived them of this benefit, yet it framed the new sort of security known by the name of a recognizance, in the nature of a statute-staple; so called because this act limits and appoints the same process, execution, and advantage, in every particular, as is set down in the statute-staple. Co. Litt. 290. See Statute-Merchant.

A recognizance, therefore, in nature of a statute-staple, as the words of the act declare, is the same with the former, only acknowledged under other persons; for, as the statute runs, the chief justice of the King's Bench and Common Pleas, or, in their absence, out of term, the mayor of the staple, at Westminster, and the recorder of London, jointly together, shall have power to take recognizances for payment of debt in the form set down in the statute. In this, as in the former cases, the king appoints a seal to attest the contract. Co. Litt. 290, a; 4 Inst. 238; 2 Roll. Abr. 466; Co. Ent. 12.

Debt lies as well upon a statute-staple as upon a bond. And a statute acknowledged on lands is a present duty, and ought to be satisfied before an obligation; a debt due on an obligation being but a chose in action, and recoverable by law, and not a present duty by law, as a debt upon a statute, judgment, or recognizance is, upon which present execution is to be taken without farther suit. Cro. Eliz. 355, 461, 494; 2 Lill. Abr. 536.

But a judgment in a court of record shall be preferred, in case of execution, before a statute. Though if one acknowledge a statute, and afterwards confess judgment, if the land be extended thereon, the cognisee shall have a scire facias to avoid the extent upon the judgment. It is otherwise as to goods; for there, he that comes first shall be first served. 8 Rep. 45; 1 Brownl. 37. The cognisor of a statute grants his estate to the cognisee; by this the execution of the statute will be suspended. 2 Cro. 424. But if the cognisee, before execution of a statute, release to the cognisor all his right to the land, it will not be a discharge of the whole execution; for, notwithstanding, he may sue execution of his body and goods. 3 Shep. Abr. 326. Upon a statute-staple, a capias and extent of lands, goods, and chattels, are contained in one writ; but it is not so on a statute-merchant. Jenk. Cent. 163.

In Chancery, the proceedings on a statute-staple are in the petty-bag office; and statutes staple are suable in the King's Bench or Common Pleas, as well as in Chancery. Cro. Eliz. 208. Chancery will give relief against an infant in case of a statute-staple, though it is not extendible against him at law. 1 Lev. 198. On a statute's being satisfied, it is to be vacated by entering satisfaction, &c. Statutes-staple and statutes-merchant are to be entered within six months, or shall not be good against purchasers. 27 Eliz. c. 4. See 16 & 17 Car. 2. c. 5. for preventing delays and extending statutes.

He that is in possession of lands on a statute-merchant, or staple, is called tenant by statute-merchant, or statute-staple, during the time of his possession. And creditors shall have freehold in the lands of debtors, and recovery by novel disseisin, if put out; but if tenant by statute-merchant or statute-staple hold over his term, he that hath right may sue out a venire facias ad computand', or enter, as upon an elegit. 27 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 9.

STATUTO MERCATORIO. The ancient writ for imprisoning him that had forfeited a statute-merchant bond, until the debt were satisfied. And of these writs, one was against lay persons, and another against persons ecclesiastical. Reg. Orig. 146, 148. See Statute-Merchant.

STATUTO STAPULE. The ancient writ that lay to take the body to prison, and seize upon the lands and goods of one who had forfeited the bond called statute-staple. Reg. Orig. 151. See Statute-Staple.

STATUTUM SESSIONUM. The statute-sessions, a meeting, in every hundred, of constables and householders, by custom for the ordering of servants, and debating of differences between the masters and servants, rating of servants' wages, &c. See 5 Eliz. c. 4. and tit. Labourers.

STAUTURUM. Any store or standing stock of cattle, provision, &c. Mat. West. anno 1259.

STEALING. See Larceny, Robbery.

STEALING CHILDREN. See Child-Stealing.

STEEL-BOW GOODS. Corn, cattle, straw, and implements of husbandry, let or delivered by a landlord to a tenant, by which the tenant is enabled to stock and work a farm; in consideration of which he becomes bound to return articles, equal in quantity and quality, at the expiration of the lease. Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

STELLIONATE. A term applied in the law of Scotland to conveyances of the same right to different persons.

By the Roman law, the making a second mortgage without giving notice of the first, was punished as a crime, called stellionatus; but the crime was not committed if the land was equal in value to all the sums charged on it. Dig. 17, 36. 1. Bac. Abr. Mortgage.

STERBRECHE, alias, Strebrich, (query street-breach.) The breaking, obstructing, or straitening of a way. Termes de la Ley.

STERLING, sterlingum.] Was the epithet for silver money current within this kingdom, and took its name from this: that there was a pure coin stamped first in England by the Easterlings, or merchants of East Germany, by the command of King John; and Hoveden writes it Easterling. Instead of the pounds sterling, we now say so many pounds of lawful English money; but the word is not wholly disused, for though we ordinarily say lawful money of England, yet the mint they call it sterling money; and when it was found convenient, in the fabrication of monies, to have a certain quantity of baser metal to be mixed with the pure gold or silver, the word sterling was then introduced; and it has ever since been used to denote the certain proportion or degree of fineness which ought to be retained in the respective coins. Lowndes's Essay on Coins, 14. See Coins.

STEUART. The king's sheriff within the king's own proper lands. Scotch Dict.

STEWART, seneschallus; compounded of the Sax. Stead, i. e. Room or Stead, and Ward, a ward or keeper; i. e. a man appointed in my place or stead.] The term hath many appr.

cations, but always denotes an officer of chief account within his jurisdiction.

The greatest of these officers is the Lord High Steward of England, who anciently had the supervising and regulating, next under the king, the administration of justice, and all other affairs of the realm, whether civil or military; and the office was hereditary, belonging to the Earls of Leicester, till forfeited to King Henry III. But the power of this officer being very great of late, the office of High Steward of England hath not been granted to any one, only pro hac vice, either for the trial of a peer of the realm on an indictment for a capital offence; or for the determination of the pretensions of those who claim to hold by grand serjeanty, to do certain honourable services to the king at his coronation, &c. for both which purposes he holds a court, and proceeds according to the laws and customs of England; and he to whom this office is granted must be of nobility, and a lord of parliament. 4 Inst. 58, 59; Crompt. Jur. 84; 13 Hen. 8. 11; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 2. See Peers of the Realm, IV.; Parliament. Of the nine great officers of the crown, the Lord High Steward is the first; but when the special business for which he is appointed is once ended, his commission expires. The first Lord High Steward that was created for the solemnizing of a coronation, was Thomas, second son of Henry IV.; and the first Lord Steward, for the trial of a peer, was Edward Earl of Devon, on the arraignment of John Holderness, Earl of Huntingdon, in the same reign. Lex Constitution. 170.

See further, Lord High Steward.

There is a Lord Steward of the household mentioned 24 Hen. 8. c. 13, whose name was changed to that of great master of the household, anno 32 Hen. 8. But this statute was repealed by 1 Mar. c. 4, and the office of Lord Steward of the household revived. He is the chief officer of the king's house, to whom is committed the care of the king's household, and he has authority over all officers and servants of the household, except those belonging to the chapel, chamber, and stable; and the palace royal exempted from all jurisdiction of any court, but only of the Lord Steward, or in his absence, of the treasurer and comptroller of the household, with the steward of the marshalsea, who, by virtue of their offices, must be any commissioner, hear and determine all treasons, murders, felonies, breaches of the peace, &c. committed in the king's palace. Besides the treasurer and comptroller, the Lord Steward hath under him several clerks of the great cloth, &c. He attends the king's person at the beginning of parliaments; and is a white staff officer, which he breaks over the hearse on the death of the king, and thereby discharges all officers taken in. Of this officer's ancient power, read Plat. 16. c. 1, and P. N. B. 2. 1. See Court of Marshalsea, Court of the Lord Steward.

The steward of Scotland was in office at the highest dignity and trust. He administered the crown revenues, superintended the affairs of the household, and possessed the privilege of holding the first place in the army next to the king, in the day of battle. From this office the royal house of Stuart took its name; and after advancement to the throne this office was staid, and was never afterwards revived.

In the liberty of Westminster, an officer is chosen and appointed, called high steward, and there is a deputy steward of the university. See Peter. The word steward is of so great authority, that in almost all corporations and all houses of honour, an officer is found of this name and authority. See other stewards of Epiph. lit. Courts, Marshalsea. See the several titles.

STILYARD, or STEELYARD. Otherwise called the style-house, in the parish of Allhallows in London, was by authority of parliament assigned to the merchants of the Hanse; and to Almaine or Easterling merchants, to have their abode in for ever, with other tenements, rendering to the mayor of London a certain yearly rent. 14 Edw. 4. In some records it is called Gildhalda Teutonicorum; and it was at first denominated stilyard, of a broad place or court where steel was sold, upon which that house was founded. See 19 Hen. 7. c. 32; 22 Hen. 8. c. 38; 1 Edw. 6. c. 13.

STIPENDIARY PRIESTS. The stipendiary priests were for trentals, anniversaries, obits, and such like, grounded on the doctrine of purgatory and masses satisfactory; and for these, charities were founded and endowed to pay for the souls of the founder and his friends, which charities were dissolved by the 1 Ed. 6. c. 14.

A stockbroker is a broker within the 6 Ann. c. 16, and must be admitted by the lord mayor and aldermen. 4 B. & Adol. 546; 1 N. & M. 392.

STOCKJOBBER. Agreements for the sale of stock are generally made at the Stock Exchange, which is frequented by a set of middlemen called jobbers, whose business is to accommodate the buyers and sellers of stock with the exact sums they want. A jobber is generally possessed of considerable property in the funds, and declares a price at which he will either sell or buy. Thus he declares he is ready to buy 3 per cent. consols at 85½, or to sell at 85½; so that in this way, a person willing to buy or sell any sum, however small, has never any difficulty in finding an individual with whom to deal. The jobber's profit is generally $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., for which he transacts both a sale and a purchase. He frequently confines himself entirely to this sort of business, and engages in no other description of stock speculation. McCulloch's Comm. Dict.

By the 7 Geo. 2. c. 8. (made perpetual by the 10 Geo. 2. c. 8.) all premiums to deliver or receive, accept or refuse any public stock, or share therein, and contracts in nature of wagers, putts, and refusals relating to the value of the stock, shall be void; and the premiums shall be returned, or may be recovered by action, with double costs; and the persons entering into or executing any such contract, shall forfeit 500*l.* No money shall be given to compound any difference for not delivering or transferring stock, or not performing contracts; but the whole money agreed is to be paid, and the stock transferred, on pain of 100*l.* Persons buying, on refusal or neglect of the seller to transfer at the day, may buy the like quantity of stock of any other person, and recover the damage of the first contractor: and contracts for sale of any stock, where contractors are not actually possessed of or entitled unto the same, are void, and the parties agreeing to sell, &c. incur a penalty of 500*l.* Brokers making agreements, &c. and acting contrary, are also liable to penalties. But the act is not to hinder lending money on stock, or contracts for the re-delivering or transferring thereof, so as no premium be paid for the loan more than legal interest.

Jobbing in omnium is within the statute. 7 T. R. 630.

An agreement to invest or replace stock at a certain time in consideration of money actually paid or advanced equivalent to the value of the stock at the time of such payment or advance is valid; and not usurious, or within the 7 Geo. 2; 8 East, 304.

In an action on this statute, the contract laid in the declaration was to deliver stock on the 27th of February: the contract proved was to deliver stock on the Settling-day, which at the time was fixed for, and understood by the parties to mean, the 27th of February: held, that the proof supported the declaration. 2 B. & A. 335.

Money lent for the express purpose of enabling the borrower to pay stockjobbing differences cannot be recovered. 3 B. & A. 179.

Stocks, cippus.] A wooden engine to put the legs of offenders in, for the security of disorderly persons, and by way of punishment in divers cases ordained by statute, &c. And it is said, that every vill within the precinct of a town is indictable for not having a pair of stocks, and shall forfeit 5*l.* Kitch. 13. See Drunkenness.

The stocks are a wooden engine to put the legs of offenders in, being originally used, not so much to punish as to keep men in hold; and the constable still, by the common law, may confine unruly offenders in the stocks by way of security, though not by way of punishment. 1 Wood's Inst. b. 4. c. 1. p. 505; 5 Burn's Just.

STOCKING FRAMES. See Frames.

STOCKLAND (or STOKELAND) and BONDLAND.

In the manor of Wadhurst in Sussex, there are two sorts of copyhold estates, called Stokeland and Bondland, descendible by custom in several manors: as if a man be first admitted to stockland, and afterwards to bondland, and dies seised of both, his eldest son and heir shall inherit both estates; but if he be admitted first to bondland, and after to the other, and of these die seised, his youngest son shall inherit: and bondland held alone, descends to the youngest son. 2 Levin. 55.

STOLA. A garment or hood formerly worn by priests. Sometimes it was taken for the archiepiscopal pall. Eadmer. c. 188. Also a vestment which matrons wore. Cowell.

STONE. A weight of 14 pounds, used for weighing of wool, &c. The stone of wool ought to weigh 14 pounds; but formerly, in some places, by custom, it was less, as 13 pounds and a half. So a stone of wax was eight pounds; and in London the stone of beef, until recently, was no more. See Measure.

STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU. When goods are consigned on credit by one merchant to another, it sometimes happens, that the consignee becomes a bankrupt or insolvent, while the goods are on their way to him, and before they are delivered. In such case, as it would be hard that the goods of the consignor should be applied in payment of the debts of the consignee, the former is allowed by law to resume possession of them, if he can succeed in doing so while they are on their way. This resumption is called stoppage in transitu, and was first allowed by equity, 2 Vern. 295; 1 Atk. 246; 2 Eden. 75; Ambl. 399; as it is now also by common law, where, on account of its remedial nature, it is regarded with considerable favour.

Whether its effect be or be not to dissolve the contract of sale between the consignor and consignee of the goods stopped, is a question which has been frequently discussed, particularly in Clay v. Harrison, 10 B. & C. 99, and which was adverted to in the 2 B. & Adol. 323, as undetermined. Lord Kenyon was of opinion that it did not rescind the sale, but was "an equitable lien, adopted by the law for the purposes of substantial justice," an opinion which certainly consists best with the decisions which have taken place, that payment of part of the price, or acceptance of a bill for the whole of it, by the vendee, will not defeat the vendor's right to stop in transitu, if the vendee become insolvent before the remainder of the price has been liquidated, or the bill taken up. 7 T. R. 440; 3 East, 93.

I. Who possesses the right of stoppage in transitu.

II. How long it continues.

III. How it may be defeated.

IV. How it may be exercised.

I. The person who stops goods in transitu must not be a mere surety for their price, one, for instance, who has, at the request of the vendee, accepted a bill drawn by the vendor for their purchase money. 6 East, 371; 1 East, 4. But a person abroad, who, in pursuance of orders sent him by a British merchant, purchases goods on his own credit, of others whose names are unknown to the merchant, and charges a commission on the price, is a consignor, so as to enable him to stop the goods in transitu if the merchant fail while they are on their passage; for he stands in the light of a vendor, and the British merchant of his vendee, 3 East, 93; and so is a person who consigns goods to be sold on the joint account of himself and the consignee, 6 East, 17.

II. The period during which the right to stop the goods continues, is, as we have seen, co-extensive with that of their transit from the vendor to the purchaser. Hence, in cases where the propriety of a resumption of this sort is questioned, the point disputed generally is, whether at the time of seizure by the vendor the transit of the goods had or had not determined. Such cases always mainly depend upon their own peculiar circumstances; but the general rule to be collected from all the decisions is, that goods are to be deemed in transitu, so long as they remain in the possession of the carrier: even as such, whether by water or land, 2 B. & P. 457; even though such carrier may have been appointed by the consignee himself, 1 Esp. 240; 2 Esp. 613; 7 T. R. 440; and also while they are in any place of deposit connected with the transmission and delivery of them, 3 East, 397; 1 Campb. 282; 6 B. & C. 422; and until they arrive at the actual or constructive possession of the consignee.

Thus, if goods be landed at a seaport town, and there deposited with a wharfinger appointed by the consignee to forward them thence by land to his own residence, they are subject to the consignor's right of stoppage, while in the hands of the wharfinger. 2 B. & P. 457. But if a consignee be in the habit of using the warehouse of a carrier, packer, wharfinger, or other such person, as his own, for instance, by making it the repository of his goods, and depositing of them there, the transit will be considered at an end when they have arrived at such warehouse. 3 B. & P. 127; 3 B. & P. 469; 6 B. & C. 109; 2 Tyrn. 217; 8 Taunt. 83; nay, if, after goods are sold, they remain in the vendor's own warehouse, and he receives warehouse rent for them, that operates as a delivery to the purchaser, and puts an end to the right to stop in transitu. 1 Campb. 452. See also 14 East, 308. And it has been decided that where part of the goods sold by one entire contract is taken possession of by the vendor, without any intention on the vendor's part of retaining the rest, that is to be deemed a transit possession of the whole. 1 B. & P. New Rep. 69; 2 H. Bl. 504; 6 East, 614; though it is otherwise if there were such an intention. 4 B. & Adol. 670. And if the vendee charter a ship to convey the goods, not to himself, but to a foreign port, on a commercial speculation for his own benefit, a delivery on board that ship is, in point of law, a delivery to the vendee himself, and a determination of the transit, 7 T. R. 442; 1 East, 522; 3 East, 588; for as between him and the seller the goods have arrived at the end of their journey, and their voyage on board the chartered vessel is a new one under the direction of the purchaser. See also 3 M. & R. 396.

III. It has been already observed, that the delivery of goods to a carrier named by the vendee, though a delivery to the vendee himself for many purposes, is not such a one as to put an end to the right to stop them in transitu, and it has been ruled though that doctrine has been questioned, that the vendee, when a particular place of delivery has been appointed, cannot anticipate the regular determination of the transit by going to meet the goods upon their journey. 11 Esp. 240. but see 2 B. & P. 461; 5 B. & P. 511; 6 B. & C. 107. nor will the vendor's right be defeated by the exercise of any claim against the consignee, such, for instance, as process of foreign attachment at the suit of a creditor of the vendee, 1 Campb. 282; or the carrier's claim of a general lien for the balance due to him by the vendee, 2 N. R. 64; for the right to stop in transitu is paramount to any lien of a third party against the purchaser. 3 M. & R. 396. And notwithstanding an endorsement of the bill of lading, by the vendor, to a party who advances money on the security of it, an equitable right of (quasi) stoppage in transitu remains in the unpaid vendor, subject to theENDORSEE'S right to be repaid his advances. And the vendor has an equity to call upon such ENDORSEES to repay himself out of other property of the vendee, as he has, and if, instead of doing so, he apply for that purpose the proceeds of the goods so equitably stopped in transitu to the vendee, will have a claim upon the vendee's interest in such property. 2 N. & M. 414.

IV. A consignor, who is desirous, and who has a right, to stop his goods in transitu, is not obliged to make an actual seizure of them while upon the road; it is sufficient to give notice to the carrier in whose hands they are, on the delivery of which notice, it becomes that person's duty to retain the goods, so that if he afterwards by mistake deliver them to the vendee, the vendor may bring trover for them, 7 Taunt. 140; even against the vendee's assignees, if he himself have become bankrupt, and the carrier, who after receipt of such notice, delivers the goods to the vendee, is guilty of a tortious act, for which he may, of course, be held responsible. See cases cited in 3 T. R. 466; 3 East, 397. Smith's Mercantile Law, 330.

This offence was triable in the court of the lord steward of the household, by a grand and petit jury, as at common law, taken out of the officers and sworn servants of the king's household. 4 Comm. 276.

Symb. par.* 2; Crompt. Jurisdict. 35. The subpœna is the leading process in the Courts of Equity. There are several of these writs in Chancery; as the subpœna ad respondend', subpœna ad replicand' et ad rejoicend', subpœna ad testificand' et ad audiend' judicium, &c. which writs are to be made out by the proper clerks of the subpœna office. SUBSIDY, subsidium.] An aid, tax, or tribute granted to the king for the urgent occasions of the kingdom, to be levied on every subject of ability, according to the value of his lands or goods.

History does not mention that the Saxon kings had any subsidies after the manner of ours at present; but they had both levies of money and personal services towards the building and repairing of cities, castles, bridges, military expeditions, &c., which they called Burgbote, Brigbote, Herefare, Heregeld, &c. But when the Danes harassed the land, King Ethelred submitted to pay them for redemption of peace several great sums of money yearly. This was called Danegeld, for the levying of which every hide of land was taxed yearly at twelve pence, lands of the church only excepted: and thereupon it was after called Hydagium, and that name remained afterwards upon all taxes and subsidies imposed upon lands; but sometimes it was laid upon cattle, and then was termed Horngeld. The Normans called these sometimes Taxes, sometimes Tallages, otherwise Auxilia et subsidia. The Conqueror had these taxes, and made a law for the manner of their levying as appears in Emendationibus ejus, page 125. sect. Volumus et firmiter, &c. Many years after the Conquest they were levied otherwise than now, as every ninth lamb, every ninth fleece, and every ninth sheaf. See Stat. Antig. 14 Edw. 3. at. 1. c. 20. Of which you may see great variety in Rastall's Abridgment, tit. Fifteenth, Subsidies, Taxes Tenth, &c. and 4 Inst. 26, 33. Whence we may gather, there is no certain rate, but as the parliament shall think fit. Subsidy is in our statutes sometimes confounded with customs. 11 Hen. 4. c. 7. Conell. See Customs in Merchandise, Taxes.

SUBSTITUTE, substitutus.] One placed under another person to transact some business, &c. See Attorney, Attorney.

Substitution, in the Scotch law, is the term for the emasculation or designation of the heirs in a settlement of property; and substitutes in an entail, are those heirs who are appointed in succession on failure of others.

SUBTRACTION OF RENTS AND SERVICES, &c. This happens when any person who owes any suit, duty, custom, rent, or service, to another, withdraws or neglects to perform or pay it, &c. See 3 Comm. c. 15; and ante, Distress, Rent, &c.

SUBTRACTION OF TITHES. See Tithes.

SUBURBANI. Husbandmen. Monasticon, ii. 464.

SUCCESSION to the Crown. See King, I.

SUCCESSION to real estate. See Descent, Heir; to personal estate, see Executor, V. 8.

SUCCESSOR, Lat.] He that followeth or cometh in another's place.

Sole corporations may take a fee-simple estate to them and their successors, but not without the word successors. And such a corporation cannot regularly take in succession goods and chattels; and therefore if a lease for a hundred years be made to a person and his successors, it hath been adjudged only an estate for life. Nor may a sole corporation bind its successors. 1 Rep. 65; 1 Inst. 8, 16, 94; 1 Inst. 249. An aggregate corporation may have a fee-simple estate in succession without the word successors, and take goods and chattels in action or possession; and they shall go to the successors. Wood's Inst. 111. See further, Corporation, Aug.

SUCKEN. Theucken consists of the whole lands abstracted to a mill (i. e. the tenants of which are bound to grind there). the possessors of these lands are termed the suckeners. Scotch Law Dict. See further, Thirlage.

SUFFERANCE. Tenant at sufferance is he who holdeth over his term at first lawfully granted. Terms de Ley. A person is tenant at sufferance that continues after his estate is ended, and wrongfully holdeth against another, &c. 1 Inst. 57.

An estate at sufferance is where one comes into possession of land by lawful title, but keeps it afterwards without any title at all. As if a man takes a lease for a year, and, after the year is expired, continues to hold the premises without any fresh leave from the owner of the estate. Or, if a man maketh a lease at will, and dies, the estate at will is thereby determined; but if the tenant continueth possession, he is tenant at sufferance. Co. Litt. 57. But a lease at will being now considered as a lease from year to year, which cannot be vacated without half a year's notice to quit, the tenant cannot be ejected at the death of the lessor without half a year's notice from his heir. 2 T. R. 159. And it is also necessary, in case of the death of the tenant, to give that notice to his personal representative. 3 Wils. 25.

As a tenant at will cannot grant or surrender, so à fortiori cannot a tenant by sufferance.

No man can be tenant at sufferance against the king, to whom no laches or neglect, in not entering and ousting the tenant, is ever imputed by law; and his tenant so holding over is considered an absolute intruder. 1 Inst. 57. But, in the case of a subject, this estate may be destroyed whenever the true owner shall make an actual entry on the lands and oust the tenant; for before entry he cannot maintain an action of trespass against the tenant by sufferance, as he might against a stranger; and the reason is, because the tenant being once in by a lawful title, the law (which presumes no wrong in any man) will suppose him to continue upon a title equally lawful, unless the owner of the land, by some public and avowed act, such as entry is, will declare his continuance to be tortious, or, in common language, wrongful. 1 Inst. 57; 2 Comm. c. 9, p. 150.

Thus stands the law with regard to tenants by sufferance; and landlords are obliged in those cases to make formal entries upon the lands, and recover possession by the legal process of ejectment, and, at the utmost, by the common law, if the tenant was bound to account for the profits of the land as by him covenanted. But now, by the 11 Geo. 2. c. 28, in case any tenant for life or years, or other person claiming under or by collusion with such tenant, shall wilfully hold over after the determination of the term, and demand made and notice in writing given by the landlord, or him to whom the remainder or reversion of the premises shall belong, for delivering the possession thereof; such person so holding over or keeping the other out of possession, shall pay, for the time he detains the lands, at the rate of double the yearly value. And by the 11 Geo. 2. c. 19, in case any tenant, having power to determine his lease, shall give notice of his intention to quit the premises, and shall not deliver up the possession at the time contained in such notice, he shall thenceforth pay double the former rent for such time as he continues in possession. See also the 6 Ann. c. 18, § 1, against holding over by guardians or trustees of infants, and by husbands seized in right of their wives, and by all others having particular estates determinable on any life or lives, by which they are considered as trespassers. These statutes have almost put an end to the practice of tenancy by sufferance, unless with the tacit consent of the owner of the tenement. 2 Comm. c. 9, ad fin.

Where a tenant has a lease for a term certain, and holds over after the expiration of it, it is not necessary for the landlord to give him any notice to quit, in order to recover possession by ejectment. 1 T. R. 53, 102. But if the landlord afterwards receives rent, or does any act by which he proves his assent to the continuance of the tenant, this turns the estate at sufferance into a tenancy from year to year.

The notice under the 4 Geo. 2. c. 28, may be given previous to the end of the term. Black. Rep. 1075. And it seems that it may also be given afterwards, though the double value can only be recovered from the delivery of the notice and demand of the possession. This notice by the landlord must be in writing; but that by the tenant, under the 11 Geo. 2. c. 19, may be parol. 3 Burr. 1603. The double value can only be recovered by action of debt; but the double rent may be recovered by distress or otherwise, like single rent. 1 Black. Rep. 535. No length of time is necessary to the validity of these notices, under the statutes, to entitle the landlord to double value or double rent. 2 Comm. c. 9, ad fin. ut n. See further, Ejectment, Rent.

SUFFERENTIA PACIS. A grant or sufferance of peace or truce. Rot. Claus. 16 Edm. 3.

SUFFRAGAN, suffraganeus, chorepiscopus, episcopi vicarius, &c. A titular bishop ordained to aid and assist the bishop of the diocese in his spiritual function; or one who supplieth the place instead of the bishop, by whose suffrage ecclesiastical causes or matters committed to him are to be adjudged, acted, or determined. Some writers call these suffragans by the name of subsidiary bishops, whose number is limited by the 26 Hen. 8. c. 14; by which statute it was enacted, that it should be lawful for every bishop at his pleasure to elect two honest and discreet spiritual persons within his diocese, and to present them to the king, that he might give to one of them such title, style, and dignity, of such of the sees in the said statute mentioned, as he should think fit; and that every such person should be called bishop suffragan of the same see, &c. This act sets forth at large for what places such suffragans were to be nominated by the king; and if any one exercise the jurisdiction of a suffragan, without the appointment of the bishop of the diocese, &c. he shall be guilty of a præmunire. See Kennett's Paroch. Antiq. 639; and tit. Bishops.

SUGGESTIONS, suggestio. A surmise or representing of a thing. By Magna Charta no person shall be put to his law on the suggestion of another but by lawful witnesses. 9 Hen. 3. c. 28. Suggestions upon record are informations drawn in writing, showing cause for prohibitions to suits in the spiritual courts, &c. See Prohibition, III. Though matters of record ought not to be staid upon the bare suggestion of the party, there ought to be an affidavit made of the matter suggested, to induce the court to grant a rule for staying the proceedings upon the record. 2 Lill. 537. There are suggestions in replevin for a retorno habendo, which, it is said, are not traversable, as they are for prohibitions to the spiritual or admiralty courts. 1 Plowd. 76. Branches of covenants and deaths of persons must be suggested upon record, &c. 8 & 9 Wm. 3. c. 10. See Abatement, Amendment. Blackstone terms the proceeding by information a prosecution by suggestion. See Information.

SUICIDE. See Homicide, III. 1.

SUIT, acta, Fr. suite, i. e. consecutio, sequela. Signifies a following another, but in divers senses. The first is a suit in law, and is divided into several and personal, which is all one with action real and personal. See Action, Chancery. 2. Suit of Court, an attendance which the tenant owes to the court of his lord. 3. Suit covenant, when a man hath covenanted to do suit in the lord's court. 4. Suit custom, where I and my ancestors owe suit time out of mind. 5. Suit is the following one in chase, as fresh suit. See Hue and Cry. And this word is used for a petition made to the king or any great personage.

SUIT AND SERVICE. When the tenant had professed himself to be the man of his superior or lord, the next consideration was concerning the service which, as such, he was bound to render for the land he held. This, in pure, proper, and original feuds, was only two-fold:—to follow or do suit to the lord in his courts in time of peace; and in his armies or warlike retinue, when necessity called him to the field. 2 Comm. 54. See Tenures.

SUIT OF COURT. That is, suit to the lord's court, is the service which the feodary tenant was bound to do at the lord's court. At first it was expressly mentioned in the grant how often these courts should be held. This appears by Fleta, lib. 2. c. 71. p. 14. Sometimes one or more, but never exceeding three, in a year. Thorn mentions two, viz. Michaelmas and Easter. But all the lord's tenants were not bound to attend his courts, but only those to whom their estates were granted upon that condition; every man was however bound to attend the sheriff's turn twice in every year. See Thorn. And if the inheritance, by reason whereof the tenant was bound to attend only at one court, did descend to co-heirs, he who had capitalem partem was bound to attend the lord's court both for himself and all his co-heirs. Comell.

None to be distrained for suit of court but they who are bound to it by charter or prescription. Joint-tenants and parceners shall make but one suit. The remedy against the lord distraining for it where it is not due, and against the tenant withholding it where it is due, stat. Marleb. 52 Hen. 3. c. 9. This is not taken away by the 12 Car. 2. c. 24. See Tenure.

SUIT OF THE KING'S PEACE. The pursuing a man for the breach of the peace. See stat. antiq. 6 Rich. 2. c. 1; 5 Hen. 4. c. 15; and post, tit. Surety of the Peace.

SUIT-SILVER. A small rent or sum of money paid in some manors to excuse the appearance of freeholders at the courts of their lords.

SULCUS-AQUÆ. A little brook or stream of water, otherwise called sike, and in Essex a doke. Paroch. Antiq. 531.

SULLERY, from the Sax. sulth, aratrum.] A plough-land. 1 Inst. 5.

SULLINGA. See Swoling.

SUMAGE. Toll for carriage on horseback. Chart de Forest, c. 14; Crompt. Juris. 191.

SUMMARY, summarium.] An abridgment. Law Lat. Dict.

SUMMARY ACTIONS. In Scotch law, such as are brought into court, not by summons, but by petition. So in the English courts there are certain summary proceedings by motions; and in both countries the practitioners of the court are the special objects of such mode of administering justice.

SUMMARY CONVICTIONS. See Conviction, Justices.

SUMMER-HUS-SILVER. A payment to the lords of the wood in the Wealds of Kent, who used to visit those places in summer-time, when their under-tenants were bound to prepare little summer-houses for their reception, or else pay a composition in money. Custom. de Sittingburn, MS.

SUMMONEAS. A writ judicial of great diversity, according to the divers cases wherein it is used. Tabl. Reg. Judio. See Process.

SUMMONERS, summonitores.] Petty officers that cite and warn men to appear in any court; and these ought to be boni homines, &c. Fleta, lib. 4. The summonitores were properly the apparitors who warned in delinquents at a certain time and place to answer any charge or complaint exhibited against them; and in citations from a superior court they were to be equals of the party cited; at least the barons were to be summoned by none under the degree of knights. Paroch. Antiq. 177. See Process.

SUMMONITORES SCACCARII. Officers who assisted in collecting the king's revenues by citing the defaulters therein into the Court of Exchequer.

SUMMONS, summonitio.] In the English law, is as much as vocatio in jus, or citatio among the civilians. Fleta, lib. 6. c. 6. See further, Process.

By a rule of T. T. 4 Wm. 4. hereafter it shall not be necessary to issue more than two summonses for attendance before a judge upon the same matter; and the party taking out such summonses shall be entitled to an order on the return of the second summons, unless cause is shown to the contrary.

SUMMONS, in Scotland, is a writ under the king's signet, containing the grounds of the action, and a warrant for citing the defendant, directed to messengers at arms as sheriffs in that behalf.

SUMMONSES AND SEVERANCE. This title is distinguished in the books by the name of summons and severance; but the proper name is severance; for the summons is only a process, which must, in certain cases, issue before judgment of severance can be given. 4 New Abr. 660. Severance is a judgment, by which, where two or more are joined in an action, one or more of these is unable to proceed in such action without the other or others. 4 New Abr. 660. See Severance.

It is a principle of law, where two or more have a joint right to a thing, they must join in an action for the recovery thereof. 4 New Abr. 660. Joint-tenants must implead jointly, for they claim under one and the same title. 1 Inst. 180. So parceners, who make but one heir, must, in order to recover the possession of their ancestor, be joined in procipe. 1 Inst. 163, 164. So executors, because the right of their testator devolves on all of them, must likewise all join in an action for the recovery thereof. Salk. 3; Carth. 61.

And wherever the right of action is in two or more persons, and they have not all joined in any action that is brought, the defendant may plead in abatement: for if one could recover in such case singly, every other might do the same; and by this means a defendant would be liable to answer in divers actions for the same thing. Cro. Eliz. 554; 3 Rep. 57; Salk. 3, 32; 2 Lev. 113; 3 Lev. 354; 1 Mod. 102. See Abatement.

It is indeed in the power of any one or more, where two or more have a joint right of action, to commence a suit in the name of all whose such right is; but, notwithstanding that a plea in abatement would be thereby prevented, it would still be in the power of any one of them, by neglecting to appear, or refusing to proceed afterwards in such suit, to render it fruitless. 1 Inst. 139; Bro. Summ. & Sev. pl. 17. For if two or more join in bringing an action, and one makes default, the nonsuit of him is the nonsuit of them all. Bro. Summ. & Sev. pl. 5, 7. So, if divers join in a writ of error, the assignment of errors cannot be by one without the others. Cro. Eliz. 192.

To prevent the great inconvenience, and the failure of justice, which would be, if persons, in whom there is a joint right of action, should be precluded, by the negligence or collusion of any one of them, from having the effect of a suit for the recovery of such right; the law has provided, that if any one of those persons, in whose name a joint action is commenced, does not appear, or after appearance makes default, the other or others may have judgment ad sequendum solum, or, in other words, a judgment of severance. Hard. 48; Bro. Summ. & Sev. pl. 4, 16. And see ib. pl. 18; F. N. B. 128; 1 Inst. 139.

The consequence of this judgment is, that, notwithstanding the severance of one or more who did not appear, or who made default, the other plaintiff or plaintiffs in the action may proceed in the suit. 4 New Abr. 661.

Where two or more are plaintiffs in an action, and one of these has not appeared, he must be summoned before judgment of severance can be given against him: for it is a general rule, that a nonsuit is in no case peremptory but on appearance, because a writ may have been purchased in the plaintiff's name without his privity. 1 Inst. 139; Bro. Summ. & Sev. pl. 10; 2 Roll. Abr. 488.

But if two joint plaintiffs have both appeared, and afterwards one makes default, the court may, without issuing any summons, immediately give judgment of severance. Bro. Summ. & Sev. pl. 10; 10 Rep. 135; Hard. 317.

No judgment of severance can be given in a writ of error.

unless it is prayed before the defendant has pleaded in nullo est erratum. Cro. Jac. 117. But such judgment may be after joinder in the assignment of error. 2 Ld. Pr. Reg. 663.

For more learning on this subject, see Vin. Abr. tit. Summons and Severance; and ante, Abatement, Error, &c.

SUMMONS TO PARLIAMENT. See Parliament.

SUMMONS TO WARRANT, summons ad warrantandum.] The process whereby the vouches in a common recovery was called. Co. Litt. 101. See Recovery.

SUMPTUARY LAWS, sumptuaria lex, from sumptuarius, of or belonging to expenses.] Are laws made to restrain excess in apparel, and prohibit costly clothes, of which heretofore we had many in England; but they are all repealed by 1 Jac. 1. c. 25; 3 Inst. 149. See Lawry.

SUNDAY, Dies Domestica.] The Lord's Day; set apart for the service of God, to be kept religiously, and not be profaned.

Profanation of the Lord's Day, vulgarly (but improperly, called Sabbath-breaking, is classed by Blackstone amongst offences against God and religion, punished by the laws of England. For, besides the notorious indecency and scandal of permitting any secular business to be publicly transacted on that day, in a country professing Christianity, and the corruption of morals which usually follows its profanation, the keeping one day in seven holy, as a time of relaxation and refreshment, as well as for public worship, is of admirable service to a state, considered merely as a civil institution. The laws of king Athelstan forbade all merchandizing on the Lord's Day, under very severe penalties. And by the 27 Hen. 6. c. 5, no fair or market shall be held on the principal festivals, Good Friday, or any Sunday, (except the four Sundays in harvest,) on pain of forfeiting the goods exposed to sale. And by the 1 Car. 1. c. 1, no person shall assemble, out of their own parishes, for any sport whatsoever, upon this day; nor, in their parishes, shall use any bull or bear-baiting, interludes, plays, or other unlawful exercises, or pastimes, on pain that every offender shall pay 3s. 4d. to the poor. This statute does not prohibit, but rather impliedly allows, any innocent recreation or amusement, within their respective parishes, even on the Lord's Day, after divine service is over.

By the 3 Car. 1. c. 2, no carrier with any horse, nor wagoner, nor carmen, nor wainmen with their respective carriages, nor drovers with any cattle shall travel on the Lord's Day, on pain of 20s. And if any butcher shall kill or sell any victual on the Lord's Day he forfeits 6s. 8d.

Travelling by stage coaches on Sunday is not unlawful within the 3 Car. 1. and 29 Car. 2. 7 B. & C. 96. But attis, as to the driver of a van travelling from London to York, for he is a carrier within the 3 Car. 1. c. 4. 9 B. & C. 164.

And by 29 Car. 2. c. 7, no person is allowed to do any worldly labour on the Lord's Day, (except works of necessity and charity,) or to use any boat or barge (see post), or expose any goods to sale; except meat in public houses, and milk before nine in the morning, and after four in the afternoon, on forfeiture of 5s.

The goods exposed to sale on a Sunday, to be forfeited to the poor, &c. on conviction before a justice of the peace, who may order the penalties and forfeitures to be levied by distress, and may allow one third to the informer: but this is not to extend to dressing meat in families, inns, cook-shops, (but see post), or victualling houses.

By the 1 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 75. § 1, so much of the 29 Car. 2. c. 7, as prevents travelling by water on a Sunday is repealed. And by § 42, the court of assistants of the Waterman's Company may appoint any number of watermen to ply on the Thames at and between Chelsea and Bow Creek: and by § 47, 49, the justices at Gravesend may grant a similar license. Persons plying without a license by § 50, forfeit 5l.

Mackarel may be sold on Sundays, before and after divine service, 10 & 11 Wm. 3. c. 24. Fish carriages are allowed to travel on Sundays, either laden or returning empty, 2 Geo. 3. c. 15.

Bakers were permitted to dress dinners on a Sunday, as a work of necessity. 5 T. R. 419. But, by the 34 Geo. 3. c. 61, every baker shall be subject to a penalty of 10s. to the use of the poor, for exercising his business in any manner as a baker on the Lord's Day: except that he may sell bread between nine in the morning and one in the afternoon; and may also, within that time, bake meat, puddings, and pies for any person who shall carry or send the same to be baked.

And by the 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 50. § 11, no baker out of the city of London, and beyond the bills of mortality, and ten miles of the Royal Exchange, shall on a Sunday make or bake any bread, rolls, or cakes of any sort or kind, or shall sell or expose the same to sale, except to travellers, or in cases of urgent necessity; or bake or deliver any victuals after half past one o'clock in the afternoon, or in any other manner exercise his trade or calling. And no victuals shall be brought to or taken from any bakehouse during divine service, nor within one quarter of an hour of the commencement thereof. Any offender may be convicted before one justice, within two days from the commission of the offence, on proof by one witness; and is liable for the first offence to the penalty of 5s., for the second offence 10s., and for the third and every subsequent offence 20s., besides costs: to be paid to the prosecutor, with such part of the penalty as the magistrate shall think proper for the loss of time, at a rate not exceeding 3s. per diem, and the residue to the churchwardens or overseers of the parish where the offence is committed, for the use of the poor.

And see the 3 Geo. 4. c. 106, (a local act) containing regulations, somewhat different from the above, as to bakers within the city of London and ten miles of the Royal Exchange.

By 21 Geo. 3. c. 49, passed to restrain an indecent practice which had become very prevalent, it is enacted, that any house or place opened for public entertainment, or for publicly debating on any subject, upon the Lord's Day, and to which persons shall be admitted by money or tickets sold, shall be deemed a disorderly house. And the keeper (or person acting as such) shall forfeit 200l. and be punished as in the case of keeping a disorderly house. And the person managing such entertainment, or acting as president, &c. of any public debate, shall forfeit 100l. And every servant receiving money or tickets from the the persons coming, or delivering out tickets of admission, shall forfeit 50l. § 1, 2. And every person advertising, or printing an advertisement of such meeting, shall also forfeit 50l. Actions to be brought within six months. § 5.

An indictment for exercising the trade of a butcher must be laid to be contra formam statuti; for it was no offence at common law. 1 Strange, 702.

Persons exercising their calling on a Sunday are only subject to one penalty; for the whole is but one offence, or one act of exercising, though continued the whole day. Comp. 640.

Law processes are not to be served on Sunday, unless it be in cases of treason or felony; or on an escape, by virtue of 5 Ann. c. 9. See Escape. Sunday is not a day in law for proceedings, contracts, &c.

And hence it is, that a sale of goods on this day in a market overt is not good: and if any part of the proceedings of a suit, in any court of justice, be entered and recorded to be done on a Sunday, it makes it all void. 2 Inst. 264; 3 Shep. Abr. 181.

The service of a citation on a Sunday is good, and not restrained by the 29 Car. 2. c. 7. And, by two judges, the delivery of a declaration upon a Sunday may be well enough, it not being a process; but Holt, Ch. J. thought it ill, because the act intended to restrain all sorts of legal proceedings. 1 Ld. Raym. 706. Service, on a Sunday, of notice of plea filed is void. 8 East, 547. A writ of inquiry cannot be executed on a Sunday. 1 Str. 387. See Arrest, Process, &c.

It has been determined that an action would not lie on a contract entered into on a Sunday, though entered into by an agent, and though the objection was taken by the party at whose request the contract was made. 4 Bingh. 84. But in a subsequent case the price of goods bought on a Sunday was held to be recoverable, the defendant having kept them and subsequently promised to pay for them. 6 Bingh. 653.

The hiring of a labourer by a farmer on Sunday was held not to be prohibited by 29 Car. 2. c. 7. § 5; and such hiring for a year and service under it therefore conferred a settlement. The statute only applies to labour, business, or work done in the exercise of a man's ordinary calling. 7 B. & C. 573.

A horsedealer cannot maintain an action on a warranty of a horse made on a Sunday; 5 B. & C. 406; but the statutes are not violated by a person who makes a bargain for a horse with a horsedealer on a Sunday not knowing he is a horsedealer, for the dealer only is exercising his ordinary calling. 3 B. & C. 232; 1 Taunt. 131. See further, Holy-days.

SUPERCARGO. A person employed by merchants to go a voyage, and oversee their cargo, and dispose of it to the best advantage. Merch. Dict.

SUPERIOR. The grantor of a feudal right to be held of himself. Scotch Law Dict. See Tenures.

SUPER-INSTITUTION, super-institutio.] One institution upon another; as where A. B. is admitted and instituted to a benefice upon one title, and C. D. is admitted and instituted on the title or presentment of another. 2 Cro. 463. See Institution.

SUPER-JURARE. A term used in our ancient law, when a criminal endeavoured to excuse himself by his own oath, or the oath of one or two witnesses, and the crime objected against him was so plain and notorious, that he was convicted by the oaths of many more witnesses. This was called super jurare. Leg. Hen. 1. 74; Leg. Athelstan. c. 15.

SUPERONERATIONE PASTURÆ. A judicial writ that lies against him who is impleaded in the county court for the surcharging or overburdening a common with his cattle, in a case where he was formerly impleaded for it in the same court, and the cause is removed into one of the courts at Westminster. Reg. Judic. See Common, III.

SUPER PRÆROGATIVA REGIS. A writ which formerly lay against the king's tenant's widow for marrying without the king's license. F. N. B. 174.

SUPERSEDEAS. A writ that lies in a great many cases; and signifies in general a command to stay some ordinary proceedings at law, on good cause shown, which ought otherwise to proceed. F. N. B. 236.

A supersedeas is used for the staying of an execution, after a writ of error is allowed, and bail put in: but no supersedeas can be made out on bringing writ of error, till bail is given, where there is judgment upon verdict, or by default, in debt. 3 Jac. 1. c. 8. Nor in actions for tithes, promises for payment of money, trover, covenant, detinue, and trespass. 12 Car. 2. st. 2. c. 2. And execution shall not be staid in any judgment after verdict (except in the case of executors) by writ of error or supersedeas thereon, unless bail be put in. 16 & 17 Car. 2. c. 8. § 3. See Error, Introductio & II. 2.

A writ of error is said to be in judgment of law a supersedeas, until the errors are examined, &c. that is to the execution; not to action of debt on the judgment at law. From the time of the allowance, a writ of error is a supersedeas; and if the party had notice of it before the allowance, it is a supersedeas from the time of such notice; but this must be where execution is not executed, or begun to be executed. Cro. Jac. 524; Raym. 100; Mod. Ca. 130; 1 Salk. 321.

Where a first writ of error abates, or is put an end to by the act of the plaintiff in error, a second writ of error brought in the same court is not a supersedeas of execution as the first; and execution may then be sued out without leave of the court. But in error of matter of fact coram vobis, which is not within the statutes requiring bail in error, the writ of error is or is not a supersedeas according to circumstances; and the court must be moved for leave to sue out execution pending it. 8 East. 412.

If, before execution, the defendant bring a writ of error, and the sheriff will execute a feri facias and levy the money, the court will award a supersedeas, quia erroneè emanavit, and to have restitution of the money. Stile. 114. After an execution, there was a supersedeas, quia executio improvidè emanavit, &c. issued, and there being no clause of restitution in the supersedeas, it was insisted that the execution was executed before the supersedeas awarded, and that a faulty supersedeas is no supersedeas; but the court ordered another supersedeas, with a clause of restitution. Moor. 465.

The supersedeas, quia erroneè emanavit, lies to restore a possession, after an habere facias seisinam, when sued out erroneously; so of a supersedeas after execution upon a capias ad satisfaciend. if it be immediately delivered to the sheriff. Jenk. Cent. 58. 92. It appearing, upon affidavit, that there were two writs of execution executed upon one judgment; the party moved for a supersedeas, because there cannot be two such executions, but where the plaintiff is hindered either by the death of the defendant, or by some act in law, that he can have no benefit of the first; and so it was adjudged. Stile. 255. A supersedeas is grantable to a sheriff to stay the return of an habeas corpora, and if he return it afterwards, and the parties proceed to trial, it is error; and so are all the proceedings in an inferior court, after an habeas corpora delivered, unless a procedendo is awarded, in which case a supersedeas is not to be granted. Cro. Car. 43. 350.

When a certiorari is delivered, it is a supersedeas to infer it courts below; and being allowed, all their proceedings afterwards are erroneous; and they may be punished. If a sheriff holds plea of 40s. debt in his county court, the defendant may sue forth a supersedeas, that he do not proceed, &c. On after judgment, he may have a supersedeas directed to the sheriff, requiring him not to award execution upon such judgment; and upon that an alias, a pluries, and an attachment &c. New Nat. Br. 432. See Certiorari.

Supersedeas may be granted by the court for setting aside an erroneous judicial process, &c. Also a prisoner may be discharged by supersedeas; as a person is imprisoned by the king's writ, so he is to be set at liberty: and a supersedeas is as good a cause to discharge a person, as the first process is to arrest him. Finch. 453; Cro. Jac. 379. If a privileged person is sued in any jurisdiction foreign to his privilege, he may bring his supersedeas. Taugh. 153.

There is a supersedeas where an audita querela is sued; and out of the Chancery, to set a person at liberty, taken upon an exigent, on giving security to appear, &c. And in cases of surety of the peace and good behaviour, where a person is already bound to the peace in the Chancery, &c. New Nat. Br. 524. 529. 532. So where a warrant issues against a man on an indictment found against him, for a misdemeanor, or other bailable offence, and he, having notice of it, does, before caption, duly put in bail, to appear and traverse the indictment, &c. he is entitled to a supersedeas, to prevent a caption.

It is false imprisonment to detain a man in custody after a supersedeas delivered, for the supersedeas is to be obeyed, and in such case it is a new caption without any cause. 2 Cro. 379.

SUPERSEDERE, in Scotch law. A private agreement among creditors to supersede proceedings against the person of a bankrupt, or other debtor.

SUPERSTITIOUS USES. See Mortmain, Uses.

SUPERVISOR, [Lat.] A surveyor or overseer: it was formerly a custom, in cases of great concern, to make a supervisor of a will, to supersede and oversee the executors that they punctually performed the will of the testator; but this office was so very carelessly executed, as to be to little purpose or use, and it is now obsolete.

Supervisor (now surveyor) of the highways is mentioned in the 5 Eliz. c. 13. See Ways.

SUPPLEMENT, Letters of, in Scotch law. Where a party is sued before an inferior court, and does not reside within its jurisdiction, these letters are obtained on a warrant from the court of session, and on these the party may be cited to appear before the inferior judge. These letters, in the king's name, recite the ground of action, and the reason why it should proceed before the inferior judge, and contain a warrant to messengers at arms, as sheriff's in that behalf, ordering them to cite the defendant. Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

SUPPLEMENTAL BILL IN EQUITY. A suit in equity, imperfect in its frame, (or become so by accident, before its end has been obtained,) may in certain cases be rendered perfect by a new bill, which is not considered as an original bill, but merely as an addition to, or continuance of, the former bill, or both. A bill of this kind may be, 1st, A supplemental bill, which is merely an addition to the original bill. 2d. A bill of revivor, which is a continuance of the original bill: see Revivor. 3d. A bill both of revivor and supplement, which continues a suit upon abatement, and supplies defects arisen from some event subsequent to the institution of the suit. Mitford's Treatise on Chanc. Plead. 33. And see further, p. 59—67.

If the interest of a plaintiff or defendant suing, or defending in his own right, wholly determines, and the same property becomes vested in another person, not claiming under him,—as in the case of an ecclesiastical person succeeding to a benefice, or a remainder-man in a settlement becoming entitled upon the death of a prior tenant under the same settlement,—the suit cannot be continued by bill of revivor (see that title); nor can its defects be supplied by a supplemental bill. For though the successor in the first case, and the remainder-man in the second, have the same property which the predecessor or prior tenant enjoyed; yet they are not, in many cases, bound by his acts, nor have they, in some cases, precisely the same rights: but in general, by an original bill, in the nature of a supplemental bill, the benefit of the former proceedings may be obtained. If the party, whose interest is thus determined, was not the sole plaintiff or defendant, or if the property, which occasions a bill of this nature, affects only part of a suit, the bill as to the other parties, and as to the rest of the suit, is supplemental merely. There seems to be this difference between an original bill in the nature of a bill of revivor, and an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill: upon the first, the benefit of the former proceedings is absolutely obtained, so that the pleadings in the first cause, and the depositions of witnesses, if any have been taken, may be used in the same manner as if filed or taken in the second cause; and if any decree has been made in the first cause, the same decree shall be made in the second: but, in the other case, a new defence may be made; the pleadings and depositions cannot be used in the same manner as if filed or taken in the same cause; and the decree, if any has been obtained, is no otherwise of advantage, than as it may be an inducement to the court to make a similar decree. Mitford's Treatise, 67, 68. and the authorities there cited; and see Revivor.

A supplemental bill must state the original bill and the proceedings thereon; and if it is occasioned by an event subsequent to the original bill, it must state that event, and the consequent alteration with respect to the parties, and in general the supplemental bill must pray, that all the defendants may appear and answer to the charges it contains. For as the supplemental bill is not for a discovery merely, the cause must be heard upon it at the same time that it is heard on the original bill, if it has not been before heard: and if the cause has been before heard, it must be further heard upon the supplemental matter. If, indeed, the alteration or acquisition of interest happens to a defendant, or a person necessary to be made a defendant, the supplemental bill may be exhibited by the plaintiff in the original suit against such person alone, and may pray a decree upon the particular supplemental matter alleged against that person only; unless, which is frequently the case, the interest of other defendants may be affected by that decree. Where a supplemental bill is merely for the purpose of bringing formal parties before the court as defendants, the parties defendants to the original bill need not in any case be made parties to the supplemental bill. Mitford's Treatise, 69, 70.

A bill in the nature of a supplemental bill, in the cases abovementioned, must state the original bill, the proceedings upon it, the event which has determined the interest of the party by or against whom the former bill was exhibited, and the manner in which the property has vested in the person become entitled. It must then show the ground upon which the court ought to grant the benefits of the former suit to or against the person so become entitled; and pray the decree of the court adapted to the case of the plaintiff in the new bill. This bill, though partaking of the nature of a supplemental bill, is not an addition to the original bill, but another original bill, which, in its consequences, may draw to itself the advantage of the proceedings on the former bill. Mitford's Treatise, 90.

SUPPLETORY OATH. See 3 Comm. 270; and Evidence.

SUPPLICAVIT. A writ issuing out of Chancery, for taking surety of the peace, upon articles filed on oath, when one is in danger of being hurt in his body by another; it is directed to the justices of the peace and sheriff of the county, and is grounded upon the 1 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 16. which ordains that certain persons shall be assigned by the chancellor to take care of the peace, &c. F. N. B. 80, 81.

When a man hath purchased a writ of supplicavit, directed to the justices of the peace, against any person, then he, against whom the writ is sued, may come into the Chancery, and there find sureties that he will not do hurt or damage unto him that sueth the writ; and upon that he shall have a writ of superseasus, directed to the justices, &c. reciting his having found sureties in Chancery, according to the writ of supplicavit: and also reciting that writ, and the manner of the security that he hath found, &c. commanding the justices, that they cease to arrest him, or to compel him to find sureties, &c. And if the party who ought to find sureties cannot come into the Chancery to find sureties, his friend may sue a superseasus in Chancery for him; reciting the writ of supplicavit, and that such a one and such a one are bound for him in the Chancery in such a sum, that he shall keep the peace according to it; and the writ shall be directed to the justices, that they take surety of the party himself according to the supplicavit, to keep the peace, &c. and that they do not arrest him; or, if they have arrested him for that cause, that they deliver him. New Nat. Br. 180.

Sometimes the writ of supplicavit is made returnable into the Chancery at a certain day; and if so, and the justices do not certify the writ, nor the recognizance, and the security taken, the party who sued the supplicavit shall have a writ of certiorari directed unto the justices of peace to certify the writ of supplicavit, and what they have done thereupon, and the security found, &c. New N. B. 180. If a recognizance of the peace be taken in pursuance of a writ of supplicavit, it must be wholly governed by the directions of such writ; but if it be taken before a justice of peace below, the recognizance may be at the discretion of such justice. Lamb. 100; Dalt. c. 70.

At the common law it was sufficient, in order to obtain this process for surety of the peace from the court of Chancery, if the party who demanded it made oath, that he was in fear of some corporal hurt, and that he did not crave the same out of malice, but for the safety of his body. F. N. B. 79, 80.

But by 21 Jac. 1. c. 8. all process of the peace shall be void, unless granted on motion in open court on affidavit in writing.

When articles of the peace are exhibited in the Court of Chancery, and oath is made that the surety of the peace is not craved by the party through malice, but for the safety of his life, a writ of supplicavit issues, directed to the justices of the peace generally, or to some one justice of the peace, or to the sheriff, commanding them or him to take security in the sum thereon indorsed, and, if the party refuses to find such security, to commit him to the next gaol until he does find such security. F. N. B. 80. Vide Bro. Off. pl. 39; F. N. B. 81; Bro. Peace, pl. 9; Lamb. 101, 107.

If there be no proceedings on a supplicavit within a year, the recognizance is of course discharged; and if the party be committed after the expiration of that time, he shall be discharged upon very slight security. Fitz. 268. If taken below, and the party appear pursuant to the condition, no indictment being lodged, he must be discharged. Hardw. Ca. But the court in its discretion may refuse to discharge a recognizance, even though the exhibitant appear and consent; for a breach against any other person is equally a forfeiture. 11 Mod. 109. SUPPLY, Commissioners of, in Scotland. Persons appointed to levy the land-tax within the county for which they are named. See Land Tax.

SUPREMACY. Sovereign dominion, authority, and pre-eminence; the highest estate. King Henry VIII. was the first prince that shook off the yoke of Rome here in England, and settled the supremacy in himself, after it had been long held by the pope. See 25 Hen. 8. c. 19, 20; 26 Hen. 8. c. 1; 1 Eliz. c. 1. By these laws the great power of Rome was suppressed; and the act of 1 Eliz., Sir Edward Coke says, was an act of restitution of the ancient jurisdiction ecclesiastical, which always belonged of right to the crown of England; and that it was not introductory of a new law, but declaratory of the old; and that which was, or of right ought to be, by the fundamental laws of this realm, parcel of the king's jurisdiction; by which laws the king, as supreme head, had full and entire power in all causes ecclesiastical as well as temporal and as, in temporal causes, the king doth judge by his judges in the courts of justice, by the temporal laws of England; so, in causes ecclesiastical, they are to be determined by the judges thereof, according to the king's ecclesiastical laws. 5 Rep. 9; Cumfrey's case. And in this case it was resolved by all the judges, that, by our ancient laws, this kingdom is an absolute empire and monarchy; consisting of one head, which is the king, and of a body politic, made up of many well agreeing members; all which the law divides into two several parts, the clergy and the laity, both of them immediately, under God, subject and obedient to the head. And the kingly head of this politic body is furnished with prerogative and jurisdiction, to render justice and right to every part and member of this body, of what estate or degree soever; otherwise he would not be at the head of the whole. 5 Rep. 8.

There are several instances of ecclesiastical jurisdiction exercised by the kings of England in former ages; and, in this respect, the king is said to be persona mixta et unita cum sacerdotibus. The king is the supreme ordinary, and by the ancient laws of the land might, without any act of parliament, make ordinances for the government of the clergy; and if there be a controversy between spiritual persons concerning jurisdiction, the king is arbitrator, and it is a right of his crown to declare their bounds, &c. Moor, 755. 1043; Hob. 17.

SURETY OF THE PEACE,

AND GOOD BEHAVIOUR.

[SECURITAS PACIS.] Either because the party who was in fear is thereby secured; or for that the suspected party gives such security.

- I. What this Security is.
- II. Who may take or demand it.

1. As relates both to the Peace and good Behaviour.
2. As to the Peace only.
3. As to good Behaviour, or good Abearance only; which includes Security for the Peace and somewhat more.

III. How it may be forfeited; or discharged.

1. As to both Peace and good Behaviour.
2. As to the Peace.
3. As to the good Behaviour.

I. This is considered by Blackstone as a species of preventive justice; by obliging persons, whom there is a probable ground to suspect of future misbehaviour, to stipulate with, and to give full assurance to the public, that such offence as is apprehended from them shall not happen through the means of pledges or sureties for keeping the peace, or for their good behaviour. 4 Comm. c. 18.

By the Saxon constitution these sureties were always at hand, by means of King Alfred's wise institution of accennaries or frankpledges; wherein the whole neighbour hood or tithing of freemen were mutually pledges for each other's good behaviour. But this great and general security being now fallen into disuse, and neglected, there hath succeeded to it the method of making suspected persons find particular and special securities for their future conduct; of which we find mention in the laws of King Edward the Confessor "tradat fidejussores de pace et legalitate tuenda," cap. 18.

This security, therefore, at present consists in being bound with one or more sureties, in a recognizance or obligation to the king, entered on record, and taken in some court, or by some judicial officer; whereby the parties acknowledge themselves to be indebted to the crown in the sum required (for instance 10 l.) with condition to be void and of no effect, if the party shall appear in court on such a day, and in the mean time shall keep the peace; either generally towards the king and all his liege people; or particular also, with regard to the person who craves the security. Or, if it be for the good behaviour, then on condition that he shall demean and behave himself well, (or be of good behaviour,) either generally or specially for the time therein limited, as for one or more years, or for life. This recognizance, if taken by a justice of the peace, must be certified to the next sessions, in pursuance of the 3 Hen. 7. c. 1. and if the condition of such recognizance be broken, by any breach of the peace in the one case, or any misbehaviour in the other, the recognizance becomes forfeited or absolute; and being estreated or extracted. (taken out from among the other records,) and sent up to the exchequer, the party and his sureties, having now become the king's absolute debtors, are sued for the several sums in which they are respectively bound. 4 Comm. c. 8.

II. 1. ANY justices of the peace, by virtue of their commission, or those who are ex officio conservators of the peace, may demand such security according to their own discretion. But a secretary of state or privy councillor are not, ex officio, such conservators, and therefore they cannot bind to the peace or good behaviour. 11 State Tri. 317. Or it may be granted at the request of any subject, upon due cause shown, provided such demandant be under the king's protection: for which reason it has been formerly doubted whether Jews, Pagans, or persons convicted of a premeditation, were entitled thereto. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. § 3. Or if the justice is averse to act, it may be granted by a mandatory writ called a supplicavit, issuing out of the Court of King's Bench or Chancery, which will compel the justice to act as a ministerial and not as a judicial officer; and he must make a return to such writ, specifying his compliance, under his hand and seal. F. N. B. 80; 2 P. Wms. 202. See Supplicavit. But this writ is seldom used; for when application is made to the superior courts, they usually take recognizances there, under the directions of the 21 Jac. 1. c. 8. And indeed a peer or peeress cannot be bound over in any other place than the Courts of King's Bench or Chancery, though a justice of the peace has a power to require sureties of any other person, being non nobis, and under the de facto of nobility whether he be a fellow justice or other magistrate, or whether he be merely a private man. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. § 5. Wives may demand it against their husbands (so peeresses against their lords), or husbands, if accessory against their wives. But from courts and infants to be brought to find security by their friends only, and not to be bound themselves; for they are incapable of engaging themselves to answer any debt, which is the nature of these recognizances or acknowledgment. See Recognizance; 4 Comm. 27, 28.

If the person against whom it is demanded be present, the justice of the peace may commit him immediately, unless he offers sureties; and a fortiori he may be commanded to find sureties, and be committed for not doing it. Bro. Mainp. pl. 99; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. But if he is absent, a warrant for committing him cannot be granted till a warrant is issued commanding him to find sureties; and this warrant, which must be under seal, ought to show the cause for which it is granted, and at whose suit. Lamb. 85; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60.

The justice of the peace who grants this last-mentioned warrant may in this case make it special for bringing the party before himself only; for as he has most knowledge of the matter, he is best qualified to do justice in it. 5 Co. 89; Foster's case; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. But if the warrant be in general terms to carry the party before any justice of the peace, the officer who executes it has his election to carry him before what justice he pleases, and carry him to gaol by virtue of the same warrant, if he refuses to find sureties before such justice; for the warrant has these words in it, 'if he shall refuse to find surety,' &c. Bro. False Imprisonment, pl. 11; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60; 5 Co. 59.

If once, however, who apprehends that the surety of the peace will be demanded against him, finds sureties before any justice of the peace of the same county, either before or after a warrant is issued against him, he may have a su-

persecede from such justice; and this shall prevent or discharge him from an arrest under the warrant of any other justice, at the suit of the same party for whose security he has found such sureties. Lamb. 95, 96; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60.

The recognizance for keeping the peace, which a justice of the peace takes upon complaint below, is to be regulated as to the number and sufficiency of the sureties, the largeness of the sum, and the time it is to continue in force, by the discretion of such justice. Lamb. 100; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. It has been said that a recognizance taken by a justice of peace, to keep the peace as to A. B. for a year, or for life, or without expressing any certain time, which shall be intended to be for life, although no time or place is fixed for the party's appearance, or he is not bound to keep the peace as to all the king's liege people, is good. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60; Lamb. 100. But it seems to be the safest way to bind the party to appear at the next sessions of the peace, and in the mean time to keep the peace as to the king and all his liege people, and especially as to the party who has demanded the surety of the peace. Lamb. 105; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. However it is settled by a modern case, that a justice of the peace is authorized to require surety of the peace for a limited time, according to his discretion, and is not obliged to bind over the party to appear at the next sessions. 2 B. & A. 278.

If one of the sureties of a man who is bound to keep the peace, dies, he shall not be obliged to find a new surety, for the execution of the recognizance of his wife is deemed to be bound by the recognizance. Lamb. 119; Bro. Peace, pl. 17; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60.

2. ANY justice of the peace may, ex officio, bind all those to keep the peace who in his presence make any affray, or threaten to kill or beat another, or contend together with hot and angry words, or go about with unusual weapons or attendance, to the terror of the people, and all such as he knows to be common barrators, and such as are brought before him by the constable for a breach of the peace in his presence, and all such persons as having been before bound to the peace, have broken it and forfeited their recognizances. Also whenever any private man hath just cause to fear that another will burn his house, or do him a corporal injury, by killing, imprisoning, or beating him, or that he will procure others so to do, he may demand surety of the peace against such person. And every justice of the peace is bound to grant it, if he who demands it will make oath that he is actually under fear of death or bodily harm, and will show that he has just cause to be so, by reason of the other's menaces, attempts, or having lain in wait for him; and will also further swear that he does not require such surety out of malice or for mere vexation: this is called swearing the peace against another; and if the party does not find such sureties as the justice in his discretion shall require, he may immediately be committed till he does. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60.

Surety of the peace may be demanded by a wife, if her husband gives her unreasonable correction. Moore, 874; Godb. 215; F. N. B. 80. Surety of the peace ought not to be granted to a man for fear of danger to his servant or cattle. Lamb. 83. It hath however been said, that a man may have the surety of the peace against one who threatens to hurt his wife or child. Dalt. 266. The surety of the peace ought not to be granted for any past battery, unless there is a fear of some present or future danger. But the offender must in such case be punished by action of indictment. Dalt. 266. The demand of the surety of the peace ought to be soon after the cause of fear; for the suffering much time to pass before it is demanded, shows that the party has been under no great terror. 6 Mod. 132.

It is said the fear of one cannot be the fear of another, and therefore every recognizance must be separated. But in Mich. 23 Geo. 2. B. R., the court allowed three women to file joint articles of the peace against three men. Res v. Nettle, cited 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. § 5, Leach's note. Although the fact from which the fear arises be pardoned, the Court of King's Bench will receive it as a ground to grant the security upon. Stra. 473.

At the common law the oath of the party was a sufficient ground for the Court of King's Bench to grant the surety of the peace; but this cannot be done since the 21 Jac. 1. c. 8, unless articles of the peace are exhibited in court, upon motion in open court. F. N. B. 79, 80.

Where articles of peace are exhibited in the Court of King's Bench, and oath is made that the party does not crave the security of the peace out of hatred or malice, but merely for the preservation of his life and person from danger, an attachment of the peace issues to the sheriff, commanding him to take bond for the appearance of the party at the return of the writ, to put in bail to the articles in this court, and if such bond is not given, to commit the party to the next gaol. Comb. 427, Russell's case; F. N. B. 79. Where the party against whom articles of the peace are exhibited, comes into court to put in bail, the articles must be read to him. 6 Mod. 132. An affirmation is not sufficient on which to grant surety of the peace. Stra. 527; 12 Mod. 243.

The court will not permit the truth of the allegations to be controverted by the defendant, but will order security to be taken immediately, if no objections arise upon the face of the articles themselves. Stra. 1202. But if on application for the assistance of the court to enforce the subsequent process, the articles should manifestly appear, from the corroborated affidavit of the defendant, to have been a malicious, voluntary, and gross perjury, the court will resist the application, and commit the offender. 2 Burr. 806; 3 Burr. 1922.

If a defendant, through infirmity of age or sickness, be unable to attend the court, a mandamus will be granted to the justices in the country, to take such security. See Stra. 835; Comb. 427.

The court will not receive articles of the peace, if the parties live at a distance in the country, unless they have previously made application to a justice in the neighbourhood. 2 Burr. 780. And if the court do receive them, the secondary may indorse the attachment in the form required, and order a justice of the county to take the security. 2 Burr. 1099; 1 Bla. 233.

When surety of the peace is granted by the Court of King's Bench, if a supersedeas comes from the Court of Chancery to the justices of that court, their power is at an end, and the party as to them discharged. Bro. Peace, pl. 17.

3. Justices of peace are empowered by the 34 Edw. 3. c. 1. to bind over to the good behaviour towards the king and his people all them that be not of good fame, wherever they be found, to the intent that the people be not troubled or endangered, nor the peace diminished, nor merchants and others passing by the highways of the realm, be disturbed nor put in the peril, which may happen by such offenders. Under the general words of this expression, that he be not of good fame, it is holden that a man may be bound to his good behaviour for causes of scandal contra bonos mores, as well as contra pacem; as for haunting bawdy-houses with women of bad fame, or for keeping such women in his own house, or for words tending to scandalize the government, or in abuse of the officers of justice, especially in the execution of their office. Thus also a justice may bind over all night-walkers, eaves-droppers, such as keep suspicious company, or are reported to be pilferers or robbers, such as sleep in the day and wake in the night, common drunkards, whore-masters, the putative fathers of bastards, cheats, idle vagabonds, and other persons whose misbehaviour may reasonably bring them within the general words of the statute, as persons not of good fame, an expression, it must be owned, of so great a latitude, as leaves much to be determined by the discretion of the magistrate himself. But if he commits a man for want of sureties, he must express the cause thereof with convenient certainty, and take care that such cause be a good one. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 61; 4 Comm. 256.

III. 1. A RECOGNIZANCE may be discharged, either by the demise of the king, to whom the recognizance is made, or by the death of the principal party bound thereby, if not before forfeited, or by order of the court to which such recognizance is certified by the justices (as the quarter sessions, assizes, or King's Bench,) if they see sufficient cause; or in case he at whose request it was granted, if granted upon a private account, will release it, or does not make his appearance to pray that it may be continued. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60.

2. Such recognizance for keeping the peace, when given, may be forfeited by any actual violence, or even an assault or menace to the person of him who demanded it, if it be a special recognizance; or if the recognizance be general, by any unlawful action whatsoever, that either is or tends to a breach of the peace; or more particularly by any one of the many species of offences against the public peace; or by any private violence committed against any of his majesty's subjects. But a bare trespass upon the lands or goods of another, which is a ground for a civil action, unless accompanied with a wilful breach of the peace, is no forfeiture of the recognizance. Neither are mere reproachful words, as calling a man a knave or liar, any breach of the peace, so as to forfeit one's recognizance (being looked upon to be merely the effect of unmeaning heat and passion), unless they amount to a challenge to fight. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60; 4 Comm. 255, 256.

By the 3 Hen. 7. c. 1. before mentioned, it is enacted, "that if the party who is called at a sessions of the peace, upon a recognizance of keeping the peace, makes default, his default shall be then and there recorded, and the same recognizance, with the record of the default, be sent and certified into the Chancery, or before the king in his Bench, or into the king's Exchequer."

He who is bound to keep the peace, and to appear at the sessions, must appear there and record his appearance, otherwise his recognizance is forfeited: and although the party who craved the surety of the peace comes not to pray that it may be continued, the justices may in their discretion order it to be continued till another sessions. Bro. Peace, pl. 17; Lamb. 109.

But if an excuse, which is judged by the court to be a reasonable one, is given for the non-appearance of a party, it seems that the court is not bound peremptorily to record his default, but may discharge the recognizance or respite till the next sessions. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. A recognizance for keeping the peace may be forfeited by any actual violence to the person of another, whether it be done by the party bound, or others by his procurement. Lamb. 116, 127; Bro. Peace, pl. 2; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. In support of a rule to stay proceedings in a scire facias upon a recognizance for keeping the peace, it was said that the assault, which had been made, was not upon him at whose request the surety of the peace was granted, but upon another person: it was held that this makes no difference, and the rule was discharged. MS. Rep. Rex v. Stanley and his bail, Trin. 27 Geo. 2. B. A recognizance for keeping the peace is not forfeited, when an officer, having a warrant against one who will not suffer himself to be arrested, beats or wounds him in the attempt to take him. Lamb. 128; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60.

So it is not forfeited, if a parent in a reasonable manner chastises his child; a master his servant, being actually in his service at the time; a schoolmaster his scholar; a gaoler his prisoner; a husband his wife. 1 Sid. 176, 177; Lamb. 127, 128; Hetl. 149, 150; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60; B. 80.

And, without enumerating all the actual assaults, which a man may make upon the person of another, and not forfeit his recognizance for keeping the peace, it may be laid down as a principle, that such a recognizance is not forfeited by any assault which could have been justified in an action, or upon an indictment, for the assault. Bac. Abr.

It has been held, that a recognizance for the peace may be forfeited by any treason against the person of the king, or by an unlawful assembly in terrorem populi. Lamb. 115; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. Words which tend directly to a breach of the peace, as challenging a man to fight, or threatening to beat one who is present, amount to a forfeiture of such recognizance. Lamb. 115; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60; Cro. Eliz. 86. A recognizance is likewise forfeited by threatening to beat a person who is absent, if the party who has so threatened, does afterward lie in wait to beat him. Lamb. 115.

A man shall not forfeit a recognizance for keeping the peace, who does a hurt to another in playing at cudgels, or such like sport, by consent; for these sports, which tend to promote activity and courage, are lawful. Dalt. 284; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. But he who wounds another in fighting with naked swords, forfeits his recognizance; because no consent, nor even the command of the king, can make so dangerous a diversion lawful. Cro. Car. 229; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. If a soldier hurts another soldier, by discharging his gun in exercising without sufficient caution, it is no forfeiture of a recognizance for keeping the peace; for though he would be liable in an action for the damage occasioned by his negligence, this, it not being a wilful breach of the peace, is not within the purport of the recognizance. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60; Hob. 184; 2 Roll. Abr. 518.

A court of quarter sessions cannot in any case proceed against the parties for a forfeiture of a recognizance for keeping the peace; but the recognizance must be sent into some of the king's courts in Westminster-hall. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60. All proceedings upon a forfeited recognizance must be by scire facias, and not by indictment, because, where a scire facias is brought, the parties have an opportunity of pleading any matter in their discharge. 1 Roll. Abr. 909. Person's case; Com. die 7th. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60.

The discharge of the king is a discharge of recognizance for keeping the peace; for the condition being seu pacem nostram, his successor cannot take advantage of a breach thereof. Bro. P. C. pl. 55. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60.

After such a recognizance is forfeited, the king may pardon the forfeiture; but he cannot release the condition before it is broken; because the party, at whose complaint it was taken, has an interest therein. Bro. Recog. pl. 22; Bro. Chart. de Pard. 24.

If no time for the continuance of a recognizance for keeping the peace is therein mentioned, it is perhaps in the power of the court, in which it was taken, or to whom it has been certified, to discharge it at their discretion. 4 New Abr. 695.

The usual practice of court of a quarter sessions is to continue a recognizance for keeping the peace from sessions to sessions until the court thinks proper to discharge it. It is the constant course of the Court of King's Bench, to take a recognizance for twelve months; and if no indictment is within that time preferred against the party bound to keep the peace, it may, at the expiration thereof, be discharged. 1 Mod. 251; Str. 521. This seems also to be the practice of the Court of Chancery; for upon a motion to discharge a writ of supplicavit, which was issued by my Lord Macarthur, the motion was granted, and he was discharged at that time. 2 P. Wms. 202, Clavering's case. See Supplication. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 60; Pro. Peace, pl. 17; Lamb. 111; 11 Mod. 137. Cro. Jac. 282, 1 id. 207.

A recognizance for the good behaviour may be forfeited by all the same means as one for the security of the peace may be; and also by some others; as by going armed with unusual attendance, to the terror of the people; by speaking words tending to sedition; or by committing any of those acts of misbehaviour which the recognizance was intended to prevent. But not by barely giving fresh cause of suspicion of that which perhaps may never actually happen; for though it is just to compel suspected persons to give security to the public against misbehaviour that is apprehended, yet it would be hard upon such suspicion, without the proof of any actual crime, to punish them by a forfeiture of their recognizance. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 61; 4 Comm. 257.

As to the proceedings when a recognizance has become forfeited, see Recognizance.

SURGEON, chirurgus, from the Fr. chirurgien. Signifying him that dealth in the mechanical part of physic, and the outward cures performed with the hand; originally compounded of the two Greek words, χειρ, munus, εργον, opus; and for this cause surgeons are not allowed to administer any inward medicine.

By the 32 Hen. 8. c. 42. the barbers and surgeons of London were incorporated, and made one company.

But by the 18 Geo. 2. c. 15. the surgeons of London, and the barbers of London, were made two separate and distinct corporations; reserving the privileges each were entitled to under 32 Hen. 8. to each company separately. By the latter act examiners are appointed to admit surgeons, &c.

The 3 Hen. 8. c. 11. enacts that no one shall practise as a surgeon in London, or seven miles round, without being licensed by the College of Surgeons, under the penalty of 5*l.* per month; but, notwithstanding, it seems that a person not so licensed may sue for business done as a surgeon within these limits, the statute containing no prohibitory clause. 2 Camp. 143.

An action on the case lies against a surgeon for gross ignorance and want of skill in his profession; as well as for negligence and carelessness to the detriment of his patient. 8 East, 348. And see further, Homicide, 3, II.

A surgeon having a certificate from the College of Surgeons cannot charge for attending a patient in a fever, without having also a certificate from the Apothecaries Company. 4 Bng. 620. But if the plaintiff had administered medicine as ancillary to a surgical case, his claim could not have been resisted. Ibid. per Best, C. J. And one who is both a surgeon and an apothecary may, besides his charges for medicine, recover reasonable charges for attendance. 4 C. & P. 110. And see 4 Tyrr. 325 and further, Apothecary.

Surgeons are not liable to serve on juries, by 6 Geo. 1. c. 50. § 2.

SURMISE. Something offered to a court to move it to grant a prohibition, audita querela, or other writ grantable thereon. See Suggestion.

SURPLUSAGE, Fr. surplus, Lat. surplusagium, corollarium. A superfluity or addition more than needful, which sometimes is the cause that a writ abates; but, in pleading, many times it is absolutely void, and the residue of the plea shall stand good. Broke; Plow. 63. See Amendment, Pleading.

If a jury find the substance of the issue before them to be tried, other superfluous matter is but surplusage. 6 Rep. 46.

SURPLUSAGE OF ACCOUNTS, signifies a greater disbursement than the charge of the accountant amounts unto. In another sense, surplusage is the remainder or overplus of money left. Litt. Dict.

SURREBUTTER. The replication or answer of the plaintiff to the defendant's rebutter. See Pleading, Rebutter.

SURREJOINDER. A second defence (as the replication is the first) of the plaintiff's declaration in a cause, and is an answer to the rejoinder of the defendant. West. Symb. par. 2. As a rejoinder is the defendant's answer to the replication of the plaintiff; so a surrejoinder is the plaintiff's answer to the defendant's rejoinder. Wood's Inst. 586.

SURRENDER.

Where a plaintiff in his surrejoinder is to conclude to the country, and not with an averment; see Raym. 94. After rejoinder and surrejoinder and rebutter, &c. there may be a demurrer. See Pleading.

SURRENDER, surrem redditio. A deed or instrument testifying that the particular tenant for life or years of lands and tenements, doth yield up his estate to him that hath the immediate estate in remainder or reversion, that he may have the present possession thereof; and wherein the estate for life or years may merge or drown by the mutual agreement of the parties. Co. Litt. 337.

A surrender is of a nature directly opposite to a release; for as that operates by the greater estate's descending upon the less, a surrender is the falling of a less estate into a greater. It is made by these words, Hath surrendered, granted, and yielded up. 2 Comm. c. 20, p. 326.

Of surrenders there are three kinds: a surrender properly taken at common law; a surrender of copyhold or customary estates, as to which see Copyhold; and a surrender, improperly taken, as of a deed, a patent, rent newly created, &c.

The surrender at common law is the usual surrender, and is of two sorts, viz. a surrender in deed, or by express words in writing, where the words of the lessee to the lessor prove a sufficient assent to give him his estate back again; and a surrender in law, being that which is wrought by operation of law, and not actual; as if a lessee for life or years take a new lease of the same land during the term, this will be a surrender in law of the first lease. 1 Inst. 338; 5 Rep. 11; Perk. 601.

To the making of a good surrender in deed of lands, the following things are requisite. The surrenderor is to be a person able to grant and make a surrender, and the surrenderee a person able to receive and take it; the surrenderor must have an estate in possession of the things surrendered, and not a future right; and the surrender is to be made to him that hath the next estate in remainder or reversion, without any estate coming between; the surrenderee must have a higher or greater estate in his own right, and not in the right of his wife, &c. in the thing surrendered, than the surrenderor hath, so that the estate of the surrenderor may be drowned therein; (so that lessee for life cannot surrender to him in remainder for years;) there is to be a privity of estate between the surrenderor and surrenderee; and the surrenderee must be sole seised of his estate in remainder or reversion, and not in joint-tenancy; and the surrenderee agree to the surrender, &c. 1 Inst. 338; Perk. 584, 588; 2 Roll. Abr. 494; Noy's Max. 73.

In some cases a surrender in law is of greater force than a surrender in deed; for if a man makes a lease for years, to begin at a day to come, this future interest cannot be surrendered by deed, because there is no reversion wherein it may drown; but if the lessee, before the day, take a new lease of the same land, it is a good surrender in law of the former lease: and this surrender in law, by taking a new lease, holds good, though the second lease is for a less term than the first; and, it is said, though the second lease is a voidable lease, &c. 5 Rep. 11; 6 Rep. 69; 10 Rep. 67; 1 Inst. 218; Cro. Eliz. 873.

If lessee for life do accept of a lease for years, this is a surrender in law of his lease for life; if it should be otherwise, the lease for years would be made to no purpose, and both the leases cannot stand together in one person. 2 Lill. Abr. 544. Lessee for twenty-one years takes a lease of the same lands for forty years, to commence after the death of A. B., it is not any present surrender of the first term; but if A. B. dies within the first term, it is. 4 Leon. 83. A lessee for years took a second lease, to commence at Michaelmas ensuing: adjudged this was an immediate surrender in law of the first; and that the lessor might enter and take the profits, from the time of the acceptance of the second lease, until Michaelmas following. Cro. Eliz. 605. If the lessor make, and lessee accept, a new lease, and it is upon condition; this shall be a surrender in law; and if an assignee of tenant for years take a new lease, &c. the first lease will be by law surrendered. 1 Inst. 218, 338. If a woman lessee for years marries, and afterwards she takes a new lease for life without her husband, this is a surrender and extinguishment of the term; but if the husband disagree, then it is revived: though if the new lease had been made to the husband and wife, then, by acceptance thereof, the first lease had been gone. Mutt. 7. A lessor takes the lessee to wife, then the term is not drowned or surrendered; but he is possessed of the term in her right, during the coverture. Wood's Inst. 285.

Lease of lands by indenture for twenty-one years, with provision that it should be determinable by lessee or lessor at the end of the first seven or fourteen years; memorandum indorsed six years after the execution of the lease, of its being agreed between the parties, previously to the execution, that the lessor shall not dispossess nor cause the lessee to be dispossessed of the said estate, but to have it for the term of twenty-one years from this present time; which memorandum was signed by the parties, and stamped with a lease stamp and not sealed. The Court of K. B. held that the lessor might determine the lease at the end of the first fourteen years; for the memorandum did not operate as a new lease and surrender of the first lease. 4 M. & S. 30.

A surrender may be of any thing grantable, either absolute or conditional; and may be made to an use, being a conveyance tied and charged with the limitation of an use; but it may not be of an estate in fee; nor of rights and titles only to other estates for life or years; or for part of such an estate; nor may one termor regularly surrender to another termor; nor can a tenant at will surrender any more than he can grant. Perk. 615; Noy's Max. 73; Cro. Eliz. 684, 1 Leon. 303. Where things will not pass by surrender, the deed may enure to other purposes, and take effect by way of grant, having sufficient words. Perk. 588, 624.

A man who hath a fee simple estate cannot surrender, because it cannot be drowned in another estate. 12 Hen. 21. And if a lease be made for life or years to A., the remainder for life to B., remainder in fee tail to C., and the first tenant surrenders to C.; this will not take effect as a surrender, by reason of the intervening estate. Dyer. 112. The lessee for life or years may surrender to him that is next in remainder in fee-simple or fee-tail. And if lessee for life surrenders his estate to one in remainder, that is tenant for his own life, it is a good surrender; for a man's estate for his own life, in judgment of law, is greater than that for another's. And where an estate is surrendered for life, there needs no livery or seisin, as in a grant, 1 Inst. 338; Dyer. 251, 280.

If there be lessee for years, the remainder for life, remainder in fee; the lessee for years may surrender to the lessee during life, and so may be to him in the remainder in fee. Perk. § 605.

In case of tenant for life, the remainder for life, reversion in fee; it was a question formerly, whether the remainderman for life by and with the consent of the tenant for life could surrender to him in reversion without deed, only on coming on the land and saying, that he did surrender to him in reversion. The court were divided; but two judges held, that if tenant for life and he in remainder for life surrendered to the reversioner, it should pass as several surrenders, viz. first of him in remainder to the tenant for life, and then by the tenant for life to him in reversion. Poph. 137.

If tenant for life grant his estate to him in reversion, this is a surrender; and it must be pleaded according to the operation it hath in law, or it will not be good. 4 Mod. 151. Though if lessees for life or years grant their estates to him in remainder or reversion, and a stranger, it shall enure as a surrender of the one half to him in reversion, and as a grant of the other moiety to the stranger. 1 Inst. 335.

In some cases, an estate, &c. may have continuance, though it be surrendered; as where lessee for life makes a lease for years, and after doth surrender, the term for years doth continue; and so of a rent charge granted by such lessee, &c. Bro. 47; 1 Inst. 338. If the lessee for years, rendering rent, surrenders his estate to the lessor, hereby the rent is extinct; but if the rent were granted away before the surrender, it would be otherwise. 8 Rep. 145; Bro. Surrend. 42. Tenant for life is disseised, or for years ousted; and before entry or possession gained, he surrenders to him in reversion; this surrender is void. And yet if lessee for years, after his term is begun, before he enters, and when nobody doth keep from him the profits, surrenders, it will be good. Park. § 60.

In a surrender there is no occasion for livery of seisin; for there is a privity of estate between the surrenderor and surrenderer. The particular estate of one, and the remainder of the other, are one and the same estate. See Remainder, Reversion. And livery having once made at the creation of it, there is no necessity for having it afterwards. 1 Inst. 50. And for the same reason it is that no livery is required on a release, or continuation in fee, to tenant for years, or of will, though a freehold thereby passes, since the reversion of the releasor or continuor, and the particular estate of the releasee or continuee, are one and the same estate. And where there is already a possesson derived from such a privity of estate, any further delivery of possession would be vain and nugatory. 2 Comm. 323. See Release, Livery of Seisin.

At common law, an express surrender of things lying in grant could be made by deed only, but a surrender of things lying in possession might be made by parol without livery of seisin, or other formal mode of conveyance, though the particular estate had been originally created by deed; for it was but a restoring of the estate back again to him in reversion or remainder. 2 Roll. Abr. 24; 1 Ventr. 242, 272. But by the 20 Car. 2. c. 2. no estates of freehold, or of terms for years, shall be granted or surrendered, but by deed or note in writing, signed by the parties, or unless by operation in law, &c.

The statute extends to tenancies from year to year, and therefore a landlord and tenant cannot, by mere parol agreement in the middle of a quarter, determine a tenancy from year to year, though created by parol. 2 Camp. 189; 2 Stark. 370. And see further, Lease, I. 4.

A surrender of a prebendary's lease, upon condition that if he then prebendary did not, within a week after, grant a new lease for three lives, the surrender shall be void. Held to be a good surrender within the 32 Hen. 8. c. 28. § 2. 2 Strange, 1201. See further, Lease, II.

Many cases have arisen upon the question, after what length of time a mortgagee terms that have been surrendered, and terms that have been assigned to trustees to attend to the same, and have subsequently been dealt with as if they had been surrendered. The decisions of the courts of law and equity have been conflicting upon this subject, which has given rise to many learned arguments. See the point discussed in Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers.

It is no ground for presuming the surrender of a term devised to trustees less than twenty years ago, that the reversion in fee has been dealt with the property as absolutely as his estate by leasing it for lives. 1 C. & M. 221.

By the 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. § 6. leases may be renewed without the surrender of under-leases. See further, 20 Fen. II. 19—146; and Lease.

As to the surrender of leases to or by executors, administrators, or assigns, see Idiota, IV. 2; Infant, V. 1. Also extend to leases of land. See further, Estate of Land, Mortgage.

SURRENDER OF COPYHOLDS. Is the yielding up of the estate by the tenant into the hands of the lord, for such purposes as in the surrender are expressed. This method of conveyance is so essential to the nature of a copyhold estate, that it cannot properly be transferred by any other assurance. But courts of equity will, in some particular cases, supply the want of a surrender. See 2 Comm. c. 22; and tit. Copyhold.

SURRENDER OF LETTERS PATENT, AND OFFICES. A surrender may be made of letters patent to the king, to the end he may grant the estate to whom he pleases, &c.; and a second patent for years to the same person, for the same thing, is a surrender in law of the first patent. 10 Rep. 66.

Letters patent for years were delivered into chancery to be cancelled, and new letters patent made for years; but the first were not cancelled. It was held that the second were good, because they were a surrender in law of the first, and the not cancelling was the fault of the chancery, which ought to have done it. 10 Rep. 66, 67; 2 Lil. Abr. 545. If an officer for life accepts of another grant of the same office, it is in law a surrender of the first grant; but if such an officer takes another grant of the same office to himself and another, it may be otherwise. 1 Ventr. 297; 3 Cro. 198. See Dyer, 167, 198; Godb. 415; and ante, titles Grant of the King, Office.

SURRENDER OF TITHES in Scotland. The submissions and surrenders of tithes there were made to King Charles I., in consequence of an action of reduction brought by his majesty of all rights to tithes which had been granted by James VI. (James I. of England), contrary to the act of annexation. These submissions led to the happiest consequences, as the decree arbitrarily which passed on them provided for the valuation and sale of tithes, and laid the foundation of a system highly fortunate for the agriculture of that country. Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

SURROGATE, surrogatus.] Is one that is substituted or appointed in the room of another; as by a bishop, chancellor, judge, &c.

For his duties in granting marriage licences, see title Marriage.

By the 56 Geo. 3. c. 82. the judicial acts of surrogates of vice-admiralty courts in the colonies, during the death, resignation, or removal of the judges by whom they were appointed, &c. are declared valid.

SURSISE, supersisa.] A word especially used in the Castle of Dover, for penalties and forfeitures laid upon those that pay not the duties or rent of castle-ward, at their days limited. It probably comes from the Fr. sursis, i. e. forborn or neglected. Brit. 52. And Bracton hath it so in a general signification. Bract. lib. 5.

SURVEY. To measure, lay out, or particularly describe a manor, or estate in lands; and to ascertain not only the bounds and royalties thereof, but the tenure of the respective tenants, the rent and value of the same, &c. On the falling of an estate to a new lord, consisting of manors, where there are tenants by lease, and copyholders, a court of survey is generally held; and at certain other times, to apprise the lord of the present terms and interests of the tenants, and as a direction on making further grants, as well as in order to improvements, &c. In this court, a survey, or particular in the nature of a rent-roll, is made out, specifying the tenants and terms of their tenure, &c. See Comp. Court Keep.

SURVEYOR, from Fr. sur, i. e. super, and voir, cernare.] One that has the overseeing or care of some person's lands or works. A court of surveyors was erected by 35 Hen. 8. c. 39. for the benefit of the crown.

SURVEYOR OF THE KING'S EXCHANGE. An ancient officer belonging to the mint and coinage, mentioned in the 9 Hen. 5. c. 4.

SURVEYOR-GENERAL OF THE KING'S MANORS AND LANDS.

Is mentioned in Crompt. Jurisd. 106. See 46 Geo. 3. c. 142. and 50 Geo. 3. c. 65. as to the execution of the powers of this officer; and tit. Forests.

SURVEYORS OF THE HIGHWAYS. See Ways.

SURVEYOR OF THE NAVY. An officer appointed over all stores; and to survey hulls and masts of ships, &c. Chamberl.

SURVEYOR OF THE KING'S ORDNANCE. This officer surveys the ordnance and provisions of war, allows bills of debt, and keeps the checks on labourers' works, &c.

SURVEYORS OF THE WARDS AND LIVERIES. This office was abolished, with the courts of wards and liveries, by the 12 Car. 2. c. 24.

SURVIVOR, from Fr. survivre, Lat. supervivo.] The longer liver of two joint-tenants, or of any two persons joined in the right of a thing. He that remaineth alive after others be dead, &c. Broke, 33. See Joint-tenant.

SUSPENSE, SUSPENSION, suspensio.] A temporal stop, or hanging up, as it were, of a man's right for a time.

In legal understanding, it is taken to be where a rent, or other profit out of lands, by reason of the unity of possession of the rent, &c. and the land out of which it issues, is not in esse for a certain time, et tunc dormit, but may be revived or awaked. And it differs from extinguishment, which is when it dies or is gone for ever. Co. Litt. 213.

A suspension of rent is, when either the rent or land is so conveyed, not absolutely and finally, but for a time, after which the rent will be revived again. Vaugh. 109. A rent may be suspended by unity for a time; and if a lessor does any thing which amounts to an entry on the land, though he presently depart, yet the possession is in him sufficient to suspend the rent, until the lessee do some act which amounts to a re-entry. Vaugh. 39; 1 Leon. 110. As rent is not issuable out of a common, the lessor's inclosing the common cannot suspend his rent. Cro. Jac. 679.

If part of a condition is suspended, the whole condition, as well for payment of the rent, as doing a collateral act, is suspended. 4 Rep. 25. And a thing or action personal once suspended, is for ever suspended, &c. Cro. Car. 373. See Extinguishment.

By letters of suspension passing under the signet in Scotland, process at law, or the effect of the judgment of a court, may be suspended.

SUSPENSION, is also used for a censure, whereby ecclesiastical persons are forbidden to exercise their office, or take the profit of their benefices; or where they are prohibited for a certain time, in both of them, in the whole or in part. Hence is suspensio ab officio, or suspensio à beneficio, and ab officio et beneficio. Wood's Inst. 510.

There is likewise a suspension which relates to the laity, i. e. suspensio ab ingressu ecclesie, or from the hearing of divine service, &c. In which case it is used, as in the canon law, pro minore excommunicatione. 24 Hen. 8. c. 12. See Excommunication.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT. See Habeas Corpus, Government.

SUSPENSION FROM OFFICES. See Mandamus, Office.

SUS. PER COLL. On the trial of criminals, the usage (at the assizes) is for the judge to sign the calendar, or list of all the prisoners' names, with their separate judgments in the margin, which is left with the sheriff. As for a capital felony, it is written opposite to the prisoner's name, "Hanged by the neck;" formerly, in the days of Latin and abbreviations, sus. per coll. for suspendatur per collum. 4 Comm. c. 32. See Execution of Criminals.

SUSPICION. A person may be taken up on suspicion where a felony is done, &c.

If a private person takes up one on suspicion of felony, he must do it of his own suspicion, not upon that of another; and he must have reasonable cause of it, &c. Hale's Hist. P. C. 78. See further, Arrest, Bail, Constable, Commitment, &c.

SUSPIRAL, from Lat. suspirare, i. e. ducere suspiria.] Is used for a spring of water, passing under ground towards a conduit or cistern. See 35 Hen. 8. c. 10.

SUTHDURE, Sax.] The south door of a church; it was the place where canonical purgation was performed; that is, if the fact charged upon a person could not be proved by sufficient evidence, the party accused came to the south door of the church, and there, in the presence of the people, made oath that he was innocent. And plaints, &c. were heard and determined at the suthdure; for which reason large porches were anciently built at the south doors of churches. Gervast. Dorob. de Reparation. Ecclesie Cantuar'.

SWAN, cygnus.] A noble bird of game; and a person may prescribe to have game of swans within his manor, as well as a warren or park. 7 Rep. 17, 18. A swan is a bird-royal (in England; but it seems not in Scotland, Erskine, B. 2. tit. 6. § 15.) All white swans not marked, which have gained their natural liberty, and are swimming in an open and common river, may be seized to the use of the king by his prerogative. But a subject may have a property in white swans not marked; as any man may have such swans in his private waters, and the property of them belongs to him, and not to the king; and if they escape out of his private waters into an open and common river, he may retake them; though it is otherwise if they have gained their natural liberty, and swim in open rivers, without such pursuit. Stealing swans marked and pinioned, or unmarked, if kept in a mote, pond, or private river, and reduced to tameness, is said to be felony. H. P. C. 68. See Larceny, I. 1.

No fowl can be a stray but a swan. 4 Inst. 280.

No person may have a swanmark except he have lands of the yearly value of five marks, and unless it be by grant of the king, or his officers lawfully authorised, or by prescription. 22 Edw. 4. c. 6.

By the 11 Hen. 7. c. 17. he that steals the eggs of swans out of their nests shall be imprisoned a year and a day, and be fined at the king's pleasure.

But this enactment was superseded by the 1 Jac. 1. c. 27. § 2. which declares that every person taking the eggs of swans out of their nests, or wilfully breaking or spoiling them, may, on conviction before two justices, on the oath of one witness, be committed to gaol for three months, unless he pay to the churchwardens, for the use of the poor, 20s. for every egg; or, after one month of his commitment, become bound with two sureties in 20l. a piece, before two justices, never to offend again in like manner.

SWARF-MONEY. A custom or service; viz. one penny halfpenny, paid before the rising of the sun; the party must go three times about the cross, and say the swarf-money, and then take witness and lay it in the hole; and he is to do so well that his witness do not deceive him; for if it be not so paid, he shall pay a great forfeiture, viz. xxxs. and a white bull. This account was found in an old MS. containing the rents due to the Catesbys in Lodbrooke, and other places in Warwickshire. It seems to be a corruption from ward-money, and that again from guard-money; money paid in and out of the service of castle-guard.

SWATH, Sax. swatha.] A swathe; or, as in Ken a sweat, and in some parts a sward; a straight row of grass or corn, as it lies after the scythe at the first mowing. it. Paroch. Antiq. 399.

SWEARING, imprecatio.] Is an offence against God and religion; and a sin, of all others, the most extravagant and unaccountable, as having no benefit or advantage attending it. Several good laws and statutes have been made for punishing this crime. By the 21 Jac. 1. c. 20. it was enacted that if any person should profanely swear or curse in the presence of a justice of peace, or the same should be proved before a justice, he should forfeit 1s. for every offence to the use of the poor, to be levied by distress; and for want of a distress, be set in the stocks, &c.

By the 19 Geo. 2. c. 21. which repeals all former statutes, if any person shall profanely curse or swear, and be convicted by the oath of any one witness before any justice of peace, &c. he shall forfeit as follows, viz. Every day labourer, common soldier, common sailor, and common seaman, 1s. (sailors are also punishable for this offence by a court-martial.) Every other person under the degree of a gentleman, 2s. Every person of or above the degree of a gentleman, 5s. A second offence double, and every other offence treble. If the offence be committed in the hearing of a magistrate, he may convict without further proof. If the offence be committed in the hearing of a constable, if the offender be unknown to him, he shall secure him, and carry him before a justice of peace; but if the offender be known to the constable, he shall make information against him before a justice of peace.

On information, a justice is to order the offender to appear, and if on conviction he do not pay or give security for the penalty, he shall be sent to the house of correction for ten days; or being a common soldier or sailor, be set in the stocks. On default of duty, justices to forfeit 5l. and constables 40s. All convictions are to be written on parchment, and returned to the next sessions. The penalties to go to the poor of the parish, and the offender to pay all charges of conviction, or be committed to the house of correction for six days extraordinary. All prosecutions to be within eight days. This act to be read in all churches four times a year, under the penalty of 5l. The justice's clerk may take for the information, summons, and conviction, 1s. and no more.

Each oath or curse being a distinct or complete offence, a person may incur any number of penalties in one day, 4 Comm. c. n. Though the conviction cannot be removed by certiorari, yet an information will lie against a magistrate corruptly convicting under it without hearing the defendant's witnesses. Burn's J. title Swearing.—Conviction for swearing 100 oaths, viz. "by G—," and 100 curses, viz. "G—d— you," is good, without repeating them 100 times in the conviction. 2 Ld. Raym. 1370; Str. 608.

SWEARING THE PEACE. See Surety of the Peace.

SWEEPAGE. The crop of hay got in a meadow, called also the swepe in some parts of England. Co. Litt. fol. 4.

SWEINMOTE, Court of the Swains or Countrymen. One of the Forest Courts, which is to be holden before the Verderers as judges, by the steward of the Sweinmote, thrice in every year, the swains and freeholders within the forest composing the jury. The principal jurisdiction of this court is, first, to inquire into the oppressions and grievances committed by the officers of the forest; and, secondly, to receive and try presentments, certified from the Court of Attachments, against offenders in vert and venison. 34 Edw. 1. st. 5. c. 1. And this court may not only inquire, but convict also, which conviction shall be certified to the court of justice-seat, under the seals of the jury; for this court cannot proceed to judgment. 4 Inst. 289. See Forest.

SWINDLER. A cheat; one who lives by cheating. It is a modern term.

To print of one that he is a swindler has been held libellous and actionable. 1 T. R. 748 but merely to say to another, "you are a swindler" has been denied to be actionable. 2 H. Bl. 501. See Cheat False Pretences, Fraud, III. Larceny.

SWINE. Shall not go unminged in woods, 35 Hen. 8. c. 17. See Hogs, London, Nuisance, Police.

SWOLING OF LAND, solinga vel swolunga terræ; Sax. swolung, from sul, aratrum, as to this day, in the west country, a plough is called a sul.] So much land as one plough can till in a year, a hide of land; though some writers say it is an uncertain quantity.

SWORN BROTHERS, fratres jurati.] Persons who, by mutual oath, covenanted to share each other's fortune: formerly, in any notable expedition, to invade and conquer an enemy's country, it was the custom for the more eminent soldiers to engage themselves, by reciprocal oaths, to share the rewards of their service: so, in the expedition of William Duke of Normandy into England, Robert de Oily, and Roger de Ivery, were sworn brothers and co-partners in the estate which the Conqueror allotted them. Paroch. Antiq. 57.

This practice gave occasion to our proverb of sworn brothers, or brethren in iniquity; because of their dividing plunder and spoil. See Ward on the Law of Nations.

SYB AND SOM, peace and security. Ld. Eccl. Canuti, c. 17. Termes de la Ley.

SYLVA CÆDUA. Wood under twenty years' growth: coppice-wood. 45 Edw. 3. c. 3. It is otherwise called in Law-french subbois. 2 Inst. fol. 642. See Tithes, Wood.

SYMBOLUM. A symbol, or sign in the sacrament; the creed of the apostles is often called by this name by our historians.

Property is in many cases transferred by the delivery of symbols: as copyholds in England by the rod. In Scotland, lands are resigned by a vassal to his superior by the staff and baton; and there in giving seisin, as in England in cases of feoffment, (see that tit. and tit. Livery of Seisin), the symbols are varied according to the nature of the subjects: thus in giving seisin of lands, the symbols are earth and stone of the lands; of an annual rent out of lands earth and stone with a penny in money; of fishings, net and cobble; of mills, clap and hopper; of houses, hasp and staple; of tithes, a sheaf of corn; of patronage, a psalm book and the keys of the church; of jurisdiction, the book of court.

SYNDICOS. An advocate or patron; a burgess or recorder of a town, &c. Mat. Paris, anno 1245.

SYNGRAPH, synographus.] A deed, bond, or writing, under the hand and seal of all the parties. See Chirograph.

SYNOD, synodus.] A meeting or assembly of ecclesiastical persons concerning religion; being the same thing in Greek as convocation in Latin.

Of synods there are four kinds: 1st. A general or universal synod or council, where bishops of all nations meet. 2ndly, A national synod, of the clergy of one nation only. 3dly, A provincial synod, where ecclesiastical persons of a province only assemble, being now what is called the convocation. 4thly, A diocesan synod, of those of one diocese, &c.

Our Saxon kings usually called a synod or mixed council, consisting of ecclesiastics and the nobility, three times a year; which is said to have been the same with our parliament. See Convocation, King, V. 3.

A synod in Scotland is composed of three or more Presbyteries.

SYNODAL, synodalc.] A tribute or payment in money, paid to the bishop or archdeacon, by the inferior clergy, at Easter visitation; it is called synodale or synodicum, quia in synodo frequentius dabatur. Right, Clerg. 59. They are likewise termed synodics, in the 34 Hen. 8. c. 16. And sometimes synodale is used for the synod itself; and synodals provincial, the canons or constitutions of a provincial synod. 25 Hen. 8. c. 19.

SYNODALES TESTES, Synods-men; thence corrupted to Sidesmen.] Were the urban and rural deans, whose office at first was to inform and attest the disorders of the clergy and people in the episcopal synod; and for which a solemn oath was given them to make their presentments. But when they sunk in this authority, the synodical witnesses were a sort of impanelled grand jury, composed of a priest and two or three laymen of every parish, for the informing of or presenting offenders: at length two principal persons for each diocese were annually chosen; till, by degrees, this office of inquest and information was devolved upon the churchwardens. (See that title.) Paroch. Antiq. 649.

TAIL.

T. EVERY person convict of any felony, save murder, and admitted to the benefit of his clergy, was to be marked with a T. upon the brawn of his thumb. 4 Hen. 7. c. 13. repealed by 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27.

TABARD, TABARDER. The bachelor scholars on the foundation of Queen's College, Oxford, are called tabiters or tabarders; and these scholars were named tabiters, from a gown worn by them, called a tabert, tabarr, or tabard. For Verstegan tells us, that tabert anciently signified a short gown that reached not farther than the middle of the leg; and it remains for the name of such in Germany and other countries, which, with the Teutonic and Saxon taber, signify all a kind of garment, &c.

TABARDUM. A garment like a gown; and used for an herald's coat, but generally taken for the gown of ecclesiastics. Matt. Paris, 164.

TABELLION, tabellio. A notary public. Matt. Paris, anno 1236.

TABLE-RENTS, redditus ad mensam. Rents paid to bishops, &c. reserved and appropriated to their table or housekeeping. See Board-land.

TACFREE. Is used, in old charters, as an exemption from payments, &c. Cum housbold & haybold & tacfree de omnibus propriis porcis suis infra omnes metas de C. that is, they paid nothing for their hogs running within that limit. Blount.

TACITE RELOCATION. Where the lessor suffers the lessee to continue after the lease is expired, paying as formerly during the lease, this is termed a tacite relocation, that is a silent or understood reletting of the premises. It is a Scotch term derived from the civil law.

TACK. A lease: tack-duty, the rent reserved on a lease. Scotch Law Diet.

TAIL; FEE-TAIL,

FEODUM TALLIATUM; from the Fr. tailler, to cut; either because the heirs general are by this means cut off; or because this estate is a part cut out of the whole. See Tenures, III. 6.

An estate in fee-tail is a limited fee, as opposed to a fee-simple: it is that inheritance whereof a man is seised to him and the heirs of his body, begotten or to be begotten; limited at the will of the donor. He that giveth lands in tail, is called the donor; and he to whom the gift is made, the donee. Litt. § 18. Estates in fee-tail are the (comparatively modern) offspring of the conditional fees at common law. Before the statute de donis, if lands were given to a man and the heirs of his body, it was interpreted to be a fee-simple presently by the gift, upon condition that he had issue; and if he had issue, the condition was supposed to be performed for three purposes, viz. to alien and disinherit the issue, and by the alienation to bar the donor or his heirs of all possibility of the reversion; to forfeit the estate for treason or felony; and to charge it with rent, &c. But, by the statute de donis, the will and intention of the donor is to be observed; as that the tenant in tail shall not alien after issue had, or before, or forfeit or charge the lands longer than for his own life, &c. and the estate shall remain to the issue of the donee, or to the donor or his heirs, where there is no issue; so that whereas the donee had a fee-simple before, now he has but an estate-tail, and the donor a reversion in fee expectant upon that estate-tail. Co. Litt. 19. See post, III.

In this place, without further entering into the origin of these estates, (for which see Tenures, above referred to,) we shall consider,

- I. What things may or may not be entailed, under the statute de donis: Westm. 2. (13 Edm. 1. st. 1.) c. 1.
- II. The several species of estates-tail: and further, how they are respectively created.
- III. The incidents to an estate-tail; and the effect of the various statutes relating thereto.
- IV. The provisions of the recent statute, 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 74.

I. TENEMENTS is the only word used in the statute: and this Coke expounds to comprehend all corporeal hereditaments whatsoever; and also all incorporeal hereditaments which savour of the realty, that is, which issue out of corporeal ones, or which concern, or are annexed to, or may be exercised within the same; as rents, estovers, commons, and the like. 1 Inst. 19, 20. Also officers and dignities, which concern lands, or have relation to fixed and certain places, may be entailed. 7 Rep. 38. But mere personal chattels, which savour not at all of the realty, cannot be directly entailed. Neither can an office, which merely relates to such personal chattels, nor an annuity, which charges only the person, and not the lands, of the grantor. But in these last, if granted to a man and the heirs of his body, the grantee hath still a fee conditional at common law, as before the statute; and by his alienation (after issue born) may bar the heir or reversioner. 1 Inst. 19, 20. An estate to a man and his heirs for another's life cannot be directly entailed: for this is strictly no estate of inheritance, and therefore not within the statute de donis. 2 Vern. 225. Neither can a copyhold estate be entailed by virtue of the statute; for that would tend to encroach upon and restrain the will of the lord: but, by the special custom of the manor, a copyhold may be limited to the heirs of the body; for here the custom ascertains and interprets the lord's will. 3 Rep. 8.

If a term for years, or any personal chattel, (except an annuity, see that title, and tit. Rents.) be granted or devised by such words as would convey an estate-tail in real property, the grantee or devisee has the entire and absolute interest, without having issue; and as soon as such interest is vested in any one, all subsequent limitations, of consequence, become null and void. 1 Bro. C. R. 274; 1 Inst. 20. Fearne. See post.

Two things seem essential to an entail, within the statute de donis. One requisite is, that the subject be land, or some other thing of real nature. The other requisite is, that the estate in it be an inheritance. Therefore neither estates pur autre vie in lands, though limited to the grantee and his heirs during the life of cuius que vie, nor terms for years, are entailable any more than personal chattels; because, as the latter, not being either interests in things real, or of inheritance, want both requisites; so the two former, though interests in things real, yet, not being also of inheritance, are deficient in one requisite.

However, estates pur autre vie, terms for years, and personal chattels, may be so settled as to answer the purposes of an entail, and be rendered unalienable for almost as long a time, as if they were entailable in the strict sense of the word. Thus estates pur autre vie may be devised or limited in strict settlement, by way of remainder, like estates of inheritance, and such as have interests in the nature of estates-tail may bar their issue and all remainders over, by alienation of the estate pur autre vie, as those who are, strictly speaking, tenants in tail may do by fine and recovery now abolished, (see post); but then the barring of issue is not an essential preliminary to the power of alienation, in the case of an estate pur autre vie, granted to out and the heirs of his body, as it is in the case of a conditional fee, from which the mode of barring by alienation was evidently borrowed.

The manner of settling terms for years and personal chattels is different from the above, for it then no remainder can be limited; but they may be entailed by executory devise, or by deed of trust, as effectually as estates of inheritance; if it is not attempted to render them unalienable beyond the duration of lives in being, and twenty-one years after, and perhaps, in the case of a posthumous child, a few months more: a limitation of time, not arbitrarily prescribed by our courts of justice, but wisely and reasonably adopted, in analogy to the case of feoffholds of inheritance, which cannot be so limited by way of remainder, as to postpone a complete bar of the entail by fine or recovery for a longer space. See Executory Devise, Limitation, Remainder.

It is also proper to observe, that in the case of terms of years and personal chattels, the very vesting of an interest, which in reality would be an estate-tail, bars the issue and all the subsequent limitation as effectually as fine and recovery (see post), in the case of estates entailable within the statute de donis, or a simple alienation in the case of conditional fees and estates pur autre vie, and farther, that if the executory limitations of personality are on contingencies too remote, the whole property is in the first taker.

Upon the whole, by a series of decisions within the two last centuries, and after many struggles in respect to personality, it is at length settled that every species of property is, in substance, equally capable of being settled in the way of entail; and though the modes vary according to the nature of the subject, yet they tend to the same point, and the duration of the entail is circumscribed almost as nearly within the same limits as the difference of property will allow.

As to the entail of estates pur autre vie, see 2 Vern. 184, 257; 1 P. Wms. 262; 1 Atk. 524; 2 Atk. 259, 376; 3 Atk. 461; and 2 Ves. 681. As to the entails of terms for years, and personal chattels, see Manning's case, 8 Co. 94; Lambert's case, 10 Co. 46 b; Child v. Bailey, W. Jo. 15; Duke of Norfolk's case, 9 C. C. 1. See also Carth. 267; 1 P. Wms. 1. And on the whole subject, Fearne's Essay on Contingent Remainders and Executory Devises; and 1 Inst. 20. in n.

II. ESTATES-TAIL are either general or special.

TAIL-GENERAL is where land and tenements are given to one and the heirs of his body begotten, which is called tail general, because how often soever such donee in tail be married, his issue in general by all and every such marriage is, in successive order, capable of inheriting the estate-tail per formam doni. Litt. § 14, 15.

Tenant in TAIL-SPECIAL is where the gift is restrained to certain heirs of the donee's body, and does not go to all of them in general. And this may happen several ways. One is, where lands and tenements are given to a man and the heirs of his body, on Mary his now wife to be begotten: here no issue can inherit but such special issue as is engendered between them two; not such as the husband may have by another wife; and therefore it is called special tail. And here we may observe, that the words of inheritance (to him and his heirs) give him an estate in fee; but they being heirs to be by him begotten, this makes it a fee-tail; and the person being also limited on whom such heirs shall be begotten (viz. Mary his present wife), this makes it a fee-tail-special. See Litt. § 16, 27, 28, 29.

Estates in general and special tail are farther diversified by the distinction of sexes in such entails; for both of them may either be in TAIL-MALE or TAIL-FEMALE. As if lands be given to a man and his heirs male of his body begotten, this is an estate in tail-male general; but if to a man and the heirs female of his body on his present wife begotten, this is an estate in tail-female special. And, in case of an entail-male, the heirs female shall never inherit, nor any derived from them; nor, et converso, the heirs male, in case of a gift in tail-female. Litt. § 21, 22. Thus if the donee in tail-male hath a daughter, who dies leaving a son, such grandson in this case cannot inherit the estate-tail, for he cannot deduce his descent wholly by heirs male. Litt. § 24. And as the heir male must convey his descent wholly by males, so must the heir female wholly by females. And therefore if a man hath two estates tail, the one in tail-male, and the other in tail-female; and he hath issue a daughter, which daughter hath issue a son; this grandson can succeed to neither of the estates, for he cannot convey his descent wholly either in the male or female line. 1 Inst. 25.

There are other estates-tail within the equity of the statute; as if lands are given to a man and his heirs males or females of his body begotten, the issue male or female shall only inherit according to the limitation. By virtue of the statute, here the daughter may be heir by descent, though there be a son. But in the case of a purchase, Lord Coke says there cannot be a heir female where there is a son who is right heir at law. 1 Inst. 24, 164. But this doctrine is now disputed, if not over-ruled. See Heir, II. ad fin. And where there is no heir to take according to the gift, as when issue fails, the land shall revert to the donor, or descend to him that is to have it after the estate tail is spent. 1 Inst. 25.

As the word heirs is necessary to create a fee, so in further limitation of the strictness of feudal donation, the word body, or some other words of procreation, are necessary to make it a fee-tail, and ascertain to what heirs in particular the fee is limited. If, therefore, either the words of inheritance or words of procreation be omitted, albeit the others are inserted in the grant, this will not make a state tail. As if the grant be to a man and his issue of his body, to a man and his seed, to a man and his children, or offspring; all these are only estates for life, there wanting the words of inheritance, his heirs. 1 Inst. 20. So, on the other hand, a gift to a man and his heirs male or female, is an estate in fee-simple, and not in fee-tail; for there are no words to ascertain the body out of which they shall issue. Litt. § 31. 1 Inst. 27. Indeed, in last wills and testaments, wherein greater indulgence is allowed, an estate tail may be created by a devise to a man and his seed, or to a man and his heirs male; or by any words which show an intention to restrain the inheritance to the descendants of the devisee. 1 Inst. 9, 27. See Will.

Further, as to the effect of particular words in creating estates-tail.

If lands are given to the husband and wife, and to the heirs of their bodies, both of them have an estate in special tail, by reason of the word heirs, for the inheritance is not limited to one more than the other. Where lands and tenements are given to a man and his wife, and to the heirs of the body of the man, the husband hath an estate in general tail, and the wife an estate for life, as the word heirs relates generally to the body of the husband. And if the estate is made to the husband and wife, and to the heirs of the body of the wife by the husband begotten; there the wife hath an estate in special tail, and the husband for term of life only, because the word heirs hath relation to the body of the wife, to be begotten by that particular husband. If an estate be limited to a man's heirs which he shall beget on his wife, it creates a special tail in the husband; but the wife will be entitled to nothing, &c. Litt. § 26, 28; Co. Litt. 22, 26.

Lands given to a man and woman unmarried, and to the heirs of their bodies, will be an estate in special tail, for they may marry. 1 Inst. 25; 10 Rep. 50. And though lands are given to a married man and another man's wife, and the heirs of their two bodies, it may be a good estate-tail, for the possibility of their intermarrying. 15 Hen. 7.

A general tail and a special tail may not be created at one and the same time; if they are, the general, which is greater, will frustrate the special. 1 Inst. 28.

It is the word body, or other words amounting to it, which makes the entail; and a gift to the heirs male, or heirs female, without any thing further, is a fee-simple estate, because it is not limited of what body; and hence a corporation cannot be seised in tail. 1 Inst. 18, 20, 27.

In a devise or last will an estate tail may be created without the word body; also begotten shall be supplied and necessarily intended. Noy's Max. 101; 1 Inst. 26. If one gives lands to a man and his issue, or children of his body, without the words "his heirs" to convey the inheritance, he has but an estate for life; though such words may be good enough to convey the inheritance in a will; as estates-tail by devise are always more favoured in law than estates-tail created by deeds. 1 Inst. 20.

The word heirs is necessary to create an estate-tail and inheritance by deed; and where an use was limited to A. B. and to his heirs male, lawfully to be begotten; these last words imply that it must be heirs male of his body, because no other heir male can inherit by virtue of his grant but such who are lawfully begotten by the grantor. 7 Rep. 41. If a man makes a feoffment to the use of himself for life, remainder to the heirs male of his body, this is an estate-tail executed in him; and so it is if he covenanted to stand seised in the same manner. 1 Mod. 159.

By a marriage settlement and fine levied, &c. to the use of the husband and wife for their joint lives, remainder to the heirs of the body of the wife by the husband to be begotten, remainder (the wife surviving the husband) to her for life, remainder to the right heirs of the husband; this was held to be an estate-tail executed in the wife. Raym. 127; 3 Salk. 338. Land is conveyed to the use of a man and his wife for their lives, and after to their next issue male in tail, then to the use of the husband and wife, and of the heirs of their bodies begotten, they having no male issue; by this conveyance husband and wife are tenants in special tail executed, and when they have issue male, they will be tenants for life, remainder to their son in tail, the remainder to them in special tail. 1 Inst. 28.

Where a person having an estate in fee conveys it by lease and release to the use of himself for life, with remainder to trustees for their lives, and remainder to the heirs of his body, he hath an estate-tail in him; but he is only tenant for life in possession: it would be otherwise if there had been no intermediate estate in the trustees for their lives. 2 Ld. Raym. 855. A man seised of land in fee makes a gift of it in tail, or lease for life, remainder to the right heirs male of the body of the donor; this remainder, it is said, will be a fee-simple, and not an estate-tail. Dyer, 156. See Remainder. If the gift or grant of the land be to J. S. and his heirs, to hold to him and the heirs of his body, &c. here he will have an estate in tail, and a fee-simple upon it. Litt. ch. 2; 1 Inst. 21. Lands are given to two brothers, &c. and to the heirs of their bodies begotten; during their lives they shall have joint estates, so that the survivor will have all for his life; and after their deaths their heirs have estates in general tail by moieties in common one with another. 1 Inst. 25; 1 Rep. 140.

When a remainder is limited to two, and the heirs male of their bodies, they have not joint but several estates-tail; and between baron and feme, it is said, several moieties may be of an estate-tail, as well as of a fee-simple. Cro. Eliz. 220; Moor, 228; 2 Lil. Abr. 551. A feoffment was made to the use of the feoffor for life, remainder to W. R. his son and his heirs; and for want of issue of him, remainder to the right heirs of the feoffor; adjudged W. R. hath only an estate in tail; for though the first words of the sentence, viz. to his son and his heirs, make a fee-simple, the subsequent words in the same sentence, i. e. for want of issue of him, make an estate-tail, by qualifying and abridging the same. 5 Mod. 266; 3 Salk. 337. See Helt. 57; Dyer, 834; and tit. Remainder.

If a person gives land to A. for life, and after his death without issue, then to another person; though here is an express estate for life given to A. the subsequent words make an estate-tail. But where lands are devised to A. during life, the remainder to trustees, remainder to his first son, &c. and if A. dies without issue, then, &c. the limitation upon the devisee's death, it is said, will not give an estate in tail to A. but it shall be here intended, that if he died without having a son. 1 P. Wms. 605. A father having two sons devised his lands to his youngest son, and if he died without heirs, then to his eldest son and his heirs; the youngest son had an estate-tail, because the devise to him, and if he died without heirs, is the same as if the testator had devised it in these words, viz. if he die without heirs of his body; for otherwise the remainder limited to the eldest son had been void, as the youngest son cannot die without heirs so long as the eldest is living. 1 Roll. Abr. 836. See also Executory Devise, Remainder.

In ejectment the case was, the father, having three sons, devised his lands to his second son and his heirs for ever, and for want of such heirs, then to the right heirs of the father; then the father died, and his second son entered, and died without issue, leaving the eldest son; it was resolved, that the second son had but an estate-tail, and that the devise over by these words, "and for want of such heirs," is void in point of limitation, for the testator's intent was that the lands should descend from himself, and not from his second son; and the words "want of such heirs" could import no other than want of issue, &c.; so that the eldest son takes by descent in this case, and not by the will. 1 Salk. 250. See Executory Devise.

A person devised land to his wife for life, remainder to his son, and his heirs for ever; and if he died without heirs, the same to remain to his two daughters: in this case it was held in equity, that the rule is, where a remainder over is to one who may be the devisee's heir at law, such limitation will be good, and the first construed an estate-tail; for the generality of the word heirs shall be restrained to heirs of the body, since the testator could not but know that the devisee would not die without an heir, while the remainder-man or any of his issue continued. But where the second limitation is to a stranger, it is merely void, and the first is a fee-simple. Talbot's Chan. Ca. 2. See Executory Devise, Remainder.

There is also another species of entailed estates, now indeed grown out of use, yet still capable of subsisting in law; which are estates in libero maritagio, or frank-marriage. These are defined to be, where tenements are given by one man to another, together with a wife, who is the daughter or cousin of the donor, to hold in frank-marriage. Litt. § 17. Now by such gift, though nothing but the word frank-marriage is expressed, the donees shall have the tenements to them, and the heirs of their two bodies begotten, that is, they are tenants in special tail. For this one word, frank-marriage, does, ex vi termini, not only create an inheritance, like the word frankalmoign, but likewise limits that inheritance; supplying not only words of descent, but of procreation also. Such donees in frank marriage are liable to no service but fealty; for a rent reserved thereon is void, until the fourth degree of consanguinity be past between the issues of the donor and donee. Litt. § 19, 20. See Frank-marriage.

III. THE incidents to a tenancy in tail, under the stat. Westm. 2. are chiefly these—1. That a tenant in tail may commit waste on the estate-tail, by felling timber, pulling down houses, or the like, without being impeached or called to account for the same. 2. That the wife of the tenant in tail shall have her dower, or thirds, of the estate-tail. 3. That the husband of a female tenant in tail may be tenant by the curtesy of the estate-tail. 4. That an estate-tail might, until recently, be barred, or destroyed by a fine, by a common recovery, or by lineal warranty descending with assets to the heir. 1 Inst. 224; 10 Rep. 38; and may now be barred by deed under the provisions of the late statute, see post, IV.

The establishment of this family law (as the statute de donis is properly styled by Pigott) occasioned, from time to time, infinite difficulties and disputes. Children grew disobedient when they knew they could not be set aside; farmers were ousted of their leases made by tenants in tail; for, if such leases had been valid, then, under colour of long leases, the issue might have been virtually disinherited: creditors were defrauded of their debts; for, if tenant in tail could have charged his estate with their payment, he might also have defeated his issue, by mortgaging it for as much as it was worth. Innumerable latent entails were produced to deprive purchasers of the lands they had fairly bought; of suits in consequence of which our ancient books are full. And treasons were encouraged; as estates-tail were not liable to forfeiture, longer than for the tenant's life. So that they were justly branded as the source of new contentions, and mischiefs unknown to the common law; and almost universally considered as the common grievance of the realm. Co. Litt. 19; Moor, 156; 10 Rep. 38. But as the nobility was always fond of this statute, because it preserved their family estates from forfeiture, there was little hope of procuring a repeal by the legislature; and therefore, by the connivance of an active and politic prince, a method was devised to evade it. 2 Comm. c. 7.

About two hundred years intervened between the making of the statute de donis, and the application of common recoveries to this intent, in the twelfth year of Edward IV., which were then openly declared by the judges to be a sufficient bar of an estate-tail. 1 Rep. 111, 112; 10 Rep. 39. For though the courts had, so long before as the reign of Edward III., very frequently limited their opinion that a bar might be effected upon these principles, yet it never was carried into execution; till Edward IV., observing in the disputes between the Houses of York and Lancaster, how little were protected by the sanctuaries of entails, gave his countenance to this proceeding, and suffered Talbot's case to be brought before the court, wherein, in consequence of the principles then laid down, it was in effect determined, that a common recovery suffered by tenant in tail should be an effectual destruction thereof. 1 Year-book 1 Edw. 3, 14, 19; 10 Rep. 39; 20 Bro. Abr.; Ibid. 30; tit. Fine of Recover, in Value, 19; tit. Taille, 36. See further, Fine of Lands, Recovery.

This expedient having greatly abridged estates-tail, with regard to their duration, others were soon invented to strip them of other privileges. The next that was attacked was their freedom from forfeitures for treason. For, notwithstanding the large advances made by recoveries, in the compass of about threescore years, towards unfettering these inheritances, and thereby subjecting the lands to forfeiture, the rapacious prince then reigning, finding them frequently resettled in a similar manner to suit the convenience of families, had address enough to procure a statute, (26 Hen. 8. c. 13.) whereby all estates of inheritance (under which general words estates-tail were covertly included) are declared to be forfeited to the king upon any conviction of high treason. 2 Comm. c. 7.

The next attack which they suffered in order of time, was by the 32 Hen. 8. c. 28. whereby certain leases made by tenants in tail, which do not tend to the prejudice of the issue, were allowed to be good in law, and to bind the issue in tail. See Lease, II. But they received a more violent blow, in the same session of parliament, by the construction put upon the statute of fines, (4 Hen. 7. c. 24.) by 32 Hen. 8. c. 36. which declared a fine duly levied by tenant in tail to be a complete bar to him and his heirs, and all other persons claiming under such entail. This was evidently agreeable to the intention of Henry VII., whose policy it was (before common recoveries had obtained their full strength and authority) to lay the road as open as possible to the alienation of landed property, in order to weaken the overgrown power of his nobles. But as they, from the opposite reasons, were not easily brought to consent to such a provision, it was therefore couched, in his act, under covert and obscure expressions. And the judges, though willing to construe that statute as favourably as possible for the defeating of entailed estates, yet hesitated at giving fines so extensive a power by mere implication, when the statute de donis had expressly declared, that they should not be a bar to estates-tail. But the statute of Henry VIII., when the doctrine of alienation was better received, and the will of the prince more implicitly obeyed than before, avowed and established that intention. Yet, in order to preserve the property of the crown from any danger of infringement, all estates-tail created by the crown, and of which the crown has the reversion, were excepted out of this statute. And the same was done with regard to common recoveries, by the 34 & 35 Hen. 8. c. 20. which enacted, that no feigned recovery had against tenants in tail, where the estate was created by the crown, and the remainder or reversion continues still in the crown, should be of any force and effect. Which was allowing, indirectly and collaterally, their full force and effect with respect to ordinary estates-tail, where the royal prerogative was not concerned. 1 Inst. 372; 2 Comm. c. 7.

Lastly, by the 33 Hen. 8. c. 39. § 75. all estates-tail are rendered liable to be charged for payment of debts due to the king by record or special contract; as since, by the bankrupt laws, they are also subjected to be sold for the debts contracted by a bankrupt. See the clauses in the recent statute, post, IV. And by the construction put on the 43 Eliz. c. 4. an appointment by tenant in tail of the lands entailed, to a charitable use, was held good, without fine or recovery. See further, Charitable Uses.

Estates-tail, being thus by degrees unfettered, are reduced again to almost the same state, even before issue born, as conditional fees were in at common law, after the condition was performed, by the birth of issue. For, first, the tenant in tail was, until recently, enabled to alien his lands and tenements by fine, by recovery, or by certain other means, and he may now do so by deed, post, IV.; and thereby may defeat the interest as well of his own issue, though unborn, as also of the reversioner, except in the case of the crown. Secondly, he is liable to forfeit them for high treason. And, lastly, he may charge them with reasonable leases, and also with such of his debts as are due to the crown, on specialties, or have been contracted with his fellow subjects in a course of extensive commerce. 2 Comm. c. 7.

An estate-tail cannot merge by the accession of the fee-simple to it. But it has been adjudged, that two fees immediately expectant upon one another, (as where a man is tenant in tail and remainder in fee to the tenant in tail,) cannot subsist in the same person; and the statute de donis having made estates-tail a kind of particular estates, they must, like all other such estates, be subject to merger and extinguishing, when united with the absolute fee. 8 Rep. 74; 1 Salk. 388.

By the recent statute, base fees, when united with the immediate reversions, are to be enlarged instead of merging in the latter, as they formerly would have done. See post, IV.

IV. By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 74. fines and common recoveries have been abolished. See the clauses of the act applicable to each of these modes of assurance under the titles Fine of Land, and Recovery.

By § 14. all warranties of lands after the 31st December 1833, made or entered into by any tenant in tail thereof shall be absolutely void against the issue in tail, and all persons whose estates are to take effect after the determination or in defeasance of the estate tail.

By § 15. after the 31st Dec. 1833, every actual tenant in tail, whether in possession, remainder, contingency, or otherwise, shall have full power to dispose of for an estate in fee-simple absolute, or for any less estate, the lands entailed, as against all persons claiming the lands entailed by force of any estate-tail which shall be vested in or might be claimed by, or which but for some previous act would have been vested in or might have been claimed by, the person making the disposition, at the time of his making the same, and also as against all persons, including his majesty, whose estates are to take effect after the determination or in defeasance of any such estate-tail; saving always the rights of all persons in respect of estates prior to the estate-tail in respect of which such disposition shall be made, and the rights of all other persons, except those against whom such disposition is by the act authorized to be made. See § 40. post.

A tenant for life in possession, with a remote remainder in tail, could by a recovery with double voucher have barred such entail, but without prejudice to the intermediate interests between his estate for life and remainder in tail. 1 T. R. 738; 6 Br. P. C. 388.

§ 16. Provides that where, under any settlement made before the passing of the act, any woman shall be tenant in tail of lands within the provisions of the 11 Hen. 7. c. 20. the power of disposition therein-before contained as to such lands shall not be exercised by her except with such assent as would under the said act have rendered valid a fine or common recovery levied or suffered by her of such lands.

Provided (§ 17.) except as to lands in settlements before that act, the 11 Hen. 7. c. 20. shall be repealed.

§ 18. Provides that the power of disposition therein before contained shall not extend to tenants of estates-tail who, by the 34 & 35 Hen. 8. c. 20. (relating to lands where the reversion is in the crown,) or by any other act are restrained from barring their estates-tail, or to tenants in tail after possibility of issue extinct.

§ 19. After the 31st Dec. 1833, in every case in which an estate-tail in any lands shall have been barred and converted into a base fee, either before or on or after that day, the person who, if such estate-tail had not been barred, would have been actual tenant in tail of the same lands shall have full power to dispose of such lands as against all persons, including his majesty, whose estates are to take effect after the determination of the base fee into which the estate-tail shall have been converted, so as to enlarge the base fee into a fee-simple absolute; saving always the rights of all persons in respect of estates prior to the estate-tail which shall have been converted into a base fee, and the rights of all other persons, except those against whom such disposition is by the act authorized to be made.

§ 20. That nothing in the act contained shall enable any person to dispose of any lands entailed in respect of any expectant interest which he may have as issue inheritable to any estate-tail therein.

§ 21. That if a tenant in tail of lands shall make a disposition of the same, under the act, by way of mortgage, or for any other limited purpose, such disposition shall, to the extent of the estate thereby created, be an absolute bar in equity as well as at law to all persons as against whom such disposition is by the act authorized, notwithstanding any intention to the contrary expressed or implied in the deed by which the disposition may be effected: provided that if the estate created by such disposition shall be only an estate pour autre vie, or for years absolute or determinable, or if, by a disposition under the act by a tenant in tail of lands, an interest, charge, lien, or incumbrance shall be created without a term of years absolute or determinable, or any greater estate, for securing or raising the same, then such disposition shall in equity be a bar only so far as may be necessary to give full effect to the mortgage, or to such other limited purpose, or to such interest, &c., notwithstanding any intention to the contrary expressed or implied in the deed by which the disposition may be effected.

By § 22. the owner of the first existing estate under a settlement, prior to an estate tail under the same settlement, is to be the protector of the settlement. And the following sections, from § 23. to 31. contain a variety of provisions with respect to whom shall be the protector of the settlement according to the circumstances of the case.

§ 32. Any settlor entailing lands may appoint, by the settlement by which the lands shall be entailed, any number of persons in esse, not exceeding three, and not being aliens, to be protector of the settlement in lieu of the person who would have been the protector if this clause had not been inserted, and either for the whole or any part of the period for which such person might have continued protector, and by means of a power to be inserted in such settlement to perpetuate during the whole or any part of such period the protectorship of the settlement in any one person or number of persons in esse, and not being an alien or aliens, whom the donee of the power shall think proper by deed to appoint protector of the settlement in the place of any one person or number of persons who shall die or shall by deed relinquish his or their office of protector; and the person or persons so appointed shall, in case of there being no other person then protector of the settlement, be the protector, and shall, in case of there being any other person then protector of the settlement, be protector jointly with such other person: provided that by virtue of any such appointment the number of the persons to compose the protector shall never exceed three. provided further, that every deed by which a protector shall be appointed under a power in a settlement, and every deed by which a protector shall relinquish his office, shall be void, unless inrolled in Chancery within six calendar months after the execution thereof: provided further, that the person who but for this clause would have been sole protector of the settlement may be one of the persons to be appointed protector under this clause, if the settlor shall think fit, and shall, unless otherwise directed by the settlor, act as sole protector if the other persons constituting the protector shall have ceased to be so by death or relinquishment of the office by deed, and no other person shall have been appointed in their place.

§ 33. In cases of lunacy of protectors, the lord chancellor, or lord keeper, or lords commissioners, or other persons intrusted with lunatics or in cases of treason or felony, &c. the Court of Chancery shall be the protector of the settlement.

§ 34. If at the time when any person, actual tenant in tail of lands under a settlement, but not entitled to the remainder or reversion in fee immediately expectant on the determination of his estate tail, shall be desirous of making under this act a disposition of the lands entailed, there shall be a protector of such settlement, then the consent of such protector shall be requisite to enable such actual tenant in tail to dispose of the lands entailed to the full extent to which he is therein-before authorized to dispose of the same; but such actual tenant in tail may, without such consent, make a disposition under this act of the lands entailed, which shall be good against all persons who, by force of any estate tail which shall be vested in or might be claimed by, or whoa but for some previous act or default would have been vested in or might have been claimed by, the person making the disposition at the time of his making the same, shall claim the lands entailed.

§ 35. Provided, where an estate tail shall have been converted into a base fee, in such case, so long as there shall be a protector of the settlement by which the estate tail was created, the consent of such protector shall be requisite to enable the person who would have been tenant of the estate tail if the same had not been barred to exercise, as to the lands in respect of which there shall be such protector, the power of disposition thereinbefore contained.

§ 36. Any device, shift, or contrivance by which it shall be attempted to control the protector of a settlement in giving his consent, or to prevent him in any way from using his absolute discretion in regard to his consent, and also any agreement entered into by the protector of a settlement to withhold his consent, shall be void, and the protector of a settlement shall not be deemed to be a trustee in respect of his power of consent; and a court of equity shall not control or interfere to restrain the exercise of his power of consent, nor treat his giving consent as a breach of trust.

§ 37. The rules of equity in relation to dealings and transactions between the donor of a power and any object of the power in whose favour the same may be exercised, shall not be held to apply to dealings and transactions between the protector of a settlement and a tenant in tail under the same settlement, upon the occasion of the protector giving his consent to a disposition by a tenant in tail under this act.

§ 38. When a tenant in tail of lands under a settlement shall have already created or shall hereafter create in such lands, a voidable estate in favour of a purchaser for valuable consideration, and shall afterwards under this act, by any disposition of the lands in which such voidable estate shall be created, such disposition, whatever its object may be, and whatever the extent of the estate intended to be thereby created, shall, if made by the tenant in tail with the consent of the protector (if any) of the settlement, or by the tenant in tail alone, if no such protector, have the effect of confirming such voidable estate in the lands thereby disposed of to its full extent as against all persons except those whose rights are saved by this act; but if at the time of making the disposition there shall be a protector of the settlement, and such protector shall not consent to the disposition, and the tenant in tail shall not without such consent be enabled under this act of confirming the voidable estate to its full extent, then such disposition shall have the effect of confirming such voidable estate so far as such tenant in tail would then be enabled under this act of confirming the same without such consent: provided, that if such disposition shall be made to a purchaser for valuable consideration, who shall not have received notice of the voidable estate, then the voidable estate shall not be confirmed as against such purchaser and persons claiming under him.

§ 39. If a base fee in any lands, and the remainder or reversion in fee in the same lands, shall at the time of the passing of this act, or at any time afterwards, be united in the same person, and at any time after the passing of this act there shall be no intermediate estate between the base fee and the remainder or reversion, then the base fee shall not merge, but shall be ipso facto enlarged into as large an estate as the tenant in tail, with the consent of the protector, if any, might have created by any disposition under this act, if such remainder or reversion had been vested in any other person.

§ 40. Every disposition of lands under this act by a tenant in tail thereof shall be effected by some one of the assurances (not being a will) by which such tenant in tail could have made the disposition if his estate were an estate at law in fee simple absolute: provided, that no disposition by a tenant in tail shall be of any force either at law or in equity, under this act, unless made or evidenced by deed; and no disposition by a tenant in tail resting only in contract, either express or implied, or otherwise, and whether supported by a valuable or meritorious consideration or not, shall be of any force at law or in equity under this act, notwithstanding such disposition shall be made or evidenced by deed; and if the tenant in tail making the disposition shall be a married woman, the concurrence of her husband shall be necessary to give effect to the same; and any deed which may be executed by her for effecting the disposition shall be acknowledged by her as therein-after directed.

§ 41. Every assurance by a tenant in tail, except a lease not exceeding twenty-one years at a rack rent, or not less than five sixths of a rack rent, shall be inoperative unless enrolled in Chancery within six months.

§ 42. The consent of the protector may be given by the same assurance or by a distinct deed.

§ 43. And if the protector of a settlement shall, by a distinct deed, give his consent to the disposition of a tenant in tail, it shall be considered he has given an unqualified consent, unless in such deed he shall refer to the particular assurance by which the disposition shall be effected, and shall confine his consent to the disposition thereby made.

§ 44. The protector shall not revoke his consent.

§ 45. A married woman being protector may consent as a feme sole.

§ 46. The consent of a protector by distinct deed shall be void, unless enrolled with or before the assurance.

By § 47. courts of equity excluded from giving any effect to dispositions by tenants in tail, or consents of protectors of settlements, which in courts of law would not be effectual.

§ 48. The lord chancellor, &c. where a protector is lunatic, shall have power to consent to a disposition by a tenant in tail, and to make such orders as shall be thought necessary; and if any other person shall be joint protector the disposition not to be valid without his consent.

And (§ 49.) the order of the lord chancellor, &c. shall be evidence of consent.

§ 50. All the previous clauses in the act, so far as circumstances and the different tenures will admit, shall apply to lands held by copy of court roll, except that a disposition of any such lands under this act by a tenant in tail thereof, whose estate shall be an estate at law, shall be made by surrender, and except that a disposition of any such lands under this act by a tenant in tail thereof, whose estate shall be merely an estate in equity, may be made either by a surrender or by a deed as thereinafter provided, and except so far as such clauses are otherwise altered or varied by the clauses thereinafter contained.

§ 51 & 52. relate to the verity of the consent of the protector of copyhold lands in the rolls of the manor.

§ 53. A tenant in tail of lands held by copy of court roll, whose estate shall be merely an estate in equity, shall have full power by deed to dispose of such lands under this act in the same manner as he could have done if they had been of freehold tenure; and all the previous clauses in this act shall, so far as circumstances will admit, apply to the lands in respect of which any such equitable tenant in tail shall avail himself of this present clause; and the deed by which the disposition shall be effected shall be entered on the court rolls of the manor of which the lands thereby disposed of may be parcel; and if there shall be a protector to consent to the disposition, and such protector shall give his consent by a distinct deed, the consent shall be void unless the deed of consent be executed by the protector either on or at any time before the day on which the deed of disposition shall be executed by the equitable tenant in tail; and such deed of consent shall be entered on the court rolls; and it shall be imperative on the lord of the manor, or his steward, or the deputy of such steward, when required so to do, to enter such deed or deeds on the court rolls, and he shall indorse on each deed so entered a memorandum, signed by him, testifying the entry of the same on the court rolls: provided always, that every deed by which lands held by copy of court roll shall be disposed of under this clause, by an equitable tenant in tail thereof, shall be void against any person claiming such lands, or any of them, for valuable consideration under any subsequent assurance duly entered on the court rolls of the manor of which the lands may be parcel, unless the deed of disposition by the equitable tenant in tail be entered on the court rolls of such manor before the subsequent assurance shall have been entered.

§ 44. Inrolment not necessary as to copyholds, otherwise than by entry on the court rolls.

§ 55. Repeals the bankrupt act, 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. § 65. so far as relates to estates tail, but is not to extend to lands of a bankrupt under a commission or fiat issued on or before the 31st of December, 1833, nor to revive former acts.

§ 56. The commissioner, in the case of an actual tenant in tail becoming bankrupt after the 31st of December, 1833, by deed may dispose of the lands of the bankrupt to a purchaser. If there be a protector who shall not consent, the estate created by the commissioners shall be as large as the bankrupt could have created without such consent.

§ 57. The commissioner, in case of a tenant in tail entitled to a base fee becoming bankrupt, and of there being no protector, is by deed to dispose of the lands of the bankrupt to a purchaser.

§ 58. relates to the consent of the protector in case of bankruptcy.

§ 59. requires, in cases of bankruptcy, the inrolment in Chancery of the deed of disposition of freehold lands, and the entry on the court rolls of the deed of disposition of copyhold lands; and of the deed of consent.

§ 60. If any commissioner acting in the execution of any such fiat as aforesaid shall, under this act, dispose of any lands of any tenure of which the bankrupt shall be actual tenant in tail, and in consequence of there being a protector of the settlement by which the estate of such actual tenant in tail was created, and of his not giving his consent, only a base fee shall by such disposition be created in such lands, and if at any time afterwards during the continuance of the base fee there shall cease to be a protector of such settlement, then immediately thereupon, such base fee shall be enlarged into the same estate into which the same could have been enlarged under this act if at the time of the disposition by such commissioner as aforesaid there had been no such protector.

§ 61. If a tenant in tail entitled to a base fee in lands of any tenure shall be adjudged a bankrupt at the time when there shall be a protector of the settlement by which the estate tail converted into the base fee was created, and if such lands shall be sold or conveyed under the present bankrupt acts, or either of them, or any other acts hereafter to be passed concerning bankrupts, and if at any time afterwards during the continuance of the base fee in such lands there shall cease to be a protector of such settlement, then immediately thereupon, the base fee in such lands shall be enlarged into the same estate into which the same could have been enlarged under this act if at the time of the adjudication of such bankruptcy there had been no such protector, and the commissioner acting in the execution of the fiat under which the tenant in tail so entitled shall have been adjudged a bankrupt had disposed of such lands under this act.

§ 63. All acts and deeds done and executed by a tenant in tail of lands of any tenure, adjudged a bankrupt, and which shall affect such lands, and which, if he had been entitled to such lands in fee simple absolute, would have been void against the assignees of the bankrupt's estate, and all persons claiming under them, shall be void against any disposition made of such lands under this act by such commissioner as aforesaid.

§ 64. Subject to the powers given to the commissioner, and to the estate in the assignees, a bankrupt tenant in tail shall retain his powers of disposition.

§ 65. The disposition by the commissioner of the lands of a bankrupt tenant in tail shall, if the bankrupt be dead, have in the cases therein mentioned the same operation as if he were alive.

§ 66. Every disposition by the commissioner of copyhold lands where the estate shall not be equitable shall have the same operation as a surrender; and the person to whom such land shall have been disposed of may claim to be admitted on paying the fines, &c.

§ 67. The rents of lands, of which any commissioner has power to make disposition under this act shall, until such disposition, or until it shall be ascertained that such disposition shall not be required for the benefit of the creditors of the bankrupt, be received by his assignees for the benefit of his creditors; and the assignees may proceed by action on debt for the recovery of such rents, or may distrain for the same, and in case trespass shall be brought for taking away such distress may plead thereto the general issue, and give this act or other special matter in evidence, and also, in case any such distress shall be replevied, shall have power to sue or make cognizance generally in such manner as any landlord may do by virtue of the 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. or by any other law now or hereafter to be made for the recovering of rent in arrear; and such assignees, and their bailiffs, agents, and servants, shall also have the same remedies, powers, privileges, and advantages of pleading, avowing, and making cognizance, and be entitled to the same costs and damages, and the same remedies for the recovery thereof, as landlords, their bailiffs, agents, and servants, are or hereafter may be by law entitled to have when rent is in arrear; and such assignees shall also have the same power of enforcing covenants, conditions, and agreements in respect of the lands of which such commissioner has the power of disposition under this act, and in respect of the rents thereof, and of entry into the same lands for the nonobservance of any such covenant, and of moving therefrom the tenants or other occupants thereof, and thereby determining the estate of the person who shall not have observed such covenants, &c. as the bankrupt would have had in case he had not been adjudged a bankrupt: provided, that this clause shall apply to all lands held by copy of court roll, but shall only apply to those lands of any other tenure which any commissioner acting in the execution of any such fiat as aforesaid may have power to dispose of under this act after the bankrupt's decease.

By § 68. all the provisions of the act in regard to bankrupts shall apply to their lands in Ireland.

And § 69. deeds relating to the lands of bankrupts in Ireland are to be inrolled in the Court of Chancery there.

§ 70. Repeals the 7 Geo. 4. c. 45. except as to proceedings commenced before 1st Jan. 1834, but the 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 56. (passed for the relief of persons entitled to entailed estates to be purchased with trust moneys,) is not to be revived.

By § 71. the previous clauses, with certain variations, are to apply to lands of any tenure to be sold, where the purchase money is subject to be invested in the purchase of lands to be entailed, and also to apply to money subject to be invested in like manner. See Trust.

§ 72. As regards bankrupts the provisions of the last mentioned clause shall apply to lands of any tenure in Ireland, to be sold, where the purchase money is subject to be invested in the purchase of lands to be entailed, and also to money under the control of a court of equity in Ireland, subject to be invested in like manner.

§ 73. Any rule or practice requiring deeds to be acknowledged before enrolment shall not apply to any deed by this act required to be inrolled in the Court of Chancery in England or Ireland.

§ 74. And every deed required to be inrolled in Chancery in England or Ireland, by which lands, or money subject to be invested in the purchase of lands, shall be disposed of under this act, shall, when inrolled as required by this act, operate and take effect in the same manner as it would have done if the inrolment thereof had not been required, except that every such deed shall be void against any person claiming the lands or money thereby disposed of, or any part thereof, for valuable consideration, under any subsequent deed duly inrolled under this act, if such subsequent deed shall be first inrolled.

TAILZIE OR ENTAIL, in Scotland, is applied to deeds whereby the legal line of succession is cut off, and an arbitrary one, according to the choice of the proprietor, substituted in its stead. In this view it appears very similar to the tail or fee-tail of the English law. But its operation is governed by very different and peculiar rules, dependent on the different forms of the Scottish law. See Bell's Scotch Law Dict. tit. Entail.

TAIL AFTER POSSIBILITY OF ISSUE EXTINGUISHED, is where lands and tenements are given to a man and his wife in special tail, and either of them dies without issue had between them, the survivor hath an estate in tail after possibility of issue, &c. Also if they have issue, and the issue dies without issue, whereby there is none left who may inherit by force of the entail the survivor of the donees hath an estate tail after possibility. Litt. § 32. The estate of this tenant must be created by the act of God, viz. by the death of either party without issue: none can have this estate but one of the donees, or a donee in special tail; for a donee in general tail may by possibility have issue. Litt. § 32; 1 Inst. 28; 11 Rep. 80. And if one gives lands to a man and his wife, and the heirs of their two bodies in special tail, and they live till each of them are a hundred years old, and have no issue, yet doth the law see no impossibility of having children, and they continue tenants in tail. But if the wife die without issue, there the law seeth an apparent impossibility. 1 Inst. 28. See Tenures, III. 7.

This estate is considered by Blackstone as an estate for life of the legal kind, contradistinguished from such as are conventional. See Life-Estates. Blackstone also shows the propriety of the long periphrasis which the law makes use of, as absolutely necessary to give an adequate idea of the nature of this estate. 2 Comm. c. 8. p. 124.

This estate is, by the learned commentator, said to be of an amphibious nature, parting partly of an estate tail, and partly of an estate for life. The tenant is in truth only tenant for life, but with many of the privileges of a tenant in tail; or he is tenant in tail, with many of the restrictions of a tenant for life; as to forfeit his estate if he alien it in fee-simple: whereas such alienation by tenant in tail, though voidable by the issue, is no forfeiture of the estate to the reversioner, who is not concerned in interest till all possibility of issue be extinct. But in general, the law looks upon this estate as equivalent to an estate for life only; and, as such, will permit this tenant to exchange his estate with a tenant for life; which exchange can only be made of estates that are equal in their nature. See Exchange of Lands.

A tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct having once been tenant in tail unto the other donee, and therefore punishable for waste, may not only commit waste, but convert to his own use the property wasted, and he shall not be restrained in equity except for malicious waste. 15 Ves. 427. See Waste. 2 Comm. c. 8 & n. See also 1 Inst. 27, 28. and the notes there; and 2 P. Wms. 240.

TAKING, felonious or unlawful. See Felony, Fraud, Larceny.

TALENT. A weight of sixty-two pounds; also a sum of money among the Greeks, of about 100*l.* value. Merch. Dict.

TALES, Lat.] A supply in case of a jury not appearing, or challenged as not indifferent, &c. of one or more such persons present in court as are equal in reputation to those that were impanelled, in order to make up a full jury. See Jury.

TALES-BOOK, name of the book in the King's Bench Office, of such persons as are admitted of the tales. 4 Inst. 93.

TALLAGE, tallagium, from the Fr. taille.] Is metaphorically used for a part or a share of a man's substance, carved out of the whole, paid by way of tribute, toll, or tax. Stat. de tallagio non concedendo, temp. Edw. 1.; Ston's Ann. 445. And according to Sir Edw. Coke, tallage is a general word for all taxes. 2 Inst. 532. See Taxes.

TALLAGERS. Tax or toll gatherers, mentioned by Chaucer.

TALLAGIUM FACERE. To give up accounts in the Exchequer, where the method of accounting was by tallies. Mem. in Scacc. Mich. 6 Edw. 1.

TALLEY, tallea; Fr. taille; Ital. tagliare, i. e. scindere.] A stick cut in two parts, on each whereof is marked, with notches or otherwise, what is due between debtor and creditor; as now used by brewers, &c. And this was the ancient way of keeping all accounts, one part being kept by the creditor, the other by the debtor, &c. Hence the tallier of the Exchequer, whom we now call the teller.

There were two kinds of tallies formerly used in the Exchequer; the one termed tallies of debt, which were in the nature of an acquittance for debts paid to the king, on the payment whereof these tallies were delivered to the debtors, who, carrying them to the clerk of the Pipe-office, had there an acquittance in parchment for their full discharge. 1 R. 2. c. 5. The other, tallies of reward or allowance, being made to sheriffs of counties, as a recompense for such matters as they had performed in their charge, or such money as was cast upon them in their accounts of course, but not leviable, &c. 27 Hen. 8. c. 11; 33 & 34 Hen. 8; 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 4.

The use of these tallies was abolished by the 23 Geo. 3. c. 82; but the old tallies were preserved in the Exchequer until recently, when, in consequence of a further change taking place in the keeping of the public accounts, under the provisions of the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 15. they were ordered to be destroyed. They were accordingly employed to heat the stoves in the House of Lords, and are said to have been the cause, from having been burnt in too large quantities, of the fire which broke out in the month of October, 1834, and consumed the two Houses of Parliament.

TALLIA. Every canon and prebendary in our old cathedral churches had a stated allowance of provisions delivered to him per modum tallia; and thence their commons in meat and drink were called tallia. Sta. Sti. Paul. Ann. 1205.

TALWOOD, talliatura. Firewood cleft and cut into billets of a certain length; otherwise written talgwood and talshide, in the ancient stats. 34 & 35 Hen. 8. c. 3; 7 Edw. 6. c. 7; 43 Eliz. c. 14. (now repealed.)

TANISTRY. Seems to be derived from thanis; and is a law or custom in some parts of Ireland; on which see Dav. Rep. 28; Antiq. Hibern. p. 38; 1 Inst.; and tit. Gavelkind, ad fin.

TANNERS. See Leather.

TARE AND TRET. The first is an allowance in merchandise, made the buyer for the weight of the box, bag, or cask, wherein goods are packed; and the last is a consideration in the weight, for waste in emptying and reselling the goods, by dust, dirt, breakage, &c. Book Rates

Tare is distinguished into real tare, customary tare and average tare. The first is the actual weight of the package; the second its supposed weight according to the practice among merchants; and the third is the medium tare, deduced from weighing a few packages and taking it as a standard for the whole. In Amsterdam and some other commercial cities, tares are generally fixed by custom; but in this country, the prevailing practice, as to all goods that can be unpacked without injury, both at the custom-house and among merchants, is to ascertain the real tare. McCulloch's Comm. Dict.

TARGET, from Lat. targus. A shield originally made of leather, wrought out of the back of an ox. Blount.

TARGIA, tarida. Was a ship of burden, since called a Tartan, and Tarita. Knighton, anno, 1385.

TARIFF. A table, alphabetically arranged, specifying the various duties, drawbacks, bounties, &c. charged and allowed upon merchandise exported and imported. See Customs on Merchandise.

TARTARON. A sort of fine cloth or silk. 4 Hen. 8. c. 6.

TAS, Fr.] A cock, heap, stack, or rick of hay or corn. Law Fr. Dict.

TAURI LIBERI LIBERTAS. In ancient charters, is used for a common bull; so called, because he is free and common to all the tenants within such a manor or liberty, &c.

TAXATIO ECCLESIASTICA, TAXATIO NORWICENSIS. The valuation of ecclesiastical benefices made through every diocese in England, on occasion of Pope Innocent IV. granting to King Henry III. the tenth of all spirituals for three years. Which taxation was first made by Walter, bishop of Norwich, delegated by the pope to this office in 38 Hen. 3. This taxation is sometimes called Pope Innocent's Valor.

In the year 1288, Pope Nicholas IV. granted the tenths to King Edward I., for six years, towards defraying the expense of an expedition to the Holy Land; and that they might be collected to their full value, a taxation by the king's precept was begun in that year, (1288,) and finished as to the province of Canterbury in 1291, and as to that of York in the following year; the whole being under the direction of John, bishop of Winton, and Oliver, bishop of Lincoln.

A third taxation, entitled "nova taxatio," as to some part of the province of York, was made A. D. 1318, (11 Edw. 2.) by virtue of a royal mandate directed to the bishop of Carlisle, chiefly on account of the invasion of the Scots, by which the clergy of those border counties were rendered unable to pay the former tax.

The taxation of Pope Nicholas is a most important record, because all the taxes, as well to our kings as to the popes, were regulated by it, until the survey made in the 26th year of Henry VIII.; and because the statutes of colleges which were founded before the Reformation, are also interpreted by this criterion, according to which their benefices under a certain value were exempted from the restriction in the 21 Hen. 8. c. 13. concerning pluralities.

Various detached parts of this record have been published in different county histories; but the whole was for the first time published in the year 1802 under the direction of the commissioners on the public records, from two MSS. in the king's remembrancer's office, Exchequer, collated with a Cottonian manuscript of much greater antiquity in the British museum, Tiberius C. X. which has unfortunately suffered some damage from the fire which happened to the Cottonian library whilst lodged in the dormitory at Westminster. The original rolls for several dioceses are still extant in the Exchequer, and these were also consulted in the above publication.

By a strange carelessness in the introductory note to the volume, published under such high authority, mention is made of Pope Innocent XXII. instead of Pope Innocent IV.

A new valor beneficiorum was instituted in 26 Hen. 8. when the first-fruits and tenths of every ecclesiastical promotion were annexed to the revenue of the crown, by 26 Hen. 8. c. 3. To ascertain their value, ecclesiastical surveys were taken by virtue of commissions in the king's name issuing under the great seal, 26 Hen. 8. c. 3. § 2. 9; and these surveys, preserved in the First-Fruits Office, are admitted as evidence of the amount at that period, although they are generally considered as estimating the value much too low. 3 Gentl. Tithe Cases, 856. 1240. These surveys are commonly called the king's books, according to which the value of livings is ascertained in case of pluralities. See Plurality. In like manner, and upon the same principle, surveys of the possessions of religious houses, previous to the dissolution of monasteries, are received in evidence, Kellington, Vicar. v. Trinity Coll. Camb. 1 Wils. 170; and these surveys are held admissible, although the commissions under which they were taken are not now to be found. See 1 Wils. 170; 2 Gentl. 542.

TAXERS. Two officers yearly chosen in Cambridge to see the true gauge of all weights and measures; though the name took rise from taxing or rating the rents of houses, which was anciently the duty of their offices.

TAX, taxa, from the Gr. τάξις, i. e. ordo, tributio] 4 tribute or imposition laid upon the subject, which being certain and orderly rated, was wont to be yearly paid into the king's Exchequer. It differs from what is commonly called a subsidy in this, that it is always certain, as it is set down in the exchequer book, and levied in general of every town, and not particularly of every man, &c. See Rastall's Abridgment, titles Fifteenth, Subsidies, Taxes, Tenths, &c. and 4 Inst. 26. 33.

A tax may now be defined to be a certain aid, subsidy, or supply, granted by the commons in parliament assembled, and confirmed by act of parliament; constituting the king's extraordinary revenue, and paid yearly towards the expenses of government. 1 Comm. c. 8. See Liberty.

Under title King, V. 4. the taxes are stated from Blackstone, as part of the king's extraordinary revenue, as applicable to the purposes of government they may, however, more properly be considered as the national revenue applicable to public purposes—the following is a very concise statement of their nature and amount. See more fully under the several titles, Customs, Excise, &c.

The taxes now levied on the subject are applicable to the purpose of supplying the public expenses, resulting from the support of the navy, the army, the interest of the national debt, and the annual expenses of government. These taxes, in the accounts annually laid before parliament under the act 42 Geo. 3 c. 75, are distinguished under the two heads of Ordinary Revenues and Extraordinary Resources: the ordinary revenues are either annual or permanent: the annual revenues were heretofore those arising from the land tax, the excise on malt, and a duty on pensions and offices: since the land-tax has been made perpetual for the purpose of redemption, (see Land Tax), the annual duties are the excise on malt, the duties on pensions and offices, and certain duties of customs on sugar, tobacco, and snuff. The permanent ordinary taxes, are the customs, excise, stamps, and tax, assessed taxes, charging those on windows, servants, carriages, houses, dogs, and annual hearings, postage duties and other articles of trifling amount, such as duties to hawkers, pack-coaches, &c. A considerable annual revenue is also derived from the Post Office. The extraordinary resources during war have consisted of duties of customs or excise imposed, and also a duty on income, or the profits of property, added by annual loans and lotteries. The greatest part of these taxes are collected under the management of the commissioners of customs, of excise, or stamps, and of taxes. The two latter boards have been recently consolidated by the 4 & 5 Wm. 4 c. 60.

The annual amount of these taxes is fluctuating according to the periods of peace and war, and other contingencies: accounts of the produce and expenditure are annually laid before parliament in a paper, called Geo. 3 c. 70, &c. and are printed by order of the House of Commons. See Account, Public, and also Public Accounts.

The average expense of collecting the whole revenue has been computed at $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and of that of the excise, at $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. which is less than any other branch of the revenue. The whole revenue is first deposited in the Exchequer, and is thence issued out to the respective officers for payment, and its application is annually accounted for to parliament, at what is commonly called the opening of the budget, that is, the statement of the national revenue and expenditure, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, at the same time, calls for a supply, if necessary.

When the House of Commons have voted a supply to His Majesty, and secured the question on that supply, they usually resolve themselves into a committee of ways and means, to consider the ways of raising the means for paying the interest of the supply so voted. And in this committee, every member, though it is looked upon as the peculiar province of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, may propose such scheme of taxation as he thinks will be least detrimental to the public. The resolutions on this matter, when approved by a vote of the house, are in general esteemed to be (as it were) final and conclusive. For though the supply cannot be actually raised upon the subject of the loan, as a part of the whole parliament, yet a committee will seldom be prevailed to the government by a majority of the commons, though it can be yet passed to establish it. 1 Comm. c. 8. p. 307, 308.

The produce of the respective taxes formerly formed separate and distinct funds, being appropriated for the sums at which they were necessary, in order to avoid confusion as they increased yearly, to reduce the number of these separate funds, by uniting and blending them together; superadding the fifth or sixth part for the general service of the whole. They were therefore reduced to three capital funds, the Aggregate Fund, the General Fund, so called from saving the land-rent, and the South Sea Fund, being the produce of the taxes appropriated to pay the interest of some part of the national debts as was advanced by that company and its maintainers. All these were united together in the Consolidated Fund, established by the 27 Geo. 3. c. 13 § 47. &c. and to which the Consolidated Fund of Ireland was added by the 56 Geo. 3 c. 58. forming one general Consolidated Fund of the whole United Kingdom, and charged indiscriminately, whether in the Exchequer of Great Britain or Ireland, with the whole of the interest of the consolidated national debt. The separate funds, thus united, are become mutual securities for each other, and the whole produce of them, thus aggregated and consolidated, is liable to pay such interest or annuities as were formerly charged upon each different fund: the faith of the legislature being moreover engaged to supply any casual deficiency; and though some of the taxes may have, now and then, proved less productive than was expected, the sum total has generally been more than sufficient to answer the charges upon them, and the surplus, in consequence, formed the sinking fund, originally destined to sink and lower the national debt. See National Debt.

The consolidated fund, above-mentioned, now stands mortgaged by parliament, to raise annuities for the maintenance of the king's household and civil list in Great Britain and Ireland. For this purpose, in Great Britain, previous to the reign of George III. the produce of certain branches of the excise and customs, the post-office, the duties on wine licences, the revenues of the remaining crown lands, the profits arising from courts of justice, (which articles include all the hereditary revenues of the crown, and also a great annuity of £100,000, was settled on the king for life, for the support of his household, and the honour and dignity of his crown. And as the amount of these several branches was uncertain, though in the reign of George II. they sometimes raised more than a million, if they did not arise annually to 800,000, the parliament engaged to make up the deficiency. But King George III. having, soon after his accession, spontaneously signified his consent, that his own hereditary revenue might be so disposed of as might best conduce to the utility and satisfaction of the public, and graciously accepted of the limited sum of 800,000, per ann. for the support of his civil list, the said hereditary and other revenues were carried into and made a part of the aggregate fund, and afterwards of the consolidated fund, which was charged with the payment of the whole annuity to the crown. This sum being found insufficient, application was, from time to time, made to parliament to discharge debt contracted of the civil list, and to assign the maintenance of the civil list. As to the sums granted to the late and present majesty for the payment of their civil lists &c., see King, V. 1.

A short statement of the ancient mode of rating property, or persons in respect of their property, either by tenths, or fifteenths, subsidies on land, hydages, scutages, or talliages, may assist the student in understanding our ancient laws and history. See 1 Comm. c. 8.

Tenth and fifteenth were temporary aids issuing out of personal property, and granted to the king by parliament. 1 Hist. c. 1. 2 Hist. 24. They were formerly the tenth or fifteenth part of all the moveables belonging to the subject, when such moveables or personal estates were a very different and a much less considerable thing than what they are at this day. Tenth and fifteenth had been first granted under Henry II. who took a voyage of the fashion he used for cruises to introduce his new taxation, in order to defray the expense of an expedition to Palestine; which he really, or seemingly, had projected against Saladin, emperor of the Saracens; whence it was originally denominated the Saladin Feck. Hard. A D 1188. Carte, 1199. Hist. 1199. But afterwards fifteenths were more usually granted than tenths. Originally the amount of these taxes was uncertain, being levied by assessments newly made at every fresh grant of the Commons, a commission for which is preserved by Mutthen Paris, (A D 1337). But it was at length reduced to a certainty, in the eighth year of Edward III.; when, by virtue of the king's commission, new taxations were made of every township, borough, and city in the kingdom, and recorded in the Exchequer; which rate was, at the time, the fifteenth part of the value of every township, the whole amounting to about 29,000*l.*; and, therefore, it still kept up the name of a fifteenth, when, by the alteration of the value of money, and the increase of personal property, things came to be in a very different situation. So that, when of later years, the Commons granted the king a fifteenth, every parish in England immediately knew their proportion of it; that is, the same identical sum that was assessed by the same aid in the eighth of Edward III.; and then raised it by a rate among themselves, and returned it into the royal Exchequer.

The other ancient levies were in the nature of the modern land-tax: for we may trace up the original of that charge as high as to the introduction of our military tenures; when every tenant of a knight's fee was bound, if called upon, to attend the king in his army for forty days in every year. But this personal attendance growing troublesome in many respects, the tenants found means of compounding for it, by first sending others in their stead, and, in process of time, by making a pecuniary satisfaction to the crown in lieu of it. This pecuniary satisfaction at last came to be levied by assessments, at so much for every knight's fee, under the name of scutages; which appear to have been levied for the first time in the fifth year of Henry II., on account of his expedition to Toulouse; and were then, it seems, mere arbitrary compositions, as the king and the subject could agree. But this precedent being afterwards abused into a means of oppression, (in levying scutages on the landholders by the royal authority only, whenever our kings went to war, in order to hire mercenary troops and pay their contingent expenses,) it became thereupon a matter of national complaint; and King John was obliged to promise in his Magna Charta, that no scutage should be imposed, without the consent of the common council of the realm. This clause was, indeed, omitted in the charters of Henry III., where we only find it stipulated, that scutages should be taken as they were used to be in the time of King Henry II. (c. 37.) Yet afterwards by a variety of statutes under Edward I., and his grandson, it was provided, that the king shall not take any aids or tasks, any tallage or tax, but by the common assent of the great men and Commons in Parliament. See Liberty.

Of the same nature with scutages upon knights' fees were the assessments of hydragage upon all other lands, and of tallage upon cities and burghs. Madox, Hist. Exch. 480. But they all gradually fell into disuse upon the introduction of subsidies, about the time of King Richard II. and King Henry IV. These were a tax not immediately imposed upon property, but upon persons in respect of their reputed estates, after the nominal rate of 4*s.* in the pound for lands, and 2*s.* 8*d.* for goods; and for those of aliens in a double proportion. But this assessment was also made according to an ancient valuation; wherein the computation was so very moderate, and the rental of the kingdom was supposed to be so exceeding low, that one subsidy of this sort, did not, according to Coke, amount to more than 70,000*l.* 4 Inst. 33. Whereas the land-tax, at the same rate, before any part of it was redeemed, produced two millions, and the tax on income or produce of property at 10 per cent. or only 2*s.* in the pound, produced in the year ending 5th January, 1808, the sum of ten millions. It was anciently the rule never to grant more than one subsidy and two fifteenths at a time: but this rule was broken through for the first time on a very pressing occasion, the Spanish invasion, in 1588; when the parliament gave Queen Elizabeth two subsidies and four fifteenths. Afterwards, as money sunk in value, more subsidies were given; and we have an instance in the first parliament of 1640, of the king's desiring twelve subsidies of the Commons, to be levied in three years.

The grant of scutages, talliages, or subsidies by the Commons, did not extend to spiritual preferments, those being usually taxed at the same time by the clergy themselves in convocation, which grants of the clergy were confirmed in parliament, otherwise they were illegal, and not binding. A subsidy granted by the clergy was after the rate of 4*s.* in the pound, according to the valuation of their livings in the king's books; and amounted, as Coke states, to about 20,000*l.* 4 Inst. 33. While this custom continued, convocations were wont to sit as frequently as parliaments; but the last subsidies thus given by the clergy were those confirmed by 15 Car. 2. c. 10. since which another method of taxation has generally prevailed, which takes in the clergy as well as the laity. In recompense for which the beneficed clergy have from that period been allowed to vote at the election of knights of the shire; and thenceforward also the practice of giving ecclesiastical subsidies hath fallen into total disuse. Dalt. of Sheriffs, 418; Gulb. Hist. Exch. c. 4. And see Convocation.

The lay subsidy was usually raised by commissioners appointed by the crown, or the great officers of state; and, therefore, in the beginning of the civil wars between Charles I. and his parliament, the latter having no other sufficient revenue to support themselves and their measures, introduced the practice of laying weekly and monthly assessments of a specific sum upon the several counties of the kingdom; to be levied by a pound rate on lands and personal estates, which were occasionally continued during the whole usurpation, sometimes at the rate of 120,000*l.* a month, sometimes at inferior rates. After the Restoration, the ancient method of granting subsidies, instead of such monthly assessments, was, as it seems, once, and once only, renewed; viz. in 1663, when four subsidies were granted by the temporality, and four by the clergy; which was, in fact, the last time of raising supplies in that manner. For the monthly assessments being now established by custom, being raised by commissioners named by parliament, and producing a more certain revenue; from that time forwards we hear no more of subsidies, but occasional assessments were granted as the national emergencies required. These periodical assessments, the subsidies which preceded them, and the more ancient scutage, hydragage, and tallage, were to all intents and purposes a land-tax; and the assessments were sometimes expressly called so. Though a popular opinion has prevailed, that the land-tax was first introduced in the reign of King William III. See Land-tax.

The learned commentator is of opinion, that the last time of raising supplies by way of subsidy was in 1670; and he seems to have been misled by the title of 22 & 23 C. 2. c. 3. viz. "An Act to grant a Subsidy to his Majesty for supply of his Extraordinary Occasions." But although, among a great variety of other taxes, 1*s.* in the pound is to be raised upon land, yet the mode of collecting it is totally different from the former subsidy assessment; it is to be levied by exactly the same plan and arrangement as were afterwards adopted in 4 Wm. & 4 M. c. 1. All the material clauses in 22 & 23 C. 2. c. 3. are copied verbatim into 4 Wm. & 4 M. c. 1. The act of Charles II. is not printed in the common edition of the statutes at large; but is given at length in Keble's edition. See 1 Comm. c. 8. in n.

The modern war-tax on income, or the profits of property, bore a near resemblance to this ancient tax. It was first introduced under the title of a tax on income, and regulated by the 38 Geo. 3. c. 16; 39 Geo. 3. c. 18; 40 & 41 Geo. 3. c. 49. Afterwards, as a contribution on the profits of property, under the 43 Geo. 3. c. 42; 43 Geo. 3. c. 123, 45 Geo. 3. c. 15; 46 Geo. 3. c. 65. Under these latter acts, it was at first 5 per cent. and afterwards increased to 6½, and then to 10 per cent.; or 2*s.* in the pound. It proved a very productive tax; and if duly and equitably imposed, it would be the fairest and most desirable of all taxes.

The annual MALT-TAX is a sum raised every year by parliament, ever since 1697, by a duty on every bushel of malt. This is under the management of commissioners of excise; and is indeed itself no other than an annual excise. Permanent duties on malt are payable in Ireland equal to the amount of the annual and permanent duties in Great Britain. See Malt. And as to other duties, see Tea, &c.

The duty on salt is now entirely repealed. See Salt.

As to the duty on houses and windows.—As early as the Conquest, mention is made in Domesday-Book of fumage or fuge, vulgarly called smoke-farthings, which were paid by custom to the king for every chimney in the house. And we read that Edward the Black Prince, (soon after his successes in France,) in imitation of the English custom, imposed a tax of a florin upon every hearth in his French dominions. But the first parliamentary establishment of it in England was by 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 10. whereby an hereditary revenue of 2s. for every hearth, in all houses paying to church and poor, was granted to the king for ever. And, by subsequent statutes for the more regular assessment of this tax, the constable and two other substantial inhabitants of the parish, to be appointed yearly, (or the surveyor, appointed by the crown, together with such constable or other public officer,) were once in every year empowered to view the inside of every house in the parish. But, upon the Revolution, by 1 Wm. & M. st. 1. c. 10. hearth-money was declared to be "not only a great oppression to the poorer sort, but a badge of slavery upon the whole people; exposing every man's house to be entered into, and searched at pleasure by persons unknown to him; and therefore, to erect a lasting monument of their majesties' goodness in every house in the kingdom, the duty of hearth-money was taken away and abolished." This monument of goodness remains among us to this day; but the prospect of it was somewhat darkened, (says Blackstone,) when, in six years afterwards, by 7 Wm. 2. c. 18. a tax was laid upon all houses (except cottages) of 3s.; and a tax also upon all windows, if they exceeded nine, in such house. Which rates have been from time to time varied and extended: and power is given to surveyors, appointed by the crown, to inspect the outside of houses, and also to pass through any house two days in the year, into any court or yard, to inspect the windows there. A pound rate was also imposed on every dwelling-house inhabited, together with the offices and gardens therewith occupied, (farm houses and cottages excepted); increasing according to the amount of the rent. See 1 Comm. c. 8.

Of late years, however, the window-tax has been reduced to one half its former amount; and houses containing not more than six windows, and not worth 5*l.* a year, have been exempted from its operation; while the duties on dwelling-houses have been altogether repealed by the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 19.

The duties imposed on MALE SERVANTS, in every part of the United Kingdom, retained or employed in the several capacities specifically mentioned in the statutes for that purpose, extend to almost every sort of male domestic, except such as are actually employed only in husbandry or manufacture. With these are combined the duties on CARRIAGES, Horses and Dogs.

Of late individuals have been allowed to compound for their assessed taxes, that is, by paying a certain yearly sum to have the liberty of keeping as many servants, carriages, &c. as they think proper, and these compositions or contracts are by the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 54. continued for five years longer; but compositions on articles kept for trade, by persons in partnership, or on carriages, horses, &c. let for hire, are not to be renewed.

The duty on OFFICES and PENSIONS in England, consisting of annual payments of 1*l.* in the pound, and 6*d.* in the pound, (over and above all other duties,) out of all salaries, fees, and perquisites of offices, and out of all pensions, and gratuities payable by the crown, exceeding 100*l.* per annum, was first imposed by 31 Geo. 2. c. 22; and by the 38 Geo. 3. c. 5. was increased to the sum of 4*s.* in the pound; which has been the amount that has since been annually levied.

It is considered as a rule of construction of revenue-acts, in ambiguous cases, to lean in favour of revenue: this rule will be found to be agreeable to good policy and the public interests; particularly when it is considered that disputes as to the meaning and effect of revenue laws most generally arise in consequence of attempts, often wholly unjustifiable, to evade them. Beyond this, which may be regarded as established law, no one can ever be said to have an undue advantage in the courts of justice. See 1 Comm. c. 8. in n.

TAXT-WARD. An annual payment heretofore made to a superior in Scotland instead of the duties due to him under the tenure of ward-holding; now abolished. See Tenures.

TEA was hardly known in this country till after 1650. In 1660, however, it began to be used in coffee-houses, and was noticed in an act passed in that year, 12 Car. 2. c. 15. From its first introduction, down to 1833, the importation of tea was a monopoly, enjoyed by the East India Company; but by the 3 & 4 Wm. 1. c. 85. § 3. the company's exclusive right of trading to China for tea was taken away; and by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 93. the trade was thrown open under the restrictions imposed by that act. See a short outline of its provisions, East India Company, VIII.

Down to the 22d April, 1834, the duty on tea was an ad valorem one, being 90 per cent. on all teas under 2*s.* a pound, and 100 per cent. on all sold at or above that price.

The following are the present duties on tea imported into the United Kingdom for home consumption, as regulated by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 101:—

	s.	d.
Bohea	1	6 per lb.
Congou, twankay, hyson skin, orange ..	1	6
Pekoe, and campoi	2	2
Souchong, flowery pekoe, hyson, young hyson, gunpowder, imperial, and other tea not enumerated	3	0

TEAM, THEAME, from the Sax. tyman, propagare, to team or bring forth.] A royalty or privilege granted by the king's charter to the lord of a manor, for the having, restraining, and judging of bondmen and villeins, with their children, goods, and chattels, &c. Glanvil, lib. 5. c. 2. TEDING-PENNY, TETHING-PENNY, TITHING-PENNY. A small duty or payment to the sheriff from each tithing, towards the charge of keeping courts, &c. from which some of the religious were exempted by charter from the king. Chart. Hen. 1.

TEENAGE, from Sax. tyuan, to inclose or shut.] Is used in many parts of England for wood for fences and inclosures.

TEMPLARS or KNIGHTS OF THE TEMPLE, Templarii. A religious order of knighthood, instituted about the year 1119, and so called because they dwelt in part of the buildings belonging to the Temple at Jerusalem, and not far from the sepulchre of our Lord. They entertained Christian strangers and pilgrims charitably, and in their armour led them through the Holy Land to view the sacred monuments of Christianity, without fear of Infidels; for at first their profession was to defend travellers from highwaymen and robbers. This order continuing and increasing for near two hundred years, was far spread in Christendom, and particularly here in England: but at length some of them at Jerusalem falling away (as some authors report) to the Saracens from Christianity, or rather because they grew too potent and rich, the whole order was suppressed by Clement V., anno 1307, by the Council of Vienna, 1312, and their substance given partly to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and partly to other religious. Cassan de Gloria Mundi, par. 9. Consid. 4. These flourished here in England from the time of Henry II. till they were suppressed, and their lands given to the knights hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem. 17 Edw. 2. st. 3. And these last were suppressed in England and Ireland in the time of Henry VIII. See English stat. 32 Hen. 8. c. 24 and Irish stat. 35 Hen. 8. st. 3. c. 5. They had in every nation a particular governor, whom Bracton, lib. 1. c. 10. calls Magistrum Militie Templi. The master of the temple here was summoned to parliament, 49 Hen. 3. m. 11. in Scheduli. And the chief minister of the Temple Church in London is still called Master of the Temple. Of these knights read Mr. Dugdale's Antiquities of Warwickshire, fol. 706. In ancient records they were also called Fratres Militie Templi Solomonis. Mon. Angl. ii. 554 b. About nine years after their institution, they were ordered by a council held at Trier to wear a white garment; and afterwards in the pontificate of Pope Eugenius, they wore a red cross on their garments. The Temples, which we now call the Inns of Courts, was the place where they dwelt, and in the Middle Temple the king's treasure was kept. Conell. Templars' lands shall be forfeit for erecting their crosses, stat. Westm. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 33. The jurisdiction of the conservators of their privileges restrained, stat. Westm. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 43.

TEMPLE. Dugdale and Stow both tell us that the Temple in London is a place of privilege from arrests, by the grant of the king; but this hath been denied by the Court of B. R. Dugd. 317, 320; 3 Salk. 45. See Arrest.

TEMPORALITIES or BISHOPS. The lay revenues, lands, tenements, and lay fees belonging to the see of bishops or archbishops, as they are barons and lords of parliament (including their baronies.) All things which a bishop hath by livery from the king, as manors, lands, tithes, &c. 1 Roll. Abr. 881; 1 Comm. c. 8. It was a custom formerly, that when bishops received from the king their temporalities, they did, by a solemn form in writing, renounce all right to the same by virtue of any provision from the pope, and acknowledged the receipt of them only from the king; which custom continued from the reign of Edward I. to the time of the Reformation; and this practice began by occasion of a bull of Pope Gregory VIII., wherein he conferred the see of Worcester on a certain bishop, and committed to him administrationem spiritualium et temporalium episcopatus predicti. Anno 31 Edw. 1.

The custody of these temporalities is stated by Blackstone as part of the king's ordinary revenue (see King, V. 4.) This, upon the vacancy of the bishopric, is immediately the right of the king, as a consequence of his prerogative in church matters, whereby he is considered as the founder of all archbishoprics and bishoprics, to whom during the vacancy they revert. And for the same reason, before the dissolution of abbeys, the king had the custody of the temporalities of all such abbeys and priories as were of royal foundation (but not of those founded by subjects), on the death of the abbot or prior. 2 Inst. 15. Another reason may also be given why the policy of the law hath vested this custody in the king, because, as the successor is not known, the lands and possession of the see would be liable to spoil and devastation, if no one had a property therein. Therefore the law has given the king, not the temporalities themselves, but the custody of the temporalities, till such time as a successor is appointed, with power of taking to himself all the intermediate profits, without any account of the successor, and with the right of presenting (which the crown very frequently exercises) to such benefices and other preferments as fall within the time of vacation. 17 Edw. 2. st. 1. c. 14; F. N. B. 32. This revenue is of so high a nature that it could not be granted out to a subject before, or even after, it accrued; but by the 14 Edw. 3. st. 4. c. 4. 5. the king may, after the vacancy, lease the temporalities to the dean and chapter, saving to himself all advowsons, escheats, and the like. Our ancient kings, and particularly William Rufus, were not only remarkable for keeping the bishoprics a long time vacant, for the sake of enjoying the temporalities, but also committed horrible waste on the woods and other parts of the estate, and to crown all, would never, when the see was filled up, restore to the bishop his temporalities again, unless he purchased them at an exorbitant price. To remedy which, King Henry I. granted a charter at the beginning of his reign, promising neither to sell, nor let to farm, nor take any thing from the domains of the church, till the successor was installed. And it was made one of the articles of the Great Charter, that no waste should be committed in the temporalities of bishoprics, neither should the custody of them be sold. 9 Hen. 3. c. 5. The same is ordained by the stat. Westm. 1. 3 Edw. 1. c. 21; and the 14 Edw. 3. st. 4. c. 4. (which permits, as we have seen, a lease to the dean and chapter), is still more explicit in prohibiting the other exactions. It was also a frequent abuse, that the king would, for trifling or no causes, seize the temporalities of bishops, even during their lives, into his own hands; but this is guarded against by the 1 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 2.

This revenue of the king, which was formerly very considerable, is now by a customary indulgence almost reduced to nothing; for at present, as soon as the new bishop is consecrated and confirmed, he usually receives the restitution of his temporalities quite entire and untouched, from the king, and at the same time does homage to his sovereign; and then, and not sooner, he has a fee-simple in his bishopric, and may maintain an action for the profits. 2 Inst. 67, 341. See 1 Comm. c. 8.

TEMPUS PESSONIS. Mast-time in the forest, which is from about Michaelmas to St. Martin's day, Nov. 11.

TENA. A coif worn by ecclesiastics. Counc. Lambeth anno 1281.

TENANT, tenens, from the Lat. tenere, to hold.] One that holds or possesses lands or tenements by any kind of title, either in fee, for life, years, or at will. The word in law is used with divers additions; thus, tenant in dower is she that possesses land by virtue of her dower. Tenant by statute-merchant, he that holds land by virtue of a statute forfeited to him. Tenant in frank-marriage, he that holds lands or tenants by virtue of a gift thereof made to him upon marriage between him and his wife. Tenant by the curtesy, he that holds for his life, by reason of a child begotten by him of his wife, being an inheritrix, and born alive. Tenant by eligit, that holds by virtue of the writ called an elegit. Tenant in mortgage, that holds by means of a mortgage. Tenant by the verge in ancient demesne, who is admitted by the rod in the court of ancient demesne. Tenant by copy of court-roll, who is admitted tenant of any lands, &c. within a manor, which time out of mind had been demisable according to the custom of the manor. Tenant by charter, that holdeth by feoffment in writing or other deed. There were also tenants by knights-service, tenant in burgage, tenant in socage, tenant in frank-fee, tenant in villeinage. So there is tenant in fee-simple; tenant in fee-tail; tenant at the will of the lord, according to the custom of the manor; tenant at will by the common law; tenant upon sufferance; tenant of estate of inheritance; tenant in chief, that he hath of the king in right of his crown, to wit, the king, he that holds of the person of the king, or has some honour; very tenant, that holds immediately of his lord, Kitch. fol. 99; tenant peravall, the lowest tenant of the fee, who is tenant to one who holds over of another. F. N. B. 135.

So there are also joint-tenants, that have equal right in lands and are tenants by virtue of one title; tenants in common, that have equal right, but hold by divers titles; particular tenant, as tenant for years, for life, &c. that holds only for his term; sole tenant, he that hath no other joined with him; several tenant, as opposite to joint-tenant, or tenant in common.

So there was tenant to the præcipe, in the case of fines and recoveries, and there is tenant in demesne, which is he that holdeth the demesnes of a manor for a rent, without service, tenant on service, he that holdeth by service; tenants by execution, that hold lands by virtue of an execution upon any statute, recognizance, &c. with divers others. Cowell

See this Dictionary, under the several titles relative to the estates of such tenants; and Tenants.

TENANTS IN COMMON are such as hold by several and distinct titles, but by unity of possession, because none knoweth his own severalty, and therefore they all occupy promiscuously. Lit. § 292.

This tenancy therefore happens, where there is a unity of possession merely, but perhaps an entire disunion of interest, of title, and of time. For if there be two tenants in common of lands, one may hold his part in fee-simple, the other in tail or for life, so that there is no necessary unity of interest. One may hold by descent, the other by purchase; or the one by purchase from A., the other by purchase from B.; so that there is no unity of title. One's estate may have been vested fifty years, the other's but yesterday; so there is no unity of time. The only unity there is is that of possession; and for this Littleton gives the true reason, because no man can certainly tell which part is his own; otherwise even this would be soon destroyed. 2 Comm. c. 12.

Tenancy in common may be created, either by the destruction of two estates in joint-tenancy and coparcenary, or by special limitation in a deed. By the destruction of the two estates mentioned, is intended such destruction as does not sever the unity of possession, but only the unity of title or interest: as if one of two joint-tenants in fee aliens his estate for the life of the alienee, the alienee and the other joint-tenant are tenants in common, for they now have several titles, the other joint-tenant by the original grant, the alienee by the new alienation; and they also have several interests, the former joint-tenant in fee-simple, the alienee for his own life only. Lit. § 293. So if one joint-tenant give his part to A. in tail, and the other gives his to B. in tail, the donees are tenants in common, as holding by different titles and conveyances. Lit. § 292. If one of two parceners aliens, the alienee and the remaining parcener are tenants in common, because they hold by different titles, the parcener by descent, the alienee by purchase. Lit. § 299. So likewise if there be a grant to two men or two women, and the heirs of their bodies, here the grantees shall be joint-tenants of the life-estate, but they shall have several inheritances, because they cannot possibly have one heir of their two bodies, as might have been the case had the limitation been to a man and a woman, and the heirs of their bodies begotten: and in this and the like cases their issues shall be tenants in common, because they must claim by different titles, one as heir of A. and the other as heir of B., and those too not titles by purchase but descent. See Lit. § 283. In short, whenever an estate in joint-tenancy or coparcenary is dissolved, so that there be no partition made, but the unity of possession continues, it is turned into a tenancy in common. 2 Comm. c. 12.

A tenancy in common may also be created by express limitation in a deed. But here care must be taken not to insert words which imply a joint estate; and then if lands be given to two or more, and it be not joint-tenancy, it must be a tenancy in common. Land given to two, to be holden the one moiety to one, and the other moiety to the other, is an estate in common; and if one grants to another half his land, the grantor and grantee are also tenants in common: because joint-tenants do not take by distinct halves or moieties; and by such grants the division and severalty of the estate is so plainly expressed that it is impossible they should take a joint interest in the whole of the tenements. But a devise to two persons to hold jointly and severally, has been held to be a joint-tenancy, because that is necessarily implied in the word "jointly;" the word "severally" perhaps only implying the power of partition: and an estate given to A. and B. equally to be divided between them, though in deeds it hath been said to be a joint-tenancy (for it implies no more than the law has annexed to that estate, viz. divisibility), yet in wills it is certainly a tenancy in common, because the deviser may be presumed to have meant what is most beneficial to both the devisees, though his meaning is imperfectly expressed. See 1 Eq. Abr. 291; 1 P. Wms. 17; 3 Rep. 39; 1 Vent. 32. And this nicety in the wording of grants makes it the most usual as well as the safest way (in them as well as in wills), when a tenancy in common is meant to be created, to add express words of exclusion as well as description, and limit the estate to A. and B., to hold as tenants in common and not as joint-tenants.

It is noticed under title Joint-Tenants, that their tenure, though formerly favoured in law, is now considered as odious. In consequence of this, in wills, the expressions, equally to be divided, share and share alike, respectively between and amongst, have been held to create a tenancy in common. 2 Atk. 121; 2 Bro. C. R. 15; 1 P. Wms. 14. And there seems but little doubt that the same construction would now be put even upon the word severally. But these words certainly are only evidence of intention, and will not create a tenancy in common, where the contrary, from the other parts of the will, appears to be the manifest intention of the testator. 3 Bro. C. R. 215.

The words, equally to be divided, make a tenancy in common in surrenders of copyholds, and also in deeds which derive their operation from the statute of uses. 1 P. Wms. 14; 1 Wils. 341; 2 Ves. 257. And though it has formerly been suggested (see 1 P. Wms. 167, 2 P. Wms. 54) that these words are not sufficient to create a tenancy in common, in common law conveyances, yet there seems but little doubt that, in such a case, nothing but invincible authority would now induce the courts to adopt that opinion, and to decide in favour of a joint-tenancy. 2 Comm. c. 12. p. 194, n. It is, however, to be observed, that though the words, equally to be divided, share and share alike, and such like, are in general construed to create a tenancy in common, yet it is not by force of the words merely, but because it appears to be the intention of the party that there should be no survivorship. 2 Roll. Abr. 90; Salk. 227, 392; 2 Ves. 258. See Joint-tenants.

As to the incidents attending a tenancy in common.—Tenants in common (like joint-tenants) are compellable by the 31 Hen. 8. c. 1; 32 Hen. 8. c. 32. to make partition of their lands, which they were not at common law. See Joint-tenants, III. They properly take by distinct moieties, and have no entirety of interest; and therefore there is no survivorship between tenants in common. Their other incidents are such as merely arise from the unity of possession, and are therefore the same as appertain to joint-tenants merely upon that account. Such as being liable to reciprocal actions of waste, and of account, by the statutes Westm. 2. c. 22; 4 Ann. c. 16; and see 8 T. R. 145. For by the common law no tenant in common was liable to account with his companion for embezzling the profits of the estate; though, if one actually turns the other out of possession, an action of ejectment will lie against him. 1 Inst. 199, 200. See 2 Comm. c. 12.

For the clause of the recent statute of limitations, with respect to possession, or receipt of rent by one tenant in common, see Limitation of Actions, II. 1.

As for other incidents of joint-tenants, which arise from the privity of title, or the union and entirety of interest, (such as joining or being joined in actions, unless in the case where some entire or indivisible thing is to be recovered,) these are not applicable to tenants in common, whose interests are distinct, and whose titles are not joint, but several. Litt. § 311; 1 Inst. 197; 2 Comm. c. 12.

Estates in common can only be dissolved two ways. 1. By uniting all the titles and interests in one tenant, by purchase or otherwise; which brings the whole to one severalty. 2. By making partition between the several tenants in common, which gives them all respective severalties. For indeed tenancies in common differ in nothing from sole estates, but merely in the blending and unity of possession.

A. and B., tenants in common, having agreed to divide their property, the occupier of the part allotted to A. (who after the agreement had paid his whole rent to A.) was not allowed, in ejectment brought against him by A., to object that a partition deed was not actually executed. 1 B. & B. 11.

In a suit in equity for partition by lessees for years, it was held that no objection can be made to such partition from the minuteness of the interest, or inconvenience, or difficulty, or from the reluctance of the other tenants in common. 1 Ves. & B. 552.

A tenant in common may devise or alien, or charge his part in the same manner and by the same deeds of conveyance as if he had been solely seised of the entirety.

A tenant in common cannot as such release to his co-tenant, as they hold, as already stated, by several and distinct titles, but he must convey his interest by lease and release, &c. as he would do to a perfect stranger.

TENDE. To tender or offer; it is mentioned in our old books; as, to tend a traverse, an averment, &c. Britton, c. 76; Staudf. Prærog. 16.

TENDER, Fr. tendre.] The offering of money or any other thing in satisfaction; or circumspectly to endeavour the performance of a thing; as a tender of rent is to offer it at the time and place when and where it ought to be paid. Also it is an act done to save the penalty of a bond before action brought, &c. Termes de la Ley, 557. See Pleading, particularly I. 4; Money into Court. As to tender of rent, see Rent.

1. In what Actions allowed.—A tender may be made in actions of assumpsit and debt.

But a tender is not pleadable to an action for unliquidated damages. 4 N. & M. 200; and see Ld. Raym. 255; 1 Saund. 33 (b).

So upon a bare covenant for the payment of money, the defendant may plead a tender. 7 Taunton, 486.

So in some cases of involuntary trespasses to lands, not committed by the party himself, but by his cattle, a tender of amends may be made by the 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. § 5.

There are a variety of statutes which authorize a tender of amends, where otherwise it would not have been allowable.

As 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. § 20, in cases of distress for rent; 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. § 10, in cases of distress for poor's rates; 24 Geo. 2. c. 44, in actions against justices of the peace; 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 53, in actions against excise officers; and 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 58, in actions against custom-house officers.

2. To and by whom to be made.—Tender of money on a bond is to be made to the person of the obligee at the day appointed, to save the penalty and forfeiture of the bond, and it ought to be done before witnesses; though, if the obligor be sued afterwards, he must still pay it. But if the obligor be to do any collateral thing, or which is not part of the obligation, as to deliver a horse, &c. and the obligor offer to do his part, and the obligee refuseth it, the condition is performed, and the obligation discharged for ever. 1 Inst. 207, 208.

A tender to one of several joint creditors is a tender to all. Thus, if A., B., and C., have a joint demand, and C. has a separate demand on D.; and D. offers A. to pay him both the debts, which A. refuses, without objecting to the form of the tender on account of his being only entitled to the joint demand, D. may plead this tender in bar of an action for the joint demand; and should state it as a tender to A., B., and C. 3 T. R. 684.

A tender to an authorized agent is a tender to his principal. 1 Camp. 477; and see 1 Esp. 349. So a tender to a managing clerk is good though he should have received orders not to accept it. 1 Marsh. 55; S. C. 5 Taunt. 307; and see 3 C. & P. 453; M. & M. 238. But a tender made to the managing clerk, who at the time disclaims authority from his master to receive the debt, is insufficient. 1 N. & M. 398.

It would seem that a tender must be taken to be made on behalf of the person who owes the money. 2 C. & P. 50.

A tender by the agent of the defendant of the whole sum demanded by the plaintiff, by pulling out his pocket-book, and offering, if he would go into a neighbouring public-house, to pay it, which the plaintiff refused to take, is good, although the agent is only authorized by the defendant to tender a sum short of the whole sum demanded, and offers the rest at his own risk. 2 M. & S. 86.

3. When and how it must be made.—Every tender at the common law, or which is given by statute, must be made before the writ sued out.

If a tender be in fact made before the bringing of the action, though, by the teste of the writ, it may appear to have been afterwards, (as if tender in vacation and teste of preceding term,) the exact time when the writ was in fact sued out may be shown in pleading, or sometimes given in evidence contrary to the teste. But if a writ be issued on the same day the tender is made, though subsequent thereto, it seems that the defendant can no way avail himself by pleading the prior tender; as there is no fraction of a day in law. See Pleading, Process.

It is no answer to a plea of tender before the exhibiting of the plaintiff's bill, that the plaintiff had before such tender retained an attorney, and instructed him to sue out a writ against the defendant; and that the attorney had accordingly applied, before the tender, for such writ, which was afterwards sued out. 8 T. R. 629.

By the 56 Geo. 3. c. 68, gold coin was declared to be the only legal tender; and no tender of silver coin is to be legal beyond 40s.; but by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 6. § 98, notes of the Bank of England, payable to the bearer on demand, are made a legal tender for any sum above 5l. so long as the Bank continues to pay in gold, except at the Bank itself, and its branch establishments.

But although, strictly speaking, a legal tender must be either gold or Bank of England notes, according to the above statutes, yet a tender in country bank notes, if not objected to on that account, will be sufficient. 2 Tyr. 92. And see 3 T. R. 554; 1 Burr. 459.

Tender may be of money in bags, without showing or telling it, if it can be proved there was the sum to be tendered; it being the duty of him that is to receive the money to put out and tell it. 5 Rep. 115. Though where the person held the money on his arm in a bag, at the time of offering, this was adjudged to good tender, for it might be counters or base money. Noy, 71.

If a tender is made of more than is due, it is good; and the party to whom tendered ought to take out what belongs to him. 5 Rep. 114. But tender of a larger sum, requiring change, is not a good tender for a smaller sum. 6 Taunt. 336; 2 D. & R. 305.

So a tender of a bank-note for 5*l*, desiring the creditor to take 3*l*. 10*s*. is clearly not a good tender. 3 Camp. 70.

But a tender of a larger sum, requiring change, is good, if the plaintiff objects only on the ground that he is entitled to more, and not because he has not change. 5 Dow. & Ryk. 289; and see 1 Gow's Ca. 111; Peake's Ca. 179.

The money must be actually produced at the time of tender, or the production must be dispensed with by the express declaration, or some equivalent act of the creditor. 10 East, 101; 2 M. & S. 86; 4 Esp. 68.

Thus, it has been held that if the defendant be willing to pay 10*l*., and a third person offers to go up stairs and fetch that sum, and is prevented by plaintiff saying, "he cannot take it," this is a good tender. 2 Carr. & P. 77; and see 7 Moo. 59; 2 C. & J. 15; 4 B. & Ad. 546; 1 Bng. N. C. 253.

A tender must be unconditional; and therefore, going with the money in hand to make a tender, and demanding whether the creditor has a receipt stamp, and receiving an answer in the negative, without an actual offer of the money, will not support a plea of tender. 7 D. & R. 119; and see 1 C. & P. 257.

So if a person tender money, but will not pay it unless he has a receipt in full of all demands, such a tender is bad. 1 C. & P. 419; 5 Esp. 48.

So a tender was held not good where the debtor at the time required the creditor to sign a receipt, expressing that the sum tendered was the balance due. Gow, 213; and see 4 Camp. 156; 6 C. & P. 237.

But if on a tender being made, the creditor insists on receiving a larger sum of money, he cannot afterwards object to the formality of the tender on account of the debtor having required a receipt. Peake, 179.

4. Demand after Tender.—A right to damages on account of the non-payment of a debt, or non-performance of a duty, may, after being taken away by a tender and refusal, be revived again by a demand subsequent to the tender and refusal; a new cause of action arises from the non-payment or non-performance thereof upon such demand. And therefore the plaintiff may reply non est subsequent demand and refusal by the defendant, which, if proved, the plaintiff must have a verdict. Brownl. 7.

But if to a plea of tender, the plaintiff replies a subsequent demand and refusal, it is incumbent on him to prove that, after the tender admitted in the pleadings, he demanded of the defendant the exact sum specified as having been before tendered and refused. 1 Camp. 181.

5. Of pleading a Tender.—Wherever the debt or duty arises at the time of the contract, and is not discharged by a tender and refusal, it is not enough for the party who pleads the tender, to plead a tender and refusal, and uncore prist, (that he is still ready,) but he must also plead tout temps prut, (that he was always ready). Salk. 622; 12 Mod. 152; Carth. 413.

On award, that the defendant should pay money on such a day, and at such a place; the defendant pleaded that he tendered the money at the day and place; and because he did not set forth that he continued there ready to pay it at the last instant of the day till after sun-setting, &c. it was held ill. 2 Cro. 243.

By the 4 & 5 Ann. c. 16. § 12. the plea of solvit post diem is granted to an action on bond; but a tender and refusal of principal and interest at a subsequent day cannot be pleaded, as not being within the equity of the statute. For such construction would be prejudicial; as it would empower the obligor, at any time, to compel the obligee to take his money without notice. Bull. Ni. Pri. 171.

A plea of tender after the day of payment of a bill of exchange, and before action brought, is not good; though the defendant aver that he was always ready to pay from the time of the tender, and that the sum tendered was the whole money then due, owing, or payable to the plaintiff in respect of the bill, with interest from the time of the default, for the damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the non-performance of the promise. 8 East, 168.

Every requisite which is in a particular case necessary to the validity of a tender, must, in pleading such tender, be shown to have been complied with, else the plea is not good. Salk. 624.

A defendant cannot be permitted to plead non assumpsit as to the whole, and a tender as to part; because, if the general issue be found for the defendant, it will appear on record that no debt is due, though something is admitted by the defendant. 4 T. R. 194. But a tender to the whole declaration is good; and it is usual to plead, as to all, except the sum tendered, non assumpsit; and as to that sum, a tender. And a defendant may plead not guilty, and a tender of amends, in trespass. 2 Black. 1089; Sellon's Pr.

And a tender may be pleaded after a judge's order to plead issuably. 1 Burr. 59.

In case of a plea of tender as to part, and non assumpsit as to the residue, and the issue on the tender being found for the defendant, the balance proved is under 40*s*.; yet the defendant, though within the jurisdiction of the county court of Middlesex, is not entitled to costs, under 23 Geo. 2. c. 33. § 19. Nor in case of a set-off having the same effect. Doug. 448. See Impey, K. B.

To an avowry for rent, the plaintiff in replevin may plead a tender and refusal, without bringing money into court; because, if the distress were not rightfully taken, the defendant must answer the plaintiff his damages. Salk. 584. But if the distress were rightfully taken, the plaintiff cannot plead tender of rent and costs in bar of an avowry for rent in any case, unless the distress was made of corn, grass, &c. growing on the premises, and then such plea is given by 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. § 9.

There is a difference in pleading a tender in action of debt and in action on the case. In an action of debt, the defendant ought to conclude his plea by praying judgment, if the plaintiff ought to have or maintain his action to recover any damages against him; for, in this action, the debt is the principal, and the damages are only accessory. But, in assumpsit, the damages are the principal; and therefore, in pleading a tender, the defendant ought to conclude his plea with a prayer of judgment, if the plaintiff ought to have or maintain his action, to recover any more or greater damages than the sum tendered, or any damages by reason of the non-payment thereof. 2 Salk. 622; 1 Lord Raym. 254; 3 Salk. 344, 345.

Proof of a tender of 20*l*. 9*s*. 6*d*. in bank notes and silver is sufficient to support a plea of tender of 20*l*. 4 B. & Ad. 547; 1 N. & M. 393.

6. Effect of a Tender.—A tender admits the contract and facts stated in the declaration. 3 Taunt. 95. And after a plea of tender the plaintiff cannot be nonsuited. 1 Camp. 327.

On the other hand, if a creditor, after refusing payment when tendered, commences an action, the tender accompanied by a payment of the sum tendered into court will be a good defence, unless the creditor can prove a prior or subsequent demand and refusal. 1 Camp. 181; 5 B. & A. 630. And a tender will prevent interest from afterwards running against the debtor. 3 Camp. 296; 8 East, 168.

The plaintiff may either admit the tender or not; if the latter, he should not take the money out of court; for, by taking it, he admits the same to be right, and judgment is given for the defendant to go quit as to that plea. But if he admits it, and goes for further damages, on the ground that the tender was not sufficient to cover his demand, he may take the money out of court, enter an acquittal as to the tender, or confess the same in his replication, and proceed on the general issue for the residue. Ld. Raym. 1744. If he admits the tender and enters an acquittal, without going for further damages, he must pay the defendant his costs. Barnes, 337. But the plaintiff may take the money out of court, though he reply that the tender was not made before action brought. 1 Bos. & Pull. 332.

The money cannot be taken out by the defendant, though he has a verdict. Str. 1027. On a tender being pleaded, and the money paid into court, the plaintiff replied a subsequent demand and refusal, whereupon issue being joined and tried, a verdict was found for the defendant. Whereupon he moved to have the money paid into court returned, in part of his costs; but the court was of opinion it could not be done. Hardw. 206.

In what cases tender and refusal shall discharge the debt, see 1 Wils. 117.

Tender of the money is requisite on contracts for goods sold, &c. to entitle the buyer to maintain an action of trover. See Trover. And a tender of stock sold for so much money, if it be well made, though not accepted, will entitle the party to the sum agreed to be paid. 3 Salk. 343; Str. 777, 882. See further Bond, Money, payment of, into Court.

TENEMENT, tenementum.] Signifies properly a house, or homestead; but, more largely, it comprehends not only houses, but all corporeal inheritances which are holden of another, and all inheritances issuing out of or exercisable with the same. Co. Litt. 6, 19, 154. A tenement may be said to be any house, land, rent, or other such like thing that is in any way held or possessed; but being a word of a large and ambiguous meaning, and not so certain as mesuage, therefore it is not fit to be used to express any thing which requires a particular description. 2 Lill. Abr. 566.

Tenement, in its original proper, and legal sense, signifies any thing which may be holden, provided it be of a permanent nature, whether it be of a substantial and sensible, or of an unsubstantial and ideal kind. Thus liberum tenementum, frank-tenement, or freehold, is applicable not only to lands and other solid objects, but also to offices, rents, commons, and the like. 1 Inst. 6. And as lands and houses are tenements, so is an advowson a tenement; and a franchise, an office, a right of common, a peerage, or other property of the like unsubstantial kind, are all of them, legally speaking, tenements. Inst. 19, 20. See Herediments.

TENEMENTARY LAND. Was the outland of manors granted out to tenants by the Saxon thanes under arbitrary rents and services. Spelm.

TENEMENTIS LEGATIS. An ancient writ, lying to the city of London or any other corporation (where the old custom was, that men might devise by will lands and tenements as well as goods and chattels), for the hearing and determining any controversy touching the same. Reg. Orig. 244.

TENENDUM. That clause in a deed wherein the tenure of the land is created and limited. The office of a tenendum in a deed is to limit and appoint the tenure of the land which is held, and how, and of whom it is to be held. Before the statute called quia emptores terrarum, 18 Edm. 1. st. 1. the tenendum was usually of the feoffor and his heirs, and not of the chief lord of the fee, whereby lords lost their escheats, forfeitures, &c. But since the said statute, the tenendum, where the fee-simple passes, must be of the chief lord of the fee, by the custom and services whereby the feoffor held; yet this statute does not extend to a gift in tail, for the donee shall hold of the donor. Co. Litt. 6 a; 2 Inst. 66, 67, 500, 501, 502, 505. See Tail, Tenures.

The tenendum seems now to be incorporated with the habendum; for we say, To have and to hold, in which clause the estate is limited, &c. See Deed, II. 4.

TENENDAS. That clause of a charter by which the particular tenure, as that of feu-holding, or blanch-holding, is expressed. Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

TENENTIBUS IN ASSISE NON ONERANDIS. A writ that formerly lay for him to whom a disseisor had alienated the land whereof he disseised another, that he should not be molested in assise for the damages, if the disseisor had where-with to satisfy them. Reg. Orig. 214.

TENHEDED, or TIENHEOFED, Sax.] Decanus, Caput vel Princeps Decaniæ sive Decariæ. Leg. Edm. Conf. c. 29.

TENOR, Lat.] Of writs, records, &c. is a transcript or copy. The word "tenor" implies that a correct copy is set out, and therefore the instrument must be set out correctly, even although the pleader need not have set out more than the substance of the instrument. 2 East, P. C. 376. The tenor of a libel hath been held to be a transcript, which it cannot be if it differs from the libel; and juxta tenorem imports it, but not ad effectum, &c. for that may import an identity in sense, but not in words. 2 Salk. 417. The word effectum by itself, however, implies that the substance only is set out. Ibid.

In action of debt brought upon a judgment in an inferior court, if the defendant pleads nul tiel record, the tenor of the record only shall be certified; and by Hale, chief justice, it may be the same on a certiorari. 3 Salk. 296. A return of the tenor of an indictment from London, on a certiorari, to remove the indictment, is good by the city charter: but in other cases it is usual to certify the record itself. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 27. § 26, 70.

TENORE INDICTAMENTI MITTENDO, is a writ whereby the record of an indictment, and the process thereupon, is called out of another court into the King's Bench. Reg. Orig. 69. See Certiorari.

TENORE PRESENTIUM. The tenor of these presents, is the matter contained therein, or rather the intent and meaning thereof; as, to do such a thing according to the tenor, is to do the same according to the true intent of the deed or writing.

TENSERIE. A sort of ancient tax or military contribution. Blackst. Magna Carta, Introd. p. xxxvii. in n.

TENTATES PANIS. The essay or assay of bread. Blount.

TENTER. A stretcher or trier of cloth, used by dyers and clothiers, &c. mentioned in the (repealed) statutes 1 Rich. 3. c. 8; 39 Eliz. c. 20.

TENTHS, decimæ.] The tenth part of the annual value of every spiritual benefice, according to the valuation in the king's books; being that yearly portion or tribute which all ecclesiastical livings formerly paid to the king. They were anciently claimed by the pope to be due to him jure divino as high priest, by the example of the high priest among the Jews, who had tenths from the Levites. But they had been often granted to the king by the pope upon divers occasions, sometimes for one year, and sometimes for more, and were annexed perpetually to the crown by the 26 Hen. 8. c. 3; 1 Eliz. c. 4. And at last granted, with the first fruits, towards the augmentation of the maintenance of poor clergymen. 2 Ann. c. 11. See First Fruits. Collectors of this revenue are to be appointed by the king, by letters-patent, instead of the bishops; and an office is to be kept for management of the same in London or Westminster, &c. 3 Geo. 1. c. 10.

Tenths likewise signified a tax on the temporality, and also certain rents reserved and made payable to the king by such as held lands formerly belonging to dissolved monasteries.

See 33 Hen. 8. c. 39. The term tenure is sometimes used for tithe. See that title.

TENURE,

TENURE, from the Latin tenere.] The manner whereby lands or tenements are holden, or the service that the tenant owes to his lord. There can be no tenure without some service, because the service makes the tenure. 1 Inst. 1. 93. A tenure may be of houses and land or tenements; but not of a rent, common, &c.

Under the word tenure is included every holding of an inheritance; but the signification of this word, which is a very extensive one, is usually restrained by coupling other words with it; this is sometimes done by words which denote the duration of the tenant's estate; as if a man holds to himself and his heirs, it is called tenure in fee-simple. At other times the tenure is coupled with words pointing out the instrument by which an inheritance is held: thus if the holding is by copy of court-roll, it is called tenure by copy of court-roll. At other times this word is coupled with words that show the principal service by which an inheritance is held; as where a man held by knight-service, it was called tenure by knight-service. Bac. Abr.

Almost all the real property of the kingdom is, by the policy of our laws, supposed to be granted by, dependent upon, and holden of, some superior lord, by and in consideration of certain services to be rendered to the lord by the tenant or possessor of this property. The thing holden is therefore styled a tenement, the possessors thereof tenants, and the manner of their possession a tenure. Thus all the land in the kingdom is supposed to be holden, mediately or immediately, of the king, who is styled the lord paramount, or above all. Those that held immediately under him, in right of his crown and dignity, were called his tenants in capite, or in chief; which was the most honourable species of tenure, but at the same time subjected the tenants to greater and more burthensome services than inferior tenures did; a distinction which runs through all the different sorts of tenure. 2 Comm. c. 5.

The above maxim, and the whole of the doctrine of tenures, being founded on the feudal system, some knowledge of that is absolutely necessary in order to comprehend the nature of tenures as they relate either to the ancient or present state of the English law. These subjects are admirably and clearly treated in chapters IV. V. and VI. of the second book of the Commentaries.

The following abridgment from Sir Martin Wright's Introduction to the Law of Tenures (frequently referred to by the learned commentator), with some extracts from the Commentaries, is submitted to the reader: having been arranged in the following order by the editor of this work, it is inserted in this place (not without some hesitation) principally because references are made to and from this title in and to very many titles throughout the dictionary. An acquaintance with this part of our law is so intimately connected with all that concerns real property, that even an imperfect attempt at this presenting it, in one arranged and connected view, must be attended with advantage to the student; and will, in a small degree at least, obviate the inconvenience arising from the disjointed nature of the information conveyed, under the several heads, scattered through the dictionary in alphabetical order.

The feudal system, once firmly fixed in this island, has never been wholly abolished. From this system we derived our laws relative to property, and to that we must have recourse in order to account for the origin and utility of many which might otherwise appear useless or unjust, and to which we must continually recur to explain and illustrate what might otherwise seem dictated only by caprice, to trace out their principle, their spirit, their purposes, and their effects. By recurring to this system did a celebrated writer on this subject (Gilbert) explain what on any other system would have remained inexplicable. He rescued many of our laws from the imputation of barbarity and arbitrary imposition; he formed an epocha in this study by directing us where to discover their origin and principles: but he not only benefited the student, he also reflected honour on the nation and its laws. After his days many rose up in his spirit, and animated by his example, and encouraged by his success, pursued those paths which he had so arduously and sedulously explored. To the student there cannot be presented a more advantageous or more pleasing fund of information than their labours have produced. See Watkins's Introduction to Gilbert's Law of Tenures, who refers in a note to the productions alluded to, which merit the attention of all who would wish to be acquainted with the rationale of our law and constitution. Besides Wright and Blackstone, on whose works the following summary is founded, reference is made to the following now universally celebrated works:—Stuart's View of Society in Europe, and Historical Dissertation on the Antiquity of the English Constitution; Sullivan's Lectures on the Laws of England; Home (Lord Kaim's) Historical Law Tracts, and Essays on British Antiquities; Dalrymple's Essay on Feudal Property; Squire's Essay on the Anglo-Saxon Government; Miller's Historical View of the English Government; Yorke's Law of Forfeiture; to all which the works of Mr. Watkins himself now form a valuable addition, as the legacy of a deceased member of the profession, always to be valued and regretted.

I. 1. FEUD, according to Somner, is a German compound, consisting of feh, feo, or feoh, (a salary, stipend, or wages,) and hade, head, or hode, (quality, kind, or nature; feudum, [feh, or] fee, or land holden in fee, is, therefore, (considered in its primary acceptation,) what was holden in fee hold, by contraction, feod, or feud, i. e. in a stipendiary, conditional, mercenary way and nature, with the acknowledgment of a superior, and a condition of returning him some service for it, upon the withdrawing whereof the land was revertible unto the lord. Somm. on Gav. 106, 111. Allodial lands were such as the proprietor had the absolute property in; the term being derived from the Northern odhal, right; so called from odh, proprietas, and all, totum; the syllables being transposed. See 2 Comm. 44, and n. Others derive this word from an and lot, allotment; the mode of dividing what was not granted as stipendiary property. Roberts. Char. V.

Feuds, or Feuda, says Selden, are the same which, in our laws, we call tenancies, or lands held; Feuda, also, are possessions so given and held, that the possessor is bound to do service to him from whom they were given, Seld. tit. Hon. 273.

This service was originally purely military; and the possessor or feudatory's homage or fealty was, (as it seems,) in the infancy of feuds, a kind of military engagement, rather implied than expressed, to be faithful to his benefactor, and also assistant unto him. Spelman therefore calls a feud, prædium militare; and Somner says that every inheritance is improperly and corruptly called a fief or fee, that is not holden militiæ gratia, the ground of all fees. Spelm. Feuds, 6; Id. Gloss. in n. Somm. Gav. 49.

2. Feuds were originally a military policy of the Northern conquering nations, devised as the most likely means to secure their new acquisitions; and were large districts, or parcels of land, given or allotted by the conquering general to the superior officers of his army; and by them dealt out, in less parcels, to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers. Thus a proper military subordination was naturally and rationally enough inferred and established; and an army of feudatories were as so many stipendiaries, always on foot, ready to muster and engage in defence of their country. So that the feudal returns of fealty or mutual fidelity and aid seem originally to have been political, or rather natural consequences, drawn from the apparent necessity these warlike people were under of maintaining their ground, with the same spirit, and by the same means, they had got it. Wright's Law of Tenures, 7—10.

As the princes of Europe were every day more and more alarmed by the progress of the Northern standard, many of them (and by degrees all) went into this or a like policy, as the strongest entrenchment; and, in imitation of it, they, reserving the dominium or property of the lands they gave, parcelled out some of their own possessions or territories under an express fealty; engaging their beneficiaries or feudatories to make them the like returns of fidelity and aid, as followed from the nature and design of an original feud. From hence, probably, the feudal obligations began to be considered as renders or services of render, calculated for the benefit of the proprietary; who was, in respect of the dominium remaining in him, thenceforth called dominus; and military aid or service (as now called) was understood to be the real or fictitious terms or conditions of all propriety or possession in Europe. Wright Ten. 10—13.

A different account, however, of the origin of the feudal system is suggested by a more modern writer, and advocated by a late editor of the Commentaries, Mr. Justice Coleridge. —It is this: That when the Germanic tribes poured down upon the empire, the conquerors made partition of the lands between themselves and the original possessors: some tribes taking larger, some a less portion to themselves. The estates of the conquerors were termed allodial; they were inheritable and subject to no burden but that of public defence. Besides these lands, others also were reserved out of the share of the conquered for the monarch; partly to maintain his dignity, and partly to supply his munificence. These were the fiscal lands, and for the greater part were gradually granted out under the name of benefices; and though the donation might not be accompanied by any express reservation of military service, yet the beneficiary was undoubtedly more closely connected with the crown, and bound to more constant service than the allodial proprietor.

It is suggested that there is no satisfactory proof that these benefices were ever resumable at pleasure, but that from the beginning they were ordinarily granted for the life of the grantee; that very early they became hereditary, and that as soon as they did so, they led to the practice of sub-feudation; which on this supposition is to be deemed the true commencement of the system of feudal tenures.

Still at this period the far larger part of the land remained allodial; and the extension of the feudal system is therefore to be attributed to the forlorn state in which the allodial proprietor found himself, during the period of anarchy and private warfare which succeeded the death of Charlemagne. In those times the connexion between the beneficiary and the vassal was a protection to both; the former abstained from acts of violence against the latter, and both together protected each against the attacks of others; while the isolated allodialist, to whom the crown in its weakness could afford no succour, was left a common prey to all. This led to a voluntary subjection of themselves to feudal laws, upon feudal conditions, and to the gradual diminution, though not extinction of allodial estates.

Hallam alludes to a custom, called commendation, which, as occasioned by the same state of society, certainly adds some credit to this theory. This custom was a kind of personal feudality; the lord was bound to protect the person and his lands who so commended himself, after which he received a stipulated sum of money called salvamentum. The vassal performed homage, but the connexion had no reference to land, was not always burdened with the condition of military service, and seems to have been capable of dissolution at the pleasure of the vassal.

This manner of accounting for the rise of the feudal system may seem not unreasonable or unnatural, principally on two grounds: 1st. What is known of the composition of the Germanic armies who overran the empire, makes it very unlikely either that the general would be actuated by so refined a policy as that formerly supposed, or that the soldiery would have submitted to take their estates as gifts to be held of him, or their superior officers, on feudal conditions; or in fact upon any other footing than that of their being the respective proportions of the territory to which their own services had given them an independent title. 2ndly. The usual theory, assuming that the foundation of the feudal system was the public defence, appears rather a refined after-thought, not warranted by the fact. No doubt, even if the first conquerors took their land allodially, they were bound by those general principles which were among the very earliest in civil society, to come forward in defence of the public safety: but the feudal principle is a private one, of mutual defence from private dangers; it was adapted to meet that state of anarchy and private warfare in which individuals did not look to the crown or the laws, but to their own strength, (with their protectors and dependents) for safety, against violence and oppression. The vassal took his oath of fealty to his immediate lord, and to no other, and the oath was without any reservation. Accordingly it was a part of the law to define under what circumstances the vassal was bound upon pain of losing his fief to follow his lord, even in his wars against the monarch; and the very circumstances of a limitation of cases being made, seems to imply a time when he was bound to do so in all cases. In some districts, in fact, the vassal owed no service to the king; and in others he was only bound to follow the lord in his wars to the limits of the lord's territories.

The system, however, which has been adopted by English lawyers may be considered, as to them, natural and true. In England the system, as a whole, was introduced at once by a public and powerful sovereign, who made or applied it as a great political means of military defence. William received the fealty, not only of his own vassals who held of him in chief, but of their vassals also, and thenceforward the oath of fealty to a subject, in England, was accompanied with the reservation to be found in Littleton's Precedent, § 85. "Salve la foy qui jee doy a nostre Seigneur le Roy." See Coleridge's note on 2 Comm. p. 46, and Hallam's Middle Ages, and Robertson's Charles V. [As to the question whether the system might not have been introduced previous to the time of William I. see post, II. 1.]

3. Feuds were originally precarious, and held at the will of the lord: they next became certain for one year; and were, some time after, given for life. But though feuds were not at first hereditary, yet the vassals or feudal tenants were called navi, as if born such: and it was unusual, and even thought hard, to reject the heir of the former feudatary, provided he was able to do the services of the feud and the lord had no just objection against him. But though the lord did not remove the heir from the feud, yet it is not likely that he succeeded absolutely as of course, but that he paid a fine, or made some acknowledgment in the nature of relief for the renewal of the feud; and though that reason ceased, yet the fine was continued afterwards, became hereditary, and is well known at this day (though by several names) in most countries. Wright, 13—15. See post, II. 5.

Feuds were afterwards extended, beyond the life of the first vassal or feudal tenant, to his sons, or some or one of them whom the lord should name. In process of time, grandchildren succeeded to sons, and brothers also succeeded to brothers, if the feud was antiquum aut paternum; but not if it was novum, i. e. newly purchased or acquired; not having descended from the father to the brother first dying. At length, not only descendants in the direct line succeeded in infantum, but collaterals also, without regard to their degree, provided they were descended from and were of the blood of the first feudatary. Wright, 15—18. and the authorities there cited.—See the next division.

Spelman says, that these several conditions of feuds had their several denominations; while precarious, they were called munera; when for life, beneficia; and were first called feuda, when they began to be granted in perpetuity, and not before. Spelman on Feuds, 4. §. 9. Somner says, feudum was a word not known until about A. D. 1000. Somner on Gav. 102.

4. Feuds being thus originally in the hands of military persons, who were under frequent incapacities to cultivate their own lands, they found it necessary to commit part of them to persons who, having no feudal possessions of their own, were glad to possess them on any terms. To such persons small portions were let, reserving such returns of service, corn, cattle, or money, as might enable the proprietors to attend to the feudal duties uninterruptedly. By this means the feudal policy was considerably extended; as all persons accepting a feud were, under an express or implied fealty, obliged to answer the stipulated renders, and to promote the peace and welfare of the feudal society. From thence therefore arose the distinctions made by the feudists, of feuds proper and improper, and the many subdivisions of these terms. Wright, 19—26.

Proper feuds are such, and such only, as are purely military; and, at this time, hereditary; and such as in all respects preserve the nature of an original feud, as before explained. It was the military nature of these feuds that first rendered women and monks incapable of receiving or succeeding to feuds of this sort; and that restrained the alienation, devising, or incumbering of the feud by the feudatary, without the consent of the lord; and of the seignior by the lord, without the consent of the tenant; the obligations of the superior and inferior being mutual and reciprocal. The feudal course of succession, in all proper feuds, belonged to the sons only, (exclusive of daughters,) and to them equally; until, by a constitution of the Emperor Frederic, honorary feuds became indivisible; and, as such, they (and, in imitation of them, military feuds in most countries,) began to descend to the eldest son only. Wright, 27—32.

5. Such feuds are termed improper feuds, as are sold or bartered for any immediate or contracted equivalent; or are granted free of all service, or in consideration of one or more certain services, whether military or not; or upon a cense, or rent, in lieu of service; and all such feuds also as, by express words in their creation or constitution, are alienable, or allowed to descend indifferently to males or females. Wright, 32. Of which sort most feuds are at this day.

They are distinguished from proper feuds, by such qualities only as are varied from or superadded to the feud by express provision of the parties; they must appear to be so from the words of the investiture; which solemnity is as necessary to this as to a proper feud. And the custom of the country where the feud lies must be accurately observed.

6. Few of the feudal obligations are, as such, of force with us. First mentioning fealty, those of eviction and aid may deserve some notice, as our laws of warranty and aid may be supposed to depend on them.

FEALTY, the essential feudal bond, is so necessary to the very notion of a feud, that it is a downright contradiction to suppose the most improper feud to subsist without it. Craig de Jure Feud. 45—7. 223; 1 Inst. 129, a; Seld. Tit. Hon. 273. See Fealty.

7. The feudal obligation upon Eviction, ut vel feudum aliud, ejusdem bonitatis, restituat Dominus, vel satisfactionem præstet, if considered as a penalty upon the lord for refusing or neglecting, when required, to protect or defend the feudatary's title to the fee, might be always reasonable; otherwise, it rather seems to have prevailed upon the reason of contracted and improper feuds, than by the nature of a pure original feud. And though none of the ancient feudists make any strict distinction, yet they must be understood to speak of the times in which they wrote; in which such improper feuds chiefly prevailed; nay, when almost all feuds were alienable and saleable as matters of merchandise. Wright, 39, 40.

8. Aid, as understood to import an obligation upon the feudal tenant to contribute to the private necessities or occasions of the lord, was not of direct feudal obligation; the original feudal aid seeming to have been purely military, binding the feudatary merely to concur with, and to assist his superior or lord, in defence of the feud, or feudal society. On this ground it can hardly be made out, that the several different aids which have been exacted, are to be inferred from the reason of feuds; but they rather seem to depend upon the usage or custom of the several countries where they are established. Wright, 40—42. See post, II. 6.

II. 1. It is difficult to determine precisely the time when feuds or tenures were first brought into ENGLAND: some have thought that they were planted here long before the conquest; others that they were introduced by William I. soon after. The authorities on both sides this question are numerous, and have been thus ranged: that feuds existed before the conquest is contended by the author of the Mirror; Lord Coke (1 Inst. 76, b.); Selden (Tit. Hon. 510.); the judges of Ireland in the cases of tenures; Nat. Bacon (Hist. Engl. Gov. 161.); Sir W. Temple (Introd. 171.); and Blackstone, though he does not admit that they were a part of the national constitution. That feuds were first introduced by William the First is asserted by Mat. Paris; Bracton (lib. 2. c. 16. § 7.); Spelman (on Feuds); Dugdale; Wilkins; Sir R. Cotton; Lord Hale (H. C. L. 107. 223.); Craig (de Jure Feud. 29.); Somner (Gavelkind, 100.); and Wright himself. See Saint-John on the Crown Lands.

One observation may be of service in deciding this question; that William the First about the 20th year of his reign, just when the general survey of England, called Domesday book, is supposed to have been finished, and not till then, summoned all the great men and landholders in the kingdom to London and Salisbury, to do their homage, and to swear their fealty to him. Hence we may reasonably suppose, 1st. That this general homage and fealty was done at this time in consequence of something new; or else that engagements so important to the maintenance and security of a new establishment would have been required long before. 2ndly. That as this general homage and fealty was done about the time that Domesday book was finished, and not before, it may be supposed that that survey was taken upon or soon after our ancestors' consent to tenures, in order to discover the quantity of every man's fee, and to fix his homage. Wright, 52—56.

On the whole, therefore, it seems, that it may safely be assumed, that tenures first became a principal branch of the national policy in the time of William I.; for even in the Saxon times particular proprietors of large tracts of land, which they could not cultivate and manure themselves, might let some part of them to their neighbours, under various acknowledgments or returns of service, not altogether unlike some of the feudal tenures; especially as our Saxon ancestors may be supposed to have had some notion of such tenures, they being a colony or branch of the ancient Goths, who first brought the feudal policy into Europe. Wright, 57, n.

The question whether the law of feudal tenures can be said to have existed even before the conquest, is very ingeniously discussed by a modern writer of eminence, who at last allows that perhaps any attempt to decide it positively would end in a verbal dispute. In every political institution three things are to be considered, the principle, the form, and the name. The last (he admits) will not be found in any genuine Anglo-Saxon record; of the form, or the peculiar circumstances and incidents of a regular fief there is some, though not much appearance. But they who reflect upon the dependence in which free and even noble tenants held their estates of other subjects, and upon the privileges of territorial jurisdiction will (the writer thinks) perceive much of the intrinsic character (the principle) of the feudal relation, though in a less mature and systematic shape than it assumed after the Norman conquest.

This question was once famous at least, if not interesting. The position asserted by Spelman in his Glossary, that lands were not held feudally before the conquest, having been denied by the Irish judges in the great case of tenures, Spelman was compelled to draw up his Treatise on Feuds, in which it is more fully maintained. Several other writers, especially Hicks, Maddox, and Sir Martin Wright took the same side. But the author now alluded to thinks that names equally respectable might be thrown into the opposite scale: and that the prevailing bias of modern antiquaries is in favour at least of the modified affirmation above stated. See Hallam's State of Europe in the Middle Ages, chap. 8. on the Anglo-Saxon Constitution.

2. The establishment of tenures in England may be called an extraordinary alteration of the national policy; not only because it was such in many of its consequences, but likewise because it originally and immediately defeated all supposition or possibility of propriety in any other person than the king; inasmuch that it became a fundamental necessary maxim, principle, or fiction of our English law of tenures, (alluded to in the introduction to this title,) that the king is universal lord of his whole territories; and that no man doth or can possess any part thereof, or lands therein, but as either mediately or immediately derived from him. Wright, 58. See also 1 Inst. 65, a.

According to this position, of which the truth is undeniable, all the lands in England, except those in the king's hands, are feudal. This universality of tenures, if not quite peculiar to England, certainly does not prevail in several countries on the continent of Europe, where the feudal system has been established; and it seems there are some few portions of allodial land in the northern part of our own island. As to Scotland, Lord Stair expresses himself rather ambiguously on the subject; for he says, that there remains little of allodial land in Scotland; but, in a few lines after, observes, that the glebes of the clergy: which seem to come nearest to allodials, are more properly mortified, or, as we should call them, Mortmain Fees. Stair, Inst. See 1 Inst. 65, a. in n.

As William I., however, notwithstanding the monkish relations, and the misapprehensions of some modern writers, did not claim or possess himself of the lands of England, as the spoils of conquest; so neither did he tyrannically and arbitrarily subject them to a feudal dependence; but as the feudal law was at that time the prevailing law in Europe, William, who had always governed by this policy, might probably recommend it to our ancestors, as the most obvious and ready way to put them upon a foot with their neighbours, and to secure the nation against any future attempts from them. We find accordingly, among the laws of William I. a law enacting the feudal law itself; not indeed ex nomine, but in effect; as it requires from all persons the same engagement to, and introduces the same dependence upon, the king, as supreme lord of all the lands in England, as were supposed to be due to a supreme lord by the feudal law. The law meant, is the 52d law of William I. (see Wright, 65); the terms of which are absolutely feudal, and are apt and proper to establish that policy with all its consequences. for it requires, "that all owners of land should expressly engage and swear that they would become vassals or tenants, and as such be faithful to William as their lord; and that they would, in consequence thereof, every where faithfully maintain and defend his, their lord's, territories and title, as well as person, and give him all possible aid and assistance against his enemies foreign and domestic." See also the 55th, 58th, 68th, and 69th laws of this king; and Sir M. Wright's ingenious observations upon the whole, in his book, p. 69, et seq.

3. Although it is certain that wardship could be no part of the law of feuds before they became hereditary, yet then, as they often descended on infants who were incapable of performing or engaging for the services of the feud, wardships of the land, i. e. the custody of the feud itself, was retained by the lord; that out of the profits he might provide a fit person to supply the infant heir's defect of services until he came of age to perform them. Wright, 89.

With respect to the custody or wardship of the body, there is no clear feudal reason to be given for it; and therefore we may suppose that our Norman ancestors might think it reasonable, rather in regard to the infant heir, than to the lord himself, that the lord, who had the custody of the feud, should likewise have the care and maintenance of the infant feudatory; who would thus be most likely to be qualified for the services of the feud. Fortesc. de Li. Ang. c. 44; Smith de Rep. Ang. 264; Comel. Inst. lib. 1. tit. 17. § 2; 1 Inst. 75, b; Bacon. Hist. Eng. Gov. 148. See 2 Comm. c. 5 p. 67; c. 6. p. 87; and tit. Guardian.

4. As for MARRIAGE, the lords of our English fees might possibly take the hint from Normandy: though, in the sense of our law, in which it meant the interest of the guardian in bestowing a ward in marriage, and was understood to be a beneficial perquisite of tenure, no express notices of it can be found earlier than the statute of Merton, c. 6, 7. Hen. 3. By the charter of Henry I., a daughter of any of the king's tenants was not, even in the life-time of her father, to be married without the king's privity; because otherwise she might marry a public enemy. But the king was to take nothing for his consent; nor could he restrain the father from marrying her to any that was not such enemy; but this charter says nothing of the marriage of males, nor does it give the least colour or countenance to any private profit from the marriage of females. Our English lords, however, by an extraordinary construction of Magna Charta, took upon them, not only the absolute marriage of female wards, but of males too, which at length became one of the great feudal grievances. See Ll. H. 1. c. 1; Spelman on Feuds, 29; Glanv. lib. 7. c. 12. p. 55, a; Bract. lib. 2. c. 37. § 6. p. 188, a; 2 Comm. c. 5. p. 70. c. 6. p. 88.

5. RELIEF; [relevamen, relevatio, relevium; intimating, that the inheritance, which, by the death of the former tenant, became jacens, or caducum, was thus relevatus, lifted or raised up again. See Bracton, lib. 2. c. 36; Britton, c. 69; Spelm. Relevamen.] was not a service, but a fruit of feudal tenure. 2 Roll. Abr. 511, D. 3; 3 Rep. 66; 1 Inst. 83, a. These were not arbitrarily introduced by William I., but brought into England with feuds, according to the custom of the feudal law and other nations: and although Lord Coke (2 Inst. 7, 8; but see 1 Inst. 176, a), supposes reliefs to have been certain at the common law, yet they were probably with us originally uncertain as by the feudal law; and were, no doubt, on this account, another of the great grievances of tenure; to remedy which several laws were made, fixing them at certain sums for all lands held by knight-service, till the expiration of that tenure, under the 12 Car. 2. c. 24. See Ll. Wm. 1. c. 22; Ll. Hen. 1. c. 14; Magna Charta, c. 2; ante, I. 3. and Wright's Tenures.

The relief of socage lands was fixed by the 40th law of William I. at one year's rent, and remains the same to this day: although it is not taken notice of in any of the charters of Henry I., John, or Hen. III. Glanv. lib. 9. c. 4; Fleta, lib. 3. c. 17. § 11; Litt. § 126, 127; 2 Inst. 232; and see 1 Inst. 93, a. in n.; and tit. Relief; and 2 Comm. c. 5. p. 65; c. 6. p. 87.

6. AIDS, (see ante, I. 8.) called by Spelman (Treatise on Feuds, 59.) Tribute, and by our old authors auxilia, were mere benevolences, rendered by a tenant to his superior lord, in times of difficulty and distress. Bracton, lib. 2. c. 16. § 8; Fleta, lib. 3. c. 14. § 9. These were not of direct feudal obligation; but first obtained out of a regard to the person and occasions of the lord. The kind and quantum, therefore, of every aid was originally as various and uncertain as the occasion of the lord, and the abilities of the tenant. But as aids grew frequent, they became, in many countries, established renders of duty: thus, in Normandy, the three most used and frequent aids, 1st, to make the lord's eldest son a knight; 2dly, to marry his eldest daughter; and, 3dly, to ransom his person; became fixed and established. Besides these, there was one of an inferior nature, respecting only inferior lords, viz. an aid to enable the lord to pay his relief, therefore called aid de relief. To all these our ancestors were liable: and thus far went into the Norman notions on this subject, viz. they carried it farther; for in the time of King John inferior lords took aids to pay their debts, and in the time of King Henry II. it was doubted whether lords might not require aids toward their military expeditions; but at length these inferior aids, together with the aid de relief, and other illegal aids imposed by the king himself, were effectually abolished by a charter of King John, revived and restored by 25 Edw. 1. c. 5, 6; and the two first of the usual aids before-mentioned were fixed (by stat. Westm. 1. c. 36. extended by 25 Edw. 3. c. 11. to aids required by the king) as follows, viz. the aid of a knight's fee at 20s. and of socage lands of 20*l.* per annum at 20*l.* and so pro ratâ. These statutes do not regulate the third aid for ransom of the lord's person; this was less frequent, and by no means capable of certainty; it being of the highest consequence, with regard especially to the supreme lord, that he should at any rate be ransomed as often as he was taken prisoner of war. Wright, 105—115. See 2 Comm. c. 5. p. 63. &c. c. 6. p. 86.

7. When a fee determines for want of heirs, or propter delictum tenentis, the land falling back to the lord is called an escheat [escaeta], and is as such reckoned by our English lawyers among the fruits or perquisites (though it might properly be considered as the absolute determination) of tenure. Spelman on Feuds, 37.

Spelman (ubi supra) divides escheats into regal and feudal; (in which he is followed by Coke, 3 Inst. 111; agreeable enough to the import of the word escheat from the French escheoir, to happen.) But, strictly speaking, such lands as are not held immediately of the king, and yet happen to him upon the commission of any treason, are not escheats, but forfeitures; which were given to the king by the common law, and do not depend upon the law of feuds or tenures, but upon Saxon laws made long before their introduction, and which prevail even now. Lambard. Ll. Alf. c. 4; Ll. Canuti, c. 54. See Yorke's Law of Forfeiture; and tit. Forfeiture, II. 1.

Though this forfeiture to the king may seem severe on the mesne lord, in defeating his seigniority, yet it seems a punishment inflicted on him for his want of caution in the choice of his tenant. The law having inflicted a similar penalty on the lord, where the tenant is guilty of felony only, the king, in this latter case, having the land a year and a day, to the prejudice of the immediate lord, to whom the estate in that case escheats. See Magna Charta, c. 22. 31; 1 Inst. 18. b. in n.; 2 Inst. 36, 37; 3 Inst. 111; St. de Prærog. Regis, 17 Edw. 2. c. 16; Stawford, P. C. l. 3. c. 30. And for further matter, 2 Comm. c. 5, 6; and tit. Escheat.

If lands be held of the king, as of an honour come to him by a common escheat, as the tenant's dying without heir, or committing felony, these lands are part of the honour; otherwise, if forfeited for treason, for then they come to the king by reason of his person and crown; and if he grants them over, &c. the patentee shall hold of the king in chief. 2 Inst. 64.

It was found by special verdict, that the prior of Merton was seised of a house in Southwark, held of the Archbishop of Canterbury, as of his borough of Southwark, and (anno 30 of his reign) surrendered it to Henry VIII., who granted it and other lands to J. S. and his heirs, to hold of him in libero burgagio, by fealty, for all services and demands, and not in capite; and afterwards Queen Mary granted the manor and borough of Southwark to the mayor and commonalty of London; and the tenant of the messuage died without issue; and the question was, whether Queen Elizabeth or the patentees of the borough should have the escheat; and adjudged for the queen; for the first patentee of the messuage held it of the queen in socage, as of a seigniority in gross; and the words in libero burgagio are merely void: for the land out of the borough cannot be held in libero burgagio; and there shall not be several tenures, for one tenure was reserved by the king for all; therefore of necessity it shall be a tenure in socage of the king. Cro. Eliz. 120.

By a recent act of parliament the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 23. (passed since the first volume of this work, containing the titles Escheat and Forfeiture, was printed off,) the law relative to the escheat and forfeiture of property real and personal, held in trust, has been amended.

§ 2. enacts, that if a trustee or a mortgagee of land die without an heir, the Court of Chancery may appoint a person to convey such land, &c. according to the provisions of the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 60.

§ 3. Lands, chattels, or stock, vested in any trustee, shall not escheat or be forfeited to the king, or any lord of a manor, by reason of the attainer or conviction of such trustee.

By § 4. the act is to extend to every case of a trustee having some beneficial estate or interest in the same subject, or some duty as trustee to perform, and also to every case of a trust by implication of law or construction of equity.

But § 5. provides that the act shall not prevent the escheat of forfeiture of any beneficial interest in such trustee.

§ 6. declares that where any trustee of lands, &c. shall have died without heirs, or have been convicted of an offence whereby the lands, &c. shall have escheated or been forfeited, such lands, &c. shall become subject to the control of the Court of Chancery, under the provisions of the said act of the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 60. But this clause is not to extend to lands, &c. vested in any person by a grant subsequent to such escheat or forfeiture, or which more than twenty years before the passing of the act have been reduced into possession by the party entitled, by virtue of such escheat or forfeiture.

8. ESCUAGE is reckoned by Lord Hale among the perquisites of tenure; and whether so or not, seems one of its most obscure and unintelligible branches.

Escuage, considered as a service, or species of tenure, was not, as Littleton intimates, (§ 95, 96,) a direct personal service of attendance upon the king in his wars; nor was it due upon all military occasions, as knight-service was: but it was a pecuniary aid, or contribution, reserved by particular lords instead, or in lieu, of personal service; the better to enable them to bear the extraordinary expense of their own attendance and warfare, when the king made war on Scotland or Wales, or upon any foreign country, if the tenure was so expressed. Bract. l. 2. c. 16; Litt. § 95, 97, 100, 103, 155, 158; Mad. Hist. Exch. 452; Seld. Notes ad Hengham, 118.

As the lord's service abroad was thus uncertain, the quantum of this aid was seldom ascertained by reservation; but was usually proportioned to the fine received by the king from his tenants in capite failing to attend in such expeditions. Fleta, lib. 3. fol. 198.

This aid and fine were both of them called escuage à scuto quod assumitur ad servitium militare (Bract. ubi supra); in respect of the scutum which ought to be borne both by lord and tenant in such wars.

In this view escuage was a specific service (of a different kind from knight-service), in respect whereof only the tenant, on account of its subserviency to the military policy of the nation, was esteemed a knight, or rather as a military tenant. Wright, 126, 127.

Escuage, however, it must be allowed, was anciently, as it is at this day, more generally understood to denote a mulct or fine for a military tenant's defect of service, as the feudal severities began to abate. Mad. Hist. Exch. 433, 454, 457, 458, 462; 2 Roll. Abr. 509, § 1; Litt. § 102.

Our kings anciently taking advantage of, or perhaps complying with, this humour of their tenants, which made their actual services precarious, did sometimes, on occasion of war, without summons, assess a moderate sum upon each knight's fee, as a scutage or escuage, by which they might be enabled to provide stipendiaries. But as escuage of this sort was a previous commutation for service really imposed at the king's will, and not incurred as a fine, it was not long submitted to: in the time of King John, it was not only insisted upon as an undoubted right of the king's tenants, but the barons urged, and the king, by his charter, declared, that no escuage should be imposed or assessed nisi per commune concilium Regni. See Litt. § 97; 1 Inst. 72, a; Magna Charta, cap. 37.

Escuage thus becoming the only penalty for defect of service, many lords, by agreement between them and their tenants, fixed it a certain sum, to be paid as often as escuage should be granted, without regard to the rate assessed by parliament. Thus ascertained, it was called escuage certain, and because it did in effect discharge the tenant from all military service, the persons who held by such escuage were looked upon as socage tenants, and no longer esteemed as tenants by knight-service. Litt. §§ 98, 120; 1 Inst. 87, a.

As to escuage, see also the notes on 1 Inst. 73, 74. And now escuage is expressly taken away by the 12 Car. 2. c. 24. (See post, III. 3.); and had fallen into disuse long before: for there is no instance of parliament assessing it since the reign of Edward II. See further, 2 Comm. c. 5. p. 74, &c.

III. 1. IT IS SO ABSOLUTE A MAXIM, principle, or fiction, of the law of tenures, that all lands are holden either mediately or immediately of the king, that even the king himself cannot give lands in so absolute and unconditional a manner, as to set them free from tenure. And, therefore, if the king should grant lands without reserving any particular service or tenure, or if he should in express words declare, that his patentee should have lands absque aliquo inde reddendo; yet the law or established policy of the kingdom would create a tenure; and the patentee should anciently (before the 12 Car. 2. c. 24.) have held of him in capite by knight-service. 1 Inst. 1. 65; 2 Inst. 501; Somn. on Gat. 126; 6 Rep. 6; 9 Rep. 123; Bro. Tenures, 3, 52. And now, in such case, or, if the king release the services to the tenant, it will not extinguish the tenure; but the tenant shall, notwithstanding, hold by fealty, which, as was before observed, (I. 6.) is an incident essential to every tenure, and therefore cannot be released. 9 Rep. 123; Law of Tenures, 196; 2 Comm. c. 6. p. 86.

Lands thus holden are called tenures; which were principally divided, according to their services, into tenures by knight-service and in socage.

According to Blackstone, there seem to have subsisted among our ancestors four principal species of lay tenures, to which all others may be reduced: the grand criteria of which were the natures of the several services, or renders, that were due to the lords from their tenants. The services, in respect of their quality, were either free or base services; in respect of their quantity, and the time of exacting them, were either certain or uncertain. Free-services were such as were not unbecoming the character of a soldier, or a freeman, to perform; as, to serve under his lord in the wars, to pay a sum of money, and the like. Base-services were such as were fit only for peasants, or persons of a servile rank; as, to plough the lord's land, to make his hedges, to carry out his dung, or other mean employments. The certain services, whether free or base, were such as were stinted in quantity, and could not be exceeded on any pretence; as, to pay a stated annual rent, or to plough such a field for three days. The uncertain depended upon unknown contingencies; as, to do military service in person, or pay an assessment in lieu of it, when called upon; or to wind a horn whenever the Scots invaded the realm; which are free services. Or to do whatever the lord should command, which is a base or villein service. 2 Comm. c. 5.

From the various combinations of these services have arisen the four kinds of lay tenure which subsisted in England till the middle of the 17th century; and three of which subsist to this day. Of these, Bracton (who wrote under Henry the Third) seems to give the clearest and most compendious account of any author ancient or modern, of which the following is the outline or abstract: "Tenements are of two kinds, frank-tenement, and villenage. And, of frank-tenements, some are held freely in consideration of homage and knight-service; others in free-socage with the service of fealty only." And again, "Of villenages some are pure, and others are privileged. He that holds in pure villenage shall do whatsoever is commanded him, and always be bound to an uncertain service. The other kind of villenage is called villein-socage; and these villein-socmen do villein services, but such as are certain and determined." See Bract. l. 4. fr. 1. c. 28. Of which the sense seems to be as follows: first, where the service was free, but uncertain, as military service with homage, that tenure was called the tenure in chivalry, per servitium militare, or by knight-service. Secondly, where the service was not only free, but also certain, as by fealty only, by rent and fealty, &c. that tenure was called liberum socagium, or free-socage. These were the only free holdings or tenements; the others were villenous or servile. As, thirdly, where the service was base in its nature, and uncertain as to time and quantity, the tenure was purum villenagium absolute or pure villenage. Lastly, where the service was base in its nature, but reduced to a certainty; this was still villenage, but distinguished from the other by the name of privileged villenage, villenagium privilegiatum; or it might be still called socage, (from the certainty of its services), but degraded by their baseness into the inferior title of villanum socagium, villenous socage.

2. TENURES BY KNIGHT-SERVICE differed very little from proper feuds; but being now abolished by the 12 Car. 2. c. 24. and turned into free and common socage, inquiry shall be made at some length into that existing tenure. See ante I. 1; II. 1, 2; and 2 Comm. c. 5. I.

3, 4. TENURES IN SOCAGE are holdings by any certain conventional services that are not military; the word socage, according to Sommer, being derived of the Saxon word soc (a liberty, privilege, or immunity,) and agium, a legal termination, signifying service or duty. Somm. Gav. 133, 143, 141; Litt. § 17; 1 Inst. 80, a; Britt. c. c. 6. § 4. 5; Plat. lib. 1. c. 8.

It seems, however, more probable and consistent to derive socage from soca, a plough; or rather, ploughshare, (soc, Fr.) the ancient service reserved on this tenure being to plough the lord's land; but which is now changed into many other kinds of service. In this sense the tenure in socage is denominated, (like the tenure by knight-service,) simply from the name or nature of the service at first reserved. Wright 141, 4; 1 Inst. 86. (b); Craig de jure Feud. 65; 2 Comm. c. 6. and the notes there. But see Socage, Socagers.

By the degenerating of knight-service, or personal military duty, into escuage or pecuniary assessments, all the advantages (either promised or real) of the feudal constitution were destroyed, and nothing but the hardships remained. These may be collected from the foregoing detail, and are very justly and feelingly stated in 2 Comm. c. 5, p. 75, 76.

Palliatives were from time to time applied by successive acts of parliaments, which assuaged some temporary grievances. Till at length the humanity of King James I. concerted, in consideration of a proper equivalent, to abolish them all, though the plan proceeded not to effect; in like manner as he had formed a scheme, and began to put it in execution, for removing the feudal grievance of heritable jurisdictions in Scotland; which has since been pursued and effected by the statute 20 Geo. 2. c. 43. 50. King James's plan for exchanging our military tenures seems to have been nearly the same as that which has since been pursued; only with this difference, that, by way of compensation for the loss which the Crown and other lords would sustain, an annual fee-farm rent was to have been settled and inseparably annexed to the Crown, and assured to the inferior lords, payable out of every knight's fee within their respective shires; an expedient seemingly much better than the hereditary excise, which was afterwards made the principal equivalent for these concessions. For at length the military tenures, with all their heavy appendages, (having, during the usurpation, been discontinued,) were destroyed at one blow by the 12 Car. 2. c. 24. which enacts, "That the Court of Wards and Liveries, and all wardships, liveries, primer seisin, and ouster-le-mains, values and forfeitures of marriages, by reason of any tenure of the king or others, be totally taken away. And that all fines for alienation of tenures by homage, knight's service, and escuage, and also aids for marrying the daughter or knighting the son, and all tenures of the king in capite, be likewise taken away. And that all sorts of tenures, held of the king or others, be turned into free and common socage; save only tenures in frankalmoigne, copyholds, and the honorary services of grand serjeanty." A statute which was a greater acquisition to the civil property of this kingdom than even Magna Charta itself: since that only pruned the luxuriances that had grown out of the military tenures, and thereby preserved them in vigour; but the statute of King Charles extirpated the whole, and demolished both root and branches. 2 Comm. c. 5. ad fin.

The above expression, in the title and body of the act, as to tenures in capite, and which was also repeated by the speaker of the House of Commons in his address to the king on presenting the bill, is an inaccuracy of a very extraordinary nature. For tenure in capite signifies nothing more than that the king is the immediate lord of the land-owner; and the land might have been either of a military or socage tenure. See 2 Comm. c. 5. n.; Mad. Bar. Ang. 238; 1 Inst. 101, n. 5; and see Serjeanty.

The several changes made in the tenure of socage by this statute, 12 Car. 2. c. 24. (the benefits of which were fully extended to Ireland by the Irish act, 14, 15 Car. 2. c. 19.) are the following: viz. First, it takes away the aids pur file marier and pur faire fitz chevalier, which were incident to all socage tenures. 2. It relieves socage in capite from the burden of the king's primer seisin, and of fines of alienation to the king, to both of which socage in capite was equally liable with tenure by knight-service in capite, though not so to wardship. 3. It extends the father's power of appointing guardians to children of both sexes; and thus supplied the means of still further preventing guardianship in socage. See Guardian. In all other respects the tenure in socage seems to be under the same circumstances, and attended with the same consequences, as it was before the Restoration.

Having thus reformed and improved this favourite tenure, the statute, in the next place, provides for the extension of it throughout the kingdom. This it effectually secures, by converting into socage all tenures by knight-service, as mentioned above; and by taking from the Crown the power of creating any other tenure than socage in future. 1 Inst. 93. (b) in n.; and see Id. 85, (a) in n.

It appears that there is nothing, however, in the above statute which in the least varies the tenure in Frankalmoigne; it being expressly saved in the statute, § 7. See Charitable Uses, Frankalmoigne, Mortmain.—Neither does it appear in any way to affect the tenure by burgage. See Burgage Tenure.—And it leaves the tenure by villeinage as it was before; one of the provisos declaring, that it shall not be construed to alter or change any tenure by copy of court-roll, or any services incident thereto. § 7.

A short statement relative to the ancient tenures of lands in Scotland, and their abolition, may not be irrelevant in this place. The following information is chiefly abstracted and digested from Bell's Dictionary of the Law of Scotland, tit. Feudal System, Tenures.

The prevailing tenure by which most of the land of Scotland was held, was ward-holding. It was this tenure which in every case of doubt was presumed; and appears to have been similar to the English knight-service in capite; for it was a military tenure, by which the vassal was bound to attend his superior to battle, and the two casualties arising from this holding, viz. wardship, and marriage, had in view the security of the superior. The consequences of this tenure (like those of the tenure of knight-service in England) were greatly oppressive; and it was not till after the rebellion of 1745 that this tenure was abolished by the provision of the British act, 20 Geo. 2. c. 50; by which the lands held ward of the Crown, or of the prince, were converted into blanch holding; and those which were held ward of a subject were converted into feu-holding, at a rate appointed by the Court of Session, under authority given by the statute.

Fee-holding was a tenure known while ward existed, which obliged the vassal to return farm-produce to the superior: on the abolition of Ward-holding the whole country became under either fee-holding, composed of the original fee-rights, or of those introduced by the act 20 Geo. 2. and which now consist of a return of farm-produce or money; or blanch-holding, which has merely the semblance of a feudal-holding, by the payment of 1*d.* Scots, or some other elusory duty.

By these abolitions the effect of the feudal system was entirely done away in England, while in Scotland, from circumstances peculiar to the practice there, slight traces of it are preserved in their conveyancing; but attended with such inconvenience and evils to the land rights of that country, as now to require a remedy, and peculiarly to call for the attention of those who are desirous of approving and assimilating the jurisprudence of Scotland with that of England. This, according to the writer above quoted, is an object truly important to the landed interest of Scotland, and one which would touch and harmonize many jarring points of the two systems.

The difference produced in Scotland and England is stated to have been in a great measure owing to the different effects produced by a statute common to both countries, the statute Quia Emptores, 18 Edw. 1. introduced into Scotland by stat. 2. c. 24. of Robert I. the purport of which in both countries was to put a stop to subinfeudations, by declaring that a vassal might sell his lands, provided he sold them to be held of his superior lord by the tenure and services therefore due: the English act produced the full effect intended, the purchaser by means of the sale holding immediately of the superior: but in Scotland, a charter of confirmation expressing the consent of the superior is held necessary to complete the conveyance; and though the superior is compellable to give such consent, yet the time requisite for obtaining it has introduced modes and forms dangerous and inconvenient in their effect, and wholly unknown in English conveyancing: the transmission of land by the law of Scotland still continuing to be regulated by feudal principles.

All English fees, or holdings, now fall under the notion of SOCAGE-TENURES; which, though they vary in point of service, succession, &c. as improper feuds, yet retain the nature of feuds, as they are holden of a superior by fealty, and usually by some other certain service or acknowledgment; and as they are subject to relief and escheat. Wright, 144, 5. See further on the subject of socage, 37 Hen. 8. c. 20; Bract. lib. 2. c. 8. 85, 86; 2 Comm. c. 6.

The socage tenures are now divided by English lawyers, according to their duration, into estates in fee, for life, for years, and at will. In the present instance it may be sufficient to class them under estates in fee, and for life only.

Estates in fee are either fees-simple or fees-tail.

5. A FEES-SIMPLE, though it be, according to Littleton (§ 1.) Hereditas pura, is not so called because it imports an estate purely allodial, or free from all tenure; but in opposition to fees-conditional at common law, and fees-tail since the statute de donis. It imports a simple inheritance, clear of any condition, limitation, or restriction, to any particular heirs; and descendible to the heirs general, whether male or female, lineal or collateral. In the express language of our law "Tenant in fee-simple is he who hath lands or tenements to hold to him and his heirs for ever." Litt. § 1; Inst. 1; Fleta. lib. 3. c. 8.

In conveying, or conferring, these fees, or estates in fee, though they are now, contrary to the original purity of proper feuds, become vendible, the ancient form of donation is still preserved; and a feoffment, whether constituting or transferring a fief, or fee, retains even at this day the form of a gift. It is perfected and notified by the same solemnity of livery and seisin on investiture, as a pure feudal donation, and is still directed and governed by the same rules. 1 Inst.

9, c. 42, a; Fleta. lib. 3. c. 15. § 4, 5; Bracton. lib. 2. c. 17. § 1. See Conveyance, Deed, Feoffment, Grant, &c.

Tenures being thus derived from the feudal law, and partaking of their origin, fees, or estates in fee, could not, at common law, be aliened without the licence of the lord: (see ante, I. 4.) This introduced sub-infeudations by the tenant to hold of himself; which were so far restrained by Magna Charta, c. 32. as to compel the tenant of an inferior lord to keep in his own hands so much of the fee as would be sufficient to answer his services to the lord. The first statute that materially varied from this law of feuds, was the statute of Quia Emptores, 18 Edw. 1. c. 1. which enabled such tenants to sell all or part of their lands, to hold of their lords by the same services as the feoffor had held. The king's tenants were, however, under several disabilities of alienation, but which were all finally removed by 34 Edw. 3. c. 15; and fines for alienation were paid to the king by his tenants, till abolished by the 12 Car. 2. c. 24. already so often alluded to: See 1 Comm. c. 5. p. 71; c. 6. p. 89.

As a tenant could not alien, so neither could he subject the tenancy or fee to his debts, until the stat. Westm. 2. (13 Edw. 1. st. 1.) c. 18. subjected a moiety of lands to execution; leaving the other to enable the tenant to do the services of the tenure. But several other statutes, as 13 Edw. 1. st. 3. de Mercatoribus; 27 Edw. 3. c. 9; 23 Hen. 8. c. 8. were afterwards made, by which lands were subjected, in a special manner, to the particular liens created by those statutes. Vide 2 Inst. 394; and tit. Execution.

As tenants could not by the feudal or common law alien their tenancies without the licence or consent of the lord; so neither could the lord himself alien his seigniorship without the consent of his tenant. Hence sprung the doctrine of attornment, abolished by the 4 Ann. c. 16. § 9. See Attornment.

For the feudal restraints on devise, see Wills.

The rules which at present operate on the law of descent to the eldest son, and the general preference of males to females, as well as those which formerly excluded the immediate ascending line of relations, are all deducible from these feudal foundations of the law; and are very ably explained by Sir Martin Wright's treatise, pp. 173—185. See Descent; and further, tit. Fee and Fee-simple.

6. A FEES-TAIL (feudum talliatum), as distinguished from a fee-simple, is a fee limited and restrained to some particular heirs, exclusive of others. It is so denominated from the French, tailleur, to cut, or cut off, on account of the particular restriction by which the heir-general was often, and collateral or remote heirs were always cut off. Fleta. lib. 3. c. 3; Bract. lib. 2. c. 5. § 3; Brit. c. 34; Litt. § 13. 18; 1 Inst. 18, b; Spelm. Gloss. ad v. Feodum; and tit. Tail.

A fee thus limited was at common law known by the name of a fee conditional; so called from the condition expressed or implied in the gift or constitution of the fee, that in case the donee died without such particular heirs, the land or fee should revert to the donor. But our ancestors were after heir or issue had, suffered at common law to alien such fee, and to defeat the donor as well as the heir; on a supposition that the condition was, for this purpose, satisfied or performed by the donee's having issue. See 1 Inst. 19, a; Plowd. Comm. 242, 5, b; 247, a.

This practice being manifestly contrary to the intent of the gift, was restrained by stat. Westm. 2. (13 Edw. 1. st. 1.) c. 1; commonly called the Statute De donis conditionalibus (or, shortly, the Statute De donis), which required that the will and intent of the donor should be observed, and the fee so given should go to the issue, and for want of issue revert to the donor. So that, though Littleton says (§ 13.) that a fee-tail is by force of this statute, yet it is not to be understood as creating any new fee, but only severing and distinguishing the limitation from the condition, and restoring the effect of each; i. e. the limitation to the issue, and the reversion to the donor: yet as by means of this statute the limitation was raised above the condition, the fee might thenceforth be denominated from the limitation, which thus became the substance, as it had before been the immediate end, of the gift. But this was at length eluded by the legal fictions of Fines and Recoveries. See that title, and also Forfeiture; and for further matter on this head of estates-tail, and the policy of making them alienable, see Tail and Fee-tail. Wright, 186, 9.

7. ESTATES FOR LIFE are either conventional or legal; of the former sort are such estates as are, in their creation, expressly given or conferred for life of the tenant only. These are of a feudal nature, held by fealty, and liable to conventional services. Of the other sort are, 1. Tenancies in tail after possibility of issue extinct. 2. Tenancies in dower, and by the curtesy. See the several titles, and also Life-Estates.

The first of these is distinguished by the particular description merely to suggest the legal disadvantages cast on such estate-tail, when turned to a hopeless inheritance. It arises where lands and tenements are given to a man and his wife in special tail, and either of them dies without issue had between them. The survivor is tenant in tail after possibility, &c. See Litt. § 32; 1 Inst. 28; 11 Rep. 80; and ante, Tail after Possibility, &c.

8. DOWER, called by Craig, Triens, and Tertia, and known to the feudists by several other names, was probably brought into England by the Normans, as a branch of their doctrine of fiefs or tenures; for we find no footsteps of dower in lands until the time of the Normans; but, on the contrary, provision is made by one of the laws of the Saxon king, Edmund, for the support of the wife surviving her husband, out of his goods only. Wright, 191, 192. See Dower.

9. TENANCIES BY THE CURTESY, or per legem terræ, though so called as if they were peculiar to England, were known not only in Scotland, but in Ireland, and in Normandy also; and the like custom is to be found amongst the ancient Almain laws; and yet it does not seem to have been feudal, nor does its original any where satisfactorily appear. Some English writers (Mirror, Selden, Comell) ascribe it to Henry I.; but Nat. Bacon calls it a law of counter-tenure to that of dower, and yet supposes it as ancient as from the time of the Saxons; and that it was therefore rather restored than introduced by Henry I. Eng. Gov. 105, 147. But as there are no notices of this curtesy among the laws of the Saxons, or among those we have of Henry I. we may, perhaps, with safety rely on Craig's conjecture, that it is derived from the civil law. Craig de Jure Feud. 312; Wright, 192, 195.

10. FORFEITURES of estates in fee, though they were very many by the feudal and common law, [vide Spelm. in v. Richard, & Lt. H. 1, c. 43; Glanv. l. 9, c. 4; Bract. l. 2, c. 35. § 11, 12.] are reduced, as the law now stands, to forfeitures by attainders of treason and for murder, and by cesser.

Of the former, enough has been said at present. Ante, II. 7; and titles Treason, Forfeiture, Treason.

The latter was introduced on true feudal principles, and introduced many feudal hardships, was at length regulated by the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. 1. c. 4; and stat. Westm. 2, 13 Edw. 1. c. 21. These statutes provided, that in case a tenant should cease to pay his rent for two years, and there should not, during that time, be sufficient distress on the land, the lord might have a cessavit; and by means thereof, if the tenant did not tender his arrears before judgment, the lord should, upon such cesser recover the land, or fee itself, and bar the tenant for ever. See 2 Inst. 295, 400, 460; Booth's Real. 41, 38, 134; F. N. B. 208, 209; Wright, 196—202; and ante, Cessavit, Rent.

Estates for life are also forfeitable by waste, and by all such acts as tend to defeat the reversion. 1 Inst. 251, 252. See Life-Estates.

There are yet two kinds of estates which, though they fall under the head of socage, are denominated and usually treated as particular species of tenure, viz. burgage and gavelkind.

11. BURGAGE-TENURE, so called to denote the particular service or tenure of houses in ancient cities or boroughs, is certainly a species of socage-tenure; the tenements being holden by a certain annual rent in money, or by some service relating to trade; and not by military or other service that had no such relation. The qualities of this tenure vary according to the particular customs of every borough, and that without prejudice to the feudal nature of it. See Wright, 204, 235; Mad. Firma Burgi; Litt. § 162—167; Co. Litt. 109; Somm. on Gav. 142, 148; Taylor on Gav. 171; 1 Inst. 109 a; Spelm.; Craig de Jure Feud. 68; Jenk. Cent. 127; 2 Comm. c. 6, p. 82; and ante, Burgage.

12. The properties of GAVELKIND TENURE are so many, and the qualities of it so different from those of any other tenure, that it seems to have been doubted whether it be a tenure of feudal nature or not. The gavelkind tenant retains strong marks of propriety; as power to alien even at the age of fifteen, Somm. Gav. 8, 9; freedom from forfeiture for felony; and many other privileges unknown to persons holding their lands by any other kind of tenure.

It is however certain that the tenure is strictly feudal, and, like the more usual tenures by knight-service and socage, is denominated from the kind or nature of the prevailing service, which was, as the name imports, tributary or censual; the word gavelkind being (according to Sommer on Gav. 12, 35, 37; and see Blount in v.) a compound of the Saxon words gavel, gafel, or gable, a tribute, tax, or rent; and gelynde, kind, sort, or quality; thus directly importing that such lands are censual or rented; although they are also subject to other kinds of service, this tenure in fact being, like burgage, a kind of socage-tenure, and liable to the same feudal burdens and forfeitures. See Wright, 206—212.

As for the famous partable quality of most of the lands in Kent, [not all, see Hale, Hist. C. L. 225; 31 Hen. 8. c. 5; but see 1 Mod. 98; 2 Sid. 153; Cro. Car. 465; Lutw. 236, 754, by which it appears that all lands in Kent shall be presumed, without pleading, to be gavelkind; unless they can be proved to be disgavelled,] it was not a particular or proper effect of gavelkind tenure. But it was rather the ancient course of descent retained and continued in that county Somm. on Gav. 89, 90. And however particular this course of descent (whereby the lands of the father are equally divided among all the sons; and of a brother dying without issue, among all his brethren, Litt. § 210; Co. Litt. 140.) may now appear to us, yet if we consider gavelkind as a species of socage-tenure, and that all tenures by socage, or of that nature, were anciently in point of succession divisible, and that they might, without prejudice to their feudal nature, descend equally or otherwise, as best suited the genius and usage of every county; it will appear much more extraordinary that all other counties should depart from this, the more ancient and natural course of descent, than that this particular county should retain it. Wright, 213. See further, 2 Comm. c. 6; and ante, Gavelkind.

13. Under this head, tenure, something ought to be said of copyholds; though they are not reducible to any of the preceding divisions of the subject.

COPYHOLDS are the remains of villenage; which, considered as a tenure, was not entirely Saxon, Norman, or feudal, but a tenure of a mixed nature, advanced by the Normans upon the Saxon bondage, and which gradually superseded it. See F. N. B. 12. C.; 1 Inst. 58 a; Bacon's Use of the Law, 42, 43; Litt. tit. Villenage; Old Ten.; Somm. Gav. 65, 66.

The Normans, according to Sir William Temple, "finding among us a sort of people who were in a condition of downright servitude, used and employed in the most servile works, and belonging (they, their children, and effects) to the lord of the soil, like the rest of the stock or cattle upon it;" enfranchised all such as fell to their share; by admitting them to fealty in respect of the little livings they had hitherto been allowed to possess, merely as the scanty supports of their base condition; and which they were still suffered to retain upon the like service as they had in their former servitude been used and employed in. But this possession, as now clothed with fealty, and by that means advanced into a kind of tenure, differed very much from the ancient servile possession, and was from henceforth called villenage. See Temp. Introd. 59; Mirror, b. 2. c. 28; Bract. lib. 2. c. 8. § 1; Litt. § 206, 207; Leg. W. 1. c. 29, 33; in which last the word villain seems first applied to such tenant. See also tit. Villein; and Spelm. Gloss. in v. Servus.

Our Saxon ancestors having submitted to the feudal law, which to them was a law of liberty, perhaps imitated the Normans in this particular; but neither did our Saxon or Norman ancestors mean to increase or strengthen the possession of their villeins; but to leave that altogether as dependent and precarious as before; save only that, as by their admission to fealty, their possession was put, in some measure, upon a feudal footing, the lords could not deal with them so wantonly as before; (vide ante, l. 4;) and at length the uninterrupted benevolence and good nature of the successive lords of many manors having, time out of mind, permitted them, or them and their children, to enjoy their possessions in a course of succession, or for life only, became customary and binding on their successors, and advanced such possession into the legal interest or estate we now call copyhold; which yet remains subject to the same servile conditions and forfeitures as before, they being all of them so many branches of that continuance or custom which made it what it is. Somn. Gav. 58; Spelm. Gloss. v. Feudum; Bro. tit. Villenage.

From this view of the origin and nature of copyholds we may possibly collect the ground of the great variety of customs that influence and govern those estates in different manors; it appearing that they are only customary estates, after the ancient will of the first lords, as preserved and evidenced by the rolls, or kept on foot by the constant and uninterrupted usages of the several manors wherein they lie. Litt. § 73, 75, 77; Wright, 220.

As to copyholds, see further, 2 Comm. c. 6. III; and titles Ancient Demesne, Copyholds, Manors, Villeins, &c.

From the above compendious view of the principal and fundamental points of the doctrine of tenures, both ancient and modern, may be observed the mutual connection and dependence that all of them have upon each other. And upon the whole it appears, that whatever changes and alterations these tenures, in progress of time, underwent, from the Saxon era to 13 Cha. 2. all lay-tenures are now in effect reduced to two species: free tenure in common socage, and base tenure by copy of court roll. There is one other species of tenure reserved by the statute of Charles II. which is of a spiritual nature, and called the tenure in Frankalmoinage. See that title.

TERCE, thirds: the Scotch term for dower.

TERM, terminus.] Signifies commonly the limitation of time or estate; as a lease for term of life, or years, &c. Bract. lib. 2. Term is also a space of time, wherein the superior courts at Westminster sit. See Terms.

TERMOR, tenens ex termino.] He that holds lands or tenements for term of years or life. Litt. § 100. See Lease, l. 1.

TERMS. Those spaces of time, wherein the courts of justice are open, for all that complain of wrongs or injuries, and seek their rights by course of law or action, in order to their redress; and during which the courts in Westminster-hall sit and give judgments, &c. But the High Court of Parliament, the Chancery, and inferior Courts, do not observe the terms; only the Courts of King's Bench, the Common Pleas, and Exchequer, the highest courts at common law.

Of these terms there are four in every year, viz. Hilary Term, which formerly began the 23d of January, and ended the 12th of February, (unless on Sundays and then the day after); Easter Term, that began the Wednesday fortnight after Easter Day, and ended the Monday next after Ascension Day; Trinity Term, which began the Friday after Trinity Sunday, and ended the Wednesday fortnight after; and Michaelmas Term, that began the 6th of November, and ended the 28th of November, (unless on Sundays, and then the day after.) See post.

These terms are supposed by Selden to have been instituted by William the Conqueror: but Spelman hath clearly and learnedly shown, that they were gradually formed from the canonical constitutions of the church; being indeed no other than those leisure seasons of the year, which were not occupied by the great festivals or fasts, or which were not liable to the general avocations of rural business. Throughout all christendom, in very early times, the whole year was one continual term for hearing and deciding causes. For the Christian magistrates, to distinguish themselves from the heathens, who were extremely superstitious in the observation of their dies fasti et nefasti, went into a contrary extreme, and administered justice upon all days alike; till, at length, the church interposed and exempted certain holy seasons from being profaned by the tumult of forensic litigations. As, particularly, the time of Advent and Christmas, which gave rise to the winter vacation; the time of Lent and Easter, which created that in the spring; the time of Pentecost, which produced the third; and the long vacation between Midsummer and Michaelmas, which was allowed for the hay time and harvest. All Sundays also, and some particular festivals, as the days of the Purification, Ascension, and some others, were included in the same prohibition: which was established by a canon of the church, a. d. 517, and was fortified by an imperial constitution of the younger Theodosius, comprised in the Theodosian code. Spelm. of the Terms.

Afterwards, when our own legal constitution came to be settled, the commencement and duration of our law terms were appointed with an eye to those canonical prohibitions; and it was ordered by the laws of King Edward the Confessor, (c. 3. De temporibus et diebus pacis;) that from the Advent to the octave of the Epiphany, from Septuagesima to the octave of Easter, from the Ascension to the octave of Pentecost, and from three in the afternoon of all Saturdays till Monday morning, the peace of God and of Holy Church shall be kept throughout all the kingdom. And so extravagant was afterwards the regard that was paid to these holy times, that though the author of the Mirror mentions only one vacation of any considerable length, containing the months of August and September; yet Britton is express, that in the reign of King Edward I. no secular plea could be held, nor any man sworn on the Evangelists, in the times of Advent, Lent, Pentecost, harvest, and vintage, the days of the great Litanies, and all solemn festivals. But he adds, that the bishops did nevertheless grant dispensations, (of which many are preserved in Rymer's Fœdera;) that assizes and juries might be taken in some of these holy seasons. And soon afterwards a general dispensation was established by stat. Westm. 1. 3 Edw. 1. c. 51. which declares, that, "by the assent of all the prelates, assizes of novi discessus, mort d'ancestor, and darrein presentment, shall be taken in Advent, Septuagesima, and Lent; and that at the special request of the king to the bishops." The portions of time, that were not included within these prohibited seasons, fell naturally into a fourfold division, and, from some festival day that immediately preceded their commencement, were denominated the Terms of St. Hilary, of Easter, of the Holy Trinity, and of St. Michael; which terms were subsequently regulated and abbreviated by several acts of parliament: particularly Trinity Term by 32 Hen. 6. c. 21. and Michaelmas Term by 16 Car. 1. c. 6. and again by 24 Geo. 2. c. 48.

There were until recently in each of these terms stated days called days in banc (dies in banco), that is, days of appearance in the Court of Common Bench. They were generally at the distance of about a week from each other, and had reference to some festival of the church. On some one of these days in banc, all original writs must have been made returnable; and therefore they were generally called the returns of that term: whereof every term had more or less, said by the Mirror to have been originally fixed by King Alfred, but certainly settled as early as the statute of 51 Hen. 3, st. 2. Easter Term had five returns; and all the other terms four. But though many of the return days were fixed upon Sundays, yet the court never sat to receive these returns till the Monday after; and therefore no proceedings could be held, or judgment could be given, or supposed to be given, on the Sunday. See Salk. 627; 6 Mod. 250; 1 Jen. 156, Swan v. Broome; Bro. P. C.

The first return in every term was, properly speaking, the first day in that term; as for instance the octave of St. Hilary, or the eighth day inclusive after the feast of that saint, which falling on the 13th of January, the octave therefore, or first day of Hilary Term, was the 20th of January; and thereon (one judge of) the court sat to take essoigns or excuses for such as did not appear according to the summons of the writ; wherefore this was usually called the Essoign Day of the Term. But on every return day in the term, the person summoned had three days of grace beyond the day named in the writ, in which to make his appearance; and if he appeared on the fourth day inclusive (quarto die post), it was sufficient.

The commencement and duration of these terms are now regulated by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 70, which by § 10, enacts that in 1831 and afterwards, Hilary Term shall begin on the 11th and end on the 31st January; Easter Term begin on the 15th April and end 8th May; Trinity Term begin on the 22d May and end 12th June; and Michaelmas Term begin on the 2d and end on the 25th November: provided if the whole or any number of the days intervening between the Thursday before and the Wednesday next after Easter Day shall fall within Easter Term, there shall be no sittings in Banc on any of such intervening days, but the term shall be prolonged for such number of days of business as shall be equal to the intervening days exclusive of Easter Day, and the commencement of the ensuing Trinity Term shall in such case be postponed, and its continuance prolonged for an equal number of days of business.

By the 1 Wm. 4. st. 2, c. 3, § 3, if any of the days above named for ending the terms fall on a Sunday, the succeeding Monday shall be the last day of the term.

Where, however, the fixed day of commencement is a Sunday, it must be considered the first day of term. 1 D. P. C. 63.

By § 7 of the same act it is enacted, that not more than twenty-four days, exclusive of Sundays, after Hilary Term and Michaelmas Terms (nor more than six days exclusive of Sunday, after Easter Term), to be reckoned consecutively or immediately after such terms, shall be appropriated to sittings at Nisi Prius in London and Middlesex: provided that in any trial at bar it shall be competent for the judges to appoint such day or days as they shall think fit; and such days, if in vacation, shall for the purpose of such trials, be taken to be a part of the preceding term; and any day not within the twenty-four days may be appointed for trials at Nisi Prius, with the consent of the parties.

The essoign or general return days were also provisionally altered by the above act, but are now fixed by the 1 Wm. 4. c. 3, § 2. See Essoign Day of the Term.

Formerly all process, whether mesne or final, and whether in real, mixed, or personal actions, must have been tested and made returnable, and many other proceedings in a cause could only be transacted, in term time; but by several recent statutes and rules of court (particularly by the 1 Wm. 4. c. 7; 2 Wm. 4. c. 39,) the distinction between term and vacation, with respect to the bringing and prosecution of personal actions, has been abolished. See the various alterations enumerated in 3 Chitty's General Practice, c. 3.

But although all or the greatest part of the technical distinctions between term and vacation, essoign days, and general return days, or return days certain, are removed as they affected most personal actions, yet, with respect to such actions as are not within the Uniformity of Process Act, and as regards all matters that must be transacted in Banc, the distinction between term and vacation still exists. See 3 Dowl. P. C. 100.

Terms have been adjourned, and returns of writs and processes confirmed. 1 W. & M. sess. 1. c. 4.

The issuable terms are Hilary and Trinity Terms only; they are so called because in them the issues are joined and records made up of causes to be tried at the Lent and Summer Assizes, which immediately follow. 2 Lil. Abr. 568. See Assizes, &c.

The day for swearing the lord mayor of London is appointed for November 9th, unless it be Sunday, and then the next day. The Morrow of St. Martin yearly appointed for nominating sheriffs in the Exchequer.

The terms in Scotland are Martinmas, Candlemas, Whitsuntide, and Lammas, at which times the Court of Exchequer, &c. there is to be kept. 6 Ann. c. 6.

The terms of our universities for students are different in time from the terms of the courts of law.

TERMS OF THE LAW. Artificial or technical words and turns of art, particularly used in and adapted to the profession of the law. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, § 87.

TERMS FOR PAYMENT OF RENT, OR RENT TERMS. The four quarterly feasts upon which rent is usually paid. Cartular. Sti. Edmund. 238. See Lease, Rent.

TERMS LEGAL AND CONVENTIONAL for payment of rents in Scotland. The legal terms are Whitsunday and Martinmas, at the former of which it is presumed that the crop has been fully sown, and therefore where the proprietor survives that term, one-half of the year's rent is supposed to be due; at the latter the whole crop is presumed to be reaped, and therefore the whole year's rent is taken as due; and these, for the purpose of settling the interest of heirs and executors, &c. are held to be the terms of payment, whatever may be the conventional terms for payment of the rent de facto. See as to the English law, Apportionment, Rent, &c.

TERMS FOR YEARS, to secure payment of mortgages and terms to attend the inheritance. See Mortgage, Trust, Use.

TERRA, In all the surveys in Domesday Register, is taken for arable land, and always so distinguished from pratum, &c. Kennet's Gloss.

TERRA VESTITA. Is used in old charters for land sown with corn. Cowell.

TERRA WAINABILIS. Tillable land. Cowell.

TERRA WARENNATA. Land that has the liberty of free warren. Rot. Parl. 21 Edw. 1.

TERRARIUS. A land-holder, or one who possesses many farms of land. Leg. W. 1.

TERRARIUS CŒNOBIALIS. An officer in religious houses, whose office was to keep a terrier of all their estates, and to have the lands belonging to the houses exactly surveyed and registered; and one part of his office was to entertain the better sort of convent-tenants when they came to pay their rents, &c. Hist. Dunelm.

TERRE-TENANT, TERTENANT, terræ tenens. He who hath the actual possession of the land: for example, a lord of a manor has a freeholder, who letteth out his freehold to another, to be possessed and occupied by him, such other is called the tertenant. West. Symb. par. 2; Britton, c. 29. In the case of a recognizance, statute, or judgment, the heir is chargeable as tertenant, and not as heir; because, by the recognizance or judgment, the heir is not bound, but the ancestor concedit that the money de terris, &c. levetur. 3 Rep. 12. Vide Cro. Eliz. 312; Cro. Jac. 506; and titles Elegit, Excecion, Scire Facias.

TERRIER, anciently called terrar; terrarium, catalogus terrarum. A land roll or survey of lands, either of a single person or of a town, containing the quantity of acres, tenants' names, and such like; and in the Exchequer there is a terrier of all the glebe lands in England, made about 11 E. 3. See 18 Eliz. c. 17.

Ecclesiastical terriers, which contain a detail of the temporal possessions of the church in every parish, are made by virtue of an Ecclesiastical Canon (87), which directs them to be kept in the bishop's registry; and it is not unusual to deposit a copy in the chest of the parish church. These being made under authority, are admissible evidence as a species of ecclesiastical memorials or records of the possessions of the church, and are as strong in their nature as any that can be adduced for such purposes. 3 Price, 380.

TERRIS, bonis et catallis rehabendis post purgationem. A writ for a clerk to recover his lands, goods, and chattels formerly seized, after he had cleared himself of the felony of which he was accused, and delivered to his ordinary to be purged. Reg. Orig. 68.

TESTA DE NEVIL. An ancient document, in two volumes, in the custody of the king's remembrancer in the Exchequer of England, more properly called Liber Feodorum, supposed to have been compiled by John de Nevil, a justice itinerant in the 18th and 24th of King Henry III., or as others imagine by Ralph de Nevil, an accountant in the Exchequer. But it appears that the volumes were not compiled till near the close of the reign of Edward II. or the beginning of Edward III., and then partly from the inquests taken on the presentments of jurors of hundreds before the justices itinerant, and partly from inquisitions upon writs awarded to the sheriffs for collecting of scutages, aids, &c. The entries which are specifically entitled Testa de Nevil are evidently quotations, and form comparatively a small part of the whole; they were probably copied from a roll bearing that name, a part of which it still extant in the Chapter-house at Westminster, containing ten counties; this roll appears to be of the time of Edward I. and agrees verbatim with the entries in the books at the Exchequer.

These books contain principally accounts, 1, of fees holden either immediately of the king, or of others who held of the king in capite, and if alienated whether the owners were enfeoffed ab antiquo or de novo, as also fees holden in frank-almoigne, with the values thereof respectively: 2, of serjeanties holden of the king, distinguishing such as were rented or alienated, with the values of the same: 3, of widows and heiresses of tenants in capite whose marriages were in the gift of the king, with the values of their lands: 4, of churches in the gift of the king, and in whose hands they were: 5, of escheats, as well of the lands of Normans as others, in whose hands the same were, and by what services holden: 6, of the amount of the sums paid for scutage and aid, &c. by each tenant.

In the cover of each book is the following memorandum in an ancient hand "Contenta pro evidentiis habeantur hic in Scacc'io et non pro recordo."

These volumes were printed under the authority of the Commissioners on the Records of the realm in the year 1807.

TESTAMENT, testamentum. Is defined by Plowden to be testatio mentis, a witness of the mind: but Aulus Gellius lib. 6. c. 12. denies it to be a compound word, and saith, it is verbum simplex, as calceamentum, pluvium, &c. And therefore it may be thus better defined: Testamentum est ultimum voluntatis justa sententia, de eo quod quis post mortem suam fieri vult, &c. See Wills.

Testament was anciently used (according to Spelman) pro scripto charta vel instrumento, quo prædictum rerumque aliarum transactiones perficiuntur, seu dictum quod de re vel testimonium ferret vel testium nomina contineret.—Si quis contra hoc meæ autoritatis testamentum aliquid machinari impedimentum præsumpsit.—Charta Croylandiæ ab Æthelbaldo Rege, Anno Domini 716. Cowell.

TESTAMENTARY CAUSES. A species of causes belonging to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. They were originally cognizable in the king's courts of common law, viz. the county courts; and afterwards transferred to the jurisdiction of the church by the favour of the crown, as a natural consequence of granting to the bishops the administration of intestates' effects. 3 Comm. c. 7. See Courts Ecclesiastical.

As observed by Lindewode, the ablest canonist of the fifteenth century, testamentary causes belong to the ecclesiastical courts, "de consuetudine Angliæ, et super consensu regio et suorum procerum in talibus ab antiquo concessa." Provincial. l. 3. t. 18. fo. 176.

TESTAMENTARY GUARDIAN. See Guardian, I. 4.

TESTAMENTARY JURISDICTION IN EQUITY. See Chancery.

TESTATOR, [Lat.] He who makes a will or testament. See Wills.

TESTATUM-CAPIAS. See Capias.

TESTE. Witness. That part of a writ wherein the date is contained, which begins with these words, Teste meipso, &c. if it be an original writ; or, Teste the Lord Chief Justice, if judicial. See Co. Litt. 134; and tit. Original Writs.

TESTIMONIAL. A certificate formerly given under the hand of a justice of the peace, testifying the place and time when and where a soldier or mariner landed, and the place of his dwelling and birth unto which he was to pass. 39 Eliz. c. 17. (repealed.) Formerly testimonials were also to be given by mayors and constables to servants quitting their services, &c. 5 Eliz. c. 4. See Servants.

TESTIMONIALS OF CLERGY, are necessary to be made by persons present, that a clergyman inducted to a benefice has performed all things according to the Act of Uniformity; to evidence that the clerk hath complied with what the law requires on his institution and induction, which in some cases he shall be put to do. Count. Pars. Comp. 24, 26. See Person, Ordination.

TESTIMOIGNES, [Fr.] Witnesses. So testimoignage, testimony. Law Fr. Dict.

TESTON, or TESTOON, commonly called tester. A sort of money which among the French did bear the value of 18d.; but being made of brass lightly gilt with silver, in the reign of King Henry VIII. it was reduced to 12d. and afterwards to 6d. Lownd's Ess. on Coins, p. 22.

TEXTUS. A text or subject of a discourse. It is mentioned by several ancient authors to signify the New Testament, which was written in golden letters, and carefully preserved in the churches.

TEXTUS MAGNI ALTARIS, we read of in Domesday and Cartular. S. Edmund.

TEXTUS ROFFENSIS. An ancient manuscript containing the rites, customs, and tenures, &c. of the church of Rochester, compiled by Ernulphus, who became bishop of that see, anno 1115. It also contains some very ancient public instruments, among which is the charter of liberties granted by Henry I. A. D. 1101. See the charters prefixed to the Statutes of the Realm, published by the Commissioners of the Public Records.

THAMES. See London, Police, Rivers, Watermen.

THANAGE OF THE KING, thanagium regia.] Signified a certain part of the king's land or property, whereof the ruler or governor thereof was called thane. Cowell.

THANES, from Sax. thenan, ministrare, a word which sometimes implies a nobleman, sometimes a freeman a magistrate, an officer, a minister. Lambard in verbo THANES. Were those who attended the English-Saxon kings in their courts, and who held their lands immediately of those kings; and therefore in Domesday they were promiscuously called thani et servientes regis, though not long after the Conquest the word was disused; and instead thereof those men were called barones regis, who, as to their dignity, were inferior to earls, and took place next after bishops, abbots, barons, and knights. There were also thani minores, and those were likewise called barons; these were lords of manors, who had a particular jurisdiction within their limits, and over their own tenants in their courts, which to this day are called courts-baron; but the word signifies sometimes a nobleman, sometimes a freeman, sometimes a magistrate, but more properly an officer or minister of the king.—Edward King grete mine bisceops, and mine eorles, and all mine thegnes, on that shiren eður mine prestes in Paulus minister habband land. Charta Edw. Conf. Pat. 18 Hen. 6. m. 9. per Inspect. Lambard, in his Exposition of Saxon Words, verb. Thanus, and Skene, De Verbor. Signif. say, that it is a name of dignity, equal with the son of an earl.

This appellation was in use among us after the Norman Conquest, as appears by Domesday, and by a certain writ of Willm the First WILLIEMUS REX salutem Hermannum episcopum, et Stevenum, et Bridwi, et omnes Thanos meos in Dorcestrensi pago amicitabiliter. MSS. de Abbatsbury. Camden says, they were ennobled only by the office which they administered. Thannus Regis is taken for a baron in 1 Inst. fol. 5. l. 1. And in Domesday, tenens, qui est caput nuncii. See Mills de Nobilitate, fol. 132.

A thane, at first, (in like manner as an earl,) was not properly a title of dignity, but of service; but, according to the degrees of service, some of greater estimation, some of less. So those that served the king in places of eminence, either in court or commonwealth, were called thani majores and thani regis; those that served under them, as they did under the king, were called thani minores, or the lesser thanes. Cowell. See Speelman of Feuds, cap. 7; also 1 Ellis's Domesday, 45.

THANE-LANDS. Such lands as were granted by charter of the Saxon kings to their thanes; which were held with all immunities, except the threefold necessity of expeditions, repairs of castles, and mending of bridges. Thance signified also land under the government of a thane. Skene. See Bockland, Reveland, Tenures.

THASCIA. A certain some of money or tribute imposed by the Romans on the Britons and their lands. Jug. Hen. l. c. 78.

THEATRES. See Play-houses.

THEFT, furtum.] An unlawful felonious taking away of another man's moveable and personal goods, against the will of the owner. See Larceny, Robbery.

THEFT-BOTE, from the Sax. theof, i. e. fur, and bote, compensatio.] The receiving a man's goods again from a thief, after stolen, or other amends not to prosecute the felon, and to the intent the thief may escape; which is an offence punishable with fine and imprisonment, &c. H. P. C. 130.

In Scotland, by the act 1436, c. 137, sheriffs, justices, and barons, guilty of this crime, were to lose life and goods; and by the act 1515, c. 2, private persons found guilty were to be punished in the same manner as the thief.

THELONIU, or BELVE ESSENDI QUIETI DE THELONIO. A writ that formerly lay for the citizens of any city, or burghesses of any town, that had a charter or prescription to free them from toll, against the officers of any town or market who would constrain them to pay toll of their merchandize, contrary to their said grant or prescription. F. N. B. fol. 226.

Abolished by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27. § 36. See further, Toll.

THELONMANNUS. The toll-man or officer who receives toll. Cartular. Abbat. Gluston. MS. 446.

THELONIO RATIONABILI HABENDO; PRO DOMINIS HABENTIBUS DOMINICA REGIS AD FIRMAM. A writ that formerly lay for him that had any part of the king's demesne in fee firm, to recover reasonable toll of the king's tenants there, if his demesne had been accustomed to be tolled. Reg. Orig. 87.

THEM, or THEME. The right of having all the generation of villains, with their suits and cattle. Termes de la Ley See Team.

THEMMAGIUM. A duty or acknowledgment paid by inferior tenants in respect of theme or team. Cowell.

THEODEN. In the degrees or distinctions of persons among the Saxons the earl or prime lord was called thane, and the king's thane; and the husbandman or inferior tenant was called theodan or under thane. See Spelm.; and ante, tit. Thane.

THEOWES. The slaves, captives, or bondmen, among our Saxons were called theowes and esnes, who were not counted members of the commonwealth, but parcels of their master's goods and substance. Spelman of Feuds, cap. 5.

THESAURUS. Was sometimes taken in old charters for thesaurarium, the treasury; and hence the Domesday register, preserved in the treasury or exchequer, when kept at Winchester, hath been often called Liber Thesauri Chart. Queen Maud, wife of King Henry I.

THETHINGA. A word signifying a tithing. Tithingmannus, a tithingman. Sax.

THEW, or THEOWE. See Theowes.

THIEF-TAKER. See Felony, Rewards.

THIGSTERS. A sort of gentle beggars. Old Scotch Dict.

THINGUS. The same with thanus, a nobleman, knight, or freeman. Crompt. Jurisd. 197.

THIRDBOROW. Is used for a constable by Lambard in his Duty of Constables, p. 6; and in the 28 Hen. 8. c. 10. See Constable.

THIRDINGS, i. e. the third part of the corn growing on the ground, due to the lord for a heriot on the death of his tenant, within the manor of Turfat in Com. Hereford. Blount, Ten.

THIRD-NIGHT-AWN-HINDE, trium noctuum hospes. By the laws of St. Edward the Confessor, if any man lay a third night in an inn, he was called a third-night-awn-hinde, for whom his host was answerable if he committed an offence. The first night, forman-night, or uncuth (Sax. unknown), he was reckoned a stranger; the second night, two-night, a guest; and the third night, an agen-hinde, or awn-hinde, a domestic. Bract. lib. 3.

THIRD-PENNY. See Denarius Tertius Comitatus.

THIRLAGE. A servitude or tenure in Scotland by which the possessor of certain lands is bound to carry all his grain growing on certain lands to a certain mill to be ground, for which he is bound to pay a proportion of the flour or meal, varying in different places from a 30th part to a 12th part, which is termed multure. Besides this, which is due to the miller or proprietor of the mill, there are smaller perquisites due to the servants termed sequels, called knave'ship, bannock, lock, or gowpen, uncertain in their amount, and ascertained only by the practice of the mill. Besides these there are services due to the mill, such as carrying home mill-stones, and repairing the mill-house, mill-dam, &c. This service was found to be hurtful to agriculture, not only by its weight, but by the circumstance of its continuing to increase with the additional produce of the farm. By the 39 Geo. 3. c. 55, therefore, provisions were enacted for commuting this servitude for an annual payment in grain, to be ascertained by the verdict of a jury after proof before the court of session of the nature and extent of the servitude in each particular instance. This act has been found advantageous, not only by ascertaining and commuting the amount of thirlage in cases where it heretofore existed, but also in preventing the institution of such a tenure or service in future cases.

THISTLE-TAKE. It was a custom within the manor of Halton, in the county palatine of Chester, that if, in driving beasts over the common, the driver permits them to graze or take but a thistle, he shall pay a halfpenny a beast to the lord of the fee. And at Fiskerton, in Nottinghamshire, by ancient custom, if a native or a cottager killed a swine above a year old, he paid to the lord a penny, which purchase of leave to kill a hog was also called thistle-take. Reg. Priorat. de Thurgarton. Cowell.

THOKES. Fish with broken bellies, which by the (repealed) statute 22 Edw. 4. c. 2. were not to be mixed or packed with tale-fish.

THORP, THREP, TROP. Either in the beginning or end of names of places, signifies a street or village, as Aldestrope; from the Sax. thorp, villa, vicus.

THRAVE OF CORN, trava bladi, from the Sax. thraev, a bundle, or the British drefa, twenty-four. In most parts of England consists of twenty-four sheaves, or four shocks, six sheaves to every shock; 2 Hen. 6. c. 2; yet in some counties they reckon but twelve sheaves to the thrave. King Athelstan, anno 923, gave by his charter to St. John of Beverley's Church four thraves of corn from every ploughland in the East Riding of Yorkshire. Cowell.

THREATS AND THREATENING LETTERS.

Threats and menaces of bodily hurt, through fear of which man's business is interrupted, are a species of injury to individuals. A menace alone, without a consequent inconvenience, makes not the injury; but, to complete the wrong, there must be both of them together. The remedy for this is in pecuniary damages, to be recovered by action of trespass vi et armis, this being an inchoate though not an absolute violence. 3 Comm. c. 8. p. 120. And in certain cases by indictment; see 4 Comm. 126, and 6 East, 126, 140, Rea v. Southerton, from which it may be inferred that an indictment will lie at common law for extorting money by actual duress, or by such threats as common firmness is not capable of resisting. The threats must in every case be specified in the indictment.

A request intimating a threat to publish a libel, charging a party with murder if the request was not complied with, ruled to be a threat. Robinson's case, East, P. C. c. 23. § 2.

The sending of letters threatening death or the burning of the party's house, &c. was formerly high treason by the 8 Hen. 5. c. 6; 4 Comm. 144. And under the 9 Geo. 1. c. 2, and 27 Geo. 2. c. 15, the offence was for a long period made punishable as a capital felony. But by the 4 Geo. 4. c. 54. § 3. so much of the above acts as related to this offence was repealed, and it was enacted, that if any person shall knowingly and wilfully send or deliver any letter or writing with or without any name or signature subscribed, or with a fictitious name, &c. threatening to kill or murder any of his majesty's subjects, or to burn or destroy his or their houses, outhouses, barns, stacks of corn or grain, hay or straw, or shall procure or abet the commission of the said offence, or shall forcibly rescue any person being in lawful custody for such offence, he is guilty of felony, punishable with transportation for life or years, or with imprisonment, with or without hard labour, not exceeding seven years.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 8. if any person shall knowingly send or deliver any letter or writing, demanding of any person, with menaces, and without any reasonable or probable cause, any money, chattel, or valuable security; or if any person shall accuse, or threaten to accuse, or shall knowingly send or deliver any letter or writing accusing or threatening to accuse any person of any crime punishable by law with death, transportation, or pillory, or of any assault with intent to commit a rape, or of any attempt or endeavour to commit any rape, or of any infamous crime as thereafter defined, with a view or intent to extort or gain from such person any chattel, money, or valuable security, the offender is declared guilty of felony punishable with transportation for life, or not less than seven years, or with imprisonment not exceeding four years, with or without whipping, in addition to the imprisonment.

For the two other clauses of the above act, see Infamous Crime.

The contents of the letter must be set out in the indictment. Lloyd's case, East, P. C. c. 23. § 5.

A letter charging one with taking away the life of the friend of the writer, who was come to revenge him, held evidence of a threat to murder. Gridwood's case, East, P. C. c. 23. § 2, 4.

THRENGES. Quia vero non erant adhuc tempore Regis Willielmi milites in Angliâ, sed Threnges, præcipit res ut de et milites fierunt ad defendendum terram, fecit autem Lanfrancus Thengos suos milites, &c. Somner's Gavelk. 123, 210. They were vassals, but not of the lowest degree, of those who held lands of the chief lord. The name was imposed by the Conqueror; for when one Edward Svarnbourn of Norfolk, and others, were ejected out of their lands, they complained to the Conqueror, insisting that they were always on his side, and never opposed him, which upon inquiry he found to be true, and therefore he commanded that they should be restored to their lands, and for ever after be called Drenches. Spelm. See Drenches, Sharnburn.

THRISHING MACHINES. By the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 72. the provisions of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 31. giving damages against the hundred in case of the destruction of the property therein mentioned by rioters, was extended to threshing machines. See Hundred.

THRIMSA, Sax. thrim, three.] An old piece of money of three shillings, according to Lambard, or the third part of a shilling, being a German coin passing for 4d. Seld. Tit. Hon. 601.

THRUTHING, thruthingane.] A division, consisting of three or four hundreds. Stat. Merton, 2 Inst. 99. See Trithing.

THUDE WEALD, Sax.] A woodward, or person that looks after the woods.

THWERTNICK. A Saxon word, which in some old writers is taken for the custom of giving entertainments to the sheriff, &c. for three nights. Rot. 11 & 12 Ric. 2.

TIDESMEN. Are certain officers of the custom-house, appointed to watch or attend upon ships till the customs are paid; and they are so called because they go aboard the ships at their arrival in the mouth of the Thames, and come up with the tide. See further, Customs.

TIERCE, Fr. tierce, a third.] A measure of wine, oil, &c. containing the third part of a pipe, or forty-two gallons. 2 Inst. 8. c. 14. repeated.

TIGH, Sax. teag.] A close or inclosure, mentioned in ancient charters; which word is still used in Kent in the same sense. Chart. Eccl. Cant.

TILLA, Sax.] An accusation. Il. Camuti.

TILLAGE, agricultura.] Is of great account in law, as being very profitable to the commonwealth; and therefore arable land hath the preference before meadows, pastures, and all other ground whatsoever. And so carefully our law to preserve it, that a bond or condition to restrain tillage, or sowing of lands, &c. is void. 11 Rep. 53. There are divers ancient statutes for encouragement of tillage and husbandry now become in a great measure, if not altogether, obsolete.

TIMBER. Wood fitted for building, or other such like use; in a legal sense it extends to oak, ash, and elm, &c. 1 Roll. Abr. 649.

Lessees of land may not take timber-trees felled by the wind; for thereby their special property ceases. 1 Keb. 691.

A variety of statutes relative to the wilful destruction of trees and woods were repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27. and other acts. See Malicious Injuries, 7.

By Scotch act, 1798, c. 15 all tenants and cottagers are required to preserve and secure all growing wood on the ground they possess, so that none shall be cut, broke, pulled up by the roots, or barked, on penalties of 10*l.* and 20*l.* (Scots.) which may be inflicted by the landlord.

In Ireland, tenants for life or in tail are entitled to the moiety of the value of such timber trees as they plant; leasees for life renewable for ever are entitled to trees planted by them; and tenants for life under settlement, &c. or for years, are entitled to others planted by them, and to hots out of timber trees, and to the trees planted, if duly registered, &c. See Irish acts, 9 Geo. 2. c. 7; 5 Geo. 3. c. 17; 17, 18 Geo. 3. c. 35; 23, 24 Geo. 3. c. 39. See Tithes, Waste.

TIMBER FOR THE NAVY. See act for the increase and preservation of timber within the forest of Dean, 20 Car. 2.

c. 8. And see 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 12. Two thousand acres of land in the New Forest to be inclosed for preserving timber for the navy royal, 9 & 10 Wm. 3. c. 36. See Forests.

TIMBERLODE. A service by which tenants were to carry timber felled from the woods to the lord's house. Thorn's Chron.

TIME and Place, are to be set forth with certainty in a declaration; but time may be only a circumstance when a thing was done, and not to be made part of the issue, &c. 5 Mod. 286. See Pleading.

It has been held that an impossible time is no time; and where a day or time is appointed for the payment of money, and there is no such, the money may be due presently. Hob. 189; 5 Rep. 22.

If no certain time is implied by law for the doing of any thing, and there is no time agreed upon by the parties, then the law doth allow a convenient time to the party for the doing thereof, i. e. as much as shall be adjudged reasonable, without prejudice to the doer of it. 2 Lil. Abr. 572. In some cases one hath time during his life for the performance of a thing agreed, if he be not hastened to do it by request of the party for whom it is to be done; but if in such case he be hastened by request, he is obliged to do it in convenient time, after such request made. Hil. 22 Car. 1. B. R.

Although it is an ancient maxim of the law, that there is no fraction of a day; Co. Litt. 135; 4 T. R. 660; 11 East, 496; yet that doctrine is not allowed to prevail when, by so doing, justice would be defeated. Thus if a tender be made at any time before a writ issues, although on the same day, it may be pleaded, Chitty on Pl. 5th ed. 1222; and if a sheriff actually seize the goods of a trader under a feri facias, at any period of the same day, but before an act of bankruptcy has been committed, the levy will be deemed complete and valid. 8 Ves. 80; 4 Camp. 197; 2 B. & A. 586.

See 20 Vin. Abr.; and title Year, and other apposite titles.

TIME, COMPUTATION OF. In the computation of any given period of time in legal proceedings, the general rule is, that one day is to be reckoned inclusive and the other exclusive. Thus in cases of murder, where the law says, that no man shall be adjudged to kill another unless the death happens within a year and a day after the mortal stroke or wound is given, the day on which the hurt was done is to be reckoned the first. 1 Hawk. c. 31. § 9. So, where any stated time is limited in a penal statute for the prosecution of an offender, the day on which the act is done is to be included in the reckoning. As where a statute provides, that all prosecutions for offences "shall be commenced within one month after the offence committed," the month begins with the day on which the offence was committed. Doug. 461; 3 T. R. 623; 3 East, 407; 2 Camp. 296.

Formerly, where the time was limited from the day of doing the act in question that day used to be excluded from the reckoning. But since the case of Pugh v. Duke of Leeds, Comp. 714. in which all the previous authorities were discussed by Lord Mansfield in a most luminous and elaborate judgment, these formal distinctions have been done away; which his lordship justly observes, were not much to the honour of the learned in Westminster Hall, thus to embarrass a point which a plain man of common understanding would have no difficulty in construing. The rule of good sense therefore is now established, that the word "from" may, in its vulgar use, and even in strict propriety of language, mean either inclusive or exclusive, according to the construction of a statute or the true intent and meaning of parties, in which ever case that term is used.

If the time be expressed in a statute by the year, or any aliquot part of one, as a half or a quarter of a year; the computation is by calendar months, of twelve to the year. See further Month.

The natural day, says Lord Coke, is divided in luxem light, which is dies solaris, and in tenebras, which is night; 3 Inst.

63.; therefore the day is commonly accounted to begin at sunrise, and to end at sunset. But in cases of burglary, in mercy to the offender, it is not considered to be night, if there be daylight or crepusculum enough begun or left to discern a man's face withal. See Burglary.

By a rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4, "in all cases in which any particular number of days, not expressed to be clear days, is prescribed by the rules or practice of the courts, the same shall be reckoned, exclusively of the first day and inclusively of the last day, unless the last day shall happen to fall on a Sunday, Christmas-day, Good-Friday, or a day appointed for a public fast or thanksgiving, in which case the time shall be reckoned exclusively of that day also."

TIN. See Stannaries, Staple.

TINCKINGS, are signals given to forewarn people of the approach of the enemy. Scotch Dict.

TINEMAN, or TIENMAN. A petty officer in the forest, who had the nocturnal care of vert and venison, and other servile employments. Constitut. Forestæ Canuti Regis, cap. 4.

TINET, tinellum.] Brushwood and thorns, to make and repair hedges. In Herefordshire to tine a gap in a hedge, is to fill it up with thorns, that cattle may not pass through it. Chart. 21 Hen. 6.

TINEWALD. The ancient parliament or annual convention of the people of the Isle of Man, of which this account is given: The governor and officers of that island do usually call the twenty-four Keys, being the chief commons thereof, especially once every year, viz. upon Midsummer-day at St. John's Chapel, to the court kept there, called the Tinewald Court; where, upon a hill near the said chapel, all the inhabitants of the island stand round about, and in the plain adjoining, and hear the laws and ordinances agreed upon in the chapel of St. John, which are published and declared unto them; and at this solemnity the lord of the island sits in a chair of state with a royal canopy over his head, and a sword held before him, attended by the several degrees of the people, who sit on each side of him, &c. King's Descript. Isle of Man. See MAN, Isle of.

TINKERMEN. Those fishermen who destroyed the young fry on the river Thames, by nets and unlawful engines, till suppressed by the mayor and citizens of London. Of which see Stow's Survey of London, p. 18.

TIN-MINES. See Stannaries.

TINPENNY. A tribute so called, usually paid for the liberty of digging in tin-mines. But some writers say it is a customary payment to the tithingman from the several friburgs, contracted from Teding-penny, which see.

TINSEL of the Feu. The loss of the estate held by feu duty in Scotland from allowing two years feu duty to remain unpaid. Scotch Law Dict. To tyne in Scotch is to lose.

TIPSTAFFS. Officers appointed by the marshal of the King's Bench, to attend upon the judges with a kind of rod or staff tipped with silver, who take into their custody all prisoners, either committed, or turned over by the judges at their chambers, &c. See Baston; and stat. 1 Rich. 2.

TITHES,

DECIMÆ, from the Sax. Teotha, i. e. tenth.] In some of our law-books are briefly defined to be an ecclesiastical inheritance, or property in the church, collateral to the estate of the lands thereof: but in others they are more fully defined to be a certain part of the fruit, or lawful increase of the earth, beasts and men's labour, which in most places, and of most things, is the tenth part, which by the law hath been given to the ministers of the Gospel, in recompense of their attending their office. 11 Rep. 13; Dyer, 84.

Tithes are classed by Blackstone, as a species of incorporeal hereditaments; and defined to be a tenth part of the increase, yearly arising and renewing from the profits of lands, the stock upon lands, and the personal industry of the inhabitants: the first species being usually called predial; as of corn, grass, hops, and wood: the second mixed; as of wool, milk, pigs, &c. consisting of natural products, but nurtured and preserved in part by the care of man; and of these two sorts the tenth must be paid in gross: the third, personal; as of manual occupations, trades, fisheries, and the like, and of these only the tenth part of the clear gains and profits is due. 2 Comm. c. 3.

Tithes, with regard to value, are divided into great and small. Great tithes are chiefly corn, hay, and wood: small tithes are the predial tithes of other kinds, together with mixed and personal tithes. Burn's Justice, tit. Tithes.

The general rule of the common law merely declares that corn, grain, hay, and wood are great tithes, and that all other predial tithes, together with all mixed and personal tithes whatsoever, are to be accounted small tithes. 2 Inst. 649; Degge, part. 2. ch. 1; Godolph. ch. 32. § 32; 2 E. & Y. 67, 172. The books, it is true, furnish a great number of judicial decisions upon this head, and these have rendered it easy in almost every case to ascertain whether a particular thing is a great or a small tithe; but it does not appear that the line of distinction has ever been settled upon any clear and intelligible principles. 1 Eagle on Tithes, 42.

Great tithes generally belong to the rector; and small tithes to the vicar. Cro. Car. 20.

And for that reason great tithes are sometimes called parsonage tithes; small tithes, vicarage tithes; as being in general, payable the one to the parson, the other to the vicar.

Some things may be great or small tithes, in regard of the place; as hops in gardens are small tithes, and in fields may be great tithes; and it is said the quantity will turn a small tithe into a great one, if the parish is generally sown with it. 1 Roll. Abr. 643; 1 Cro. 578; Wood's Inst. 162.

In Scotland personal tithes have never been acknowledged; and the system of predial tithes is so regulated, that the proprietor of land, the heritor, can purchase his tithes in some cases at nine, and in others at six years' purchase, except such tithes as belong to the crown or to colleges or schools. Where the tithes exist, they are not in the hands of the clergy, who are all stipendiaries, and paid according to a stipend modified or regulated by the commission of tithes, whose powers in this respect are defined and regulated by 18 Geo. 3. c. 138. The oppression therefore which in certain instances may result from the system of tithes in England, (to which that of Ireland is in many instances similar,) is unknown in Scotland; while the liberal views of the commission and the legislature unite in supporting the clergy in their proper rank in society. See Edinburgh Review, February 1823.

1. Bishop Barlow, Selden, Father Paul, and others, have observed, that neither tithes nor ecclesiastical benefices, (which are correlative in their nature,) were ever heard of for many ages in the Christian church, or pretended to be due to the Christian priesthood; and, as that bishop affirms, no mention is made of tithes in the grand codex of canons, ending in the year 451, which, next to the Bible, is the most authentic book in the world; and that it thereby appears, during all that time, both churches and churchmen were maintained by free gifts and oblations only. Barlow's Remains, p. 169; Selden of Tithes, 82. See Watson's Complete Incumbent, p. 3, 4, &c.

Selden contends, that tithes were not introduced here into England till towards the end of the eighth century, i. e. about the year 786; when parishes and ecclesiastical benefices came to be settled; for, it is said, tithes and ecclesiastical benefices being correlative, the one could not exist without the other; for whenever any ecclesiastical person had any portion of tithes granted to him out of certain lands, this naturally constituted the benefice; the granting of the tithes of such a manor or parish being, in fact, a grant of the benefice; as a grant of the benefice did imply a grant of the tithes: and thus the relation between patrons and incumbents was analogous to that of lord and tenant by the feudal law. Selden of Tithes, 86, &c.

About the year 794, Offa, king of Mercia, (the most potent of all the Saxon kings of his time in this island,) made a law, whereby he gave unto the church the tithes of all his kingdom; which the historians tell us was done to expiate for the death of Ethelbert, king of the East Angles, whom in the year preceding he had caused basely to be murdered. But that tithes were before paid in England by way of offerings, according to the ancient usage and decrees of the church, appears from the canons of Egbert, archbishop of York, about the year 750: and from an epistle of Boniface, archbishop of Mentz, which he wrote to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, about the same time; and from the seventh canon of the general council held for the whole kingdom at Chalcut, in the year 787. But this law of Offa was that which first gave the church a civil right in them in this land, by way of property and inheritance; and enabled the clergy to gather and recover them as their legal due, by the coercion of the civil power. Yet this establishment of Offa reached no further than the kingdoms of Mercia, (over which Offa reigned,) and Northumberland, until Ethelwulf, about sixty years after, enlarged it for the whole realm of England. P. deaux on Tithes, 166, 167. See post.

It is said, tithes, oblations, &c. were originally the voluntary gifts of Christians, and that there was not any canon before that of the fourth council of Lateran, anno Dom. 1215, that even supposed tithes to be due of common right. 2 Wils. 182. But this seems very contrary to other opinions.

Blackstone says, he will not put the title of the clergy to tithes upon any divine right; though such a right certainly comes in, it is certainly considered with a view to the clergy. Yet an honourable and competent maintenance for the ministers of the Gospel is, undoubtedly, jure divino; whatever the particular mode of that maintenance may be. For, besides the positive precepts of the New Testament, natural reason will tell us, that an order of men, who are separated from the world, and excluded from other lucrative professions, for the sake of the rest of mankind, have a right to be furnished with the necessities, conveniences, and moderate enjoyments of life, at their expence for whose benefit they forego the usual means of providing them. Accordingly all municipal laws have provided a liberal and decent maintenance for their national priests or clergy; ours, in particular, have established this of tithes, probably in imitation of the Jewish law; and perhaps, considering the degenerate state of the world in general, it may be more beneficial to the English clergy to found their title on the law of the land, than upon any divine right whatsoever, unacknowledged and unsupported by temporal sanctions. 2 Comm. c. 3.

We cannot (continues the commentator) precisely ascertain the time when tithes were first introduced into this country. Possibly they were contemporary with the planting of Christianity among the Saxons by Augustin the monk, about the end of the sixth century. But the first mention of them in any written English law appears to be in a constitutional decree, made in a synod held A. D. 786, wherein the payment of tithes in general is strongly enjoined. Selden, c. 8. § 2. This canon, or decree, which at first bound not the laity, was effectually confirmed by two kingdoms of the Heptarchy, in their parliamentary conventions of estates, respectively consisting of the kings of Mercia and Northumberland, the bishops, dukes, senators, and people; which was a few years later than the time that Charlemagne established the payment of them in France, (A. D. 778,) and made that famous division of them into four parts; one to maintain the edifice of the church, the second to support the poor, the third the bishop, and the fourth the parochial clergy. Seld. c. 6. § 7; Spirit of Laws, b. 31. c. 12.

*The following more explicit account of the origin of tithes is extracted from Henry's History of Great Britain, book ii. chap. 2. § 4. Ethelwulf the eldest surviving son of Egbert, (the first monarch of England,) who succeeded his father in the throne A. D. 837, had been designed for the church; and was, we are told, a sub-deacon in the cathedral of Winchester when his father died. This prince did not forget his former friends and brethren of the clergy after his advancement to the throne; but continued to give them many substantial marks of his favour; of which the most considerable was, his famous grant of the tenth of all his lands to the church. The Christian clergy in England, as well as in other countries, began pretty early to claim the tenth of every thing, as the pope in Scotland by the law called the annuance of the ministers of religion; but it required a long time, and many laws both of church and state, to make this claim effectual. In the seventh and eighth centuries the English clergy had been supported, by the produce of the lands which had been given to the church by kings and other great men; by a church-scot or tax, of one Saxon penny on every house that was worth thirty Saxon pence of yearly rent; and by voluntary oblations of the people. These funds, in times of plenty and tranquillity, were abundantly sufficient: but in times of war and confusion, when their houses were burnt, and their slaves who cultivated their lands killed or carried away by the Danes; when the church-scot could not be regularly levied, and when the voluntary oblations of the people failed; the clergy were reduced to great distress and indigence. Ethelwulf, who was a religious prince, and seems to have placed his chief hopes of being preserved from that destruction with which he was threatened by the Danes in the prayers of the church, was desirous of delivering the clergy from their present distress, and of providing for their future support. With this view he called an assembly of all the great men of his hereditary kingdom of Wessex, both of the clergy and laity, at Winchester, in November, A. D. 844; and, with their consent, made a solemn grant to the church of the tenth part of all the lands belonging to the crown, free from all taxes and impositions of every kind, even from the trinoda necessitas of building bridges, fortifying and defending castles, and marching out on military expeditions. It was no doubt intended that this royal grant should be imitated, and probably it was imitated, by the nobility. In return for this noble donation, the clergy were obliged to perform some additional duties, viz. to meet with their people every Wednesday in the church, and there to sing fifty psalms, and celebrate two masses, one for king Ethelwulf, and another for the nobility, who had consented to this grant. What immediate benefit the clergy reaped from this donation we are not well informed, though* it is probable that it was not very great, as a regulation of this kind could hardly be carried into execution in those distracted times. See Anglia Sacra, vol. 1. p. 200.

Though the presence of a prince with his people was never more necessary than in the reign of Ethelwolf, when his territories were every moment in danger of being invaded by the most cruel and destructive foes; yet this prince, prompted by the prevailing superstition of that age, left his kingdom in great confusion, and went to Rome, A. D. 854, where he spent much money in presents to the pope, the clergy, and the churches. After his return from Rome, he enlarged his former grant to the church, by extending it to the other kingdoms, which now compose the English monarchy. This was done in a great council at Winchester, A. D. 855, at which, besides Ethelwolf, Beorred, the tributary king of Mercia, and Edmund, the tributary king of East-Anglia, the two archbishops of Canterbury and York, with all the other bishops, the nobility, and chief clergy of England, were present. To give the greater force and solemnity to this donation, the charter containing the grant of it was presented by King Ethelwolf in the presence of the whole assembly, on the altar of St. Peter the apostle, in the cathedral of Winchester; and all the bishops were commanded to send a copy of it to every church in their respective dioceses. See Chron. Saxon. A. D. 854; Spelm. Concil. i. 348.

The next authentic mention of tithes is in the Fædus Edwardi et Guthruni, the laws agreed upon between King Guthran, the Dane, and Alfred and his son Edward, the elder, successive kings of England, about the year 900. This was a kind of treaty between those monarchs, which may be found at large in the Anglo-Saxon laws: wherein it was necessary, as Guthran was a Pagan, to provide for the subsistence of the Christian clergy under his dominion; and accordingly, we find the payment of tithes not only enjoined, but a penalty added upon non-observance, which law is seconded by the laws of Athelstan, about the year 930. And this is as much as can certainly be traced out, with regard to their legal original. See Wilkins, p. 51; 2 Comm. c. 3.

Upon the first introduction of tithes, though every man was obliged to pay tithes in general, yet he might give them to what priests he pleased, which were called arbitrary consecration of tithes; or he might pay them into the hands of the bishop, who distributed among his diocesan clergy the revenues of the church, which were then in common. 2 Inst. 646; Hob. 296; Seld. c. 9. § 4. But, when dioceses were divided into parishes, the tithes of each parish were allotted to its own particular minister; first by common consent, or the appointments of lords of manors, and afterwards by the written law of the land. Lt. Edgar, c. 1 & 2; Canut. c. 11.

However, arbitrary consecrations of tithes took place again afterwards, and became in general use till the time of King John. Selden, c. 11. This was probably owing to the intrigues of the regular clergy, or monks of the Benedictine and other orders, under Archbishop Dunstan and his successors; who endeavoured to wean the people from paying their dues to the secular or parochial clergy, (a much more valuable set of men than themselves,) and were then in hopes to have drawn, by sanctimonious pretences to extraordinary purity of life, all ecclesiastical profits to the coffers of their own societies. And this will naturally enough account for the number and riches of the monasteries and religious houses which were founded in those days, and which were frequently endowed with tithes. For a layman, who was obliged to pay his tithes somewhere, might think it good policy to erect an abbey, and there pay them to his own monks; or grant them to some abbey already erected; since, for this dotation, which really cost the patron little or nothing, he might, according to the superstition of the times, have masses for ever sung for his soul. But, in process of years, the income of the poor laborious parish priests being scandalously reduced by these arbitrary consecrations of tithes, it was remedied by Pope Innocent III. about the year 1200, in a decretal epistle sent to the archbishop of Canterbury, and dated from the palace of Lateran, which has occasioned Sir Henry Hobart and others to mistake it for a decree of the council of Lateran, held A. D. 1179, which only prohibited what was called the infeodation of tithes, or their being granted to mere laymen, whereas this letter of Pope Innocent to the archbishop enjoined the payment of tithes to the parsons of the respective parishes where every man inhabited, agreeable to what was afterwards directed by the same pope in other countries. This epistle, says Coke, bound not the lay subjects of this realm; but, being reasonable and just, (and, he might have added, being correspondent to the ancient law,) it was allowed of, and so became Lex Terræ. 2 Inst. 641. This put an effectual stop to all the arbitrary consecrations of tithes; except some footsteeps which still continue in those portions of tithes, which the parson of one parish hath, though rarely, a right to claim in another; for it is now universally held, that tithes are due of common right to the parson of the parish unless there be a special exemption. Regist. 46. Hob. 296. This parson of the parish, we have formerly seen, may be either the actual incumbent, or else the appropriator of the benefice; appropriations being a method of endowing monasteries, which seems to have been devised by the regular clergy, by way of substitution to arbitrary consecrations of tithes. See 2 Comm. c. 3.

Where an endowment is lost, and it appears that the rector has not received any small tithes, but that the vicar has received all the small tithes which have been rendered, the court infers in favour of the vicar, that the endowment conferred upon him, by a general expression, all small tithes whatever, not only such as were then actually received, but such also as were at that time neglected or as came afterwards into existence by improvements in husbandry. But when the vicar has never received, nor been entitled to receive the whole of the small tithes, it cannot be so readily presumed that the endowment contained a gift to him in these general terms. If a certain tithe has been uniformly received by the vicar, and never by the rector, or any portioner, that fact ascertains that the endowment conferred the title upon him. 1 Y. & J. 17.

The tithes of a rectory which belonged to a dissolved abbey, are due to the grantee of the crown, and not to the incumbent of the parish as rector. 7 Bro. P. C. 7.

In extra parochial places, the king, by his royal prerogative, has a right to all the tithes. 2 Rep. 2, 34, 2 Inst. 64.

The tithes of all extra parochial lands belong jure coronæ to the king; and the title of the crown is not confined to such extra parochial lands only as were forest or part of forest land. Att. Gen. v. Eardley, (Ld.) 8 Price, 39.

II. In general, tithes are to be paid for every thing that yields an annual increase, as corn, hay, fruit, cattle, poultry, and the like: but not for any thing that is of the substance of the earth or is not of annual increase; as stone, lime, chalk, and the like: nor for creatures that are of a wild nature, as deer, hawks, &c.; whose increase, so as to profit the owner, is not annual, but casual: though for deer and rabbits tithes may be payable by special custom. 2 Comm. c. 3. § 2.

Tithes are due either de jure, or by custom: all tithes which are due de jure, arise from such fruits of the earth as renew annually; or from the profit that accrues from the labour of a man. Hence it follows, that such tithes can never be part of, but must always be collateral to, the land from which they arise. 11 Rep. 13, 14.

Nay, tithes due de jure are so collateral to every kind of land, that if a lease is made of the glebe belonging to a rectory, with all the profits and advantages thereof; and there is besides a covenant, that the rent to be paid shall be in full satisfaction of every kind of exaction and demand, belonging to the rectory; yet, as the glebe is not expressly discharged of tithes, the lessee shall be liable to the payment thereof. 11 Rep. 13, 14; 1 Roll. Abr. 655, pl. 1; Cro. Eliz. 162, 261; Cro. Car. 362.

No tithe is due de jure of the produce of a mine or of a quarry; because this is not a fruit of the earth renewing annually, but is the substance of the earth, and has perhaps been so for a great number of years. F. N. B. 53; Bro. Dism. pl. 18; 2 Inst. 651; 1 Roll. Abr. 637; Cro. Eliz. 277.

No tithe is due de jure of any thing (generally) which is part of the soil, and does not renew annually; but it may be due by custom. Vide 2 Vern. 46; 1 Roll. Abr. 637, pl. 5; 2 Mod. 77; 1 Mod. 35; 1 Roll. Abr. 642. S. pl. 7, 8.

No tithes are due de jure of houses; for tithes are only due de jure of such things as renew from year to year. 11 Rep. 16, Grant's case. But houses in London are, by decree, which was confirmed by an act of parliament, made liable to the payment of tithes. 2 Inst. 659. See 37 Hen. 8. c. 12; 22 § 20 Car. 2. c. 15. Before this decree, houses in London were by custom liable to pay tithes; the quantum to be paid being thereby only settled as to such houses for which there was no customary payment. 2 Inst. 659; Hard. 116; Gilb. Eq. Rep. 193, 194. See post V. There is likewise in most ancient cities and boroughs a custom to pay tithes for houses; without which there would be no maintenance in many parishes for the clergy. 11 Rep. 16; Bunb. 102.

It was held by three barons of the exchequer, Prich, Montague, and Page, contrary to the opinion of Bury, chief baron, that two tithes may be due of the same thing, one de jure, the other by custom. Bunb. 43.

By a grant of all tithes, arising out of or in respect of farms, lands, &c. the tithes arising out of and in respect of common appurtenant to such farms or lands will pass. 7 T. R. 641.

Personal tithes are only payable by a special custom; and perhaps are now paid no where in England, except for fish caught in the sea, and for corn mills. 3 Burn's Eccl. Law, 473.

No personal tithe is due of the profit which a man receives without personal labour, or of the profit which one man receives from the labour of another. Roll. Abr. 656. pl. 1. pl. 2; 2 Inst. 621, 6, 9. If a man lets a ship to a fisherman, no personal tithe is due of the money received for the use of such ship; because this is a profit without personal labour. 1 Roll. Abr. 656, n. pl. 2. Vide 1 Roll. Abr. 656, n. pl. 3; 2 Bulst. 141.

In § 7, of stat. 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 13. common day-labourers are exempted from the payment of personal tithes. No personal tithes are due from servants in husbandry; for by their labour the tithes of many other things are increased. 1 Roll. Abr. 646, pl. 1. It was settled, by a decree of the House of Lords, upon an appeal from a decree of the Court of Exchequer, that only personal tithes are due from the occupier of a corn-mill. 1 Eq. Abr. 366; 2 P. Wms. 463; Bro. P. C.

The 9 Edw. 2. at. 1. c. 5. (as to occupiers of mills, paying tithes,) provides that new erected mills shall be liable to the payment of tithes. But, as nothing therein is said concerning ancient mills, there can be no doubt that such ancient mills, as before the making of this statute were liable to pay tithes, continued afterwards to be liable. 12 Mod. 243; 3 Bulst. 212.

The profits of mills are in their nature strictly personal; for they are produced wholly by the labour and industry of man, and therefore at the common law they are not liable to the payment of tithes. Tithe, it is true, is payable for corn mills, but that is only sub modo in the case of new mills, and by the above statute of articuli cleri, ancient corn mills and all other mills, as fulling mills, paper mills, and lead mills, are not titheable except by custom or prescription. 1 Eagle on Tithes, 377.

III. Such tithes as arise immediately from the fruits of the earth, as from corn, hay, hemp, hops, and all kinds of fruits, seeds, and herbs, are called Predial tithes. 2 Inst. 649. They are so called because they arise immediately from the fruits of the farm, (prædium), or earth. 2 Inst. 647.

By the ecclesiastical law, many things are liable to the payment of predial tithes, which by the common law, or in the Courts of equity, are not held to be so. 2 Inst. 621; 4 Mod. 344. This may cause, and has caused, some confusion. In the former case, the last resort is to the Delegates, in the latter to the House of Lords. Shaw's Law of Tithes, 139. The canons must, in all cases, give way to the custom of the place. Id. 112.

The design, under this head, is to show what things are liable by the common law to pay predial tithes.

In doing this, it will appear that some things, which are in the general exempted therefrom, become by custom liable to the payment of predial tithes. 1 Roll. Abr. 637, E. pl. 2; 642, S. pl. 7, pl. 8.

It will also appear, that divers things, which are in the general liable thereto, are, under particular circumstances, exempted from the payment of such tithes. 1 Roll. Abr. 645, pl. 11; Cro. Eliz. 175; Prich, 55; 12 Mod. 255.

But wherever any fraud is used to bring a thing under those circumstances, by reason of which it would, if it had come fairly under them, have been exempted from the payment of predial tithes, it is by such fraud rendered liable thereto. Cro. Eliz. 175; Prich, 55.

The predial great tithes now appear to be corn, grain, hay, clover, grass (when made into hay,) wood, underwood, and beans and pease (when sown in fields). The predial small tithes are flax, hemp, madder, hops, garden roots, and herbs, as potatoes, turnips, parsley, cabbage, saffron; and the fruits of all kinds of trees, as apples, pears, acorns, &c. All kinds of seeds, as turnip-seed, parsley-seed, rape-seed, carraway-seed, aniseed, clover-seed, and beans and pease if sown in a garden. Shaw's Law of Tithes.

As it would be tedious to enumerate all the things which are liable to predial tithes, only those shall be mentioned concerning the tithes of which some question has arisen; but from such as will be mentioned, it may be easily collected of what other things predial tithes are due.

AGISTMENT.—Agistment, in the strict sense of the word, means the depasturing of a beast the property of a stranger. But this word is constantly used in the books for depasturing the beast of an occupier of land, as well as that of a stranger. 5 New Abr. 53. The tithe of agistment is the tenth part of the value of the keeping or depasturing such cattle as are liable to pay it. Agistment is derived from the French gayer, gister (jacere); because the beasts are levant and couchant during the time they are on the land. Agistment tithe seems rather a mixed than strictly a predial tithe.

In respect to the nature of agistment tithe it seems to have been long considered a matter of doubt, whether it was payable on account of the cattle, or the herbage on which they are depastured; but it is now fully settled that it is the tithe of the grass or herbage which is eaten, and not of the improvement of the cattle, and consequently is in its nature a predial tithe. 1 Anstr. 332; 3 Anstr. 760; 2 E. & Y. 429.

The parson, vicar, or other proprietor of the tithes, is entitled to agistment tithe de jure; because the grass which is eat is of common right tithable. Ld. Raym. 137; 2 Salk. 655; 2 Inst. 651.

An occupier of land is not liable to pay tithe for the pasture of horses, or other beasts, which are used in husbandry in the parish in which they are depastured, because the tithe of corn is by their labour increased. 1 Roll. Abr. 646, pl. 2, pl. 3, pl. 6, pl. 7; Cro. Eliz. 446; Ld. Raym. 130. But, if horses or other beasts are used in husbandry out of the parish in which they are depastured, an agistment tithe is due for them. 7 Mod. 114; Ld. Raym. 130.

It seems to be the better opinion, that no tithe is due for the pasture of a saddle-horse which an occupier of land keeps for himself or servants to ride upon. 1 Roll. Abr. 642, pl. 4; Cro. Jac. 430; Bulst. 171; Bunb. 3. No tithe is due for the pasture of milk cattle, which are milked in the parish in which they are depastured; because tithe is paid of the milk of such cattle. 1 Roll. Abr. 646, pl. 2; Ld. Raym. 130; Cro. Eliz. 446.

Milk cattle which are reserved for calving, shall pay no tithe for their pasture whilst they are dry. But, if they are afterwards sold, or milked in another parish, an agistment tithe is due for the time they were dry. Hell. 100; Ld. Raym. 130. No tithe is due from an occupier of land, for the pasture of young cattle, reared to be used in husbandry, or for the pail. Cro. Eliz. 476. But if such young beasts are sold, before they come to such perfection as to be fit for husbandry, or before they give milk, an agistment tithe must be paid for them. Hell. 86.

An occupier of land is liable to an agistment tithe, for all such cattle as he keeps for sale. Cro. Eliz. 446, 476; Jenk. pl. 6; Cro. Car. 237; Show. P. C. 192. Vide Cro. Jac. 430; 1 Roll. Abr. 647, pl. 14.

But if any cattle which have neither been used in husbandry nor for the pail, are, after being kept some time, killed, to be spent in the family of the occupier of the land on which they were depastured, no tithe is due for their pasture. Jenk. 281, pl. 6; Cro. Eliz. 446, 476; Cro. Car. 237. It is in general true, that an agistment tithe is due, for depasturing any sort of cattle the property of a stranger. Cro. Eliz. 276; Cro. Jac. 276; Bunb. 1; Freem. 329. No tithe is due for the cattle, either of a stranger or an occupier, which are depastured in grounds that have in the same year paid tithe of hay. Bunb. 10, 79; Poph. 142; 2 Roll. Rep. 191.

No agistment tithe is due for such beasts, either of a stranger or an occupier, as are depastured on the head-lands of ploughed fields; provided that these are not wider than is sufficient to turn the plough and horses upon. 1 Roll. Abr. 646, pl. 19. No tithe is due for such cattle as are depastured upon land that has the same year paid tithes of corn. Bro. Dism. 18; 1 Mod. 216. If land, which has paid tithe of corn in one year, is left unsown the next year, no agistment is due for such land; because, by this lying fresh, the tithe of the next crop of corn is increased. 1 Roll. Abr. 642, pl. 9. But if land, which has paid tithe of corn, is suffered to lie fallow longer than by the course of husbandry is usual, an agistment tithe is due for the beasts depastured upon such land. Shep. Abr. 1008.

Sheep are considered profitable animals, in respect of the wool and lambs they produce, and the manurance of the land upon which they are folded; and therefore no tithe of agistment is due from sheep when they are sheared or drop their lambs in the same parish in which they are depastured: for the tithes of their pasturage is included in the tithes of the wool and lambs. 3 Anstr. 829; 1 E. & Y. 356, 578; 2 E. & Y. 128, 229, 284, 436. But it is to be observed, that regularly the year in tithing sheep is from shearing time in one year to shearing time in the next, 1 E. & Y. 566; 2 Anstr. 500; and that the payment of tithes of wool and lambs has merely a retrospective operation, covering the pasturage of the sheep up to the time of their lambing and shearing, and that only within the same parish. Amb. 149. See 1 E. & Y. 356. And the rule is now perfectly established, that by the common law, tithe of wool and lambs may be due in one parish and tithe of agistment in another, Gwill. 1022, 1028, although upon general principles it would be clearly otherwise. 1 Eagle on Tithes, 296.

There is a peculiar difficulty attending the tithe of agistment, that cannot be taken in kind; custom is therefore the principal rule to go by in payment of it; and the old decisions on the subject vary so much, that it would be difficult to obtain any general inference from them. Burn says, in all cases, the tithe of agistment of barren and unprofitable cattle is to be paid according to the value of keeping each per week; and the value of the keeping of a sheep, beast, or horse, upon any particular lands, is easily ascertained from the usual prices given for their depasture per week in the neighbourhood, where profitable cattle are kept at the same time upon the lands, together with them, or not. 3 Burn. Eccl. L. 448.

In Ireland, in the year 1735, resolutions were made by the House of Commons against enforcing tithe for the agistment of dry and barren cattle. Comm. J. vi. 678, 672. And by the Irish act, 40 Geo. 3. c. 23. passed just before the Union with Great Britain, reciting that tithe agistment for dry and barren cattle had not been demanded for more than sixty years then last past, it is enacted, that no claim shall be allowed for tithe agistment for dry and barren cattle, nor shall any suit be entertained in any court of civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction for recovery of the same. But this shall not exempt from payment of tithe any kind of cattle in any parish or place in which tithe had been usually paid within the last ten years.

CORN.—The common-law mode of tithing wheat is in the sheaf and not in the shock. 2 Taunton, 55. And it is not competent for a farmer, without a custom, before tithing, to put all the sheaves immediately when bound into shocks, and then withdrawing the tenth sheaf from each, to remove the remainder; for the parson has not then a reasonable opportunity of comparing the tenth with the other nine, as he is entitled by law. 13 East, 261. And see 12 East, 239.

It is laid down in some books, that no tithe is due of the rakings of corn involuntarily scattered. 1 Roll. Abr. 615, pl. 11; Cro. Eliz. 278; Freem. 335; Moor, 278. But if more of any sort of corn is fraudulently scattered than, if proper care had been taken, would have been scattered, tithe is due of the rakings of such corn. Cro. Eliz. 476; Freem. 335. And it has been said by Holt, Ch. J. that tithe is due of the rakings of all corn, except such as is bound up in sheaves. 12 Mod. 235. No tithes are due of the stubbles left in cornfields, after moving or reaping the corn. 2 Inst. 261; 1 Roll. Abr. 640, p. 14. See post, VI.

HAY.—The common-law mode of tithing hay is in the cocks into which the grass is first collected after cutting or tedding. In this case, (as in corn,) the farmer must leave his nine parts in the field a reasonable time for the parson to compare his tithe with them. 10 East, 5; 2 Taunton, 55. Tithe of hay is to be paid, although beasts of the plough or pail, or sheep, are to be foddered with such hay. Cro. Jac. 47, Webb v. Warner; 1 Roll. Abr. 650, pl. 12; 12 Mod. 17. But no tithe is due of hay grown upon the head-lands of ploughed grounds, provided that such head-lands are not wider than is sufficient to turn the plough and horses upon. 1 Roll. Abr. 646, pl. 19. See post, VI.

It is laid down in one old case, that if a man cuts down grass, and while it is in the swathes, carries it away and gives it to his plough cattle, not having sufficient sustenance for them otherwise, no tithe is due thereof. 1 Roll. Abr. 645, Crawley v. Wells, Mich. 8 Car. 1. In one case, the Court of Exchequer seemed to be of opinion, that no tithe is due of vetches or clover, cut green, and given to cattle in husbandry. Bunb. 279. But in another case, it was afterwards held, that the right to tithe of hay accrues upon mowing the grass; and that the subsequent application of this, while it is in grass, or when it is made into hay, shall not, although beasts of the plough or pail are fed with it, take away this right. 12 Mod. 498. And the doctrine of this last case coincides with that of an old case, in which it was held, that tares cut green, and given to beasts of the plough, may, by special custom, be exempted from the payment of tithes; from whence it follows that such tares are not exempted de jure. 12 Mod. 498. See post, VI. as to such tithes, and also tithes of aftermath, or after-pasture.

Wood.—Tithe of wood is not due of common right, because wood does not renew annually: but it was, in very ancient times, paid in many places by custom. 2 Inst. 642; 12 Mod. 111; Salk. 656; Comb. 404; Bunb. 61.

A constitution was made, in the seventeenth year of the reign of Edward III., by John Stratford, archbishop of Canterbury, that tithes shall be paid within this province of silva cædua. 2 Inst. 642; Palm. 37, 38.

Several petitions having been presented to the king, complaining of the clergy in taking tithes of gross-wood and underwood, by virtue of this constitution; at length, a statute was made in these words: "At the compunction of the great men and commoners, shewing by the petition that when they sell their gross-wood, of the age of twenty or forty years, and of a greater age, to merchants, to their own profit, and to the aid of the king in his wars, the parsons and vicars of holy church do implead and trouble the said merchants, in court christian, for the tithe of the said wood, under the denomination of silva cædua, by reason of which they cannot sell their wood for the real value, to the great damage of themselves and the realm: it is ordained and established, that a prohibition in this case shall be granted, and upon the same an attachment, as it has hitherto been." 45 Edw. 3, c. 3.

From the petitions and answers, from this statute, and from books of the best authority, it appears plainly, that no title of gross-wood is due of the common law; and that the demand thereof as such, by virtue of the constitution made by the archbishop, was an encroachment. 2 Inst. 642; 45 Edw. 3, c. 3; Plowd. 470; Bro. Paroch. pl. 1; Cro. Jac. 100.

After the making of this statute, prohibitions were constantly granted to suits instituted in spiritual courts for tithes of gross-wood. But two questions often arose; what is gross-wood? and of what age gross-wood must be before it is exempted from the payment of tithe? 2 Inst. 643, 644, 645.

For the putting an end to these, it had long been settled, that gross-wood is not only small wood, but any wood, but such as is generally, or by the custom of a particular part of the country, (as beech, in Buckinghamshire,) used as timber; and that all such wood, if of the age of twenty years, is exempted from the payment of tithe. 2 Inst. 642, 643; Cro. Eliz. 1; 12 Mod. 534; Bunb. 127. Oaks, and chestnuts, being universally used as timber, it has been always held, that such trees, if of twenty years, are gross-wood. 2 Inst. 642. It hath been held, upon great deliberation, (notwithstanding what is laid down to the contrary in Plowd. 470,) that a hornbeam tree, if of the age of twenty years, is gross-wood, because this is used in building and repairing. It is also to be observed, that an aspen-tree, of the age of twenty years, is gross-wood. 2 Inst. 643.

In a recent case tithe was held to be payable for oak wood, springing or growing from the germins or stumps of trees formerly felled; though such wood was timber, of the growth of eighty years and upwards. And that by gross-wood in the 45 Edw. 3, is intended wood of the species of timber of twenty years, or greater growth; but the statute does not point to the means of growth, whether it shall be from seed or germins; but according to the authorities, the growth must be from the former; and germins, of whatever age or size, are liable to tithe. Evans v. Rome, 1 McClell. & Y. 577. See Eagle on Tithes, 233, 260, where the propriety of the above decision is questioned in a very able argument.

With respect to trees which are clearly of a species to be denominated timber, the court have declared they would presume the trees to be above twenty years' growth, unless the plaintiff demanding the tithes prove the contrary. 2 P. Wms. 606; Gwill. 357.

Tithes are not in the general due of beech, birch, hazel, willow, sallow, alder, maple, or white-thorn trees, or of any fruit trees, of whatsoever age they are; because these are not timber. Plowd. 470; Cro. El. 477; 1 Cro. Jac. 193; 1 Roll. Abr. 640, pl. 5, pl. 6; Brownl. 94. But, if the wood of any of these trees is used in a particular part of the country, where timber is scarce, in building and repairing, no tithe is due of such wood, if of the age of twenty years, in that part of the country. Hob. 289; Brownl. 94. It is laid down in several old books, that if a timber tree, after it is of the age of twenty years, decays so as to be unfit to be used in building, no tithe is due of the wood of this tree, because it was once privileged. 11 Rep. 48; Cro. Eliz. 477; Cro. Jac. 100; 1 Roll. Abr. 640, pl. 2.

If the wood of a coppice has been usually felled for firing, such wood shall pay tithe, although it stand till it be forty years of age. Sid. 300; 1 Lev. 189.

If, when the wood of coppice is felled, some trees growing therein, which are of the age of twenty years, and have never been lopped, are lopped, and these loppings are promiscuously bound up in faggots with the coppice-wood, tithe must be paid on the whole, because it would be very difficult to separate the tithable wood from that which is not so, and the owner ought to suffer for his folly in mixing them. Walton v. Tryon, 5 Bac. Abr.; and see Danes v. Mullins, 2 Leccs. 79.

If the wood of a timber tree is sold for firing, it was determined in one case, that although the tree was of the age of twenty years, it was liable to pay tithe. Bunb. 99. Greenaway v. The Earl of Kent. The reporter of this case mentions four others, in which the same had been held; and says, that it was in one of them laid down, that the wood of timber-trees is only exempted from the payment of tithe, on the account of its being used in building. The contrary doctrine, however, of the old books, was confirmed by a subsequent case in the Court of Chancery. A bill being brought for tithe of the loppings of timber trees, which had been sold for firing, it was insisted that this wood, which would otherwise have been exempted from the payment of tithes, was liable thereto, because it was sold to be used for firing; and the cases just now cited were relied upon. But the bill was dismissed; and by Hardwicke, chancellor, in the case in 1 Lev. 189, and Sid. 300, the wood in question was coppice-wood, which had been usually felled for firing; and such wood, of whatever age it is, is always tithable. The case of Greenaway and The Earl of Kent is quite a singular one, and is not law; for in the case of Bibye and Huxley, 11 Geo. 1, it was agreed, that no tithe is due of the wood of a timber tree, which has been once privileged from the payment of tithe, although such wood is sold to be used for firing. Walton v. Tryon, Mich. 25 Geo. 2: 5 Bac. Abr.; Gwill. on Tithes, 818. See farther, Bro. Dism. pl. 14; 11 Rep. 4; Cro. El. 4; Godb. 175; Roll. Abr. 640, pl. 3. Held also in the said case of Walton v. Tryon, that wherever a tree has been lopped before it was of the age of twenty years, all future loppings, although ever so old, are liable to pay tithe. And see Withington v. Harris, Gwill. 584, 586; Broke v. Rogers, Mo. 908; Gwill. 833; 4 M. & S. 130.

IV. SUCH tithes as arise from beasts or fowls which are fed with the fruits of the earth, are called mixed tithes. 2 Inst. 649; 1 Roll. Abr. 635. Many things are, by the ecclesiastical law, liable to pay such tithes, which by the common law are not. 2 Inst. 621; 4 Mod. 344.

The design under this head is to show, of what mixed tithes are due by the common law.

The same general observations as to custom, frauds, and exemption, apply here as to the former kind of predial tithes.

The tithes of colts, calves, lambs, kids, pigs, milk, cheese, agistment or pasturage, eggs, chickens, &c. are mixed tithes. Shaw's Law of Tithes.

Tithes are in general due of the young of all beasts, except such as are feræ naturæ. But none are due of young hounds, apes, or the like, because such beasts are kept only for pleasure. Bro. Dism. pl. 20. No tithe is due of the young of deer, for these are feræ naturæ. 2 Inst. 651. And, for the same reason, none is due, but by custom, of young conies. 1 Roll. Abr. 635, C. pl. 3; Cro. Car. 339; 1 Ventr. 5.

The young of all birds and fowls, except such as are feræ naturæ, are in the general liable to pay tithes; unless the eggs of such birds or fowls have before paid tithes. 1 Roll. Abr. 642, pl. 6; 2 P. Wms. 463. But no tithes are due either of the eggs or young of any birds or fowls which are kept only for pleasure. Bro. Dism. pl. 20. No tithes are due of the eggs or young of partridges or pheasants, because these are feræ naturæ. Moor, 599; 2 P. Wms. 463. If a man keeps pheasants in an enclosed wood, whose wings are clipped, and from their eggs hatches and brings up young ones, no tithe is due of these young pheasants, although none was paid for their eggs; because the old ones are not reclaimed, and would go out of the inclosure if their wings were not clipped. 1 Roll. Abr. 636, pl. 5.

It was heretofore held, that neither the eggs nor young of turkeys are tithable, turkeys being feræ naturæ. Moor, 599. But it is now held that, as turkeys are now as tame as hens or other poultry, tithe is due of their eggs or young. 2 P. Wms. 463. No tithe is due of such young pigeons as are spent in the house of the person who breeds them. 1 Roll. Abr. 644, Z. pl. 4; pl. 6; 1 Ventr. 5; 12 Mod. 77; 12 Mod. 47. But if any young pigeons are sold, tithe is due of them. 1 Roll. Abr. 644, Z. pl. 5, pl. 6.

If a man pay tithe of young lambs at Marks-tide, and at Midsummer assizes shears the other nine parts of the lambs, tithe is due of the wool; for although there are but two months between the time of paying tithe-lambs which were not shorn, and the shearing of the residue, there is in this case a new increase. 1 Roll. Abr. 642, R. pl. 7; Bunb. 90. If a man shears his sheep about their necks at Michaelmas time, to preserve their fleeces from the brambles, no tithe is due of this wool; for it appears that this, which is done before their wool is much grown, can never be for the sake of the wool. 1 Roll. Abr. 645, pl. 16. If a man, after their wool is well grown, shear his sheep about their necks to preserve them from vermin, no tithe is due of the wool. 1 Roll. Abr. 645, pl. 14.

If a man, a little before shearing time, cuts dirty locks of wool from his sheep to preserve them from vermin, no tithe is due of such wool. 1 Roll. Abr. 646, pl. 17.

But in any of these cases, if more wool than ought to have been cut off is fraudulently cut off, tithe must be paid of the wool. 1 Roll. Abr. 645, pl. 15, 646, pl. 17. Tithe is due of the wool of such sheep as are killed to be spent in the house. 1 Roll. Abr. 646, pl. 18; Cont. Litt. Rep. 31.

Fish taken in a pond, or in any inclosed river, are liable to pay tithe. 1 Roll. Abr. 636, pl. 4, pl. 6, pl. 7. But no tithe is due, except by custom, of fish taken in the sea, or in any open river, although they are taken by a person who has a several fishery, because such fish are feræ naturæ.

Noy, 108; 1 Roll. Abr. 636, pl. 4, pl. 6, pl. 7; Cro. Car. 332; 1 Leo. 179; Sid. 278. Honey and bees-wax are both tithable. Fitz. N. B. 51; 1 Roll. Abr. 633, C. pl. 1; Cro. Car. 559. But where the tithe of their honey and wax has been paid, no tithe is due of the bees. Cro. Car. 404. No tithe is due of the milk spent in the house of a farmer, provided such house stands in that parish in which the cows are milked. Id. Raym. 129. See post, VI.

V. THE subtraction or withholding of tithes from the parson or vicar, whether the former be a clergyman or a lay appropriator, is among the pecuniary causes cognizable in the ecclesiastical court. But herein a distinction must be taken; for the ecclesiastical courts have no jurisdiction to try the right of tithes, unless between the spiritual persons; but in ordinary cases, between spiritual men and lay-men, are only to compel the payment of them, when the right is not disputed. 2 Inst. 364, 489, 490. By the statute, or rather writ, of Circumspecte agatis, it is declared, that the Court Christian shall not be prohibited from holding pleas, "si rector parialis versus parochianos oblationes et decimas debitas et consuetas." So that if any dispute arises whether such tithes be due and accustomed, this cannot be determined in the ecclesiastical court, but before the king's courts of the common law; as such question affects the temporal inheritance, and the determination must bind the real property. But where the right does not come into question, but only the fact, whether or no the tithes allowed to be due are really subtracted or withdrawn, this is a transient personal injury, for which the remedy may properly be had in the spiritual court: viz. the recovery of the tithes, or their equivalent.

By 27 Hen. 8. c. 20; 32 Hen. 8. c. 7. for due payment of tithes, upon complaint of the ecclesiastical judge, of any contempt or misbehaviour by a defendant in any suit for tithes, any privy councillor, or any two justices of the peace (or, in case of disobedience to a definitive sentence, any two justices of the peace,) may commit the party to prison, without bail or mainprise, till he enter into recognizance with sureties to give due obedience to the process and sentence of the court.

It now seldom happens that tithes are sued for at all in the spiritual court; for if the defendant pleads any custom, modus, composition, or other matter whereby the right of tithing is called in question, this takes it out of the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical judges; for the law will not suffer the existence of such a right to be decided by the sentence of any single, much less an ecclesiastical, judge, without the verdict of a jury. 3 Comm. c. 7.

By 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 13. it is enacted, that if any person shall carry off his predial tithes, (viz. of corn, hay, or the like,) before the tenth part is duly set forth, or agreement is made with the proprietor, or shall willingly withdraw his tithes of the same, or shall stop or hinder the proprietor of the tithes, or his deputy, from viewing or carrying them away; such offender shall pay double the value of the tithes, with costs, to be recovered before the ecclesiastical judge, according to the king's ecclesiastical laws. By a former clause of the same statute, the treble value of the tithes, so subtracted or withheld, may be sued for in the temporal courts; which is equivalent to the double value to be sued for in the ecclesiastical; for one may sue for and recover in the ecclesiastical courts the tithes themselves, or a recompence for them, by the ancient law; to which the suit for the double value is superadded by the statute; but as no suit lay in the temporal courts for the subtraction of tithes themselves, therefore the statute gave a treble forfeiture, if sued for there; in order to make the course of justice uniform, by giving the same reparation in one court as in the other. 2 Inst. 650.

In an action on this statute, 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 13. for the treble value of corn omitted to be set out, it is not enough for the defendant to show the existence in fact of a custom in the parish to set out the 11th instead of the 10th mow; for the validity as well as existence of such a custom is properly triable in this form of action, though penal in its nature; being given to the party grieved, and his only remedy at common law for subtraction of the tithe due to him. 8 East, 178; and see 16 East, 641.

Where the declaration was for not setting out predial and other tithes, as wool, &c. and a general verdict was given, judgment was arrested: the statute extending only to predial tithes. Schw. N. P. 1074. But the statute extends to small predial tithes as well as great. Day v. Packwell, Moor, 915. As to the right of way in the parson to be used for carrying the tithe, see 2 New Rep. 466. The validity of a prescription to be exempt from the penalties of this act, 2 & 3 Edw. 6. is proper to be tried in an action on the statute. 8 East, 178.

Where an occupier of land, who had been under composition for tithes, refused to pay the composition, or to set out tithes in kind, alleging that he was exempted by a modus; the Court of C. P. held, that in an action on 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 18. for the treble value of the tithe, it was not necessary to prove a notice to determine the composition; the occupier's denial of the rector's right to tithes in kind rendering such notice unnecessary. 1 B. & B. 4; and see Fell v. Wilson, 12 East, 83.

By 53 Geo. 3. c. 127. § 5. no action shall be brought for the recovery of any penalty for the not setting out of tithes, nor any suit instituted in any court of equity or ecclesiastical court to recover the value of any tithes, unless within six years from the time when such tithes became due. And this is extended to Ireland by 54 Geo. 3. c. 68. § 5.

Suits for tithes are generally instituted in the Court of Exchequer. See further, Limitation of Actions II. 1.

The following statutes, for the summary recovery of tithes before justices of the peace, have also operated to abridge the power of the ecclesiastical court.

By 7 & 8 Wm. 3. c. 6. § 1. it is, for the more easy recovery of small tithes, where the same do not amount to above the yearly value of 40s. from any one person, enacted, "that if any person shall fail in payment for twenty days after demand, the parson may make complaint in writing to two justices of the peace, (neither being patron, nor interested), who, after summoning the party, are to hear and determine the complaint, and give a reasonable allowance for the tithes, and costs, not exceeding 10s.

"If the person complained against insists on any prescription, composition, modus decimandi, or other title, delivers the same in writing to the justices, and gives to the party complaining sufficient security to pay costs at law, if the title is not allowed, the justices are not to give judgment. The justices have power to give costs, not exceeding 10s., to the party prosecuted, if they find the complaint false and vexatious. The act not to extend to tithes within the city of London, or in any other place where the same are settled by any act of parliament. An appeal is given to the sessions, and no proceedings or judgment, had by virtue of this act, to be removed or superseded, by any writ of certiorari, or other writ whatsoever, unless the title of such tithes shall be in question."

By 53 Geo. 3. c. 127. § 4. the remedy of this act 7 & 8 Wm. 3. is extended to all tithes where the value does not exceed 10*l.*, and the complaint may be received by one justice, who shall summon the party to be heard before two, as required by the act 7*Wm. 3.* And see 54 Geo. 3. c. 68. § 4. extending in like manner the power given to justices in Ireland under Irish act, 1 Geo. 2. c. 12.

By 7 & 8 Wm. 3. c. 34. § 4. where any Quaker shall refuse to pay, or compound for, his great or small tithes, it shall be lawful for the two next justices of the peace of the same county, other than such justice of the peace as is patron of the church or chapel to which the tithes belong, or any ways interested, upon complaint, to convene before them such Quaker, and to examine upon oath the truth of the complaint, and to ascertain what is due from such Quaker, and by order under their hands and seals to direct the payment thereof, so as the sum ordered do not exceed 10*l.*; and, upon refusal of the Quaker to pay, to levy the money. Any person aggrieved may appeal to the next general quarter sessions.

No proceedings, or judgment, had by virtue of this act, shall be removed or superseded by any writ of certiorari, or other writs out of his majesty's courts at Westminster, or any other court whatsoever, unless the title to such tithes shall be in question.

The material point as to granting a certiorari is, whether the title to the tithes is really in question or not. The general denial of a right to tithes, by a Quaker, is not such a controverting the title, as shall enable him to have a certiorari. 1 Burr. 485.

By 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 6. § 2. the like remedy is given for the recovery of all other ecclesiastical dues from Quakers, as by 7 & 8 Wm. 3. c. 34. is given for tithes to the value of 10*l.*

The justices of the peace, upon complaint of any parson, vicar, curate, farmer, or proprietor of such tithes, or other person who ought to have, receive, or collect any such tithes or dues, may proceed in a similar manner as directed by the former act, touching Quakers.

By 53 Geo. 3. c. 127. § 6. the provisions of the two last-mentioned statutes are extended to any tithes, &c. not exceeding the value of 50*l.*, and one justice may receive the complaint, and summon the party to appear before two to determine it. So in Ireland, under the Irish act, 1 Geo. 3. c. 21. as extended by 54 Geo. 3. c. 68. § 6.

The tithe of houses in London, which are regulated by 37 Hen. 8. c. 12. may be recovered in the Court of Exchequer. Bennett v. Treppass, Bro. P. C. Under 22 & 23 Car. 2. c. 15. the tithes of all the parishes in London, injured by the great fire in 1666, are settled, to be levied by an equal rate; and, on non-payment, the lord mayor is to grant a warrant of distress for the same; or, on his refusal the lord chancellor, or two barons of the Exchequer, may grant such warrant; and all courts ecclesiastical and temporal are ousted of their jurisdiction in this case by this statute. These tithes are a real charge on the houses, payable though they are empty, and leviable on the goods of the succeeding occupier; and appeal lies from the lord mayor to the lord chancellor. 3 Atk. 639.

By 32 Hen. 8. c. 7. § 7. where persons having any estate of inheritance, &c. in any parsonage, tithes or ecclesiastical profits admitted by law to be in temporal hands, shall be disseised by persons claiming title, the persons so disseised shall have their remedy in the temporal courts by such writs as the case shall require; and like provision is made in Ireland by 33 Hen. 8. (I.) st. 1. c. 12.; and by the Irish act 15 & 16 Geo. 3. c. 27. § 3. it is positively provided that ejectment may be brought for non-payment of rent (one year being in arrear) reserved on leases of great or small tithes.

Under the above act, 32 Hen. 8. c. 7. the inheritance of tithes, as well as of any other species of property, may be recovered by ejectment.

By 6 Geo. 1. (I.) c. 14. leases of tithes for longer time than during incumbency, are void against the successors. (See as to England, Lease, II.) and 39 Geo. 3. (I.) c. 14. declares void all leases of tithes made by lessees of rectors, &c. except leases to the actual occupiers of the land subject to the tithe.

IV. ACORNS, as they yearly increase, are liable to the payment of tithes; but this is where they are gathered and sold, and reduced to a certain profit; not when they drop and the hogs eat them. 2 Inst. 643; Hell. 27.

AFTER-MATH, OR AFTER-PASTURE, pays no tithes, except by custom; being the remains of what was before tithed. 2 Inst. 262, 652; 2 Danv. Abr. 589, tit. Dismes. F. N. B. 53; Bro. Dismes, pl. 16; 11 Rep. 16; Cro. Jac. 42; Ld. Raym. 243. But it is held in other books, that tithe is due of aftermowth hay. 1 Roll. Abr. 64, pl. 11; Cro. Eliz. 660; Cro. Jac. 116; Cro. Car. 403; 12 Mod. 498; Bunb. 10. And the principle upon which the doctrine that no tithe is due of aftermowth hay is founded is denied in some modern cases. In some of these it is laid down, that tithes shall be paid of divers crops grown upon the same land in the same year. Bunb. 19, 314. In others it is held, wherever there is, in the same year a new increase from the same thing, tithe is due. Bunb. 9; Gillb. Rep. in Eq. 231.

ACCOMMODATION of cattle upon pasture land, which hath paid no other tithes that year, pays tithe for the cattle. See ante, III.

ALDER trees pay tithes, notwithstanding they are above twenty years' growth, not being timber. Ash is timber; and therefore, if these trees are above twenty years' growth, they are tithe free. Asp or aspen trees are exempted, if beyond that growth, in places where they are used for timber. 2 Cro. 199.

BARK of trees is not tithable, if the trees whereon produced were timber. 11 Rep. 49.

BARREN LAND, which is so of its own nature, pays no tithe; where land is barren, and not manurable without some extraordinary charge, in respect of such charge, and for the advancement of husbandry, such land being converted to tillage, shall, for the first seven years after the improvement, be discharged from tithes, by construction of 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 13. § 5. But the barren land, during the seven years of improvement, shall pay such small tithes as have been accustomed to be paid before; and afterwards to pay the full tithe according to the improvement. If land be merely over-run with bushes, or become unprofitable by bad husbandry, it cannot properly be called barren land; and if it be grubbed, or ploughed and sowed, it immediately pays tithes. 2 Inst. 656; Cro. Eliz. 475. See also Stockwell v. Terry, 1 Ves. 115, and Warwick v. Collins, 2 Maule & Selw. 340, and Selsea, Ld. v. Powell, 8 Taunton, 297, that the proper enquiry seems to be whether the land was of such a nature in itself as to require extraordinary expense, either in manure or labour, to bring it into a proper state of cultivation: in which case it shall be exempt from tithes for seven years. See as to exemption of such land from tithes in Ireland, Irish acts, 5 Geo. 2. c. 9. § 6, 7; 33 Geo. 3. c. 25. § 1, 5.

BEECH TREES, where timber is scarce, and these trees are used for building, if above twenty years growth to be timber, are privileged from tithes, by 15 Edw. 3. c. 3, though this tree is not naturally timber, for it is necessity makes it so. 2 Danv. Abr. 589.—BEES are tithable for their honey and wax, by the tenth measure and tenth pound. It has been a question whether the tenth swarm can be demanded for tithes of bees, because bees are feræ naturæ; but when the bees are gathered into the hives, they are then under custody, and may pay tithe by the hive or swarm; but the tithe is generally paid in the tenth part of the honey. 1 Roll. Abr. 651; 3 Cro. 404, 559.—BIRCH WOOD is tithable though of above twenty years growth. 2 Inst. 643.—BRICKS pay not tithes, for they are made of parcel of the freehold, and are of the substance of the earth, not an annual increase. 1 Cro. 1.—BROOM shall pay tithe; but it may be discharged by custom, if burnt in the owner's house, or kept for husbandry. 2 Danv. Abr. 597.

CALVES are tithable, and the tenth calf is due to the parson, when weaned, and he is not obliged to take it before; but if in one year a person hath not the number of ten calves, the parson is not entitled to tithes in kind for that year, without a special custom for it, though he may take it in the next year, throwing both years together; and it is a good custom to pay one calf in seven, where there hath been no more in one year; and where a man sells a calf to pay the tenth of the value, or for the parson to have the right shoulder, &c. 1 Roll. Abr. 648; Raym. 277.

CATTLE sold pay tithe, but not cattle kept for the plough or pail, which shall pay no tithe for their pasture, by reason the parson hath the benefit of the labour of plough-cattle in tilling the ground, by the tithe of corn, and tithe milk for those kept for the pail; yet if such cattle bought are sold before used, or if, being past their labour, the cows are barren, and afterwards fattened in order to sell, tithes shall be paid for them; though if the owner kill and spend the cattle in his own house, no tithe is due for them, being for his provision, to support him in his labour about other affairs for which the parson hath tithes. Cattle feeding on large commons, where the bounds of the parish are not certainly known, shall pay tithes to the parson of the parish where the owner lives; and if fed in several parishes, and they continue above a month in each parish, tithes shall be paid to the two parsons proportionably. 1 Roll. Abr. 635, 646, 647; Hardr. 35; 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 13. § 3.—CHALK and CHALK-PITS are not tithable, nor is CLAY or COAL, as they are part of the freehold, and not annual, to pay tithes. 2 Inst. 651.—CHEESE pays tithe by custom, where tithe is not paid for the milk; but if the milk pays a tithe, the cheese pays none; and it may be a good custom to pay the tenth cheese made in such a month, for all tithe milk in that year. 1 Roll. Abr. 651. See Milk.—CHICKENS are not tithable if tithe is paid for the eggs. 1 Roll. Abr. 642.—COLTS pay tithes in the same manner as calves. Ibid.—CONIES are tithable only by custom for those that are sold, not for such as are spent in the house. 2 Danv. Abr. 583.

CORN pays a predial tithe; it is tithed by the tenth cock, heap, or sheaf, which if the owner do not set out, he may be sued in an action upon the 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 13. And if the parishioner will not sow his land usually sown, the parson may bring his action against him. When tithe corn is set forth, the law gives the parson a reasonable time to carry it away; and if he suffer the same to lie too long on the land, to the prejudice of the owner thereof, he may be liable to an action; but the parson may not set out the tithes himself, or take them away without leave. 1 Roll. Abr. 644; 1 Sid. 283; 2 Vent. 48; Ley. 70.

DEER are not tithable, for they are feræ naturæ; though in parks, &c. they pay tithes by custom. 2 Inst. 651.—DOVES kept in a dove-house, if they are not spent in the owner's house, are tithable. 1 Vent. 5.

EGGS pay tithes when tithes are not paid for the young. 1 Roll. Abr. 642.—ELM TREES, being timber, are discharged from the payment of tithes, but not if under twenty years growth. 2 Inst. 643.

FALLOW GROUND is not tithable for the pasture in that year in which it lies fallow, unless it remain beyond the course of husbandry, because it improves and renders the land more fertile by lying fresh. 1 Roll. Abr. 642.—FENS being drained and made manurable, or converted into pasture, are subject to the payment of tithes. 1 Roll. Rep. 354. FISH taken in the sea or common rivers are tithable only by custom, and the tithe is to be paid in money, and not the tenth fish; but fish in ponds and rivers inclosed ought to be set forth as a tithe in kind. 2 Danv. Abr. 583, 584. FLAX; every acre of flax or hemp sown, shall pay yearly 5s. for tithe, and no more. 11 & 12 Wm. 3. c. 16. A former act (3 & 4 Wm. & M. c. 3) fixed the modus at 4s. The tithe of hemp is in like manner ascertained at 5s. an acre in Ireland, by the Irish act, 28 Geo. 3. c. 29; but no act has defined the tithe of flax sown in Ireland.—FOREST LANDS shall pay no tithes while in the hands of the king, though such lands in the hands of a subject shall pay tithes; and if a forest shall be disafforested, and within a parish, it shall pay tithes. 1 Roll. Abr. 655; 3 Cro. 94.—

FOWLS, as hens, geese, ducks, are to pay tithes, either in eggs or the young, according to custom, but not in both. So of turkeys it is now resolved that tithes are due of their eggs or young. 2 P. W. 463. FRUIT, apples, pears, plums, cherries, &c. pay tithes in kind when gathered, and ought to be set out according to the statute. 2 Inst. 621.—FRUIT TREES cut down and sold are not tithable if they have paid tithe-fruit that year before cut. Ibid. 652.—FURZES, if sold, pay tithe; not if used for fuel in the house, or to make pens for sheep &c. Wood's Inst. 166.

GARDENS are tithable as lands, and therefore tithes in kind are due for all herbs, plants, and seeds sowed in them; but money is generally paid by custom or agreement.—GRASS mown is tithable by payment of the tenth cock, or according to custom; but for grass cut in swaths for the sustenance of plough cattle only, not made into hay, no tithe is to be paid. Grass or corn, &c. when sold standing, the buyer shall pay the tithes; and if sold after cut and severed, the seller must pay it. The parson is not obliged to take tithe of grass the day it is cut, but may let it lie long enough to make it into hay. 1 Stra. 245; 1 Rol. Abr. 644, 645. See post, Hay.

HAZLE, HOLLY, and MAPLE TREES, &c. are regularly tithable, although of twenty years growth. 2 Danv. Abr. 589.

HAY pays a predial tithe; the tenth cock is to be set out and paid, after made into hay, by the custom of most places; and by custom generally, but not of common right, the parishioners shall make the grass cocks into hay for the parson's tithe; but if they are not obliged to make the tithe into hay, they may leave it in cock, and the parson must make it, for which purpose he may come on the ground, &c. A prescription to measure out and pay the tenth acre, or part of grass standing, in lieu of all tithe hay, may be good. And if meadow ground is so rich that there are two crops of hay in one year, the parson, by special custom, may have tithe of both. 1 Rol. Abr. 643, 647, 950.—HEADLANDS are not tithable if only large enough for turning the plough; but if larger, tithe may be, and generally is, payable. 2 Inst. 653.

HEMP, see Flax.—HERBAGE of ground is tithable for barren cattle kept for sale, which yield no profit to the parson. Wood's Inst. 167.—HONEY pays a tithe, see Bees.—HORS are tithable, and the tenth part may be set out after they are picked. It is now settled, on appeal to the House of Lords, that hops ought to be picked and gathered from the vines before they are tithable; and then measured in baskets, before being dried, and every tenth basket set out for the tithes; and no usage can vary this rule. Knight v. Halsey, 2 B. & P. 172; 7 T. R., K. B. 86; and see Bro. P. C. tit. Tithes.—HORSES kept to sell, and afterwards sold, tithes shall be paid for their pasture, though not where horses are kept for work and labour. Hut. 7.

HOUSES for dwelling are not properly tithable. A modus may be paid for houses in lieu of tithes of the land upon which they are built; and a great many cities and boroughs have a custom to pay a modus for their houses, as it may be reasonably supposed that it was usual to pay so much for the land, before the houses were erected on it. 11 Rep. 16; 2 Inst. 659. See London (Tithes), and ante, V.

KIDS pay a tithe as calves; the tenth is due to the parson. Wood, 167.

LAMBS are tithable in like manner as calves; but if they are yeanned in one parish, and do not tarry there thirty days, no tithe is due to the parson of that place. If there be a custom that the parishioners having six lambs or under shall pay so much for every lamb, and if he have above that number then to pay the seventh, it is good. 3 Cro. 403. The rector's right to the tithe of lambs vests at the time when they are yeanned, although the tithe cannot be set out until they are fit to be weaned. 1 B. & P. 81. The tithe of lambs is when the animals are dropped, but the farmer is bound to keep them until they are capable of living without the dam. 2 Y. & J. 575.

LEAD may pay tithe by custom, as it does in some counties; but it doth not without it. 2 Inst. 651.—By custom only LIME and LIME-KILNS are tithable. 1 Rol. Abr. 642.

MADDER is now tithable in kind; it was liable for twenty-eight years only, to a modus of 5s., but the statutes for that purpose are expired. 31 Geo. 2. c. 12; 5 Geo. 3. c. 18.—MAST of oak and beech pays tithes as under Acorns.

MILK is tithable when no tithes are paid for cheese, all the year round, except custom over-rides; and it is payable by every tenth meal, not tenth quart or part of every meal; and it was formerly held, that it was to be brought to the house of the parson, &c., in which particular this tithe differs from all others, which must be fetched by the receiver. But this is only where there is a special custom; and it seems now decided, that the tithe of milk is by setting out every tenth morning and evening's meal in clean vessels, belonging to the owner of the milk, and leaving the same therein till the vessels are again wanted by the owner; and if not fetched away by the parson prior to that time, the owner is at liberty to throw it on the ground; and in the intermediate time the owner is not answerable for any accident that may happen to it. Dr. Bosworth v. Lambrick, Bro. P. C. The tithe of milk is that of the whole of the tenth day morning and evening, and not the tenth meal; and the milk of a whole herd of cattle must be taken on the same day. 2 Y. & J. 575. In some places they pay tithe cheese for milk, and in others some small rate according to custom. Cro. Eliz. 609; 2 Danv. Abr. 596.

MILLS. As there are several sorts of them, the tithes are different; the tithes of corn-mills driven by wind or water have been paid in kind, every tenth toll-dish of corn to the parson of the parish wherein the mills are standing. But ancient corn-mills are tithe-free, being suggested that they are very ancient, and never paid tithes, &c. And it is questioned whether tithe is due for any corn-mills, unless by custom, because the corn hath before paid tithe; and it seems rather a personal tithe where due. The tithes of fulling-mills, paper-mills, powder-mills, &c. are personal, charged in respect to the labour of men, by custom only; and these are regarded more as engines of several trades than as mills. 1 Rol. Abr. 656; 2 Inst. 621. It is now settled, that tithes of all mills are personal tithes, and only a tenth part of the clear profits, deducting all charges and expenses, is payable as tithe. Newte v. Chamberlam, Bro. P. C.; and see 2 P. Wms. 11.

MINES pay no tithes but by custom, being of the substance of the earth, and not annually increasing. 2 Inst. 651.

NURSERIES of TREES shall pay tithes if the owner dig them up, and make profit of them by selling. 2 Danv. Abr. 585; 1 Co. 526; 2 Jon. 416; Godb. 481; Hard. 380.

OAK TREES are privileged as timber from the payment of tithes by the statute of Siba Ceodua, 45 Edw. 3. c. 3. if of or above twenty years growth; and if oaks are under that age, it is the same when they are apt for timber. Moor, 541. See ante, III.—OFFERINGS, &c. are in the nature of personal tithes. 2 Inst. 659, 661. See Offerings, Oblations.—ORCHARDS pay tithes both for the fruit they produce and the grass or grain, if any sown or cut therein. 2 Inst. 652.

PARKS are tithable by custom for the deer and the herbage; and when disparted and converted into tillage, they shall pay tithes in kind. The tithes of parks may be in part certain, and part casual; and 2s. a year, and a shoulder of every third deer hath been paid as tithe for a park. 1 Rol. Rep. 176; Hob. 37, 40.—PARTRIDGES and PHEASANTS, &c. as they are fera naturæ, yield no tithes of eggs or young. 1 Rol. Abr. 656.—PEASE, if gathered for sale, or to feed hogs, pay tithes; but not green pease spent in the house. 1 Rol. Abr. 647. Pease are generally a great tithe, but the vicar may be endowed of them. See Parl. Ca. tit. Tithes.—PIGEONS ought to pay tithes when sold; and this holds good if they lodge in holes about a house, as well as in a dove-house; and by custom, if spent in the house, they may be tithable, though not of common right. 2 Dano. Abr. 588, 597. Pigs are tithable, as calves. Ibid.—POLLARD TREES, such as are usually lopped and distinguished from timber-trees, pay tithes. Plowd. 470.

POTATOES are a small tithe, wherever planted and in whatever quantities they are produced. The setting out the tithe of potatoes by the tenth basket as raised, and immediately removing the other nine parts, and so going on through the day, held not to be a setting out binding on the tithe-owner, and consequently no payment of tithe; a reasonable quantity must be raised before setting out the tenth for inspection and view. 2 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 495.

QUARRIES OF STONE, &c. are not subject to pay tithes, because they are part of the inheritance, and tithes ought to be collateral to the land, and distinct from it. 1 Roll. 644.

RABBITS. See Conies.—RAKINGS OF CORN are not tithable, for they are left for the poor, and are properly the scatterings of the corn whereof the tithes have been paid, left after the cocks set out are taken away. Cro. Eliz. 660. See ante, III. (Corn.)

SAFFRON pays a predial and small tithe. 1 Cro. 467.—SALT is not tithable but by custom only. 1 Bunb. 10.—SHEEP, a tithe is paid for, of lambs and wool, and therefore they pay no tithe for their feeding. But see ante, III. Agistment. If sheep are in the parish all the year, they are to pay tithe wool to the parson; but if removed from one parish to another (without fraud), the parson of each parish to have tithe pro rata, where they remain thirty days in a parish; and if they are fed in one parish and brought into another to be shorn, the same tithing is to be observed. 1 Roll. Abr. 642, 647; 3 Cro. 237. It seems now that the rule is, that tithe of the wool shall be paid where the sheep are shorn, and agistment tithe in other parishes where they have been depastured. Shaw's Law of Tithes.—STUBBLE pays no tithe under aftermath. 2 Inst. 652.

TARES, vetches, &c. are tithable; but if they are cut down green, and given to the cattle of the plough, where there is not a sufficient pasture in the parish, no tithe shall be paid for them. 1 Cro. 139.—TILES are no yearly increase, and not tithable. 2 Inst. 651.—TIMBER TREES, such as oaks, ashes, and elms, and in some places beech, &c. above the age of twenty years, were discharged of tithes by the common law, before the 45 Edw. 3. c. 3. and the reason of it is, because such trees are employed to build houses, and houses when built are not only fixed to but part of the freehold; loppings of timber-trees above twenty years growth, pay no tithes, for the branch is privileged as well as the body of the tree, and the roots of such trees are exempted as parcel of the inheritance. Trees cut for plough-bote, cart-bote, &c. shall not pay tithes, although they are no timber; but all trees not fit for timber, and not put to those uses, pay tithes. 1 Roll. Abr. 650; Cro. Eliz. 477, 499. See ante, III.—TURFS used for fuel are part of the soil, and tithe-free. 2 Inst. 651.—TURNS are reckoned among small predial tithes; and the tithes of them shall be paid as often as they are sown, though twice or more on the same land and in the same year. So if eaten off the land by barren cattle. Bunb. 10. See III. Agistment.

UNDERWOOD is tithable, though the tithe is not of annual payment; and is set out while standing, by the tenth acre, pole, or perch; or when cut down, by tenth faggot or billet, as custom directs; and if he that fells the wood doth not set out the tithe, he is liable to the treble damages by 2 & 3 Ed. 6. c. 13. But if the underwood is used for firing in a house of husbandry, or to burn brick to repair the house, or for hedging and fencing the lands in the same parish, it may be discharged from tithe. 2 Inst. 642, 643, 652; Hob. 250; 2 Dano. Abr. 597.

WARRENS, where tithable, see Conies. WASTE GROUND whereon cattle feed, is liable to the payment of tithes. 2 Dano. Abr. WOAD growing in the nature of an herb is a predial and small tithe. Hutt. 77; Cro. Car. 28. Wood is generally esteemed to be a great tithe. If wood grounds have likewise timber trees grown on them, and consist for the most part of such trees, the timber trees shall privilege the other wood; but if the wood is the greatest part, then it must pay tithes for the whole. 13 Rep. 13. If wood be cut to make hop-poles, where the parson hath tithe of hops, no tithe shall be paid for it. Hughes's Abr. 689. See ante, III.

WOOL is a mixt small tithe, paid when clipped; one fleece in ten, or in some places one in seven, is given to the parson. If there is under ten pounds of wool at the shearing, a reasonable consideration shall be paid, because the tithes are due of common right; and if less than ten fleeces, they shall be divided into ten parts, or an allowance be otherwise made. All sheep killed, and sheep which die, pay tithe-wool; and neck-wool cut off for the benefit of the wool, but not if it is to preserve the sheep from vermin, &c. Also the wool of lambs shorn at Midsummer, though tithe was paid for the lambs at Mark-tide, is tithable. 1 Roll. Abr. 646, 647; 2 Inst. 652. See Sheep, and ante, IV.

VII. LANDS, and their occupiers, may be exempted or discharged from the payment of tithes, either in part, or totally; first, by a real composition; or, secondly, by custom or prescription.

First. A real composition is when an agreement is made between the owner of the lands and the parson or vicar, with the consent of the ordinary and the patron, that such lands shall for the future be discharged from payment of tithes, by reason of some land or other real recompense given to the parson in lieu and satisfaction thereof. 4 Inst. 490; Regist. 38; 13 Rep. 40. This was permitted by law, because it was supposed that the clergy would be no losers by such composition; since the consent of the ordinary, whose duty it is to take care of the church in general, and of the patron, whose interest it is to protect that particular church, were both made necessary to render the composition effectual; and hence have arisen all such compositions as exist at this day by force of the common law. But, experience showing that even this caution was ineffectual, and the possessions of the church being, by this and other means, every day diminished, the disabling statute, 13 Eliz. c. 10. was made; which prevents, among other spiritual persons, all parsons and vicars from making any conveyances of the estates of their churches, other than for three lives or twenty-one years. So that now, by virtue of this statute, no real composition made since the 13 Eliz. is good for any longer term than three lives, or twenty-one years, though made by consent of the patron or ordinary.

Neither was a composition made since that statute binding on a succeeding incumbent, although sanctioned by the concurrence of all parties, and acquiesced in for 130 years. 2 Wood. 137; 7 Br. P. C. 44; 1 E. & Y. 543. But now, by the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 100. § 2. every composition which has been confirmed by the decree of a court of equity, in a suit to which the ordinary, patron, and incumbent were parties, and which has not since been set aside, or departed from, is declared valid. See the other provisions of this statute, post.

Where, however, such a composition has been made, the land is for ever discharged from the payment of tithes, both at the common law and by the statutes of the 32 Hen 8. c. 7. and 3 Ed. 6. c. 13. the latter of which expressly provides that no person shall be sued for tithes of any description that are discharged by composition real. 2 Inst. 490; 3 E. & Y. 795.

No evidence is sufficient to support a real composition unless it bear some reference to a deed of composition. 2 Bos. & Pull. 172.

With regard to compositions entered into between the tithe-owner and any parishioner, for the latter to retain the tithe of his own estate, it has been decided that they are analogous to leases from year to year between landlord and tenant; and if they are paid without or beyond an agreement for a specific time, they cannot be put an end to without six months' notice before the time of payment, and the parishioner may avail himself of the defect of notice, at the same time that he controverts the right of the incumbent, to receive tithe in kind: an objection not permitted to a tenant who denies the right of the landlord. See Rent, 2 Bro. C. R. 161. See ante, V.

Compositions for tithes cease on the death of the incumbent with whom they were made, at least as to his successor; but if the successor continue to receive the next payments due after the death of his predecessors, he can only be accountable to the executors for such portion of it as the nature of the tithes would have amounted to, if paid in kind, accruing due between the last composition received by the preceding incumbent and his death; and not pro rata according to the time which had run before his death from the last payment. 10 East, 269.

A parishioner who has compounded with the parson one year for his tithes, and has not determined the composition, cannot set up as a defence to an action for the next year's composition money, that the parson is sinuatus. 8 Taunt. 313.

The mode of making composition for tithes, either by portions of land applied to the purpose, or by corn rents adjudged from time to time on an average of a certain number of years, has of late been very extensively adopted in acts of inclosure; the provisions of many of which acts for this purpose extend not only to lands newly enclosed, but also to all tithes and moduses, and compositions for tithes throughout the whole of many parishes. Most of those acts are local; and many of them private and not printed, being considered as relative merely to the place over which they operate, without advertent to their effect on the general system of law in this particular.

By the 4 Geo. 4. c. 99. as amended by 5 Geo. 4. c. 63. and 8 Geo. 4. c. 60. provisions of a very extensive and detailed nature were made for the establishment of compositions for tithes in Ireland, by the co-operation of certain select vestries in each parish with the incumbent, in appointing commissioners for the purpose, who were empowered to agree in fixing the amount of the annual sum to be paid as a composition for all tithes, after due inquiry on the average amount paid, or agreed, or adjudged to be paid during seven years preceding November, 1821; such composition not to be lower than such average, nor to exceed it more than one-fifth. A power of appointing umpires was given; as also an ultimate superintending power to the lord lieutenant and privy council of Ireland.

Numerous compositions, extending to nearly one-half of the parishes of Ireland, were entered into under the above statutes, which have been further amended by the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 119. and 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 100.

Secondly. A discharge by custom or prescription is, (but now see post.) where, time out of mind, such persons or such lands have been, either partially or totally, discharged from the payment of tithes. And this immemorial usage is binding upon all parties; as it is in its nature an evidence of universal consent and acquiescence, and with reason supposes a real composition to have been formerly made. This custom or prescription is either de modo decimandi, or de non decimando.

A modus decimandi, commonly called by the simple name of a modus only, is where there is by custom a particular manner of tithing allowed, different from the general law of taking tithes in kind, which are the actual tenth part of the annual increase. This is sometimes a pecuniary compensation, as two-pence an acre for the tithe of land; sometimes it is a compensation in work and labour, as that the parson shall have only the twelfth cock of hay, and not the tenth, in consideration of the owner's making it for him; sometimes in lieu of a large quantity of crude or imperfect tithe, the parson shall have a less quantity, when arrived to greater maturity, as a couple of fowls in lieu of tithe eggs, and the like. Any means, in short, whereby the general law of tithing is altered and a new method of taking them is introduced, is called a modus decimandi, or special manner of tithing.

Moduses are of two kinds, customary and prescriptive. The former is a modus which extends over a hundred, parish, township, hamlet, or other well known district, and is common to all the persons and lands within the place in general.

It is strictly a custom, and it is generally called a distinct or parochial modus.

The latter is a modus confined to a particular estate, farm, or other limited quantity of land, generally called a farm modus, and it is properly a prescription.

The only difference between a composition real and a modus is the time of their commencement; for a composition real, as contra-distinguished from a modus, necessarily implies an agreement made after the time of legal memory. See 2 Eagle on Tithes, 40.

To make a good and sufficient modus, the following rules must be observed. 1. It must be certain and invariable, for payment of different sums will prove it to be no modus, that is, no original real composition; because that must have been one and the same from its first original to the present time. 1 Keb. 602. 2. The thing given, in lieu of tithes, must be beneficial to the parson, and not for the emolument of third persons only: thus a modus to repair the church in lieu of tithes, is not good, because that is an advantage to the parish only; but to repair the chancel is a good modus, for that is an advantage to the parson. 1 Roll. Abr. 649. 3. It must be something different from the thing compounded for; one load of hay, in lieu of all tithe hay, is no good modus; for no parson would bona fide make a composition to receive less than is due in the same species of tithe; and therefore the law will not suppose it possible for such composition to have existed. 1 Lev. 179. 4. One cannot be discharged from payment of one species of tithe by paying a modus for another. Thus a modus of 1d. for every milch cow will discharge the tithe of milch kine, but not of barren cattle; for tithe is, of common right, due for both; and therefore a modus for one shall never be a discharge for the other. Cro. Eliz. 446; Salk. 657. 5. The recompense must be in its nature as durable as the tithes discharged by it; that is, an inheritance certain; and therefore a modus that every inhabitant of a house shall pay 4d. a-year, in lieu of the owner's tithes, is no good modus; for possibly the house may not be inhabited, and then the recompense will be lost. 2 P. Wms. 462. 6. The modus must not be too large, which is called a rank modus; as if the real value of the tithes be 60*l.* per ann. and a modus is suggested of 40*l.* this modus will not be established; though one of 40*s.* might have been valid. 11 Mod. 60. Indeed, properly speaking, the doctrine of rankness in a modus is a mere rule of evidence drawn from the improbability of the fact, and not a rule of law. Pyke v. Donling, Hil. 19 Geo. 3. C. B. For, in these cases of prescriptive or customary moduses, it is supposed that an original real composition was anciently made; which being lost by length of time, the immemorial usage is admitted as evidence that it once did exist, and that from thence such usage was derived. Now time of memory hath been long ago ascertained by the law to commence from the beginning of the reign of Richard the First; and any custom may be destroyed by evidence of its non-existence in any part of the long period from that time to the present; wherefore, as this real composition is supposed to have been an equitable contract, or the full value of the tithes at the time of making it, if the modus set up is so rank and large, as that it beyond dispute exceeds the value of the tithes in the time of Richard the First, this modus is (in point of evidence) felo de se, and destroys itself. For, as it would be destroyed by any direct evidence to prove its non-existence at any time since that era, so also it is destroyed by carrying in itself this internal evidence of a much later original.

To constitute a good modus, it seems necessary that it should be such as would have been a certain, fair, and reasonable equivalent or composition for the tithes in kind, before the year 1189; and therefore no modus for hops, turkeys, or other things introduced into England, since that time, can be good. Burb. 307. The question of rankness, or rather modus or no modus, is a question of fact which courts of equity will send to a jury unless the grossness of the modus is so obvious as to preclude the necessity of it. 2 Bro. C. R. 103; 1 Bluck. Rep. 420.

A custom to pay only a part of the tithe, without substituting any thing else in lieu of the remainder, is bad. But a custom to pay less than the whole tithe, may be good, where something in lieu of, and as a compensation for, the rest is paid to the parson. 7 T. R. 93.

For the provisions of the recent statute respecting moduses, and other exemptions from tithes, see post.

A prescription de non decimando is a claim to be entirely discharged of tithes, and to pay no compensation in lieu of them. Thus the king by his prerogative is discharged from all tithes. Cro. Eliz. 511. So a vicar shall pay no tithes to the rector, nor the rector to the vicar, for ecclesia decimas non solvit ecclesie. Cro. Eliz. 479, 511; Sav. 3; Moor. 910. But these personal privileges (not arising from, or being annexed to the land) are personally confined to both the king and the clergy; for their tenant or lessee shall pay tithes, though in their own occupation their lands are not generally tithable. And, generally speaking, it is an established rule, that in lay hands modus de non decimando non valet. But it seems that the king's tenant at will shall not pay tithes. 1 Woodd. 100.

Spiritual persons or corporations, as monasteries, abbots, bishops, and the like, were always capable of having their lands totally discharged of tithes by various ways. Hob. 309; Cro. Jac. 308. As, 1. By real composition; 2. By the pope's bull of exemption; 3. By unity of possession; as when the rectory of a parish, and lands in the same parish, both belonged to a religious house, those lands were discharged of tithes by this unity of possession; 4. By prescription; having never been liable to tithes, by being always in spiritual hands; 5. By virtue of their order; as the Knights Templars, Cistercians, and others, whose lands were privileged by the pope with a discharge of tithes. 2 Rep. 44; Seld. Tith. c. 13, § 2. Though, upon the dissolution of the greater abbeyes by Henry VIII., most of these exemptions from tithes would have fallen with them, and the lands become tithable again, had they not been supported and upheld by the 1 Hen. 8. c. 13, which enacts, § 17. (vulgo 20.) that all persons who should come to the possession of the lands of any abbey then dissolved, should hold them free and discharged of tithes, in as large and ample a manner as the abbeyes themselves formerly held them. This provision is peculiar to this statute: and, therefore, all the lands belonging to the lesser monasteries, dissolved by 27 Hen. 8. c. 28, are now liable to pay tithe. And from this original have sprung all the lands, which, being in lay hands, do at present claim to be tithe-free; for if a man can show his lands to have been such abbey lands, and also immemorably discharged of tithes by any of the means before-mentioned, this is now a good prescription de non decimando. But he must show both these requisites; for abbey lands, without a special ground of discharge, are not discharged of course; neither will any prescription de non decimando avail in total discharge of tithes, unless it relates to such abbey lands. 2 Comm. c. 3.

A like exemption of the land formerly belonging to monasteries in Ireland, is contained in the Irish act 35 Hen. 8. st. 2. c. 5.

A catalogue of the greater monasteries, in respect of which exemptions may be claimed, is contained in Tanner's Notitia: from thence copied into Burn's Eccl. Law, title Tithes, and into the Appendix to Toller on Tithes.

[The following view of the law respecting such exemption is contained in a note on the statute, in Evan's Collection of Statutes.]

The exemption may be in respect, first, of unity of possession by the monastery of the parsonage, and the land tithable; and this exemption takes place as well when they are in the hands of a tenant, as when they are in the hands of the owner. The requisites to such exemption are, that the union must have been, 1. founded on the legal title; 2. equal with respect to the quantity of estate; 3. free from the payment of any tithes in any manner; 4. immemorial; and such immemorial possession must be proved, and is not to be presumed. Christie v. Oram, Gwill. 1354, but see Ingram v. Thackstone, Gwill. 819. Secondly, in respect of orders: Religious orders were by Pope Pascal II. exempted generally from tithes of lands, dum propriis manibus excoluntur. This exemption was confined by Pope Adrian IV. to the orders of the Cistercians, Templars, and Hospitallers, and was afterwards endeavoured by Innocent III. to be extended to the Præmonstratenses; but the extension has not been allowed in this country. By the Council of Lateran, in 1215, received as law in England, the exemption of religious houses was restrained to the lands of which they were at that time in possession. The Cistercians afterwards obtained bulls for the exemption of lands in the hands of tenants. Such exemptions were prevented for the future by 2 Hen. 4. c. 4; but are valid as to privileges then existing. Lands, in respect of which the monasteries were entitled to exemption ratione ordinis, are exempted; although, at the time of the dissolution, they were in the hands of tenants, and as such tithable. Conley v. Keys, Gwill. 1308: but it is otherwise with respect to lands which previous to the dissolution had been granted in tail. Farmer v. Shereman, Hob. 258; Gwill. 431. The exemption extends in other cases only to lands in the hands of the owners. It may be claimed by a tenant in tail, or by a tenant for life under the limitation of a settlement, Hett v. Mead, Gwill. 1515; but not by a lessee for life, semble, ib. An absolute and not a qualified discharge was presumed in favour of lands that had never paid tithes, although belonging to a Cistercian abbey, and never in lease, and although tithes had been paid for other parts of the same farm when in the hands of tenants. Ingram v. Thackstone, Gwill. 819.

Lands of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, which came to the crown by 32 Hen. 8. c. 24, are exempted from tithes under the authority of 31 Hen. 8. c. 13. See Toller, 175.

It has been held that lands exempted by the statute are not chargeable, although they have paid tithes ever since it passed. Clericourt, E. v. Denton, Ly., Gwill. 363. Likewise that lands so exempt are not rendered liable by the general provision of an inclosure act, that tithes should be paid from the new inclosure, notwithstanding any modus or exemption in other parts of the parish. 3 Bro. P. C. 512; Gwill. 704.

Where A. purchased an estate free from rectorial tithes, with a right of common annexed thereto, and the common was afterwards inclosed under an inclosure act, and certain land was allotted to him in lieu of his right of common, no tithe is payable in respect of the land so allotted. 5 B. & A. 22.

Land exempted from tithes, as being part of the demesne of an ancient monastery, when inclosed by act of parliament, shall not be made liable to tithes by any general words of the act. 7 Bro. P. C. 12.

In a suit for tithes there was no proof of payment for a very long period: all the evidence which could tend to prove a legal exemption (claimed by the occupier) was adduced at the hearing; but as that could not, in the opinion of the court, justify a jury in finding for the exception, an issue was refused. Ross v. Aglionby, 4 Russ. 489.

By a recent statute (2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 100,) the length of time requisite to support claims of modus decimandi, or exemptions from or discharge of tithes, has been most materially shortened.

By § 1. all prescriptions and claims of or for any modus decimandi, or of or to any exemption from or discharge of tithes, by composition real or otherwise, shall, in cases where the render of tithes in kind shall be hereafter demanded by the king, or any duke of Cornwall, or by any lay person, not being a corporation sole, or by any body corporate whether temporal or spiritual, be sustained and be deemed valid in law, upon evidence showing, in cases of claim of a modus decimandi, the payment or render of such modus, and in cases of claim to exemption or discharge showing the enjoyment of the land, without payment or render of tithes, money, or other matter in lieu thereof, for the full period of thirty years next before the time of such demand, unless in the case of claim of a modus decimandi the actual payment or render of tithes in kind, or of money or other thing differing in amount, quality or quantity from the modus claimed, or in case of claim to exemption or discharge, the render or payment of tithes, or of money or other matter in lieu thereof, shall be shown to have taken place at some time prior to such thirty years, or it shall be proved that such payment or render of modus was made or enjoyment had by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing; and if such proof in support of the claim shall be extended to the full period of sixty years next before the time of such demand, in such cases the claim shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, unless it shall be proved that such payment or render of modus was made or enjoyment had by agreement for that purpose by deed or writing, and where the render of tithes in kind shall be demanded by any archbishop, bishop, dean, prebendary, parson, vicar, master of hospital, or other corporation sole, whether spiritual or temporal, then every such prescription or claim shall be valid and indefeasible, upon evidence showing such payment or render of modus made or enjoyment had, as is therein-before mentioned, applicable to the nature of the claim. For and during the whole time that two persons in succession shall have held the office or benefice in respect whereof such render of tithes in kind shall be claimed, and for not less than three years after the appointment and institution or induction of a third person thereto: provided that if the whole time of the holding of such two persons shall be less than sixty years, then it shall be necessary to show such payment or render of modus made or enjoyment had (as the case may be,) not only during the whole of such time, but also during such further number of years, either before or after such time, or partly before and partly after as shall with such time make up the full period of sixty years, and also for the further period of three years after the appointment and institution or induction of a third person to the same office or benefice, unless it shall be proved that such payment or render of modus was made or enjoyment had by agreement by deed or writing.

By § 2. no modus, exemption or discharge shall be deemed to be within the act, unless such modus, &c. shall be proved to have existed and been acted upon at the time of or within one year next before its passing.

§ 3. Provided that the act shall not be available in any suit or action relative to any of the matters before mentioned, now or to be after commenced during the then session of parliament, or within one year from the end thereof.

§ 4. Provided that the act shall not extend to any case where the tithes of any lands, &c. shall have been demised by deed for any term of life or years, or where any composition for tithes shall have been made by deed or writing, by the person or body corporate entitled to such tithes, with the owner or occupier of the land, for any such term or number of years, and such demise or composition shall be subsisting at the passing of the act, and where any action or suit shall be instituted for the recovery of tithes in kind within three years next after the expiration, surrender, or other determination of such demise or composition.

§ 5. Where any lands or tenements shall have been or shall be held or occupied by any rector, vicar, or other person entitled to the tithes thereof, or by any lessee of any such rector, &c. or by any person compounding for tithes with any such rector, &c. or by any tenant of any such rector, or person, or of any such lessee or compounder, whereby the right to the tithes of such lands or tenements may have been or may be during any time in the occupier thereof, or in the person entitled to the rent thereof, the whole of every such time and times shall be excluded in the computation of the several periods of time therein-before mentioned.

§ 6. The time during which any person otherwise capable of resisting any claim to any of the matters before mentioned shall have been or shall be an infant, idiot, non compos mentis, feme covert, or lay tenant for life, or during which any action or suit shall have been pending, and which shall have been diligently prosecuted, until abated by the death of any party or parties thereto, shall be excluded in the computation of the periods therein-before mentioned, except only in cases where the right or claim is hereby declared to be indefeasible.

§ 7. In all actions and suits to be commenced after the act shall take effect, it shall be sufficient to allege that the modus or exemption or discharge claimed, was actually exercised and enjoyed for such of the periods mentioned in the act as may be applicable to the case; and if the other party shall intend to rely on any proviso, exception, incapacity, disability, contract, agreement, deed, or writing hereinmentioned, or any other matter of fact or of law not inconsistent with the exercise and enjoyment of the matter claimed, the same shall be specially set forth in answer to the allegation of the party claiming, and shall not be received in evidence on any general traverse of the matter claimed.

§ 8. In the several cases provided for by the act, no presumption shall be allowed in favour of any claim upon proof of the exercise or enjoyment of the right or matter claimed for any less period of time than for the period mentioned in the act applicable to the case.

By § 9. The act extends to England only.

In consequence of the operation of the above act being deferred until a year after the determination of the session of parliament in which it was passed, a great number of suits were immediately instituted under an apprehension on the part of the plaintiffs, that they would be precluded from recovering the tithes they claimed, unless they prosecuted their claims within the period limited by the act. This led to another statute (4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 83.) whereby, in order to give the defendants time, the proceedings in all suits commenced after the passing of the above act were suspended until the end of the next session of parliament, on the defendants paying the costs incurred by the plaintiffs into the Bank of England, to be placed to the credit of the suits. By § 5, however, judges may permit the actions to be proceeded with upon sufficient cause shown.

The abolition of tithes in Ireland, which have proved such a fruitful source of evil to that country, it is hoped, will be effected in the course of the present session of parliament (1835); and a measure for the abolition or commutation of tithes in England will in all probability shortly follow.

TITHING, tithunga, from the Saxon Teothunga, Decuria.] Was, in its first appointment, the number or company of ten men with their families held together in a society, all being bound for the peaceable behaviour of each other: and of these companies there was one chief person who was called teothung-man, at this day tithing-man; but the old discipline of tithings is long since left off. In the Saxon times, for the better conservation of the peace, and more easy administration of justice, every hundred was divided into ten districts or tithings; and within every tithing the tithing-men were to examine and determine all lesser causes between villagers and neighbours; but to refer greater matters to the then superior courts, which had a jurisdiction over the whole hundred. Paroc. Antiq. 688. The subdivision of hundreds into tithings seems to be most peculiarly the invention of King Alfred. See 1 Comm. Introd.

TITHING-MEN, are now a kind of petty constables, elected by parishes, and sworn in their offices in the court-leet, and sometimes by justices of peace, &c. There is frequently a tithing-man in the same town with a constable, who is as it were a deputy to execute the office in the constable's absence; but there are some things which a constable has power to do, that tithing-men and head-boroughs cannot intermeddle with. Dalt. 3. When there is no constable of a parish, the office and authority of a tithing-man seems to be the same under another name. 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 12. See Constable.

TITHING-PENNY. See Teding-Penny.

TITLE, titulus.] Is when a man hath lawful cause of entry into lands whereof another is seised; and it signifies also the means whereby a man comes to lands or tenements as by feoffment, last will and testament, &c.

The word title includeth a right, but is the more general word. Every right is a title, though every title is not such a right for which an action lies; so that titulus est justa causa possidendi quod nostrum est, and is the means of holding the lands. Co. Litt. 15. Blackstone defines it to be "the means whereby the owner of lands has the just possession of his property." 2 Comm. c. 13.

There are several stages or degrees requisite to form a complete title to lands and tenements: as, first, the lowest and most imperfect degree of title consists in the mere naked possession, or actual occupation of the estate, without any apparent right, or any shadow or pretence of right to hold and continue such possession; which naked possession, by length of time, and negligence of him who hath the right, may by degrees ripen into a perfect and indefeasible title; and at all events, without actual possession, no title can be completely good. 2d. The next step to a good and perfect title is a right of possession; which is either actual or apparent; and which may reside in one man, while the actual possession is in another. This actual possession may be recovered by him who has the right of possession, if sued for within a competent time: otherwise he will have nothing left in him.

There was formerly a third stage or degree, viz. the mere right of property, without even possession, or the right of possession. Thus, if a disseisor turned me out of possession of my lands, he thereby gained a mere naked possession, and I still retained the right of possession and the right of property. If the disseisor died, and the lands descended to his son, the son gained an apparent right of possession; but I still retained the actual right, both of possession and property. If I acquiesced for thirty years, without bringing any action to recover the possession of the lands, the son gained the actual right of possession, and I retained nothing but the mere right of property; and even this right of property failed, or at least was without a remedy, unless I pursued it within the space of sixty years. So also if the father were tenant in tail, and aliened the estate-tail to a stranger in fee, the alienee thereby gained the right of possession, and the son had only the mere right, or right of property. And hence it followed that one man might have the possession, another the right of possession, and a third the right of property. For if tenant in tail enfeoffed A. in fee-simple, and died; and B. disseised A.; then B. would have the possession, A. the right of possession, and the issue in tail the right of property. A. might have recovered the possession against B., and afterwards the issue in tail might evict A., and united in himself the possession, the right of possession, and also the right of property; in which union consisted a complete title to lands, tenements, and hereditaments; for it was an ancient maxim of the law, that no title was completely good, unless the right of possession was joined with the right of property; which right was then denominated a double right, jus duplicatum, or droit double. Mir. l. 2. c. 27; 1 Inst. 266; Bract. l. 5. tr. 3. c. 5. And when, to this double right, the actual possession was also united; when there was, according to the expression of Fleta, (l. 3. c. 15. § 5.) juris et seisinæ conjunctio, then, and then only, was the title completely legal. See 2 Comm. c. 12.

Now by the recent changes that have been effected in the laws relating to real property, under the provisions of the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27, by the abolition of all real and mixed actions, with the exception of quare impedit and actions for dower, the stages or degrees requisite to complete the title to lands and tenements are reduced to two, viz. possession and a right of possession; for where the latter does not exist, or where in other words there is not a right of entry upon which an ejectment may be maintained, there are not only no means by which land may be recovered, but the above statute extinguishes with the remedy all right and title to the lands. See further Limitation of Actions, II. 1.

Title is generally applied to signify the right to land and real effects; as property is to signify that to mere personal estate. See title Property; and further, tit. Dissaisin; Estate; Limitation of Actions; Release, &c.

Title to lands, tenements, and hereditaments, is said to accrue either by descent or purchase. Purchase, in this sense, includes every mode of acquiring lands, except by descent. See Descent and Purchase.

Title by purchase may be either by escheat; occupancy; prescription; forfeiture, or alienation; which latter may be either by deed, matter of record, special custom, or devise.

Property in, or title to, things personal, may arise either by occupancy; prerogative, and forfeiture; by custom; by succession; marriage; judgment; gift; grant; contract; bankruptcy; will, or administration. See the several titles, as also Executor, and other apposite titles, and 2 Comm. post tot.

The law will not permit titles and things, in entry, &c. to be granted over; and the buying or selling any pretended rights, or titles, to lands, is prohibited by statute as a maintenance. See that title.

TITLE OF ACTS OF PARLIAMENT. See Parliament VII. Statutes.

TITLES, pretended, buying or selling. See Champany; Maintenance.

TITLE TO THE CROWN. See King, I.

TITLES OF CLERGYMEN, signify some certain place where they may exercise their functions. A title, in this sense, is the church to which a priest was ordained, there constantly to reside: and there are many reasons why a church is called titulus; one is because in former days the name of the saint to whom the church is dedicated was engraved on the porch, as a sign that the saint had a title to that church; from whence the church itself was afterwards denominated titulus. Concil. London, Anno 1025. Anciently, a title of clergy was no more than entering their names in the bishop's roll; and then they had not only authority to assist in the ministerial function, but had a right to the share of the common stock or treasury of the church: but since, a title is an assurance of being preferred to some ecclesiastical benefice, &c. See Curate, Parson.

TITLE-DEEDS. By 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 23, any person who shall steal any paper or parchment written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, being evidence of the title or of any part of the title to any real estate, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour punishable by transportation for seven years, or by fine or imprisonment. In any indictment for such offence, it shall be sufficient to allege the thing stolen to be evidence of the title legal or equitable to the estate mentioned; and it shall not be necessary to allege the thing stolen to be of any value. By § 34. the conviction for the offence shall not affect any other remedy of the party injured, but shall not be given in evidence in any action, neither shall the party be convicted if he shall have disclosed the facts in consequence of my trial, &c.

The like enactments were made for Ireland by 9 Geo. 4. c. 55, § 23, 24.

TITLE OF ENTRY. Is when one seised of land in fee makes a feoffment thereof on condition, and the condition is broken; after which the feoffer hath title to enter into the land, and may do so at his pleasure; and by his entry the freehold shall be said to be in him presently. And it is called title of entry, because he could not have a writ of right against his feoffee upon condition, for his right was out of him by the feoffment, which cannot be reduced into entry; and the entry must be for the breach of the condition. Cowell. See Entry.

TITULARS OF ERECTION. Persons who, after popery was destroyed in Scotland, got a right to the parsonage tithes which had fallen to monasteries, because of several parishes that had belonged to them in mortmain. Scotch Law Dict. They are the same as impropiators in England.

TOALIA, a towel. There is a tenure of lands by the service of waiting with a towel at the king's coronation. Inq. Ann. 12, 13. Johan. R. See Serjeanty.

TOBACCO. By the 12 Car. 2. c. 34. (extended to Scotland by the 22 Geo. 3. c. 73.) tobacco is not to be planted in England or Ireland, on pain of forfeiting 40s. for every rod of ground thus planted; but this shall not extend to hinder the planting of tobacco in physic gardens.

By the 19 Geo. 3. c. 35. so much of former acts as prohibited the growth of tobacco in Ireland was repealed; but tobacco raised there was to be exported thence to England only.

But by the 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 16. the last-mentioned act was repealed, and the provisions of the 12 Ch. 2. c. 34. and of every other act passed since for prohibiting the growth of tobacco in Great Britain or Ireland, were revived; the culture of tobacco throughout the United Kingdom is forbid, except the places in and quantities and for the purposes mentioned in the prohibitory acts.

§ 4. Imposes a penalty of 100*l.* on any person having tobacco exceeding one pound in weight, of the growth of the United Kingdom, in his possession, &c.

Heavy duties are payable on the importation and manufacture of tobacco in Great Britain and Ireland, under the management of the commissioners of Excise; and the manufacture is subject to the control of the commissioners and officers of excise; every manufacturer taking out a licence, the licence being charged according to the quantity manufactured. Dealers also must take out licences. Repealed by 6 Geo. 4. c. 187.

The present duties on the importation of tobacco are regulated by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 56.

TOD OF WOOL. Twenty eight pounds, or two stone; mentioned in 12 Car. 2. c. 32.

TOFT, toftum. A messuage; or rather a place or piece of ground where a house formerly stood, but is decayed or casually burnt, and not re-edified. It is a word not in use in times, wherein we often read toftum and croftum, &c. West. Synch. par. 2.

TOFTMAN, toftmanus. The owner or possessor of a toft. Reg. Priorat. Lem. p. 18.

TOLLE, Fr. i. e. Tola. A net to encompass or take deer, which is forbid to be used unlawfully in parks, on pain of 20*l.* for every deer taken therewith. 3 & 4 P. & M. c. 10. But see Deer.

TOKENS, FALSE. See Cheats.

TOLERATION ACT. The st. 1 Wm. & M. st. 1. c. 18; as to which see Dissenters.

By 19 Geo. 3. c. 44, § 4. reciting that it had been doubted

[see 1 Ld. Raym. 20; 1 Salk. 147.] whether this act was a public or private act, it is positively declared to be a public act.

TOLL, or To TOLL, from Lat. tollere. To bar, defeat, or take away; as to toll the entry, i. e. to deny or take away the right of entry. 8 Hen. 6. c. 9. See Entry.

TOLL, tolnetum vel thecolonium; tolne. A Saxon word, signifying properly a payment in towns, markets, and fairs, for goods and cattle bought and sold. It is a reasonable sum of money due to the owner of the fair or market upon sale of things tollable within the same. 2 Inst. 220.

The word it used for a liberty as well to take, as to be free from toll; of which freedom from toll the city of Coventry boasts an ancient charter granted by Leofrick, Earl of the Mercians, in the time of King Edward the Confessor, who at the importunity of Godiva, his virtuous lady, granted this freedom to that city.

I. Of Fair and Market Tolls.

II. Of Exemptions from Fair and Market Tolls.

I. By the ancient law of this land, the buyers of corn or cattle in fairs or markets ought to pay toll to the lord of the market, in testimony of the contract there lawfully made; for toll was first invented that contracts in markets should be openly made before witnesses; and privy contracts were held unlawful.

Toll doth not of common right belong to a fair; though it hath been held, that some toll is due of common right, as appears from the immunities of several persons not to pay toll; which proves that, if it was not for those privileges, they ought to pay toll of common right; therefore where the king grants a market, toll is due, although it is not expressed in the grant what toll is to be paid; and is from the necessity of it, because the property of things sold in a market is not altered without paying toll. Palm. 76; 2 Lutw. 1377. But it is said, that toll is not incident of common right to a fair. If the king grants to a man a fair or market, and grants no toll, the patentee shall have no toll; for toll being a matter of private right for the benefit of the lord, is not incident to a fair or market, as a court of piepowder is, which is for the benefit of the public and advancement of justice, &c. Such a fair or market is free from toll; and, after the grant made, the king cannot grant a toll to such free fair or market, without some proportionable benefit to the subject. And if the toll granted with the fair or market be outrageous, the grant of the toll is void; and the same is a free market, &c. 2 Inst. 220; Cro. Eliz. 559. And see 1 Wils. 109; and tit. Fairs, Markets.

When the king grants a fair, he may likewise grant that toll shall be paid, though it be a charge upon the subjects, but then it must be of a very small sum. Toll is to be reasonable, for the king cannot grant a burdensome toll; and one may have toll by prescription for some reasonable cause; but such a prescription to charge the subject with a duty of toll must import a benefit or recompense for it, or some reason must be shown why it is claimed. Cro. Eliz. 559; 3 Lev. 421; 2 Mod. 143; 4 Mod. 323.

At this day there is not any one certain toll to be taken in markets; but if that which is taken be unreasonable, it is punishable by the 3 Edw. 1. c. 31. And what shall be deemed reasonable is to be determined by the judges of the law, when it comes judicially before them. Toll may be said to be unreasonable and outrageous, when a reasonable toll is due and excessive toll is taken; or when no toll is due, and toll is unjustly usurped, &c. 2 Inst. 222. If excessive toll be taken in a market town by the lord's consent, the franchise shall be seized; and if by other officers, they shall pay double damages, and suffer imprisonment, &c. Stat. Westm. 1. 3 Edw. 1. c. 31.

A toll of 1*d.* for every pig brought into a market, is not unreasonable. 4 B. & Ad. 116.

The remedy for taking toll where none is due, or for taking excessive toll, is by action of trespass, or an action on the case; and, in some cases, by indictment. See Extortion.

It seems that by common right toll was demandable only upon live cattle sold in a fair or market, and not upon the sale of victuals and other wares; More, 474; Com. Dig. tit. Market (F. 1); but by custom toll may be payable for every thing brought to market, and for the standing of the seller there; for the sale of victuals is for the good of the commonwealth. 1 Leon. 218.

The toll in fairs is generally taken upon the sale of cattle, as horses, &c.; but, in the markets, for grain only; and the lord may seize until satisfaction is made him. It is always to be paid by the buyer, unless there be a custom to the contrary; and nothing is tollable before the sale, except it be by custom time out of mind, which custom none can challenge that claim the fair or market by grant since the reign of King Richard II.; so that it is better to have a market or fair by prescription than grant. 2 Inst. 220, 221.

Owners of markets and fairs are to appoint toll-takers where toll is to be taken, under penalties. 2 & 3 Ph. & M. c. 7.

By the 57 Geo. 3, c. 108. for the regulation of levying tolls at fairs, markets, and ports in Ireland, it is enacted, that boards specifying the usual tolls, customs, or duties, required, shall be put up at every fair, market, and port. A penalty of 40s. is imposed on the levying any tolls not so specified, and 5l. on persons defacing the boards. Every person and corporation claiming any toll, custom, or duty, at any fair, market, or port, are required to deliver to the clerk of the peace a table or schedule of the tolls so required before levying them.

Where it appeared in evidence that a corporation were entitled under a general grant, explained by usage, to toll for all commercial goods passing in and out of the city on horses, or in carts or waggons, at a certain rate per horse, the court of K. B. held that any alteration of the carriage by which the goods were so conveyed, as by taking them in stage-coaches, instead of carts or waggons, did not vary the right of toll in proportion to the horses employed, although the number of horses was regulated rather by the passengers than the goods. 5 East, 2.

Whether a right to take toll on goods sold by sample in a market can be fully supported, appears not to be absolutely decided. See 4 T. R. 197; 1 Bos. & Pull. 100. In the case of Tenchesbury Corp. v. Diston, 6 East, 438, an action on the case by the owners of a market who had a prescriptive right of toll on all corn brought into the market to be sold, and there sold, alleging that the defendant, intending to deprive them of their toll, fraudulently bought corn in the market by sample, knowing that it was not in bulk there at the time of the sale, whereby they were prevented from taking their toll, was held by the Court of K. B. not to be sustained by evidence of the mere fact of such purchase by sample in the market, though with the knowledge of the plaintiff's claim of toll, coupled with the fact of not paying the toll on demand afterwards when the corn was delivered in the borough out of the market: and the court held that the fact of such purchase by sample in the market, though coupled with the subsequent delivery, did not sustain a count as for corn brought into the market, and there sold. But in a subsequent case, by the same corporation v. Bricknell, 2 Taunt. 120, it was held by the Court of C. P. that as the seller of corn by sample in a market is benefited by the market, as well as the seller of corn pitched there in bulk and sold, if he refuse to pay the same toll as was paid by the seller of corn in bulk, an action on the case could be maintained against him for the injury done to the market in selling by sample. And in the case of Hill v. Smith, 10 East, 476, confirmed in error 4 Taunt. 520, where the corporation of Worcester had for above forty years received toll upon corn sold in their market by sample, and afterwards brought within the city to be delivered to the buyer; and for about sixty years back, as far as living memory went, when corn pitched in the market-place, or on market-day, was not then sold, it was usually put in store in the city, and only one bag brought into the next market for a sample, and when sold in that manner toll used to be taken on the whole; the Court of K. B. held this to be sufficient evidence to be left to the jury of a prescriptive right to take toll on corn sold in the market by sample, and afterwards brought into the city to be delivered to the buyer. And see also 4 B. & Ald. 559, and 4 Bing. 8.

The result of the above decisions is thus stated in a recent publication—Gunning on Tolls.

The owner of the market, therefore, has it seems no right to toll unless the goods in respect of the sale of which he claims it are actually brought into the market, and there sold. In markets in which the proper mode of selling corn, &c. is to have the bulk itself brought into the market for sale, and where the toll arises upon the sale of the article there, the seller cannot deprive the owner of his toll by selling by sample (the bulk itself not being brought into the market). If he does, the owner of the market may maintain a special action on the case against him not for the toll, but for the injury done to his market by such mode of sale. In such a case, however, no action lies against either the buyer or the seller for the toll to which the owner of the market would have been entitled had the bulk been brought into it, and there sold; nor can he seize any portion of the bulk for the toll, upon its being afterwards brought into the town to be delivered in pursuance of the contract of sale. And no action lies in such a case against the buyer, unless there is some trick or contrivance between him and the seller to deprive the owner of the market of his toll, by adopting the sale by sample instead of the ordinary mode of sale which prevails in the market.

Tolls may be recovered in assumpsit, although no proof be given of any thing like a contract by the party against whom the claim is made. Per Lord Tenterden, 3 B. & Ad. 412.

II. The king shall pay no toll for any of his goods; and a man may be discharged from the payment of toll by the king's grant.

Also tenants in ancient demesne are discharged of toll throughout the kingdom for things which arise out of their lands, or brought for manurance thereof, &c., not for merchandizes. Horn's Mirr. lib. 1; 2 Inst. 221; 2 Roll. Abr. 108.

Persons may be exempt from toll by prescription, or by the king's grant, and a city, borough, &c. may prescribe to be exempt. F. N. B. 226. 1.; Com. Dig. tit. Toll, (G. 1.)

It seems that the king cannot grant either to individuals or corporations, an exemption from toll in fairs or markets already in existence, and in which any person has a right to receive toll. See 2 Inst. 221; F. N. B. 227. A.; 2 Shorr. 34; 4 Leon. 168, 214.

The great question, as to the exemption of the citizens of London from toll under the charters granted to the city by Henry the First and Henry the Third, was, after a long contest determined, viz. that freemen of the city of London have a right to be exempt from the payment of all tolls and port-dues throughout England, (except the prizes of wines,) in whatever place they reside; and though they have obtained their freedom by purchase, 1 H. Black. 206. This judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was reversed by the Court of K. B. (see 4 T. R. 130), but affirmed in parliament, May 2, 1796. London (Corporation) v. King's Lynn (Corp.) 6 T. R. 778; 1 Bos. & Pull. 487; 7 Bro. P. C. 121.

They must, however, be resident inhabitants paying scot and lot. 1 B. & P. 522, n. (a.); 7 Bro. P. C. 121.

Where the party is exempt from toll, he might until recently have had his remedy on the ancient writ De essendo quietum de Theolonia, now abolished by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27. See 1st Edition of Actions, II. 1.

And he may still have an action on the case for damages. 2 Leon. 190.

See further, Prescription.

PORT-TOLL. A prescription to have port-toll for all toll coming into a man's port may be good. 2 Lev. 96; 2 Lut. 1519. The liberty of bringing goods into a port for safety, implying a consideration in itself. 3 Lev. 37. Prescription of toll for goods landed in a manor, or to have port-toll for all goods coming into port, is a good prescription; but not to have toll of goods brought into a river, &c. 2 Lev. 96, 97. Toll may be appurtenant to a manor. 2 Mod. 144.

And see further as to port-tolls, and also as to canal and ferry tolls, Gunning on Tolls, 101.

RETURN-TOLL. See Turn-Toll.

TOLL-TRAVERS, or TRAVERSE. Is where one claimeth to have toll for every beast driven across his ground, for which a man may prescribe, and distrain for it in viâ regis. Cro. Eliz. 710.

Toll-Travel is properly when a man pays certain toll for passing over the soil of another man in a way not a high street. 22 Ass. 58. And for this toll a man may prescribe. 2 Roll. Abr. 522; Cro. Eliz. 710; Moor, 574.

It is also due in some cases for passage over the private ferry bridge, &c. of another. 1 Sid. 454.

Under certain circumstances this toll is payable for passing over the common highway; thus if a person claiming a toll for passing over a highway can show that the liberty of passing over the soil and the taking of toll for such passage are both immemorial, and that the soil and the tolls were, before the time of legal memory, in the same hands, though severed since, it will be presumed that the toll was originally granted to the public in consideration of the tolls; and such original grant is a good consideration to support the demand. 1 T. R. 660.

Unlike toll-thorough, a corporation or an individual may prescribe a toll traverse without alleging any consideration. Per Curiam, 2 Hils. 23; and the prescription will be good, for the owners of the soil in the person prescribing, is a sufficient consideration for such a toll; and the law supposes a reservation of the toll to have been made by the proprietor of the land at the time he first began to put the soil to private use over it. Per Curiam, See Acton, 17, pl. 2; 1 B. & C. 223; 13 B. & C. 288.

The reservation of a toll must be intended to be a toll for the use of the way to the public, 1 T. R. 660, post, and previous to the recent prescription. 2 S. Hils. 23, 71. It could not have been demanded unless it had been used to be taken time out of mind. Per Curiam, Toll, pl. 2. See the provisions of this statute, tit. Prescription, III.

TOLL-THOROUGH. Is when a town prescribes to have toll for such a number of beasts, or for every beast that goeth through their town, or over a bridge or ferry maintained at their cost; which is reasonable, though it be for passing through the king's highway, where every man may lawfully go, as it is for the ease of travellers that go that way. Terms de la Ley, 561, 562.

Toll-thorough is also defined by one author to be a sum demanded for a passage through a highway, Com. Dig. tit. Toll (C); and by another, a toll taken from men for passing through a vill in a high street. Fin. Abr. tit. Toll (A). And when highway and street are mentioned, it is to be understood that the definition and cases apply equally to a toll taken for passing along the sea or a public navigable river, or a public ferry, or bridge. See 1 Vent. 71; 1 Sid. 454; Wilkes, 111.

Persons may have this toll by prescription or grant; but it must be for a reasonable cause, which must be shown, viz. that they are to repair or maintain a causeway, or a bridge, or such like. Cro. Eliz. 711. The king granted to a man to take such toll of persons that passed over certain bridges with their cattle, as was taken there and elsewhere in England, &c.; and it was held void for uncertainty. Bridge, 88.

The words toll-thorough and toll-traverse are used promiscuously. A man cannot prescribe to have thorough-toll of men passing through a vill in the high-street, because it is against the common law and common right, for the high street is common to all, without alleging of a special consideration, as the repairing the way. And the king cannot have such toll for passing in the high street, as in the case aforesaid for the cause aforesaid. 2 Roll. Abr. 522; 22 Ass. 58.

So a man cannot prescribe to have thorough-toll of men for passing through a vill in a place which is not the high street; for it is more than the law allows to go there. 2 Roll. Abr. 523; 22 Ass. 58.

A claim of toll-thorough cannot be supported without showing a beneficial consideration moving to the person of whom it is claimed, and the benefit to the public; or, in other words, the consideration for the toll must be co-extensive with the right claimed. Thus it has been held that the repair of some streets in a town is not a sufficient consideration to support a claim of toll thorough in all parts of the town. 10 B. & C. 508. And see 2 Wils. 296; 4 Taunt. 520.

TURN-TOLL. A toll paid for beasts that are driven to market to be sold, and do return unsold, 6 Rep. 46. There is also in toll and out toll, mentioned in ancient charters.

TOLLAGE. Is the same with tallage; signifying generally any manner of custom or imposition.

TOLL-BOOTH. The place where goods are weighed, &c.

TOLL-CORN. Corn taken for toll ground at a mill; and an indictment lies against a miller for taking too great toll. 5 Mod. 13; Ld. Raym. 159. See Extortion.

TOLL-HOP. A small dish or measure by which toll is taken in a market, &c.

TOLSESTER, tolcestrum. An old excise or duty paid by the tenants of some manors to the lord for liberty to brew and sell ale. Cartular. Reading, 221; Chart. 51 Hen. 3.

TOLSEY, from the Sax. tol, i. e. tributum, and see, sedes. The place where merchants meet in a city or town of trade.

TOLT, Lat. tollit, quia tollit causam. A writ whereby a cause depending in a court-baron is taken and removed into the county court. Old Nat. Br. 4. And as this writ moves the cause to the county court, so the writ pone removeth a cause from thence into the Court of Common Pleas, &c.

TOLTA. Wrong, rapine, extortion, any thing exacted or imposed contrary to right and justice. Pat. 48 Hen. 3. in Brady Hist. Eng. Append. p. 235.

TOMIN. A weight of twelve grains used by goldsmiths and jewellers.

TONGUE, CUTTING OUT OR DISABLING. See Mahem.

TONNAGE. In commercial navigation the number of tons burden that a ship will carry.

The mode in which the tonnage of British ships has heretofore been and is still ascertained, is specified in the Registry Act, 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 55. § 16, 17.

A duty on wine imported, according to a certain rate per tun. This, with poundage, which was a duty on every pound value of merchandize imported and exported, was formerly granted, together with subsidies on wool, &c. exported, to the monarch for life, by acts of parliament usually passed at the commencement of each reign. See Customs on Merchandize.

TOOLS. See Machinery.

TOP ANNUAL. An annual rent out of a house built in a burgh. Scotch Diet.

TORCARE, boves strigare et torcare. To comb and cleanse his oxen. Fluta, lib. 2. c. 75.

TORRA, Sax. tor. A mount or hill; as Glastonbury

Torre. Chart. Abbat. Glaston. MS. p. 114. So a variety of high hills in Derbysbire are called tor; but generally some epithet is prefixed, as Mam-tor, &c.

TORT, from the Lat. tortus.] A French word for injury or wrong; as de son tort demesne, of his own wrong. Cro. Rep. fol. 20, White's case. Wrong or injury is properly called tort, because it is wrested or crooked, and contrary to that which is right and straight. Co. Litt. fol. 158.

TORTFEASOR, Fr. tortfaisieur.] A wrong-doer, a trespasser.

TORTURE. The statute law of England doth very seldom, and the common law doth never, inflict any punishment extending to life or limb, unless upon the highest necessity; and the constitution is an utter stranger to any arbitrary power of killing or maiming the subject without the express warrant of law. "Nullus liber homo," says the Great Charter, (c. 29.) "aliquo modo destruat, nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum aut per legem terre." Which words, "Aliquo modo destruat," according to Sir Edward Coke (2 Inst. 48.) include a prohibition not only of killing and maiming, but also of torturing (to which our laws are strangers), and of every oppression by colour of an illegal authority.

The peine forte et dure, formerly inflicted on prisoners standing mute, and which was the only species of punishment, in the nature of torture, allowed by the common law, was repealed by 12 Geo. 3. c. 20. See Mute.

The rack or question to extort a confession from criminals, is a practice of a different nature, the peine forte et dure having been only used to compel a man to put himself upon his trial, that being a species of trial in itself. And the trial by rack is utterly unknown to the law of England. See Rushw. Coll. i. 638; 4 Comm. c. 25.

The torture was formerly applied in Scotland to discover crimes, but in the claim of right this was declared to be contrary to law; and by 7 Ann. c. 21. § 5. it was expressly prohibited.

TOTIES QUOTIES. As often as a thing shall happen, &c. 19 Car. 2. c. 4, &c.

TOTTED. A good debt to the king was by the foreign apposer or officer in the Exchequer formerly noted for such by writing the word tot to it; and that which was paid should be totted. Tot pecunie regi debetur,—so much money is due to the king. 42 Edw. 3. c. 9; 1 Edw. 6. c. 15.

TOURN. See Turn.

TOURNAMENTS. See Justs.

TOUT TEMPS PRIST ET UNCORE EST, i. e. always was and is at present ready. See Tender.

TOWAGE, tonagium, Fr. tavage.] The towing or drawing a ship or barge along the water by another ship or boat fastened to her; or by men or horses, &c. on land; it is also money which is given by bargemen to the owner of ground next a river where they tow a barge or other vessel. Plac. Parl. 18 Edw. 1.

TOWN, oppidum, villa.] A walled place or borough; the old boroughs were first of all towns; and upland towns, which are not ruled and governed as boroughs, are but towns, though inclosed with walls. Finch. 80. There ought to be in every town a constable, or tithing-man; and it cannot be a town unless it hath or had a church, with celebration of sacraments and burials, &c. But if a town is decayed so that it hath no houses left, yet it is a town in law. 1 Inst. 115. Under the name of a town or village, boroughs, and it is said cities, are contained; for every borough or city is a town. See City. Where a murderer escapes untaken in a town in the day-time, the town shall be amerced. 3 Hen. 7. c. 1. A township is answerable for felons' goods to the king, which may be seized by them. But by the 31 Edw. 3. c. 3. if it can allege any thing in discharge of itself, and by which another doth become chargeable, it shall be heard, and right administered.

TOWN-CLERK. How he is to deliver a schedule of fines,

&c. to the sheriff; and a duplicate into the Court of Exchequer. Discharging or concealing an indictment, &c. liable to a forfeiture of treble the penalty incurred by the original offence. 22 & 23 Car. 2. c. 22. May be amerced by the barons of the Exchequer; and which amercements are leviable according to the usual practice. 3 Geo. 1. c. 15. § 12.

TRABARLE. Little boats, so called from their being made out of single beams, or pieces of timber cut hollow. Florence of Worcester, page 618.

TRABES in churches, were what we now call branches, made usually with brass, but formerly with iron. Cowell.

TRACTUS. A trace by which horses in their gears draw a cart, plough, or waggon. Paroch. Antiq. 549.

TRADE. In general signification is traffic or merchandise: also a private art, and way of living.

Trading with enemies is generally prohibited by positive statutes in time of war. See Treason.

Trading with an enemy without the king's licence is illegal. 8 T. R. 548. But such trade is legalized by a royal licence. 5 M. & S. 25; 13 East, 332; the conditions of which, however, must be strictly observed. See 1 East, 475. But a subject of Great Britain, domiciled in a country at amity with ours, may exercise the privilege of a subject of that country by trading with one in hostility to ours. 1 M. & S. 726.

It was formerly held that none of the king's subjects might trade to and with a nation of infidels without the king's leave, because of the danger of relinquishing Christianity. And Sir Edward Coke said, that he had seen a licence from one of our kings, reciting, that he, having a special trust and confidence that such a one, his subject, would not decline his faith and religion, licensed him to trade with infidels, &c. 3 Nels. Abr. 331.

As to private trades, at common law, none was prohibited to exercise any particular trade, wherein he had not any skill or knowledge; and if he used it unskilfully, the party grieved might have his remedy against him by action on the case, &c. But by the 5 Eliz. c. 4. § 31. it was enacted that a man should serve seven years' apprenticeship before he set up a trade; that statute, however, was repealed by the 54 Geo. 3. c. 96. which also abolished all restrictions upon taking apprentices. See Apprentice.

If a bond or promise restrains the exercise of a trade, though it be to a particular place only, if there was no consideration for it, it is void; if there be a consideration, in such a case it may be good. 2 Lill. Abr. 179; Ld. Raym. 1436; 2 Strange, 739. See Bond.

Frequent acts are passed to enable soldiers and sailors, having served his majesty for certain terms, to exercise any trades in Great Britain, though not generally bred to them, or free of corporations or companies. See 42 Geo. 3. c. 69; 52 Geo. 3. c. 67; and Navy, Soldiers.

TRADERS, Debts from. See Executors, Real Estate.

TRADITION. See Delivery.

TRAGA. A waggon without wheels. Mon. Ang. i. 851.

TRAILBASTON. See Justices of Trailbaston.

TRAINED BANDS of London. See Soldiers.

TRAITOR, traditor, proditor.] A state offender, betrayer, &c. See Treason.

TRAITEROUS, perfidiosus.] Treacherous, or full of disloyalty. Lat. Law Dict.

TRAITEROUS POSITION, of taking arms by the king's authority against his person, and those that are commissioned by him, is condemned by the 14 Car. 2. c. 3.

TRANSCRIPT. Is the copy of any original writing, or deed, &c. where it is written over again, or exemplified. 34 & 35 Hen. 8. c. 14. (repealed.) See Tenor.

TRANSCRIPTO PEDIS FINIS LEVATI MITTENDO IN CANCELLARIUM, was a writ for certifying the foot of a fine levied before justices in eyre, &c. into the Chancery. Reg. Orig. 669.

TRANSCRIPTO RECOGNITIONIS FACTÆ CORAM JUSTICIARIIS ITINERANTIBUS, &c. An old writ to certify a recognizance taken by justices in eyre. Reg. Orig. 152.

TRANSGRESSIONE. A writ or action of trespass, according to Fitzherbert. See Trespass.

TRANSIRE, from transire.] A warrant from the custom-house to let goods pass. 14 Car. 2. c. 11. (repealed).

TRANSITORY. Is the opposite to local. Transitory actions are those that may be laid in any county or place; such as personal action of trespass, &c. See Action, Venue.

TRANSLATION, translatio.] In the common sense of the word, signifies a version out of one language into another; but, in a more confined acceptance, it denotes the removing from one place to another; so the removal of a bishop to another diocese, &c. is called translating; and such a bishop writes not, anno consecrationis, but anno translationis nostræ, &c.

A bishop translated is not consecrated de novo; for a consecration is like an ordination; it is an indelible character, and holds good for ever. 3 Salk. 72. But the bishop is to be anew elected, &c. 1 Salk. 137. See Bishop.

TRANSPORTATION. The banishing or sending away a criminal into another country.

It appears that exile was first introduced as a punishment by the legislature in the thirty-ninth year of Queen Elizabeth, when a statute (39 Eliz. c. 4.) enacted, that such rogues as were dangerous to the inferior people, should be banished the realm. Barr. Ant. Stat. 445. (5 Edw.) And that the first statute in which the word transportation is used, was the 13 & 14 Car. 2. § 23. by which justices at sessions were authorized to transport such rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars, as should be duly convicted and adjudged to be incorrigible, to any of the English plantations beyond the seas. Then came the 18 Car. 2. c. 3. which gave a power to the judges, at their discretion, either to execute or transport to America for life the moss-troopers of Cumberland and Northumberland. 2 Woodd. 498. The act 18 Car. 2. was made perpetual by 31 Geo. 2. c. 42. See 1 Comm. c. 9. p. 137. n.

Transportation was first brought into general use as a punishment anno 1718, by the 4 Geo. 1. c. 11.; which statute allowed the court a discretionary power to order felons, who were by law entitled to their clergy, to be transported to the American plantations.

By these statutes the persons contracting for the transportation of convicts to the colonies, or their assigns, had an interest in the service of each, for seven or fourteen years, according to the term of transportation.

The system of transportation to the American colonies continued for fifty-six years; during which period, and until the commencement of the American war in 1773, great numbers of felons were sent, chiefly to the province of Maryland. The rigid discipline which the colonial laws authorized the masters to exercise over the servants, joined to the prospects which agricultural pursuits, after some experience, held out to these convicts, tended to reform the chief part; who, after the expiration of their servitude, mingled in the society of the country, under circumstances highly beneficial to themselves, and even to the colony. Treatise on the Police of the Metropolis.

The convicts having accumulated greatly in the year 1776, and the intercourse with America being then shut up, it became indispensably necessary to resort to some other expedient, and the choice of offenders the system of the hulks was suggested, and first adopted under the authority of a statute, 1 Geo. 3. c. 43.

This act was followed up three years afterwards by another statute: viz. 1 Geo. 3. c. 71. which had two very important objects in view. The first was to erect in some convenient common or waste ground in Middlesex, Essex, Kent, or Surrey, two large Penitentiary Houses. The second purpose of this act regarded the continuation of the system of the hulks.

Subsequently the 34 Geo. 3. c. 84. was passed for erecting a penitentiary house or houses for confining and employing convicts. But it appears by the preamble to the 52 Geo. 3. c. 44. that none such were erected. This latter act (as amended by 53 Geo. 3. c. 162.) provided for the erection of a penitentiary house at Millbank near Westminster, for the purpose of confining offenders convicted in London and Middlesex. That penitentiary house being completed, it was by 56 Geo. 3. c. 63. made applicable to the kingdom at large; and further provisions were made for its regulation by 59 Geo. 3. c. 136.; 4 Geo. 4. c. 82.; 5 Geo. 4. c. 19.; and 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 33. As to the punishment by confinement to hard labour of offenders in Ireland, liable to transportation, see 51 Geo. 3. c. 63.

From the great difficulty of finding any situation after the independence of America, where the services of convicts could be rendered productive or profitable to merchants who would undertake to transport them, arose the idea of making an establishment for these outcasts of society on the eastern coast of New South Wales, more generally known by the name of Botany Bay, from a bay on the coast so named by Captain Cook, and where the first convicts were landed; to which remote region it was at length determined to transport atrocious offenders. Accordingly, in the year 1787, an act passed, 27 Geo. 3. c. 2. authorizing the establishment of a court of judicature for the trial of offenders who should be transported thither.

The governor of the settlement may remit the punishment of offenders there; and on a certificate from him, their names shall be inserted in the next general pardon. 30 Geo. 3. c. 47.

By 25 Geo. 3. c. 46. provision was made for the more effectual transportation of offenders in Scotland; and the removal of prisoners was authorized from gaols in Scotland to the gaols or hulks in Great Britain.

And see the recent statutes, post, which extend to the whole of Great Britain.

The statutes relating to transportation being about to expire, the 5 Geo. 4. c. 84. (amended by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 39.) was passed to consolidate the law upon the subject.

By § 2. offenders adjudged for transportation are to be transported under the act; and whenever his majesty shall extend mercy to any offender convicted of any capital crime, upon condition of transportation beyond the seas, either for life, or years, and signified to the court before which such offender shall have been convicted, or any subsequent court with the like authority, such court shall allow to such offender the benefit of a conditional pardon, and make an order for the immediate transportation of such offender; and in case such intention of mercy shall be signified to any judge, such judge shall allow to such offender the benefit of a conditional pardon, and make an order for the immediate transportation of such offender, in the same manner as if such intention of mercy had been signified to the court during the term or session in or at which such offender was convicted.

§ 3. His majesty may appoint places of transportation; and a secretary of state may authorize persons to make contracts for transportation of offenders, &c.

§ 4. Sheriffs or gaolers, on receiving orders for removal of offenders for transportation, to deliver them over to the contractor, if free from distemper.

§ 5. Persons undertaking to transport offenders are to give proper security.

§ 6. That if any offender be guilty of misbehaviour or disorderly conduct on board of the ship in which he or she shall be transported, the surgeon may cause to be inflicted on such offender such moderate punishment or correction as may be authorized by the instructions received from a secretary of state: provided, that no such punishment or correction shall be inflicted, unless the master of such ship shall first signify his approbation thereof in writing under his hand; and every such punishment, with the particulars of the offence for which the same is inflicted, and such written approbation, shall on the same day, in all cases, be entered by such master, upon the log book of the ship, under a penalty of twenty pounds.

§ 7. A secretary of state may nominate persons to have the custody of offenders transported in king's ships, without security being given for their transportation.

§ 8. The governor of the colony, &c. to have property in service of offender, and may assign him to any other person, who may assign him over.

§ 9. Provided that nothing in the act shall affect his majesty's prerogative of mercy.

§ 10. His majesty may appoint places of confinement of offenders in England.

§ 13. His majesty, by order in council, may direct convicts to be employed in any part of his majesty's dominions out of England, under the management of the superintendent and overseer.

§ 17. Convicts adjudged by courts out of the United Kingdom to transportation, and convicts pardoned on condition of transportation, may, when brought to England, be imprisoned and transported.

§ 18. Convicts may be kept to hard labour, and may be removed to House of Correction.

But § 19. the time of imprisonment shall be deemed part of term.

§ 20. Offenders may be carried through any county to the seaport.

And § 21. expenses of removal are to be paid by the county where conviction took place.

§ 22. Any person rescuing, or assisting to rescue, any offender from the custody of such superintendent or overseer, or of any sheriff or gaoler, or other person, conveying or removing him or her, or conveying any disguise, instrument for effecting escape, or arms to such offender, shall be punishable in the same manner as if such offender had been confined in a gaol or prison in the custody of the sheriff or gaoler, for the crime of which such offender shall have been convicted. See Escape.

§ 26. Every felon under sentence of transportation, who hath received or shall receive any remission of his sentence from the governor of any colony, authorized to grant the same, while residing in a place where he lawfully may reside under such remission, may maintain any action for the recovery of any property, real, personal, or mixed, acquired by such felon since his conviction, and for any damage or injury sustained by such felon since his conviction, not only in the courts of the colony or place where such felon shall lawfully reside, but also in the courts of the kingdom, and of all other his majesty's dominions.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 69. § 3. all powers and authorities, which by a former act of 4 Geo. 4. c. 96. were vested in the colonial courts of general and quarter sessions, for taking cognizance of and punishing all crimes and misdemeanors, not punishable with death, committed by any felons or other offenders, who had been or should be transported to New South Wales or its dependencies, and whose sentences had not expired or been remitted, or for taking cognizance of complaints made against such offenders for drunkenness, disobedience of orders, neglect of work, absconding or desertion, or other turbulent or disorderly conduct, or for punishing such offences, shall be vested in any one or more justices of the peace for the said colony, or any district thereof, to be exercised in a summary way. But no justice is to exercise such power where any court of general or quarter sessions shall be appointed to be held, within one week after the complaint, at any place not more than twenty miles distant from where the offence was committed.

By § 1. his majesty in council may authorize the governors of colonies to appoint the place to which any offender committed in the colonies, and under sentence of transportation, shall be sent, and such offenders shall be subject to the same laws as shall be in force with respect to convicts transported from Great Britain.

By the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 39. it is enacted (§ 1.) that felons ordered to be put on shore in the one colony, but put on shore in the other, and those removed from one colony to the other, shall be subject to the same rules as the other convicts in the same colony.

§ 2. The governor of the one colony may receive felons who are ordered to be delivered in the other colony.

And § 3. the governor of one colony may remove felons to the other colony.

§ 4. Convicts while being removed from one colony to another are still liable to punishment for disorderly conduct.

§ 5. Convicts removed from one colony to another to be subject to the regulations of the colony to which they are removed.

§ 6. prohibits the supply of spirituous liquors to offenders under sentence of transportation.

By the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 67. so much of the 5 Geo. 4. c. 84. as inflicted death upon persons returning from transportation, is repealed, and every person convicted of such an offence, or of aiding in or procuring the commission thereof, shall be liable to be transported for life, and previously shall be imprisoned with or without hard labour, in any gaol, house of correction, or penitentiary, for not exceeding four years.

TRANSPORTATION, of goods and merchandize, is allowed or prohibited, in many cases by statute, for the advantage of trade. See Navigation Acts.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION, transubstantiatio.] Is a converting into another substance: To transubstantiate, i. e. quidpiam in aliam substantiam convertere. Lit. Dict. A declaration against the doctrine of transubstantiation maintained by the Church of Rome was formerly required by the 20 Car. 2. st. 2. c. 1. See Roman Catholics.

TRANSUMPTS. On a summons wherein the complainant demands that his rights to certain lands should be exhibited, and copies judicially to be taken of them, these authentic copies are called transumps. Scotch Dict.

TRAVERSE, from Fr. traverser.] Is used in law for the denying of some matter of fact alleged to be done, in a declaration or pleadings; upon which the other side comes and affirms that it was done; and this makes a single and good issue for the cause to proceed to trial. See Pleading, l. 2.

And pleas in bar are divided into pleas by way of traverse and pleas by way of confession and avoidance.

Of traverses there are various kinds. The most ordinary kind is that which may be called a common traverse. It consists of a tender of issue, that is, of a denial accompanied by a formal offer of the point denied, for decision; and the denial that it makes, is by way of express contradiction, in terms, of the allegation traversed.

Besides this, the common kind, there is a class of traverses which requires particular notice. In most of the usual actions there is a fixed and appropriate form of plea for traversing the declaration, in cases where the defendant means to deny its whole allegations or the principal fact on which it is founded. This form of plea or traverse has been usually denominated the general issue in that action; and it appears to have been so called because the issue that it tenders, involving the whole declaration, or the principal part of it, is of a more general and comprehensive kind than that usually tendered by a common traverse. But as by the provisions of the recent rules of court (Hil. 4 Wm. 4.) a more limited effect will hereafter be allowed to such issues than formerly, the term of general issue will become rather less appropriate. See further Issue.

There is another species of traverse which varies from the common form, and which, though confined to particular actions and to a particular stage of the proceedings, is of frequent occurrence. It is the traverse de injuriâ sud propriâ alij - tali causâ, or, as it is more compendiously called, the traverse de injuriâ. It always tenders issue, but on the other hand differs (like many of the general issues) from the common form of a traverse, by denying, in general and summary terms, and not in the words of the allegation traversed.

There is still another species of traverse, which differs from the common form, and which will require distinct notice. It is known by the denomination of a special traverse. It is also called a formal traverse, or a traverse with an absque hoc.

The affirmative of the special traverse is a denial of the negative part of the declaration, and those being the Latin words formerly used, and from which the modern expression, without this, is translated. The different parts and properties here noticed are all essential to a special traverse, which must always thus consist of an inducement, a denial, and a conclusion to the country.

The formal words of a special traverse are in our French sa vece, in Latin absque hoc, and in English without this, that such a thing was done or not, &c. Kitch. 217; West. Symb. part 2.

The conclusion to the country in a special traverse is a novelty introduced by the rules of court, H. T. 4 Wm. 4; for previously it always concluded with a verification, the effect of which was to postpone the issue to a later time, and to a place later than it would have been arrived at in the common form.

For examples of a special traverse, and an explanation of its use and object, see Stephen on Pleading.

A plea will be ill which neither traverseth nor confesseth the plaintiff's title, &c. And every matter in fact alleged by the plaintiff may be traversed by the defendant, but not matter of law, or where it is part matter of law and part matter of fact; nor may a record be traversed which is not to be tried by a jury. And if a matter be expressly pleaded in the affirmative, which is expressly answered in the negative, no traverse is necessary, there being a sufficient issue joined; also where the defendant hath given a particular answer in his plea to all the material matters contained in the declaration, he need not take a traverse; for when the thing is answered, there needs no further denial. Cro. Eliz. 755; Yelv. 173, 193, 195; 2 Mod. 54.

Any fact which appears to be material is traversable, though it be only on suggestion; as in prohibition a suggestion or refusal by the spiritual court of a plea (which ought to be allowed) in a suit there for tithes, or other matter of their cognizance, is traversable, otherwise their jurisdiction might in any case be taken away by such suggestion. 2 Co. 45 a. So any surmise which takes away the jurisdiction of the court, is traversable. Cro. Eliz. 511. But traverse of a thing not necessary to be alleged, is bad. Cro. Car. 328. So of matter of mere supposal or inducement. Com. Dig. tit. Pleading, (G. 13, 14.)

As one traverse is enough to make a perfect issue, a traverse cannot be regularly taken upon a traverse, if it is well taken to the material point, and goes to the substance of the action; but where the first traverse is not well taken, nor pertinent to the matter, there to that which was sufficiently confessed and avoided before, the other party may well take a traverse after such immaterial traverse taken before; and if special matter alleged in a foreign county in the defendant's plea be false, the plaintiff may maintain his action, and traverse that special matter; and in such case a traverse on a traverse hath been adjudged good; but a traverse after a traverse may be allowed; as in trespass in such a county, defendant pleads a concord for trespass in every other county, and traverses the county, the plaintiff may join issue on the county, or traverse the concord. 1 Inst. 252 b; Mo. 428; 1 Saund. 32; Poph. 101.

These rules are to be observed in traverses: 1, the traverse of a thing not immediately alleged, vitiates a good bar; 2, nothing must be traversed but what is expressly alleged; 3, surplusage in a plea doth not enforce a traverse; 4, it must be always made to the substantial part of the title; 5, where an act may indifferently be intended to be at one day or another, there the day is not traversable; 6, in action of trespass, generally the day is not material; though, if a matter be to be done upon a particular day, there it is material and traversable. 2 Rol. Rep. 37; 1 Rol. Rep. 235; Yelv. 122; 2 Lil. Abr. 313. If the parties have agreed on the day for a thing to be done, the traverse of the day is material; but where they are not agreed on the day, it is otherwise, and though it is proved to be done on another day, it is sufficient. Palm. 280.

Where a traverse goes to the matter of a plea, &c., all that went before is waived by the traverse; and if the traverse goes to the time only, it is not waived. 2 Salk. 642. In action of trespass, a particular place and time were laid in the declaration; and in the plea there was a traverse as to the place, but not as to time. On averment that it was eodem transgressio, the plea was held good. 3 Lev. 227; 2 Lutm. 1452. Where a plea in justification of a thing is not local, a traverse of the place is wrong. 2 Mod. 270.

The substance and body of a plea must be traversed. Hot. 232. But a traverse that a person died seised of land in fee, modo et forma, as the defendant had declared, was adjudged good. Hutt. 123. A lord and tenant differ in the services, there the tenure and not the seisin shall be traversed; but if they agree in the services, the seisin and not the tenure is traversable; and it is a general rule, that the tenant shall never traverse the seisin of the services without admitting the tenure. March. 116. That which is not material nor traversable, is not admitted when it is alleged and not traversed. 2 Salk. 361. But the omitting a traverse where it is necessary, is matter of substance. 2 Mod. 60. And a traverse of a debt is ill when a promise is the ground of the action, which ought to be traversed, and not the debt. Leon. 252.

A traverse should have an inducement to make it relate to the foregoing matter. And it is no good plea for the plaintiff to reply that a man is alive who is alleged to be dead, without traversing that he is not dead. 3 Salk. 357.

Traverse may be in an answer in Chancery, replication, &c. In an action upon a bail-bond, the arrest is not traversable. 1 Stra. 444. Traverse of a seisin in fee is ill, where a less estate would be sufficient. 2 Stra. 818. Where the party confesses and avoids, he ought not to traverse. But it may be passed over and issue taken upon the traverse. 2 Stra. 937.

Default of traverse where the plaintiff has not fully confessed and avoided, is only form, and aided on a general demurrer. And by the 4 & 5 Ann. c. 10. no exception shall be for an immaterial traverse, unless shown for cause of demurrer. But defect of a traverse, where there are two affirmatives, is not aided on a general demurrer; for by default of an issue the right cannot appear to the court. So if a traverse be necessary to make a good bar, the omission will be fatal on a general demurrer. And if the replication does not traverse the matter of the bar, which is not fully confessed and avoided, the defendant shall not be aided on a general demurrer. Com. Dig. tit. Pleading, (G. 22.) See further, Stephen on Pleading, and titles Pleading, Trespass.

TRAVERSE OF AN INDICTMENT OR PRESENTMENT. The taking issue upon, and contradicting or denying some chief point of it; as in a presentment against a person for a highway overflowed with water, for default of scowring a ditch, &c. he may traverse the matter, that there is no highway, or that the ditch is sufficiently scoured; or otherwise traverse the cause, viz. that he hath not the land, or he and they whose estate, &c. have not used to scour the ditch. Lamb. Eiren. 521; Book Entr. See Trial.

In cases of misdemeanor, when a person appears and traverses, that is, pleads not guilty to an indictment found against him, and postpones the trial until the ensuing assizes or sessions, as in certain cases he may do (see Misdemeanor), he is said to traverse the indictment until such subsequent assizes or sessions.

TRAVERSE OF AN OFFICE is the proving that an inquisition made of lands or goods by the escheator, is defective and untruly made. See Inquest of Office. No person shall traverse an office unless he can make to himself a good right and title; and if one be admitted to traverse an office, this admission of the party to the traverse doth suppose the title to be in him, or else he had no cause of traverse. Vaugh. 641; 2 Lil. Abr. 590, 591. The traverse of an inquisition for the king is to be considered as a debt, and the prosecutor may carry down the record. 2 Str. 1208.

TRAWLermen. A kind of fishermen on the river Thames, who used unlawful arts and engines to destroy fish; of these some were termed tinkermen, others hebermen and trawlermen, &c. And hence comes to trowl or trawl for pikes. Stow's Surv. Lond. 19.

TREASON,

FROM Fr. trahir, to betray; trahison, betraying, contracted into treason; Lat. proditio.] The crime of treachery and infidelity to our lawful sovereign.

In Scotland, since the Union with England, the law of treason has been regulated by the English law; the general principle was agreed to in the articles of union, and was carried into effect by the 7 Ann. c. 21. which declares that such crimes and offences which are high treason or misprision of high treason within England, shall be construed, adjudged, and taken to be high treason and misprision of high treason within Scotland; and that from thenceforth no crimes or offences shall be high treason or misprision thereof within Scotland, but such as are so in England; and the trial, pains, penalties, and forfeitures of this crime are declared to be the same in both countries.

In IRELAND, the provisions of the 25 Edw. 3. st. 5. c. 2. are in force; but those of several subsequent English acts do not extend to Ireland; and there are some Irish statutes in force which do not extend to England; and no act has been passed since the Union between Great Britain and Ireland to assimilate the laws of high treason throughout the United Kingdom. See more particularly under the several ensuing divisions; and see particularly Div. IV. ad fin.

I. TREASON, in its very name, imports a betraying, treachery, or breach of faith. It therefore happens only between allies, saith the Mirror; for treason is indeed a general appellation made use of by the law to denote not only offences against the king and government, but also that accumulation of guilt which arises whenever a superior reposes a confidence in a subject or inferior, between whom and himself there subsists a natural, civil, or even a spiritual relation, and the inferior so abuses that confidence, so forgets the obligations of duty, subjection, and allegiance, as to destroy the life of any such superior or lord; this is looked upon as proceeding from the same principle of treachery in private life as would have urged him who harbours it to have conspired in public against his liege lord and sovereign; and therefore for a wife to kill her lord or husband, a servant his lord or master, and an ecclesiastic his lord or ordinary; these, being breaches of the lower allegiance, of private and domestic faith, were formerly denominated petit treasons; but by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 31. § 2. they are now declared to be murder only, and no greater offence. See Homicide. But when disloyalty so rears its crest as to attack even majesty itself, it is called by way of eminent distinction high treason, alta proditio, being equivalent to the crimen læsæ majestatis of the Romans, as Glossville denominates it also in our English law. 4 Comm. c. 6.

The greatness of this offence of treason, and severity of the punishment thereof is upon two reasons; because the safety, peace, and tranquillity of the kingdom are highly concerned in the preservation of the person and government of the king; and therefore the laws have given all possible security thereto, under the severest penalties; and as the subjects have protection from the king and his laws, so they are bound by their allegiance to be true and faithful to him. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 59.

As this is the highest civil crime which (considered as a member of the community) any man can possibly commit, it ought thereof to be the most precisely ascertained. For if the crime of high treason be indeterminate, this alone (says Montesquieu) is sufficient to make any government degenerate into arbitrary power. And yet, by the ancient common law, there was a great latitude left in the breast of the judges, to determine what was treason or not so, whereby the creatures of tyrannical princes had opportunity to create abundance of constructive treasons, that is, to raise by forced and arbitrary constructions, offences into the crime and punishment of treason, which never were suspected to be such. Thus, in the reign of Edward I. appealing to the French courts in opposition to the king's, was in parliament solemnly adjudged high treason. 3 Inst. 7; 1 Hale, 79. And this under the idea of subverting the realm. Another charge, the approaching or attempting to exercise royal power (a very uncertain charge), was in the 21 Edw. 3. held to be treason in a knight of Hertfordshire, who forcibly assaulted and detained one of the king's subjects till he paid him 90*l.*, a crime, it must be owned, well deserving of punishment, but which seems to be of a complexion very different from that of treason. 1 Hale's P. C. 80. Killing the king's father or brother, or even his messenger, has also fallen under the same denomination. Britton, c. 22; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17. § 1. But, however, to prevent the inconveniences which began to arise in England from this multitude of constructive treasons, the 25 Edw. 3 st. 5, c. 2. was made, which defines what offences only for the future should be held to be treason. See post, III.

Nothing can be construed to be treason under this statute which is not literally specified therein; nor may the statute be construed by equity, because it is a declarative law, and one declaration ought not to be the declaration of another; besides, it was made to secure the subject in his life, liberty, and estate, which by admitting constructions to be made of it, might destroy all. 1 Hawk. P. C. 31; 3 Salk. 358.

The statute, after reciting that divers opinions having been what cases should amount to high treason, enacts and declares that if a person doth compass or imagine the death of the king, queen, or their eldest son and heir; or if he do violate and deflower the king's wife or companion, or his eldest daughter unmarried, or the wife of the king's eldest son; or if he levy war against the king in his realm, or adhere to his enemies, give them aid and comfort in the realm or elsewhere, and thereof be probably (or proveably) attainted of open deed; and if a man counterfeit the king's great or privy seal, or his money, or bring false money into the kingdom, like to the money of England, to make payment therewith in deceit of the king and his people; or if he kill the chancellor, treasurer, or any of the king's justices in either bench, justices of assize, &c. being in their places, doing their offices; these cases are to be adjudged treason.

By the 13 Car. 2, c. 1. (a temporary act which expired with the life of that king) it was enacted that if any person should compass, imagine, devise, or intend death or destruction to the king, or bodily harm leading to death or destruction, or imprisonment or restraint of the person of the king, or to deprive or depose him; and such compassings and imaginations should express, utter, or declare, by printing, writing, preaching, or malicious and advised speaking, he should be adjudged a traitor, and suffer death. Under this statute one Stuyly was convicted and executed in 1678. State Trials, 6 Howell, 150, 152; and see Phillipp's State Trials, i. 329—350.

II. EVERY subject of Great Britain, whether ecclesiastical or lay, man or woman, if of the age of discretion, and of sane memory, may be guilty of high treason. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17. § 4. If a married woman commit high treason, in the company of her husband, or by his command, she is punishable as if unmarried; for in a crime of such magnitude, the presumption of coercion by the husband is no excuse. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 1. § 11; 1 Hal. P. C. 47. A soldier cannot justify by the command of his superior officer; for, as the command is traitorous, so is the obedience. Kely, 19. Neither can a man justify, by acting as counsel. Kely, 28.

There are no accessories in treason: all are principals; and any person offending in treason, either by overt act or procurement, whereupon open deed has ensued, is adjudged by the law to be a principal traitor. Dyer, 98 b. Throckmorton's case; State Trials, 1 Howell, 870, &c. See post, Div. V. 1. of this title.

Madmen were heretofore punished as traitors, particularly by the 33 Hen. 8, c. 20; but now they are not punishable, if the crime is committed during a total deprivation of reason. 1 Hal. P. C. 37. And this has been confirmed in modern cases. See the provisions of the 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 94. for the safe custody of insane persons charged with treason. Idiota, VI.

The husband of a queen regnant, as was King Philip, may commit high treason. So may a queen consort against the king her husband. Such were the cases of Queen Anne Boleyn and Catharine Howard; for the queen is considered, in the eye of the law, as a distinct person, for many purposes. 3 Inst. 8. See post.

Aliens may commit treason; for as there is a local protection on the king's part, so there is a local allegiance on theirs. 7 Rep. 6. There is no distinction, whether the alien's sovereign is in amity or enmity with the crown of England. If during his residence here, under the protection of the crown, he does that which would constitute treason in a natural-born subject, he may be dealt with as a traitor. 1 Hal. P. C. 60. So also if he resides here, after a proclamation of war; unless he openly removes himself, by passing to his own prince, or publicly renounces the King of England's protection, which is analogous to a diffidatio, or defiance; and then, under such circumstance, he is considered as an enemy. 1 Hal. P. C. Thus the Marquis De Guiscard, a French Papist residing here, during a war, under the protection of Queen Anne, was charged with holding a traitorous correspondence with France. And two Portuguese were indicted and attainted of high treason, for joining in a conspiracy with Dr. Lopez to poison Queen Elizabeth. 7 Rep. 6; Dy. 141.

If an alien, during a war with his native country, leaving his family and effects here, goes home, and adheres to the king's enemies, for the purposes of hostility, he is a traitor; for he was settled here, and his family and effects are still under the king's protection. 1 Salk. 46; 1 Ld. Raym. 282; Fost. 185, 186. In declarations of war, it has been frequently used to except, and take under the protection of the crown, such resident aliens as demean themselves dutifully, and neither assist or correspond with the enemy. In that case, they are upon the footing of aliens coming here by licence or safe-conduct, and are considered as alien friends. Fost. 185.

If an alien is charged with a breach of his natural allegiance, he may give alienage in evidence, for he is charged with a breach of that species of allegiance, which is not due from an alien. 4 St. Tr. 699, 700.

Alien merchants are protected by the statute staple, in case of a war, which provides, that they shall have convenient warning, by forty days' proclamation, or eighty days in case of accident, to avoid the realm; during which time, they may be dealt with as traitors, for any treasonable act; if after that time they reside and trade here, as before, they may be either treated as alien enemies, by the law of nations, or as traitors, by the law of the land. 1 Hal. P. C. 93, 94. See Mag. Chart. c. 30; 27 Edw. 3. st. 2, c. 2, 13, 17, 19, 20.

Subjects of the king in open war or rebellion, are not the king's enemies, but traitors; and if a subject join with a foreign enemy, and come into England with him, if he be taken prisoner, he shall not be ransomed or proceeded against as an enemy, but as a traitor to the king; on the other hand, an enemy coming in open hostility into England, and taken, shall be either executed by martial law, or ransomed; for he cannot be indicted of treason, because he never was within the allegiance of the king. 3 Inst. 11; 7 Rep. 6, 7; 1 Hal. P. C. 100.

A natural-born subject cannot abjure his allegiance, and transfer it to a foreign prince. Neither can any foreign prince, by naturalizing, or employing a subject of Great Britain, dissolve the bond of allegiance between that subject and the crown. 1 Comm. 369. This was determined in the case of Æneas Macdonald, who was born in Great Britain, but educated from his early infancy in France; and being appointed commissary of the French troops intended for Scotland, was taken prisoner, tried, and found guilty of high treason. Fost. 60; 9 Stat. Tr. 585.

It is a question, whether the general exemption of ambassadors from the cognizance of the municipal tribunal, extends to treason? On the one hand, there is a positive breach of local allegiance; on the other, an infringement of the privilege of personal inviolability, universally allowed by the law of nations. Coke maintains, that if an ambassador commits treason, he loses the privilege and dignity of an ambassador, as unworthy of so high a place, and may be punished here, as any other private alien, and not remanded to his sovereign but of courtesy. 4 Inst. 153. Most writers agree that an ambassador, conspiring the death of the king, or raising a rebellion, may be punished with death. But it is doubted, whether he is obnoxious to punishment for bare conspiracies of this nature. 1 Roll. Rep. 185; 1 Hale, 96, 97, 99.

The bishop of Rosse, ambassador from Mary Queen of Scots, to Elizabeth, was committed to the tower as a confederate with the Duke of Norfolk, for corresponding with the Spanish ministry, to invade the kingdom; he pleaded his privilege, and afterwards, having made a full confession, no criminal process was commenced. 1 Hal. P. C. 97; 1 St. Tri. 105. But he was afterwards banished the country. The Spanish ambassador for encouraging treason, and the French ambassador for conspiring the same queen's death, were only reprimanded. Doctor Storey was condemned and executed; but he was an Englishman by birth, and therefore could never shake off his natural allegiance. Dyer, 298, 300; 3 St. Tri. 775.

From this view we may collect, that the right of proceeding against ambassadors for treason, in the ordinary course of justice, has been waved, from motives of policy and prudence: and that they have seldom been proceeded against further than by imprisonment, seizing their papers, and sending them home in custody. As was done in the case of Count Gyllenberg, the Swedish minister in George the Second's time. Fost. 187. See 1 Comm. 254; Ward's Law of Nations, where this subject is fully treated.

III. 1. THE first treason described by the 25 Edw. 3. st. 5. c. 3. is, "When a man doth compass or imagine the death of our lord the king, of our lady his queen, or of their eldest son and heir."—Under this description it is held that a queen regnant, (such as Queen Elizabeth or Queen Anne) is within the words of the act, being invested with royal power, and entitled to the allegiance of her subjects. 1 Hal. P. C. 101: but the husband of such a queen is not comprised within these words, and therefore no treason can be committed against him. 3 Inst. 7; 1 Hal. P. C. 106.

Though the compassing the death of the queen consort be treason, this must be intended during the marriage; for it doth not extend to a queen dowager. And the eldest son and heir of the king, that is living, is intended by the said act, though he was not the first son; but if the heir apparent to the crown be a collateral heir, he is not within the statute; nor is a conspiracy against such collateral heir treason by this act. 3 Inst. 8.

At common law, compassing the death of any of the king's children, and declaring it by overt act, was taken to be treason; though by this statute it is restrained to the eldest son and heir. 1 Hal. P. C. 125.

The king, intended by the act, is the king in possession, without any respect to his title; for it is held, that a king de facto, and not de jure, or in other words an usurper that hath got possession of the throne, is a king within the meaning of the statute; as there is a temporary allegiance due to him for his administration of the government, and temporary protection of the public; and therefore treasons committed against Henry VI. were punished under Edward IV, though all the line of Lancaster had been previously declared usurpers by act of parliament. But the most rightful heir of the crown, or king de jure and not de facto, who hath never had plenary possession of the throne, as was the case of the house of York during the three reigns of the line of Lancaster, is not a king within this statute, against whom treasons may be committed. 3 Inst. 7; 1 Hal. P. C. 104. And a very sensible writer on the crown-law carries the point of possession so far, that he holds that a king out of possession is so far from having any right to our allegiance, by any other title which he may set up against the king in being, that we are bound by the duty of our allegiance to resist him; a doctrine which he grounds upon the 11 Hen. 7. c. 1. by which it is expressly provided, that no person who shall attend upon the king for the time being in his person, and to do him true allegiance, or be in other places by the king's command in his wars, shall for such deed be convicted or attainted of high treason, nor of other offences, by act of parliament, or otherwise, whereby he shall forfeit life, or lands, &c.; but any act or process to the contrary shall be void. See King. This act is considered as declaratory of the common law. 1 Hamk. P. C. c. 17. § 14—18. But Blackstone observes, that Hankin's doctrine, founded on this act, seems to confound all notions of right and wrong; and the consequence would be, that when Cromwell had murdered the elder Charles, and usurped the power (though not the name) of king, the people were bound in duty to hinder the son's restoration: and were a foreign king to invade this kingdom, and by any means to get possession of the crown, (a term by the way of very loose and indistinct signification,) the subject would be bound by his allegiance to fight for his natural prince to-day, and by the same duty of allegiance to fight against him to-morrow. The true distinction seems to be, that the statute of Henry VII. does by no means command any opposition to a king de jure; but excuses the obedience paid to a king de facto. When, therefore, an usurper is in possession, the subject is excused and justified in obeying and giving him assistance: otherwise, under an usurpation, no man could be safe, if the lawful prince had a right to hang him for obedience to the powers in being, as the usurper would certainly do for disobedience. Nay, farther, as the mass of people are imperfect judges of title, of which in all cases possession is prima facie evidence, the law compels no man to yield obedience to that prince, whose right is by want of possession rendered uncertain and disputable, till Providence shall think fit to interpose in his favour, and decide the ambiguous claim; and, therefore, till he is entitled to such allegiance by possession, no treason can be committed against him. Lastly, a king who has resigned his crown, such resignation being admitted and ratified in parliament, is, according to Hale, no longer the object of treason. 1 Hal. P. C. 104. And the same reason holds, in case a king abdicates the government; or, by actions subversive of the constitution, virtually renounces the authority which he claims by that very constitution: since, when the fact of abdication is once established, and determined by the proper judges, the consequence necessarily follows, that the throne is thereby vacant, and he is no longer king. 4 Comm. c. 6.

Let us next see, what is compassing or imagining the death of the king, &c. These are synonymous terms; the word compass signifying the purpose or design of the mind or will, and not, as in common speech, the carrying such design into effect. 1 Hal. P. C. 107. And, therefore, it has been held that an accidental stroke, which may mortally wound the sovereign, per infortunium, without any traitorous intent, is no treason; as was the case of Sir Walter Tyrrel, who, by the command of King William Rufus, shooting at a hart, the arrow glanced against a tree, and killed the king upon the spot. 3 Inst. 6. But, as this compassing or imagination is an act of the mind, it cannot possibly fall under any judicial cognizance, unless it be demonstrated by some overt (s. c. open) act; and therefore it is necessary that there appear an open or overt act of a more full and explicit nature, to convict the traitor upon. The statute expressly requires, that the accused "be thereof, upon sufficient proof, attainted of some open act, by men of his own condition." Thus, to provide weapons or ammunition for the purpose of killing the king, is held to be a palpable overt act of treason, in imagining his death. 3 Inst. 12. To conspire to imprison the king by force, and move towards it by assembling company, is an overt act of compassing the king's death; for all force, used to the person of the king, in its consequence may tend to his death, and is a strong presumption of something worse intended than the present force by such as have so far thrown off their bounden duty to their sovereign; it being an old observation, that there is generally but a short interval between the prisons and the graves of princes. 1 Hal. P. C. 109. There is no question, also, but that taking any measures to render such treasonable purposes effectual, as assembling and consulting on the means to kill the king, is a sufficient overt act of high treason. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17 § 21; 1 Hal. P. C. 119.

Mr. Justice Foster lays down generally, that the care the law hath taken for the personal safety of the king, is not confined to actions or attempts of the more flagitious kind, to assassination or poison, or other attempts immediately and directly aimed at his life: it is extended to every thing wilfully and deliberately done or attempted, whereby his life may be endangered. Post. 195.

It hath been adjudged, that he who intended by force to prescribe laws to the king, and to restrain him of his power, doth intend to deprive him of his crown and life; that if a man be ignorant of the intention of those who take up arms against the king, if he join in any rebellion with them, he is guilty of treason; and that the law constructeth every rebellion to be a plot against the king's life, and a deposing him, because a rebel would not suffer that king to reign and live, who will punish him for rebellion. Moor, 620; 2 Salk. 68.

How far mere words, spoken by an individual, and not relative to any treasonable act or design then in agitation, shall amount to treason, has been formerly matter of doubt. Two instances occurred in the reign of Edward IV. of persons executed for treasonable words: the one a citizen of London, who said he would make his son heir of the crown, being the sign of the house in which he lived; the other a gentleman, whose favourite buck the king killed in hunting, whereupon he wished it, horns and all, in the king's belly. These were esteemed hard cases; and the Chief Justice Markham rather chose to leave his place than assent to the latter judgment. 1 Hal. P. C. 115.

It was resolved in the trial of the regicides, that though a man cannot be indicted of high treason for words only, yet if he be indicted for compassing the king's death, these words may be laid as an overt act, to prove that he compassed the death of the king; and to support this opinion, the case of a person was cited who was indicted of treason, anno 9 Car. 1, for that he, being the king's subject at Lisbon, used these words: "I will kill the king, (innuendo, King Charles,) if I may come to him;" and afterwards he came into England for that purpose; and two merchants proving that he spoke the words, for that his traitorous intent, and the wicked imagination of his heart was declared by these words, it was held to be high treason by the common law, and within the statute of the 25 Edw. 3 c. 2. Cro. Car. 242; 1 Lev. 57.

But now it seems clearly to be agreed, that by the common law, and the statute of Edward III., words spoken amount only to a high misdemeanor, and no treason: for they may be spoken in heat, without any intention; or be mistaken, perverted, or misremembered by the hearers; their meaning depends always on their connexion with other words, and things; they may signify differently even according to the tone of voice with which they are delivered; and sometimes silence itself is more expressive than any discourse. As therefore there can be nothing more equivocal and ambiguous than words, it would indeed be unreasonable to make them amount to high treason. And accordingly, in 4 Car. 1. on a reference to all the judges, concerning some very atrocious words spoken by one Pyne, they certified to the king, "That though the words were as wicked as might be, yet they were no treason; for unless it be by some particular statute, no words will be treason." Cro. Car. 125. See 1 Hal. P. C. 111—120; 312—322; Foster, 196—207. From which authorities it may be concluded, that bare words are not overt acts of treason, unless uttered in contemplation of some traitorous purpose actually on foot or intended, and in prosecution of it: as if they are intended or followed by a consultation, meeting, or any act, then they will be evidence or a confession of the intent of such meeting, consultation, or act.

Ever since the revolution, it has been the constant practice, where a person, by treasonable discourses, has manifested a design to murder or depose the king, to convict him upon such evidence. And Chief Justice Holt was of opinion, that express words were not necessary to convict a man of high treason; but if, from the tenor of his discourse, the jury were satisfied he was engaged in a design against the king's life, this was sufficient to convict the prisoner. 4 State Trials, 172.

If the words be set down in writing, it argues more deliberate intention; and it has been held that writing is an overt act of treason; for scribere est agere. But even in this case the bare words are not the treason but the deliberate act of writing them. And such writing, though unpublished, has in some arbitrary reigns convicted its author of treason; particularly in the cases of one Peacham, a clergyman, for treasonable passages in a sermon never preached; and of Algernon Sydney, for some papers found in his closet; which, had they been plainly relative to any previous formed design of dethroning or murdering the king, might doubtless have been properly read in evidence as overt acts of that treason, which was specially laid in the indictment. Foster, 198. But being merely speculative, without any intention (so far as appeared) of making any public use of them, the convicting the authors of treason upon such an insufficient foundation has been universally disapproved. Peacham was therefore pardoned; and though Sydney indeed was executed, yet it was to the general discontent of the nation; and his attainder was afterwards reversed by parliament. There was then no manner of doubt, but that the publication of such a treasonable writing was a sufficient overt act of treason at the common law; though, of late, even that has been questioned. 1 Hal. P. C. 118; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17. § 32, 45. And see the provisions of the 36 Geo. 3. c. 7; and post, III. 4.

2. The next species of treason to be considered is, "if a man do levy war against our lord the king in his realm." And this may be done by taking arms, not only to dethrone the king, but under pretence to reform religion or the laws, or to remove evil councillors, or other grievances, whether real or pretended. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17. § 25. So it was held, in the case of Lord G. Gordon, that an attempt, by intimidation and violence, to force the repeal of a law, is a levying war against the king, and high treason. Dougl. 570. For the law does not, neither can it, permit any private man, or set of men, to interfere forcibly in matters of such high importance; especially as it has established a sufficient power, for these purposes, in the high court of parliament. Neither does the constitution justify any private or particular resistance, for private or particular grievances; though, in cases of national oppression, the nation has very justifiably risen as one man, to vindicate the original contract subsisting between the king and his people. To resist the king's forces, by defending a castle against them, is a levying of war; and so (it has been held) is an insurrection, with an avowed design to pull down all inclosures, all brothels, and the like; the universality of the design making it a rebellion against the state, and usurpation of the powers of government, and an insolvent invasion of the king's authority. 1 Hal. P. C. 182. But a tumult, with a view to pull down a particular house, or lay open a particular inclosure, amounts at most to a riot;

this being no general defiance of public government. So, if two subjects quarrel and levy war against each other, it is only a great riot and contempt, and no treason. Thus it happened between the Earls of Hereford and Gloucester, in 20 Edw. 1., who raised each a little army, and committed outrages upon each other's lands, burning houses, attended with the loss of many lives; yet this was held to be no high treason, but only a great misdemeanor. 1 Hale, P. C. 136.

But in the case of a great riot in London by the apprentices there, some whereof being imprisoned, the rest conspired to kill the lord mayor, and release their comrades; and, in order to do it, to provide themselves with armour, by breaking open two houses near the Tower. They marched with a cloak on a pole, instead of an ensign, towards the lord mayor's house; and in the way, meeting with opposition from the sheriffs, resisted them: this was held levying of war, and treason. Sid. 358.

Those who make an insurrection in order to redress a public grievance, whether it be a real or pretended one, are said to levy war against the king, although they have no direct design against his person; as they are for doing that by private authority, which he by public justice ought to do, which manifestly tends to a rebellion. For example; where great numbers by force endeavour to remove certain persons from the king, or to lay violent hands on a privy councillor, or revenge themselves against a magistrate for executing his office, or to deliver men out of prison, expel foreigners, or to reform the law of religion, see post, Dio. 4. But where a number of men rise to remove a grievance to their private interest, as to pull down a particular inclosure, they are only rioters; for there is a difference between a pretence that is public and general, and one that is private and particular. 3 Inst. 9; H. P. C. 14; Kel. 75; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17. § 25.

It was resolved by all the judges of England, in the reign of King Henry VIII., that an insurrection against the statute of labourers, for raising their wages, was a levying of war against the king; because it was generally against the king's law, and the offenders took upon them the reformation thereof. Read. Statutes, vol. 5. p. 150. It is to be observed however that many of the foregoing constructions of treason, in cases where the object, though extensive, was private, and not connected with the government of the country, are to be considered with great caution, and are not likely to be adopted as precedents: particularly since the 36 Geo. 3. c. 7; 57 Geo. 3. c. 6. post, 4. of this division; and see to this point, Luders's Consideration on the Law of Treason.

Not only such as directly rebel and take up arms against the king, but also those who in a violent manner withstand his lawful authority, or attempt to reform his government, do levy war against him; and therefore, to hold a fort or castle against the king's forces, or keep together armed men in great numbers against the king's express command, have been adjudged a levying of war, and treason. But those who join themselves to rebels, &c. for fear of death, and return the first opportunity, are not guilty of this offence. 3 Inst. 10; Kel. 76.

A person in arms was sent for by some of the council from the King, and to give in the names of those that were armed with him; but he refused, and continued in arms in his house; and it was held treason. Also, where one went with a troop of captains and others into London, to pray help of the city to save his life, and bring him to court to the queen, though there was no intent of hurt to her, was adjudged treason; and in them who joined with him, though they knew nothing but only a difference between him and some courtiers. So if any man shall attempt to strengthen himself so far, that the prince cannot resist him. E. of Essex's Case, Moor, 620.

A bare conspiracy to levy war does not amount to this species of treason; but, if particularly pointed at the person of the king or his government, it falls within the first, of compassing or imagining the king's death. 3 Inst. 9; Foster, 211, 213.

By the common law, levying war against the king was treason. But as, in cases of high treason, there must be an overt act, therefore it is that a conspiracy, or compassing to levy war, is no overt act, unless a war is actually levied; though if a war is actually levied, then the conspirators are all traitors, although they are not in arms. And a conspiracy to levy war will be evidence of an overt act to maintain an indictment for compassing the king's death; but if the indictment be for levying war only, proof must be made that a war was levied, to bring the offender under this clause of the statute. 3 Inst. 8, 9; H. P. C. 14. If two or more conspire to levy war, and one of them alone raises forces, this shall be adjudged treason in all. Dyer, 98.

And see the provisions of the 36 Geo. 3. c. 7. post, III. 4.
3. "If a man be adherent to the king's enemies in his realm, giving to them aid and comfort in the realm, or elsewhere, he is also declared guilty of high treason. This must likewise be proved by some overt act, as by giving them intelligence, by sending them provisions, by selling them arms, by treacherously surrendering a fortress, or the like. 3 Inst. 10. Sending intelligence to the enemy of the destinations and designs of this kingdom, in order to assist them in their operations against us, or in defence of themselves, is high treason, although such correspondence should be intercepted. 1 Burr. 650. So sending any intelligence to the enemy, in order to serve them in shaping their attack or defence, though its object be to dissuade them from an invasion, is high treason. 6 T. R. 529.

Officers or soldiers of this realm, holding correspondence with any rebel, or enemy to the king, or giving them any advice, information by letters, message, &c. are declared guilty of treason by the 2 & 3 Ann. c. 20. which does not extend to Ireland: but see post, IV. ad finem.

By enemies are here understood the subjects of foreign powers with whom we are at open war. As to foreign pirates or robbers who may happen to invade our coast, without any open hostilities between their nation and our own, and without any commission from any prince or state at enmity with the crown of Great Britain, the giving them any assistance is also clearly treason; either in the light of adhering to the public enemies of the king and kingdom, or else in that of levying war against his majesty. Foster, 219. And, most indisputably, the same acts of adherence or aid which, when applied to foreign enemies, will constitute treason under this branch of the statute, will, when afforded to our own fellow-subjects in actual rebellion at home, amount to high treason, under the description of levying war against the king. 1 st. 216. But to relieve a rebel, fled out of the kingdom, is no treason; for the statute is taken strictly, and a rebel is not an enemy; an enemy being always the subject of some foreign prince, and one who owes no allegiance to the crown of England. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17. § 28. And if a person be under circumstances of actual force and constraint, through a well-grounded apprehension of injury to his life or person, this fear or compulsion will excuse his even joining with either rebels or enemies in the kingdom, provided he leaves them whenever he hath a safe opportunity. Foster, 216. See ante, I.

The delivery or surrender of the king's castles or forts, by the captains thereof, to the king's enemy, within the realm or without, for reward, &c. is an adhering to the king's enemies. A lieutenant of Ireland let several rebels out of Dublin castle, and discharged some Irish hostages which had been given for securing the peace; and for this he was attainted of high treason in adhering to the king's enemies. 33 Hen. 8. Adhering to the king's enemies out of the realm is treason; but such adherence out of the realm must be alleged in some place in England. 3 Inst. 10; H. P. C. 14; Dyer, 298, 310. If there be war between the king of England and France, those Englishmen that live in France before the war, and continue there after, are not merely upon that account adherents to the king's enemies, to be guilty of treason, unless they actually assist in such war; or at least refuse to return into England upon a privy seal, or on proclamation and notice thereof; and this refusal is but evidence of an adherence, and not so in itself. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 165. Adhering to the king's enemies is an adhering against him; and English subjects joining with rebel subjects of the king's allies, and fighting with them under the command of an alien enemy prince, are guilty of treason in adhering to the king's enemies. So cruising in a ship with intent to destroy the king's ships, without doing any act of hostility, is an overt act of adhering, comforting, and aiding; for where an Englishman lists himself and marches, this is treason without coming to battle or actual fighting. 2 Salk. 634.

By a temporary act, 38 Geo. 3. c. 27. (now expired,) it was enacted, that if any person residing, or being in Great Britain should, during the war with France, either on his own account or on account of any other person whatsoever, buy, sell, procure, or send, or assist in so doing, for the use of the French armies, or of any persons resident within the dominions of France, any ordnance stores, iron, lead, or copper, except cutlery ware, not being arms, and except buttons, buckles, japanned wares, toys, and trinkets; or any bank notes, gold, or silver; or any provisions whatever, or any clothing for the armies or fleets; or any leather wrought or unwrought, without licence from the king or privy council, he shall be guilty of high treason. And that every British subject, who should purchase, or enter into any agreement for any land or real property in France, should also be guilty of high treason. Temporary provisions were also made by various acts to prevent the intercourse and correspondence with France and other hostile countries during the war, viz. 38 Geo. 3. c. 28, 45, 79, the restraints imposed by which were removed by 42 Geo. 3. c. 11. and not renewed during the subsequent war.

4. The legislature, in the reign of Edward III., was not only careful to specify and reduce to a certainty the vague notions of treason that had formerly prevailed; but the statute goes on to state, that, "because other like cases of treason may happen in time to come, which cannot be thought of nor declared at present, it is accorded that if any other case, supposed to be treason, which is not above specified, doth happen before any judge: the judge shall tarry without going to judgment of the treason, till the cause be shown and declared before the king and his parliament, whether it ought to be judged treason, or other felony." Sir Matthew Hale is very high in his encomiums on the great wisdom and care of the parliament, in thus keeping judges within the proper bounds and limits of this act; by not suffering them to run out (upon their own opinions) into constructive treasons, though in cases that seem to them to have a like parity of reason; but reserving them to the decision of parliament. This is a great security to the public, the judges, and even this sacred act itself; and leaves a weighty memento to judges to be careful and not over-hasty in letting in treasons by construction or interpretation; especially in new cases that have not been resolved and settled. 2. He observes, that as the authoritative decision of these casus omisi is reserved to the king and parliament, the most regular way to do it is by a new declarative act; and therefore the opinion of any one or of both houses, though of very respectable weight, is not that solemn declaration referred to by this act, as the only criterion for judging of future treasons. 1 Hale, P. C. 250; 4 Comm. c. 6.

Doubts having been entertained, how far the words of 25 Edw. 3. were applicable, with sufficient explicitness, to modern treasonable attempts to overturn the constitution, by means of tumultuous assemblies of the people; the publication and dispersion of inflammatory works and speeches against all the branches of the legislature having increased to an enormous and very alarming degree, "with unremitted industry, and with a transcendent boldness;" the project of overawing parliament, by means of mobs and their leaders, having been repeatedly avowed; the legislature thought the following act necessary to explain and enlarge the clauses of the 25 Edw. 3. relative to the treasons enumerated in the three preceding divisions.

The 36 Geo. 3. c. 7. (the preamble of which alludes to the transactions just mentioned,) enacts, "That if any person shall, within the realm or without, compass, imagine, invent, devise, or intend death or destruction, or any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maim or wounding, imprisonment or restraint of the person of the king, his heirs and successors. Or to deprive or depose him or them from the style, honour, or kingly name of the imperial crown of this realm, or of any other of his dominions. Or to levy war against his majesty, his heirs, and successors within this realm, in order, by force or constraint, to compel him or them to change his or their measures or councils, or in order to put any force or constraint upon, or to intimidate or overawe, both houses, or either house of parliament: or to move or stir any foreigner with force to invade this realm, or any other of his majesty's dominions; and such compassings, &c. shall express, utter, or declare, by publishing any printing or writing, or by an overt act or deed," the offender shall be deemed a traitor, and punished accordingly. The benefits of 7 Wm. 3. c. 3; 7 Ann. c. 11. (see post, V. 2.) are reserved to the offenders; and the act does not extend to prevent any prosecutions at common law.

This act at the time of its passing did not extend to Ireland; and the provision was temporary, during the king's life, &c. But by the 57 Geo. 3. c. 6. (passed after the union between Great Britain and Ireland,) these provisions are made perpetual, and by the recital of them in that act appear now to be extended to Ireland; and the like attempts to assault the person of King George IV. while prince regent, within the realm or without, were declared high treason.

The 36 Geo. 3. c. 7. is a very salutary law and was much needed. The 25 Edw. 3. had confined the law of treason within too narrow limits for the protection of the monarchy in a free, advanced, and populous condition of society. Judges had been induced to remedy the defect by a latitude of construction which certainly departed further from the letter of the law than in any other instance; and it is scarcely too much to say, that new treasons were, in fact, created by judicial authority, contrary to the express letter of the statute of Edward III. The act 36 Geo. 3. has, in effect, much curtailed the doctrine of constructive treason, by converting those dangerous and criminal acts of rebellion and sedition, which had been so often the subject of prosecution as overt acts of compassing the king's death, into specific treasons. The law is at once simplified and rendered certain: and the definitions of the crime are now so specific and unambiguous as, in a great measure, to exclude judicial construction from extending them by analogy.

5. The killing of the king's chancellor, treasurer, justices of either bench, &c. declared to be treason, relates to no other officers of state besides those expressly named; and to them only when they are in actual execution of their offices, representing the person of the king, and it doth not extend to any attempt to kill, or wounding them, &c. 3 Inst. 18, 38; H. P. C. 17. The places for the justices to do their offices, are the courts themselves, where they usually, or by adjournment, sit for dispatch of the business of their courts. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 232. See Judges, Privy Council.

By 7 Ann. c. 21. it is made high treason to slay any of the lords of session in Scotland, or lords of justiciary, sitting in judgment; or to counterfeit the king's seals appointed by the Act of Union. See post, 7.

6. It is also a species of treason, under the statute 25 Edw. 3. "if a man do violate the king's companion, or the king's eldest daughter unmarried, or the wife of the king's eldest son and heir." By the king's companion is meant his wife; and by violation is understood carnal knowledge, as well without force as with it; and this is high treason in both parties, if both be consenting, as some of the wives of Henry VIII. by fatal experience evinced.

It is, however, observable, that as well in the instance of the alleged incontinence of Queen Ann Boleyn, as of the undoubted criminality of Queen Catharine Howard, both these queens were attainted of treason by special acts of parliament. 28 Hen. 8. c. 7; 33 Hen. 8. c. 21.

In the preamble of a bill in the House of Lords, "for depriving Caroline, the queen of King George IV. of the title and rights of Queen Consort," an adulterous intercourse was charged to have taken place between her (while Princess of Wales) and a foreigner in foreign parts. After the first reading of the bill, (and before proceeding to hear evidence,) the opinion of the judges was required, "Whether, if a foreigner, owing no allegiance to the crown, do in a foreign country violate the wife of the king's eldest son, and she consent to such violation, she thereby commits high treason within the meaning and true construction of the statute 25 Edw. 3." to which the judges present unanimously gave their opinion in the negative. See Journals, Dom. Proc. 17th August, 1820.

After hearing evidence on this bill for thirteen weeks, (with an interval of about three weeks between the closing the evidence for the bill, and the opening of that against it,) and many debates in the committee on the bill, the third reading was carried by a majority of nine only; the contents being 108, non-contents, 99. After which the third reading was put off for six months; the bill being thereby virtually abandoned.

The plain intention of the law is to guard the blood royal from any suspicion of bastardy, whereby the succession to the crown might be rendered dubious; and, therefore, when this reason ceases, the law (generally speaking) ceases with it; for to violate a queen or princess dowager is held to be no treason. 3 Inst. 9. But it has been remarked that the instances specified in the statute do not prove much consistency in the application of this treason; for there is no protection given to the wives of the younger sons of the king, though their issue might inherit the crown before the issue of the king's eldest daughter; and her chastity is only inviolable before marriage, whilst her children would be clearly illegitimate. 4 Comm. c. 6, n.

The eldest daughter of the king is such a daughter as is eldest not married at the time of the violation, which will be treason, although there was an elder daughter than her, who died without issue; for now the elder alive has a right to the inheritance of the crown upon failure of issue male. Violating the queen's person, &c. was high treason at common law, by reason it destroyed the certainty of the king's issue, and consequently raised contention about the succession. H. P. C. 16.

As a queen dowager, after the death of her husband, is not a queen within the statute; for though she bears the title, and hath many prerogatives answering the dignity of her person, yet she is not the king's wife or companion. So a queen divorced from the king à vinculo matrimonii, is no queen within this act, although the king be living; which was the case of Queen Catharine, who, after twenty year's marriage with King Henry VIII. was divorced causa affinitatis. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 124.

7. "If a man counterfeit the king's great or privy seal," this is also high treason. But if a man takes wax bearing the impression of the great seal off from one patent, and fixes it to another, this is held to be only an abuse of the seal, and not a counterfeiting of it; as was the case of a certain chaplain, who in such manner framed a dispensation for non-residence. But the knavish artifice of a lawyer much exceeded this of the divine. One of the clerks in chancery glued together two pieces of parchment; on the uppermost of which he wrote a patent, to which he regularly obtained the great seal, the label going through both the skins. He then dissolved the cement; and taking off the written patent, on the blank skin wrote a fresh patent, of a different import from the former, and published it as true. This was held no counterfeiting of the great seal, but only a great misprision; and Coke mentions it with some indignation, that the party was living at that day. 3 Inst. 16; 4 Comm. c. 6.

Counterfeiting the king's seal was treason by the common law; and the 25 Edw. 3. st. 5. c. 2. mentioned only the great seal and privy seal; for the counterfeiting of the sign manual, or privy signet, was not treason within that act, but by the 1 Mary, st. 2. c. 6. those who aided and consented to the counterfeiting of the king's seal were equally guilty with the actors.

The above two statutes, so far as they relate to this head of treason, are now repealed by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 66. consolidating the laws relating to forgery, and which act § 2.) declares, that if any person shall forge or counterfeit, or utter, knowing the same to be forged or counterfeited, the great seal of the United Kingdom, his majesty's privy seal, any privy signet of his majesty, his majesty's royal sign manual, any of his majesty's seals appointed by the twenty-fourth article of the union to be kept, used, and continued in Scotland, the great seal of Ireland, or the privy seal of Ireland, every such offender is guilty of high treason, and shall suffer death. Provided that nothing contained in 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. or 7 Ann. c. 21. shall extend to any indictment, or proceedings thereon, for any of the treasons thereinbefore mentioned. See post, V. 2.

But an intent or compassing to counterfeit the great seal, if it be not actually done, is not treason; there must be an actual counterfeiting, and it is to be generally like the king's great seal. 3 Inst. 15; S. P. C. 3; H. P. C. 18.

It was held that this branch of the 25 Ed. 3. did not extend to the affixing the great seal to a patent, without a warrant for so doing; nor to the raising any thing out of a patent, and adding new matter therein; yet this, like the taking off the wax impressed by the great seal, from one patent, and fixing it to another, though it was not a counterfeiting, was adjudged a misprision of the highest degree. And a person guilty of an act of this nature, with relation to a commission for levying money, &c. had judgment to be drawn and hanged. 2 Hen. 4; 3 Inst. 16; Kel. 80. Till a new great seal is made, the old one of a late king, being used and employed as such, is the king's seal within the statute; notwithstanding its variance in the inscription, portraiture, and other substantialia. When an old great seal is broken, the counterfeiting of that seal, and applying it to an instrument of that date wherein it stood, or to any patent, &c. without date, is treason. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 177. The adding a crown to a counterfeit privy signet, which was not in the true; and omitting some words of the inscription, and inserting others, done purposely to make a little difference, alters not the case, but it is high treason; being published on a forged patent to be true, &c. 1 Hale, P. C. 184.

There was also formerly another head of treason under the 25 Ed. 3. st. 5. c. 2. which was "where a man counterfeited the king's money, or brought false money into the realm counterfeited to the money of England, knowing the money to be false, to merchandize and make payment withal."

Or where, under the 4 Hen. 7. c. 18. and 1 Mary, sess. 2. c. 6. a man counterfeited foreign money made current here by the king's proclamation.

The parts of the above statutes relating to this offence have, however, been repealed by the 2 Wm. 4. c. 24. consolidating the laws against coining; and by this act the crime of counterfeiting the coin of the realm is reduced to felony.

IV. In consequence of the power, not indeed originally granted by the statute of Edward III., but constitutionally inherent in every subsequent parliament, (which cannot be abridged of any rights by the act of a precedent one,) the legislature was extremely liberal in declaring new treasons in the unfortunate reign of King Richard II.; as, particularly, the killing of an ambassador was made so; which seems to be founded upon better reason than the multitude of other points that were then strained up to this high offence. The most arbitrary and absurd of all which was by the 21 Rich. 2. c. 8. which made the bare purpose and intent of killing or deposing the king, without any overt act to demonstrate it, high treason. And yet so little effect have over violent laws to prevent any crime, that within two years afterwards this very prince was both deposed and murdered. And in the first year of his successor's reign, an act was passed, reciting "That no man knew how he ought to behave himself, to do, speak, or say, for doubt of such pains of treason. And therefore it was accorded, that in no time to come any treason be judged, otherwise than was ordained by the statute of King Edward the Third." This at once swept away the whole load of extravagant treasons introduced in the time of Richard the Second. 1 Hen. 4. c. 10.

But afterwards, between the reign of Henry IV. and Queen Mary, and particularly in the bloody reign of Henry VIII., the spirit of inventing new and strange treasons was revived; among which we may reckon the offences of clipping money; breaking prison or rescue, when the prisoner is committed for treason; burning houses to extort money; stealing cattle by Welchmen; counterfeiting foreign coin; wilful poisoning; execrations against the king; calling him opprobrious names by public writing; counterfeiting the sign-manual or signet; refusing to abjure the pope; deflowering or marrying, without the royal licence, any of the king's children, sisters, aunts, nephews or nieces; bare solicitation of the chastity of the queen or princess, or advances made by themselves; marrying with the king, by a woman not a virgin, without previously discovering to him such her inebriety; judging or believing (manifested by any overt act) the king to have been lawfully married to Anne of Cleves; derogating from the king's royal style and title; impugning his supremacy; assembling riotously to the number of twelve, and not dispersing upon proclamation. All which new-fangled treasons were totally abrogated by the 1 Mar. st. 1. c. 1. which once more reduced all treasons to the standard of the 25 Edw. 3. Since which time, though the legislature became more cautious in creating new offences of this kind, yet the number was afterwards very considerably increased, but has of late years been again diminished.

For instance, the different treasons relating to persons exercising the Roman Catholic religion, namely, that created by the 5 Liz. c. 1. of defending the pope's jurisdiction in this realm; that created by the 27 Eliz. c. 2. of a popish priest tarrying here three days without taking the oaths; that created by the 3 Jac. 1. c. 4. of any natural-born subject being reconciled to the See of Rome, have long been obsolete; and indeed seem to be now virtually repealed by the two acts of the 31 Geo. 3. c. 32. and 10 Geo. 4. c. 7. the first for the relief, and the last for the final emancipation of the Roman Catholics. See Roman Catholics.

But there is one kind of treason declared by the 25 Eliz. c. 1. distinct from any treason of the last description, although the statute was ostensibly made against maintaining the authority of the See of Rome. For by § 2. persuading or withdrawing any subject from his natural obedience to the crown, is made high treason. And a provision of a similar nature is contained in the 3 Jac. 1. c. 4.

Such treasons as related to the offence of counterfeiting the coin have, as already observed, been reduced to felony. See ante, III. 7.

The only new head of treason (for that of counterfeiting the great seal, &c. also already noticed, is but an extension of the provisions of the 25 Edw. 3.) are such treasons as are created for the security of the Protestant succession to the throne in the house of Hanover. With respect to this latter it may be necessary to state something in this place, in addition to what is said under title King, I.

After the act of settlement (12 & 13 Wm. 3. c. 2.) was made for transferring the crown to the illustrious house of Hanover, it was enacted by 13 & 14 Wm. 3. c. 3. that the pretended Prince of Wales, who was then thirteen years of age, and had assumed the title of King James III., should be attainted of high treason; and it was made high treason for any of the king's subjects, by letters, messages, or otherwise, to hold correspondence with him, or any person employed by him, or to remit any money for his use, knowing the same to be for his service. And by the 17 Geo. 2. c. 39. it was enacted, that if any of the sons of the Pretender should land or attempt to land in this kingdom, or be found in Great Britain or Ireland, or any of the dominions belonging to the same, he should be judged attainted of high treason, and suffer the pains thereof. And to correspond with them, or to remit money for their use, was made high treason in the same manner as it was to correspond with the father. By 1 Ann. st. 2. c. 17. (British; 2 Ann. c. 5. Irish;) if any person shall endeavour to deprive or hinder any person, being the next in succession to the crown according to the limitations of the act of settlement, from succeeding to the crown, and shall maliciously and directly attempt the same by any overt act, such offence shall be high treason. And by 6 Ann. c. 7. (but to which there is no Irish act similar) if any person shall maliciously, advisedly, and directly, by writing or printing, maintain and affirm, that any other person hath any right or title to the crown of this realm, otherwise than according to the act of settlement; or that the kings of this realm, with the authority of parliament, are not able to make laws and statutes to bind the crown, and the descent thereof; such person shall be guilty of high treason. This offence (or indeed maintaining this doctrine in any wise, that the king and parliament cannot limit the crown) was once before made high treason, by 13 Eliz. c. 1. during the life of that princess. And after her decease it continued a high misdemeanor, punishable with forfeiture of goods and chattels, even in the most flourishing era of indefeasible hereditary right, and jure divino succession. But it was again raised into high treason, by the statute of Anne before-mentioned, at the time of a projected invasion in favour of the then Pretender; and upon this statute one Matthews, a printer, was convicted and executed in 1719, for printing a treasonable pamphlet intitled Vox Populi Vox Dei. 4 Comm. c. 6. See ante, III. 4, as to the statute 36 Geo. 3. c. 7.

No act similar to that of the English stat. 1 Mary, st. 1. c. 1. having passed in Ireland, the following Irish acts still remain in force there, by which the offenders are made guilty of treason: 18 Hen. 6. c. 2. against persons putting themselves into safeguard, or cornrick, or granting safeguard to thieves, robbers, and rebels; 18 Hen. 6. c. 3. against levying people or horses upon the king's subjects without their consent; 10 Hen. 7. c. 2. against receiving rebels coming into Ireland; 10 Hen. 7. c. 13. against procuring or stirring Irishry or Englishry to make war against the king's authority, or stirring the Irishry against the Englishry; 13 Hen. 8. c. 1. against the wilful burning of ricks of corn, and houses of the king's subjects.

By the 28 Hen. 8. c. 7. (which was taken from the English act, 26 Hen. 8. c. 13. repealed by 1 Mary, st. 1.) maliciously to wish, will, or desire, or to imagine, practise, or attempt any bodily harm to the king, queen, or heir apparent, &c. or to slander the king, as a heretic, usurper, &c. or to withhold any fortresses, ships, ammunition, &c. is declared treason; and, finally, by 33 Hen. 8. st. 1. c. 1. doing any thing to the peril of the king's person, or in derogation to his title to the crown of Ireland, is treason. Perhaps all these acts (with the exception of the provision as to withholding fortresses, &c.) might be now safely repealed.

By the Irish act 11 Eliz. st. 3. c. 1. which attainted Shan O'Neyle, and vested in the crown the county of Tyrone, &c. it is enacted that to challenge or take the name of O'Neyle, or to claim or execute any superiority, jurisdiction, tributes, &c. usurped or taken by O'Neyle, shall be treason.

V. 1. THOUGH the offence of treason is not within the letter of the commission of justices of the peace; yet, because it is against the peace of the king and of the realm, any justice may upon his own knowledge, or the complaint of others, cause any person to be apprehended, and commit him to prison. And the justice may take the examination of the person apprehended, and the information of those who can give material evidence against him, and put the same in writing, and also bind over those who can give any material evidence to the justices of oyer and terminer, or gaol-delivery; and certify the proceedings to that court where he binds over the informers. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 8. See Justice of the Peace.

By the ancient common law bail was allowed in all cases except for homicide previous to the 3 Edw. 1. c. 15. whereby bail was prohibited to be taken in treason and other heinous offences; but that statute and several other subsequent acts having been repealed by the 7 Geo. 4. c. 64. although the provisions of this statute allowing justices to take bail in cases of felony do not extend to treason, yet it would seem that they may, if they choose to incur the responsibility, under the old common law admit parties charged with treason to bail. See Deacon's Crim. Law, 102.

The Court of King's Bench, having power to bail in all cases whatsoever, may admit a person to bail for treason done upon the high seas; or a person committed for high treason generally, if four terms have elapsed, and no prosecution commenced. Holt, 83; 1 Stra. 2.

The commitment may be for high treason generally; and it is not necessary to express the overt act in the warrant.

The regular and legal way of proceeding in cases of treason, and misprision of treason, is by indictment. An information cannot be brought in capital cases, nor for misprision of treason. Anciently an appeal of high treason, by one subject against another, was permitted in the courts of common law, and in parliament; and if committed beyond the seas, in the court of the high constable and marshal. See Appeal. And as to proceedings by impeachment, see that title.

By the common law, no grand jurors can indict any offence whatsoever, which does not arise within the limits of the precincts for which they are returned; therefore they are enabled, by several statutes, to inquire of treasons committed out of the country.

The venue, or place laid in the indictment where the offence was committed, must generally be laid in that county where the offence was actually committed, unless a statute gives a power to the contrary. If treason is committed in several counties, the venue may be laid in any one of them. 4 Sta. Tri. 640. If treason is committed out of the realm, the venue may be laid by the statute law in any county within the realm where the treason is appointed to be inquired into. See further, Indictment, V.

Offenders guilty of high treason by being concerned in the rebellion in the first year of King George I. were to be tried before such commissioners of oyer and terminer and gaol-delivery, and in such county, as his majesty by any commission under the great seal should appoint, by lawful men of the same county, as if the fact had been there committed; this extended only to persons actually in arms. 1 Geo. 1. c. 33.

By 7 Ann. c. 21. if treason is committed by any native of Scotland, upon the high seas, or in any place out of the realm of Great Britain, it may be inquired of in any shire or county that is assigned by the commission. Therefore the venue may be laid in such county, as if the treason was actually committed there.

This 7 Ann. c. 21. also enacted, that the crimes of high treason, and misprision of treason, shall be exactly the same in England and Scotland; and that no acts in Scotland (except slaying the lords of session, &c. see ante, Div. 5.) shall be construed high treason in Scotland, which are not high treason in England. And all persons prosecuted in Scotland for high treason, or misprision of treason, shall be tried by a jury, and in the same manner as if they had been prosecuted for the same crime in England.

It has been resolved, that if treason is committed in Ireland, it may be laid and tried in England, in pursuance of 35 Hen. 8. c. 2. 1 Sta. Tri. 189. In the case of Lord Maguire the venue was laid in Middlesex, though the war was levied against the king in Ireland. 1 St. Tr. 950. But see tit. Ireland.

The indictment must be drawn with great form and accuracy: for there can be no conviction of treason, where the crime is not formally laid, even though the facts charged amount to treason. 2 St. Tri. 808, 809. The day laid in the indictment is circumstance and form only, and not material in point of proof. Therefore the jury are not bound to find the defendant guilty on that particular day; but may find the treason to be committed either before or after the time laid. 3 Inst. 230; Kely, 16.

There must be a specific charge of treason. And since the traitorous intent is the gist of the indictment, the treason must be laid to have been committed traitorously, this word being indispensably requisite. If the charge is for compassing the king's death, the words of the 25 Edw. 3. (or 36 Geo. 3. as the case may be) must be strictly pursued. The indictment must charge, that the defendant did traitorously compass and imagine, &c. And then proceed to lay the several overt acts, as the means employed for executing his traitorous purposes. Levying war may be charged as a distinct species of treason, according to the statute; or it may be laid as an overt act of compassing.

There must be an overt act laid. It is not necessary that the overt act be laid to have been committed traitorously, because that is not the offence; but if the treason consists not in the intention, but in the act, as levying war, then it must be laid to have been done traitorously. Cranburn's case, 2 Salk. 633. It has been doubted, whether an overt act is required for any other species, except that of compassing or imagining the king's death; but since the words of 25 Edw. 3. "and thereof be proveably attainted by overt act," relate to all the treasons, an overt act is required for each. 5 Sta. Tri. 21; 2 Salk. 634.

Though a specific overt act must be alleged, yet it is not necessary that the whole detail of evidence intended to be given should be set forth; it is sufficient that the charge be reduced to a reasonable certainty, so that the defendant be apprized of its nature. Neither is it necessary to prove the overt act committed on the particular day laid. Foster, 19; 9 Sta. Tri. 607.

The compassing is considered as the treason, and the overt act as the method of effecting it. As to what shall be considered as an overt act, see generally, ante, III. 1. And as to proof of overt acts not specifically laid in the indictment, see post, V. 3.

In indictments upon the clause of the statute for levying war, which Sir Matthew Hale calls an obscure clause, it is not necessary to lay the day with precision. 9 Sta. Tri. 550. But there must be an overt act shown in the indictment, upon which the court may judge upon the question of fact, whether war is levied or conspired. And this is usually done by setting forth, that the insurgents were arrayed in a warlike manner, were armed, or were conspiring to procure arms for the purpose of arming themselves. 2 Vent. 316, Harding's case.

2. If the defendant is in custody before the finding of the indictment, the next step is the arraignment. But if he absconds or secretes himself, still an indictment may be preferred against him in his absence; and if it is found, process issues to bring him into court.

The first process is a capias. At common law, in cases of treason, there was but one capias; and as this has not been altered by statute, upon a non est inventus returned, an exigent is awarded, in order to proceed to outlawry. 2 Hale, P. C. 191.

But if the indictment is originally taken in the King's Bench, the 6 Hen. 6. c. 1. specially provides, that before any exigent awarded, the court shall issue a capias to the sheriff of the county where the indictment is taken, and another to the sheriff of that county where the defendant is named in the indictment, having six weeks' time or more before the return; and after these writs returned, the exigent to issue as before. 2 Hale, P. C. 195.

A capias and exigent may issue against a lord of parliament; although, in civil cases, they cannot. 2 Hale, P. C. 159.

If the offender is out of the realm, the process is of the same effect as if he was resident in the realm. Com. Dig. tit. Indictment, p. 513.

The punishment for outlawries, upon indictments for misdemeanors, is the same as for outlawries in civil actions. But an outlawry in treason amounts to a conviction and attainder of the offence charged in the indictment, as much as if the offender was found guilty by his country. By 5 & 6 Edw. 6. c. 11. § 7, 8. a party within one year after the outlawry for treason may surrender himself to the chief justice of England, and traverse the indictment, and being found thereon not guilty, shall be acquitted. See Sir T. Armstrong's case, Philipps's St. Tr. ii. 153.

Previous to arraignment and trial, the prisoner is entitled to many important privileges, conferred upon him by the 7 Wm. 3. c. 3; 7 Ann. c. 21. which are the standard for regulating trials in cases of treason and misprision, with the exceptions hereafter noticed.

By the 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. which extended to all cases of high treason, whereby corruption of blood may ensue, (except treason in counterfeiting the king's seals,) or misprision of such treason, it is enacted, first, that no person shall be tried for any such treason, except an attempt to assassinate the king, unless the indictment be found within three years after the offence committed; next, that the prisoner shall have a copy of the indictment, (which includes the caption,) but not the names of the witnesses, five days at least before the trial; that is, upon the true construction of the act, before his arraignment; for then is his time to take any exceptions thereto, by way of plea or demurrer. See Fost. 250, 251; Doug. 590. Thirdly, that he shall also have a copy of the panel or jurors two days before his trial: and, lastly, that he shall have the same compulsive process to bring in his witnesses for him, as was usual to compel their appearance against him. And by 7 Ann. c. 21. (which did not take place till after the decease of the late Pretender,) all persons, indicted (in Great Britain) for high treason or misprision thereof, shall have not only a copy of the indictment, but a list of all the witnesses to be produced and of the jurors impanelled, with their professions and places of abode, delivered to him ten days before the trial, and in the presence of two witnesses; the better to prepare him to make his challenges and defence. But this last act, so far as it affected indictments for the inferior species of high treason, respecting the coin and the royal seals, is repealed by 6 Geo. 3. c. 51; else it had been impossible to have tried those offences in the same circuit in which they are indicted: for ten clear days, between the finding and the trial of the indictment, will exceed the time usually allotted for any session of oyer and terminer. Foster, 250.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 50. § 21. in indictments for treason in any other court than the King's Bench, the list of the petit jury is to be delivered ten days before the arraignment, but in the King's Bench it may be delivered after arraignment so as it is ten days before the trial. The provision does not extend to any treasons within the following statute or in counterfeiting the great seal, &c.

By 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 93. (extended to Ireland by 2 Geo. 4. c. 24. § 2. passed after several attempts to assassinate King George III. for which the offenders were tried for high treason according to the regulations of the foregoing acts,) it is provided, that in all cases of high treason in compassing or imagining the death of the king, and of misprision of such treason, where the overt act alleged shall be the assassination or killing the king, or any direct attempt against his life or person, the trial shall be as in cases of murder; and none of the provisions of the statutes 7 Wm. 3. and 7 Ann. shall extend to such cases; but, upon conviction, the judgment shall be as in cases of high treason.

The Irish act 5 Geo. 3. c. 21. directs that every person who shall be accused and indicted under the 25 Edw. 3. shall have a copy of the indictment five days before trial, and shall be admitted to make his full defence by counsel, not exceeding two.

It is the practice to deliver the copy of the indictment, and the list of witnesses and jurors, ten clear days, exclusive of the day of delivery and the day of trial, and of intervening Sundays, previous to the trial. Fost. 2. 230.

We cannot help inserting in this place the opinion of the just and venerable judge Foster, on the subject of the indulgence given to prisoners accused of high treason, by the above statutes. No one will dare to suggest that that eminent writer on crown law was in the least degree an advocate for oppression or arbitrary power.

The furnishing the prisoner with the names, professions, and places of abode of the witnesses and jury, so long before the trial, may serve many bad purposes, which are too obvious to be mentioned; one good purpose, and but one, it may serve. It giveth the prisoner an opportunity of informing himself of the character of the witnesses and jury. But this single advantage will weigh very little in the scale of justice or sound policy, against the many bad ends that may be answered by it. However, if it weigheth any thing in the scale of justice, the crown is entitled to the same opportunity of sifting the character of the prisoner's witnesses. Fost. 250.

Equal justice is certainly due to the crown and the public. For let it be remembered that the public is deeply interested in every prosecution of this kind, that is well founded. Or shall we presume that all the management, all the practising upon the hopes or fears of witnesses, lieth on one side? It is true, power is on the side of the crown: may it, for the sake of the constitutional rights of the subject, always remain where the wisdom of the law hath placed it. But in a government like ours, and in a most changeable climate, power, if in criminal prosecutions it is but suspected to aim at oppression, generally disarmeth itself. It raiseth and giveth countenance to a spirit of opposition, which falling in with the pride or weakness of some, the false patriotism of others, and the sympathy of all, not to mention private attachments and party connections, generally turns the scale to the favourable side, and frequently against the justice of the case. Fost. 251.

The following observations of a more modern writer arising from the impunity, which has in fact not unfrequently taken place, in consequence of the nice distinctions between treason and other offences of an inferior nature, are well deserving of attention. "The present method of trial in high treason sometimes gives an unfair advantage to the real and most dangerous criminal. Before the act of King William, the advantage was on the side of the prosecution, and so tyrannically exercised in general as to have given occasion to the contrary extreme in the new law. This evil is most likely to occur in the case of those popular commotions out of which the constructive treason of levying war is drawn. If they who direct a prosecution in such case think proper to risk the benefit of public justice by so doing, let them take the consequences: but I would have them allowed a choice, and the use of their discretion. Let no defendant, indicted for murder or misdemeanor, be allowed to object that his case amounts to a higher crime. Some state prosecutions for treason have been justified by the argument that they could not be instituted for a less crime." Luders's Law Tracts, i. 134.

The reason of giving the prisoner a copy of the panel is, that he may inquire into the characters and qualifications of the jury, and make what challenges he thinks fit. But the copy may be delivered antecedent to the panel returned by the sheriff. For if he has a copy of the panel arrayed by the sheriff, which is afterwards returned into court, and there is no variation from it, the end and intent of the act is entirely pursued. 4 Sta. Tri. 649, 663, 664; 2 Doug. 590.

If there is any objection to the copy, as if it does not appear before whom the indictment was taken, or that it was taken at all, or in what place, this must be objected to before the plea. For the copy is given the prisoner to enable him to plead; therefore, by pleading, he admits that he has had a copy, sufficient for the purpose intended by the act. 4 Sta. Tri. 668.

By the 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. before cited, the prisoner is allowed to make his defence by counsel. And the court is authorized to assign him counsel, not more than two in number, who shall have free access to him at all seasonable hours. The counsel are to assist him throughout the trial, to examine his witnesses, and to conduct his whole defence, as well in points of fact, as upon questions of law. And this indulgence is extended to cases of impeachment in parliament, by 20 Geo. 2. c. 30. And see the Irish act, 5 Geo. 3. c. 21. and the 2 Geo. 4. c. 24.

Upon a joint indictment against several, each is intitled to two counsel. 1 East, P. C. c. 2. § 48, 51.

3. The arraignment is the calling the prisoner to the bar of the court, to answer to the matter charged in the indictment. Upon this, the indictment being read, it is demanded of the prisoner what he saith to the indictment; who either confesses, stands mute, pleads, or demurs.

A plea to the jurisdiction is where the indictment is taken before a court that has no cognizance of the offence. Fitzharris, in the Court of King's Bench, pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, that he was impeached of high treason, by the commons of England in parliament, before the lords, and that the impeachment was still in force. But the court, after taking time to consider, held that the plea was insufficient to bar the court of its jurisdiction. 3 Sta. Tri. 259, 260; 4 Sta. Tri. 167.

Lord Macguire, an Irish peer, pleaded his privilege of peerage, but the court resolved he might be tried here. 1 Sta. Tri. 950; 4 Sta. Tri. 415.

Lord Delamere was indicted for high treason, before the lord high steward, during a prorogation of parliament, and pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, that, as the parliament was not dissolved, he ought to be tried by the whole body of peers; the plea was over-ruled. 4 Sta. Tri. 212, 215.

The 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. § 9. provides, that the indictment shall not be quashed for mis-writing, mis-spelling, or false or improper Latin, unless the exception is taken before any evidence is given.

Pleas in bar are general or special. The general issue is Not Guilty. Upon which the defendant is not merely confined to evidence in negation of the charge, but may offer any matter in justification or excuse. In short, the general issue goes to say, that the prisoner, under the circumstances, has not been guilty of the crime imputed to him.

Special pleas in bar are such as preclude the court from discussing the merits of the indictment; either on account of a former acquittal, or of some subsequent matter operating in discharge of the defendant.

A pardon may be pleaded in bar, either on the arraignment, or in arrest of judgment, or in bar of execution. By 13 Rich. 2. st. 2. c. 1. no pardon of high treason is good, unless the crime is expressly specified. See Pardon, II.

Sir H. Lane justified that what he did was by authority of parliament; that the king was out of possession of the kingdom; and that the parliament was the only governing power. But this was overruled by the court. Kelynge, 14. Neither can a man plead, by way of justification, that what he did was ex defensione. 2 Hale, P. C. 258.

A man may plead specially the limitation of the 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. § 5. that no man shall be indicted, tried, or prosecuted for certain treasons unless within three years after they are committed. See ante, V. 2.

A demurrer admits the facts stated in the indictment, but refers the law arising upon them to the determination of the court. As if the prisoner insists that the fact as stated is no treason.

After plea, the jurors are sworn, unless challenged by the party.

A peremptory challenge of thirty-five jurors is at this day allowable in cases of high treason. For though the 33 Hen. 8. c. 23. enacted, that in cases of high treason or misprision of treason, a peremptory challenge should not be allowed: yet the 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 10. enacts, that all trials for any treason shall be according to the order and course of the common law, which allowed this privilege. 3 Inst. 27; 2 Hale, P. C. 269; and see 7 & 8 Wm. 3. c. 3. § 2.

But by 33 Hen. 8. c. 12. which seems to be still in force, for treasons committed in the king's household, and tried before the lord steward, all challenge, except for malice, is taken away. See 2 Hale, P. C. 272; and further, tit. Jury. See 35 Hen. 8. c. 2. that treasons, committed out of the realm, may be tried before the King's Bench, or by commission in any shire, as if such treasons had been committed within the realm.

If a person be indicted by a several indictment for receiving and harbouring a traitor, he shall not be tried until the principal be convicted: if he be indicted in the same indictment with the principal, the jury must be charged to inquire first of the principal offender; and if they find him guilty, then of the fact of having received him: for though in the eye of the law they are both principals in the treason, yet in truth the receiver is so far an accessory that he cannot be guilty if the principal be innocent. Fost. 345; Hale, P. C. i. 238; ii. 222.

After the jury are sworn, and the indictment opened, the next step is proceeding to evidence of the charge.

The 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. § 2. enacts, that no person shall be indicted, tried, or attainted for high treason or misprision, except upon the oaths of two lawful witnesses; either both of them to the same overt act, or one of them to one, and the other to another overt act of the same treason; unless the prisoner willingly without violence, in open court, confesses the same: or stands mute; or refuses to plead; or, in cases of high treason, peremptorily challenges more than thirty-five of the jury.

At common law, one positive witness was sufficient. But several statutes previous to the act of William required two; but a collateral fact, not tending to the proof of the overt acts, may be proved by one. 5 St. Tr. 29.

If two distinct heads of treason are alleged in one bill of indictment, one witness produced to prove one of the treasons, and another witness to prove another of the treasons, are not two witnesses to the same treason, according to the intent of the act. In an indictment for compassing the king's death, the being armed with a dagger, for the purpose of killing the king, was laid as an overt act; and being armed with a pistol for the same purpose, as another overt act; it was held, that proving one overt act by one witness, and the other by a different witness, was good proof by two witnesses within the meaning of the act.

As there must be an overt act laid, so that which is laid must be proved; for if another act than what was laid was sufficient, the prisoner would never be provided to make his defence. But if more than one are laid, the proof of any one will maintain the indictment. Also if one overt act is proved, others may be given in evidence to aggravate the crime, and render it more probable. 1 Hale, P. C. 121, 122.

In Sir Henry Vane's case (Howell's State Trials, VI. 119, &c.) it was resolved that the treason laid in the indictment being the compassing of the king's death (which was in Middlesex), and the levying of war being laid only as one of the overt acts to prove the compassing of the king's death, though this levying of war were laid in the indictment to be in Middlesex, yet a war levied by him in Surrey might be given in evidence; for being not laid as the treason, but only as the overt act to prove the compassing, it is a transitory thing which may be proved in another county. But that if an indictment be for levying war, and that be made the treason for which the party is indicted, in that case it is local and must be laid in the county where in truth it was.

The rule here laid down is, that if the treason charged in the indictment be the compassing the death of the king, (which is one of the treasons specified in the 25 Edw. 3.) and the levying of war is laid as the overt act of such compassing in the county in which the prisoner is tried, other overt acts of levying war, besides those laid in the indictment, may be proved to have been committed in other counties, being overt acts of the same species of treason. On the authority of this and other cases, East in his Treatise on the Pleas of the Crown, states the rules in the following terms: "After proof of an overt act in the county in which the treason is laid, evidence may be given of any other acts of the same species of treason in other counties." East, P. C. 122, ad fin. citing Parkin's case, 4 St. Tr. 633, 13 Howell, 92, and Layer's case, 6 St. Tr. 240, 241. (16 Howell, 164, 291.) Again, in another passage, thus: "If one overt act be proved by one witness in the county in which the trial takes place, or which gives the grand jury jurisdiction to inquire, another overt act, of the same species of treason, proved by another witness in a different county, will make two witnesses within the statute." East, P. C. 130, citing Layer's case, and Gavan's case, 2 St. Tr. 879. (7 Howell, 405, 406.)

There is no doubt, (says Phillips in his State Trials reviewed, 289, &c.) that the reported language of the judges in the cases cited by East, and in many other cases of a much more recent date, fully warrants these statements. Yet on consideration it appears to be clear that the rule laid down in Sir H. Vane's case, and in most of the cases referred to, requires a very material limitation. The correct rule appears to be this; that any overt act of the prisoner, tending to prove the overt act laid in the indictment, may be given in evidence, whether committed in the same or in a different county. But if the overt act proposed to be proved is not itself laid in the indictment, nor tends to prove any other overt act which is laid, it ought not to be admitted in proof. Such is the principle laid down by Holt, C. J. in Rookwood's case, 13 Howell, St. Tr. 220, where the rule is much more correctly expressed than either in Parkin's case or Layer's case. Holt, in Rook- wood's case, commenting on § 8. of 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. which enacts, "that no evidence shall be admitted or given of any overt act, that is not expressly laid in the indictment, against any person whatsoever," observes, that "the act does not exclude such evidence as is proper and fit to prove that overt act which is laid in the indictment. Therefore the question is," he adds, "whether the giving of the list (which was the overt act not laid, to the proof of which an objection had been taken) does not prove some overt act that is laid in the indictment." It may be remarked also, that in Parkin's as well as Layer's case, although the language of the court, as reported, is more extensive and general than the language of Holt in Rookwood's case, yet the overt act which had been committed in another county, and which was allowed to be proved, did directly tend and contribute to the proof of the overt act laid in the indictment. See Foster, 245. In the state trials of 1746, the rule frequently laid down and acted upon was, that acts of treason tending to prove the overt acts laid, though done in a foreign country, might be given in evidence. Foster, 10. On the other hand, Vaughan's case clearly establishes the converse of the proposition; namely, that unless the proposed evidence tend to the proof of some overt act laid in the indictment, it ought to be rejected. Foster, 246. and see Harrison's case, 1 Phillips's St. Tr. 255.

These remarks (continues Mr. Phillips) may not be without their use in preventing error and misconception on a point of some importance. The difference between the two rules here considered is very great, the one allowing proof of all overt acts, not laid in the indictment, provided only they are overt acts of the same species of treason as that described in the record; the other admitting only such proof as tends or contributes to prove some overt act which is charged. According to this latter rule, which appears to be the most correct, the prisoner is previously in the same situation on a trial for treason as in any other criminal proceeding; in which it is perfectly just, that any act done by him in any county (or in any part of the world) should be brought forward against him to prove the specific charge on which he is tried, and of which charge he has had notice. But according to the other rule, overt acts of a description the most irrelevant and extraneous may be proved in any number, and to any extent; subject only to this restriction, that they are not overt acts of a different species of treason. And when it is considered that although the treason is the crime, the overt act is the act charged to have been done in the prosecution of the traitorous intent, and is therefore substantially the charge on which he is to be tried, it is plain that if such evidence were to be admitted, the prisoner would be partly tried, and perhaps his conviction might in the result principally turn on the proof of facts entirely unconnected with the specific act charged, and brought forward at the trial for the first time. In this manner the accused might be taken by surprise, and thus be without any means of defence. Such a course would be inconsistent with the principle observed in other criminal proceedings. See Phillips's State Trials, i. p. 287. 292. &c. 1826.

As the levying of war is made by the 25 Edw. 3. a distinct and substantive act of treason, it has been contended that this is a strong ground for inferring that the mere conspiring to levy war ought not to be construed as an overt act of compassing and imagining the death of the king. But as the strongest of all proofs to evidence a design of killing would manifestly be the proof of an actual attempt to kill, so it cannot be disputed that the conspiring to kill is equally strong evidence of the same design. It is therefore an unreasonable conclusion that the person who designs the overthrow of the king, designs also his death. The same may be said of a conspiracy with foreigners to procure an invasion of the kingdom, and of a conspiracy to raise insurrection and rebellion, and to seize the king's guards, which were the overt acts in Lord Russell's case. These may therefore be properly laid as overt acts of the imagining and compassing the king's death, and the proof of any one of these conspiracies is competent evidence of such traitorous design for the consideration of the jury, affording (not a presumption or absolute conclusion of law,) but a reasonable and natural presumption of fact, on which the jury are to determine whether the accused did in fact imagine and design the death of the king.

This question is not now of such general importance as formerly; the st. 36 Geo. 3. c. 7, (see ante, III. 4.) containing many more extensive provisions than the stat. of Edw. 3. has very materially narrowed such discussions by making some acts amount to substantive acts of treason which would only before be laid as overt acts. See Phillips's State Trials reviewed, vol. II. Lord Russell's case and notes thereon.

On an indictment for high treason in sending intelligence to the enemy, a letter sent by one of the conspirators in pursuance of the common design, with a view of reaching the enemy, is evidence against all engaged in the same conspiracy, 6 T. R. 527.

The same rules of evidence are observable in cases of parliamentary impeachments, as in the ordinary courts of judicature.

As to the confession, there have been doubts whether the 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. requires a confession upon the arraignment of the party; or a confession taken out of court by a person authorised to take such examination. Evidence of a confession proved upon the trial by two witnesses has been held sufficient to convict, without further proof of the overt acts. Foster, 241. See 1 East's P. C. c. 2. § 66. This point is however not clearly settled. But such confession out of court is evidence admissible, proper to be left to a jury, and will go in corroboration of other evidence to the overt acts.

We have seen that the prisoner is intitled by the act 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. to have a similar process of the court to compel witnesses to appear for him, to that which is usually granted to compel witnesses to appear against him; and by 1 Ann. st. 2. c. 9. § 3. the witnesses on the behalf of prisoners, before they give evidence, are to take an oath to depose the whole truth, &c. as the witnesses for the crown are obliged to do. And if convicted of wilful perjury in their evidence, they shall suffer the usual punishment.

The jury must be unanimous, and give their verdict in open court. No privy verdict can be given. 2 H. P. C. 300.

Upon the trial of peers in the Court of the Lord High Steward, a major vote is sufficient either to acquit or condemn; provided that vote amount to twelve or more. Kelynge, 56, 57. Therefore it has been usual to summon not less than twenty-three peers. See Lord High Steward, Peers.

After the trial and conviction, unless the prisoner has any thing to offer in arrest of judgment, the judgment of the court is awarded.

The punishment of high treason, in general, at common law, was very solemn and terrible. 1. That the offender should be drawn to the gallows, and not be carried, or walk; though usually (by connivance, at length ripened by humanity into law,) a sledge or hurdle was allowed, to preserve the offender from the extreme torment of being dragged on the ground or pavement. 2. That he should be hanged by the neck, and then cut down alive. 3. That his entrails should be taken out and burned, while he was yet alive. 4. That his head should be cut off. 5. That his body should be divided into four parts. 6. That his head and quarters should be at the king's disposal. 4 Comm. c. 6.

The king might, and often did, discharge all the punishment, except beheading, especially where any of noble blood were attainted; and now by 54 Geo. 3. c. 146. reciting the above punishment, it is enacted, that in all cases of high treason, in which, as the law then stood, the sentence or judgment ordered by law was such as before stated, the sentence in future shall be, that the offender shall be drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution, and there be hanged by the neck until he be dead; and that afterwards his head shall be severed from his body, and the body, divided into four quarters, shall be disposed of as the king shall think fit. A proviso is added, that after sentence the king may by warrant, under the sign manual, direct that the offender shall not be drawn to the place of execution, but taken thither as may be directed, and that he may not be hanged but beheaded; and also to direct the disposal of the body, &c.

In the case of coining, which was formerly treason, but of a different complexion from the rest, the punishment was for male offenders to be drawn, and hanged by the neck till dead.

The punishment of women guilty of high treason was formerly to be burnt alive, and this was not altered till the 30 Geo. 3. c. 48. under which females are now to be drawn to the gallows, and there to be hanged.

Upon a writ of error to reverse an attainder in treason, because the party convicted was not asked what he had to say why judgment should not be given against him, the attainder was reversed: for he might have a pardon, or some matter to move in arrest of judgment. 2 Salk. 630; 3 Mod. 285. And the omission of any necessary part of the judgment for treason is error sufficient to reverse an attainder, as it is more severe and formidable in treason than for other crimes. 2 Salk. 632.

By 29 Eliz. c. 2. it was enacted, that no record or attainder for high treason, where the offender had been executed, should be reversed by the heirs of the offender for any error whatever.

The consequences of the judgment in treason are, attainder, forfeiture of all lands and tenements, and corruption of blood.

By the word proveably (or probably) attainted, in the 25 Edw. 3. a person ought to be convicted of the treason on direct and manifest proofs, and not upon presumptions or inferences; and the word attainted necessarily implies that the prisoner be proceeded against and attainted according to due course of law; wherefore, if a man be killed in open war against the king, or be put to death arbitrarily, or by martial law, and be not attainted of treason, according to the common law, he forfeits nothing; for which cause some persons, killed in open rebellion against the king, have been attainted by act of parliament. 3 Inst. 12.

See further Descent, Forfeiture, II. 1, Tenures.

TREASON, PETIT. Was where one, out of malice, took away the life of a subject, to whom he owed special obedience. It occurred only in three cases:—1. Of a servant killing his master or mistress. 2. A wife killing her husband. 3. A clergyman killing his superior. It was called petit treason in respect to high treason, which is against the king. 3 Inst. It is now abolished. See Homicide, III. 4.

TREASURER, thesaurarius.] An officer to whom the treasure of another is committed to be kept, and truly disposed of. The chief of these was the lord high treasurer of England, who was a lord by his office, and one of the greatest men of the kingdom. This great officer held his place dum bene placito, and was instituted by the delivery of a white staff to him by the king; and in former times he received his office by delivery of the golden keys of the treasury: he was also treasurer of the exchequer by letters-patent. Under the charge and government of the lord treasurer was all the king's wealth contained in the exchequer; he had the check of all the officers employed in collecting the customs and royal revenues: all the offices of the customs in all ports of England were in his gift and disposition; escheators in every county were nominated by him; and he made leases of all the lands belonging to the crown, &c. See 4 Inst. 104. The chancellor of the exchequer is under-treasurer, and a check on the treasurer. See Under-Treasurer.

By 31 Edw. 3. st. 1. c. 12. in writs of error the lord chancellor and lord treasurer shall cause the record and process of the exchequer to be brought before them, who are judges; but the writ is to be directed to the treasurer and barons, who have the keeping of the records. See Error.

If any one kill the treasurer, being in his place, doing his office, it is high treason by 25 Edw. 3. c. 2. See Judges, Treason.

Besides the lord treasurer, there was a treasurer of the king's household, who was of the privy council, and with the comptroller, &c. had great power. A treasurer of the navy or war, see 35 Eliz. c. 4. and post. Treasurer of the king's chamber, 39 Hen. 8. c. 39. A treasurer of the wardrobe, 95 Edw. 3. c. 21.

The high and important post of lord high treasurer has of late years, like many other great offices, been esteemed too great a task for one person, and been generally executed by commissioners. The power of leasing the crown lands is now confided to the commissioners of woods, forests, and land revenues of the crown, under the direction of the commissioners of the treasury, in whom all the powers of lord high treasurer are vested by their commission.

By the 56 Geo. 3. c. 98. for consolidating the public revenues of Great Britain and Ireland, it is enacted, § 2. that the offices of lord high treasurer of Great Britain and lord high treasurer of Ireland shall be united into one office; and the person holding the same shall be called lord high treasurer of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland: and that whenever there shall not be any such lord high treasurer, his majesty may by letters-patent, under the great seal, appoint commissioners of his majesty's treasury, for executing the offices of treasurer of the exchequer of Great Britain, and lord high treasurer of Ireland: and that all officers and persons employed in the collection or management of the public revenue shall be in all respects subject to the control of such lord high treasurer or commissioners of his majesty's treasury.

By the same act, § 4. &c. his majesty is empowered to appoint a vice-treasurer for Ireland for the issuing money out of the exchequer of Ireland. See Under-Treasurer.

For regulating the office of treasurer of the navy, see the 1 Wm. 4. c. 42. by which all former acts relating to that office were consolidated and amended.

TREASURER, IN CATHEDRAL CHURCHES. An officer whose charge was to take care of the vestments, plate, jewels, relics, and other treasure belonging to the said churches. At the time of the reformation, the office was extinguished as needless in most cathedral churches; but is still remaining in those of Salisbury, London, &c.

TREASURER OF THE COUNTY. He that keeps the county stock. There are two of them in each county, chosen by the major part of the justices of the peace, &c. at Easter sessions: they must have 10*l*. a year in land, or 150*l*. in personal estate; and shall not continue in their office above a year; and they are to account yearly at Easter sessions, or within ten days after, to their successors, under penalties. The county stock, of which this officer has the keeping, is raised by rating every parish yearly; and is disposed to charitable uses, for the relief of maimed soldiers and mariners, prisoners in the county gaols, paying the salaries of governors of houses of correction, and raising poor rates, &c. The duty of these treasurers, with the manner of raising the stock, &c. is particularly specified in the 43 Eliz. c. 2; 7 Jac. 1. c. 4; 11 & 12 Wm. 3. c. 18; 5 Ann. c. 32; 7 Geo. 4. c. 64. &c. See further, County-Rates, Poor.

There are like officers in Ireland regulated by several acts of the Irish parliament.

TREASURER'S REMEMBRANCER. Was he whose charge is to put the lord treasurer and the rest of the judges of exchequer in remembrance of such things as were called on and dealt in for the king's behoof: he made process against all sheriffs, escheators, receivers, and bailiffs for their accounts. Scotch Diet. There was a like officer in the exchequer of England. See Remembrancer.

TREASURE-TROVE, thesaurus inventus; French, trouvée, found.] Money or coin, gold, silver, plate, or bullion, found hidden in the earth or other private place, the owner thereof being unknown.

In such cases, the treasure belongs to the king, and is part of his ordinary revenue; but if he that hid it be known, or afterwards found out, the owner, and not the king, is entitled to it. 3 Inst. 132; Dalt. of Sheriffs, c. 16. Also, if it be found in the sea, or upon the earth, it does not belong to the king, but to the finder, if no owner appears. Brit. c. 17; Finch. L. 177. So that it seems it is the hiding, and not the abandoning of it, that gives the king a property: Bracton defining it, in the words of the civilians, to be vetus depositio pecunie, L. 3. c. 3. § 4.

This difference clearly arises from the different intentions which the law implies in the owner. A man that hides his treasure in a secret place, evidently does not mean to relinquish his property; but reserves a right of claiming it again when he sees occasion: and if he dies, and the secret also dies with him, the law gives it to the king in part of his royal revenue. But a man that scatters his treasure into the sea, or upon the public surface of the earth, is construed to have absolutely abandoned his property, and returned it into the common stock, without any intention of reclaiming it; and therefore it belongs, as in a state of nature, to the first occupant or finder; unless the owner appear and assert his right, which then proves that the loss was by accident, and not with an intent to renounce his property. 1 Comm. c. 8.

Formerly, all treasure-trove belonged to the finder. Bract. L. 3. c. 3; 3 Inst. 133; Kitch. 80. Afterwards it was judged expedient for the purposes of the state, and particularly for the coinage, to allow part of what was so found to the king, which part was assigned to be all hidden treasure; such as is casually lost and unclaimed, and also such as is designedly abandoned, still remaining the right of the fortunate finder. And that the prince shall be entitled to this hidden treasure is now grown to be, according to Grotius, "jus commune, et quasi gentium;" for it is not only observed, he adds, in England, but in Germany, France, Spain, and Denmark. The finding of deposited treasure was much more frequent, and the treasures themselves more considerable, in the infancy of our constitution, than at present; and therefore the punishment of such as concealed from the king the finding of such hidden treasure was formerly no less than death, but now it is only fine and imprisonment. Glanv. l. 1. c. 2; 3 Inst. 133.

Nothing is said to be treasure-trove but gold and silver. It is every subject's part, as soon as he has found any treasure in the earth, to make it known to the coroners of the county, &c. Britton, cap. 17; S. P. C. 25. Coroners ought to inquire of treasure-trove, being certified thereof by the king's bailiffs, or others, and of who were the finders, &c. 4 Edw. 1. st. 2. And seizures of treasure-trove may be inquired of in the sheriff's torn. 2 Hank. P. C. c. 10. § 57.

But where it has been granted by the king to the lord of a manor or other liberty, the court-leet ought not then to inquire of such seizure, for it is contrary to law for the leet to take cognizance of trespasses done to the private damage of the lord, since that would be to make him judge in his own cause. 2 Hank. c. 10. § 57.

Larceny cannot be committed of treasure-trove before it is seized by the king or his grantee. See Larceny.

TREASURY. Signifies sometimes the place where the king's treasure is deposited; and at other times the office of treasurer. Comell.

TREATIES, LEAGUES, AND ALLIANCES. See King, V. 3.

TREBUCHET, TREBUCKET, TRIBUCH, terbiche-tum.] A tumbril or cucking-stool. Also a great engine to cast stones to batter walls. 3 Inst. 219; Matt. Paris, 1246; Knighton, An. 1332. See Castigatory.

TREES. See Malicious Injuries, 7; Timber.

TREET, triticum.] Fine wheat; mentioned in the 51 Hen. 3. See Bread.

TREMAGIUM, TREMESIUM, TERMISIUM. The season or time of sowing summer corn, being about March, the third month, to which the word may allude; and corn sowed in March is by the French called tremes and tremois. Tremesium was the season for summer corn, barley, oats, beans, &c. opposed to the season for winter corn, wheat and rye, called hibernagium; and is thus distinguished in old charters. Cartular. Glaston. MS. 91.

TREMELLUM. A granary. Mon. Ang. i. 470.

TRENCHATOR, from Fr. trancher, to cut.] A carver of meat at a table. In the patent rolls, mention is made of a pension granted by the king to A. B. uni trenchiatorum nostrorum, &c.

TRENCHIA. A trench, or dike newly cut. Peramb. 33 Hen. 3.

TRENTAL, triennale; Fr. trentale.] An office for the dead, that continued thirty days, or consisting of thirty masses; from the Ital. trenta, i. e. triginta. 1 Edw. 6. c. 14.

TREPGET See Trebuchet.

TRESAYLE. Was the name of a writ sued on ouster by abatement on the death of the grandfather's grandfather. It has long been obsolete, and is now abolished. See Assize of Mort d'Ancestor.

TRESPASS,

TRANSRESSIO.] Any transgression of the law less than treason, felony, or misprision of either; but it is most constantly used for that wrong or damage which is done by one private man to another, or to the king in his forest, &c.: in which signification it is of two sorts,—trespass general, otherwise called trespass vi et armis, and trespass special, or upon the case. Bro. Trespas; Bract. lib. 4.

Trespass, in its largest and most extensive sense, signifies any transgression or offence against the law of nature, of society, or of the country in which we live, whether it relates to a man's person or his property. Therefore beating another is a trespass, for which an action of trespass vi et armis in assault and battery will lie. Taking or detaining a man's goods are respectively trespasses, for which an action of trespass vi et armis, or on the case in trover and conversion, is given by the law: so also non-performance of promises or undertakings is a trespass, upon which an action of trespass on the case in assumpsit is grounded: and in general any misfeasance, or act of one man, whereby another is injuriously treated or damaged, is a transgression, or trespass in its largest sense, for which an action will lie. 3 Comm. c. 12. See Action, Assault, Mayhem, &c.

Trespass supposes a wrong to be done with force; and trespasses against the person of a man are of several kinds, viz. by menacing or threatening to hurt him; assaulting or setting upon one to beat him; battery being the actual beating of another; maiming of a person, so that he loses the use of his limbs; by imprisonment, or restraining him of his lawful liberty, &c.

Trespasses against a man's property may be committed in divers cases; as against his wife, children, or servants, or his house and goods, &c.; and against his land, by carrying away deeds and evidences concerning it, cutting the trees, or spoiling the grass therein, &c. F. N. B. 86, 87; Finch. 198, 201; 2 Roll. Abr. 545.

Trespass vi et armis may be brought by him that hath the possession of goods, or of a house, or land, if he be disturbed in his possession; for the disturbance, besides the private damage, is also a breach of the public peace. 1 Inst. 57; 6 East, 602.

It is a settled distinction, that where an act is done which is in itself an immediate injury to another's person or property, there the remedy is usually by an action of trespass vi et armis; but where there is no act done, but there is only a culpable omission, or where the act is not immediately injurious, but only by consequence and collaterally, there no action of trespass vi et armis will lie, but an action on the special case for the damages consequent on such omission or act. 11 Mod. 180; Ld. Raym. 1402; Stra. 635; 3 Comm.

c. 8. p. 123; c. 12. p. 208. The distinctions in these cases are frequently very delicate. See the subject much considered in 2 Black. Rep. 892.

Where the defendant's servant was driving him in a gig and the horse ran away and did an immediate injury to the plaintiff's property, it was held that the action was well brought in trespass. 1 C. & M. 29.

It is a direct trespass to injure the person of another by driving a carriage against the carriage in which such person is sitting, although the last-mentioned carriage is not the property nor in the possession of the person injured. 7 Taunt. 698.

A court which is not a court of record cannot hold plea of trespass vi et armis. F. N. B. 85. Writs of trespass lie either to the sheriff to determine the matter in the county court, or returnable in B. R. or C. B. F. N. B. 88, 190. Trespass quare vi et armis clausum fregit was brought, wherein the plaintiff laid damage to the value of 20s. and the defendant demurred for that cause, alleging that B. R. could have no cognizance at common law, or by the statute of Gloucester, to hold plea in an action where the damages are under 40s. But it was adjudged that trespass quare vi et armis will lie in this court, be the damages what they will. 3 Mod. 275.

At common law, in trespass vi et armis, if the defendant was convicted, he was to be fined and imprisoned; but in other trespasses only amerced. Jenk. Cent. 185.

II. ——— for Injuries to Personal Property.

III. ——— for Injuries to Real Property.

IV. ——— under colour of Legal Proceedings.

V. Of the Pleadings, &c.

I. TRESPASS is the only remedy for a menace to the plaintiff, attended with consequent damages, 3 Comm. 120; and for an illegal assault, battery, and wounding, or imprisonment, when not under colour of process. 11 Mod. 180, 181. It lies also when the battery, imprisonment, &c. were in the first instance lawful, but the party, by an unnecessary degree of violence, became a trespasser ab initio, Com. Dig. tit. Trespas, C. 2; and for a wrongful imprisonment after the process is determined, Cro. Jac. 379; or for an assault after an acquittal for a felonious assault and stabbing, 12 East, 409.

So it lies for an injury to the relative rights occasioned by force, as for menacing tenants, servants, &c. and beating, wounding, and imprisoning a wife or servant, 2 M. & S. 436; whereby the landlord, master, or servant, hath sustained a loss, though the injury, the loss of service, &c. were consequential, and not immediate; and it lies for criminal conversation, 7 Mod. 81; 2 Salk. 552; 6 East, 387; seducing away a wife, Fitz. N. B. 89; 6 East, 387; or servant, 2 Salk. 552; 5 T. R. 361; or for debauching the latter, 3 Wils. 562, 18, 19; 2 New Rep. 476; 2 M. & S. 436; force being implied, and the wife and servant being considered as having no power to consent; and a count for beating the plaintiff's servant per quod servitium amisit, may be joined with other counts in trespass; 2 M. & S. 436, 2 New Rep. 476; and though it has been usual to declare in case for debauching a daughter, 2 T. R. 167; 6 East, 387, it is now thought preferable to declare in trespass; 2 New Rep. 476; 2 M. & S. 436. See 1 Chitty on Pleading.

II. TRESPASS lies for taking or injuring all inanimate personal property, and all domiciled and tame animals, as dogs and cats; 1 Saund. 84, n. 2, 3; Cro. Eliz. 125, 3 T. R. 37, 38; and all animals usually marketable, as parrots, monkeys, &c.; and in which case it is not necessary to show in the pleadings that they have been reclaimed; Cro. Jac. 262; but in the case of a hawk, pheasant, hare, rabbit, fish, or other animal feræ naturæ, and not generally merchandizable, it should be shown in the pleadings that the same were reclaimed or dead, or at least that the plaintiff was possessed of them. Bac. Ab. Tresp. 1; Cro. Jac. 262; 1 Ld. Raym. 251. So it lies in some cases for taking animals feræ naturæ, and not reclaimed; as if a hare or rabbit be killed on the land of another, he having a local property ratione soli in such hare or rabbit, may support trespass for taking it, though the wrongdoer did not enter the land. 2 Salk. 556; 1 Ld. Raym. 251.

In trespass for taking goods, the plaintiff must allege a property in himself, because in such case there may be two intendments, one that they were the defendant's own goods, and then the taking is lawful; and the other, that they were the goods of the plaintiff, when the taking will be wrongful; but wherever the construction is indifferent, it shall always be most strong against the plaintiff. 2 Lev. 20; Yelv. 36.

With respect to the plaintiff's interest in the personal property affected, he must, at the time the injury was committed, have had an actual or constructive possession; 1 T. R. 480; 4 T. R. 496; 7 T. R. 9; and also a general or qualified property therein, which may be either, 1st, in the case of the absolute or general owner entitled to immediate possession; 2dly, the qualified owner coupled with an interest, and also entitled to immediate possession; 1 B. & P. 44; 7 T. R. 9; 3dly, a bailee with a mere naked authority, unaccompanied with any interest, except as to remuneration for trouble, &c. but who is in actual possession; or, 4thly, actual possession, though without the consent of the real owner, and even adverse.

In the first instance, the person who has the absolute or general property may support this action, although he has never had the actual possession, or although he has parted with his possession to a carrier, servant, &c. giving him only a bare authority to carry or keep, &c. not coupled with an interest in the thing; 7 T. R. 12; 12 East, 33; it being a rule of law that the general property of personal chattels primâ facie, as to all civil purposes, draws to it the possession. 2 Saund. 47, a, b, d; 2 Bulstr. 268; 7 T. R. 9. But if the general owner part with his possession, and the bailee, at the time when the injury was committed, have a right exclusively to use the thing, the interference of possession is rebutted, and the right of possession being in reversion, the general owner cannot support trespass, but only an action on the case, for an injury done by a stranger while the bailee's right continued. 4 T. R. 489; 7 T. R. 9; 15 East, 607. Nor can the general owner in such case support this action even against such bailee for mere abuse; though if a bailee destroy the thing, trespass may be supported if the injury were forcible. If however the general owner merely permit another gratuitously to use the chattel, such owner may sue a stranger for an injury done to it while it was so used. 2 Camp. 464; 3 Camp. 187; 16 East, 33.

In the second case also, that of the bailee who has an authority coupled with an interest, it should seem that trespass may be supported, though he never had actual possession, for any injury done during his interest; 1 B. & P. 45; 16 East, 33. As in the case of a factor or consignee of goods in which he has an interest in respect of his commission, &c. But. N. P. 33; 1 Hen. Bla. 81; 1 T. R. 113; 7 T. R. 359. The quantity or certainty of the interest is not material, and therefore a shopkeeper may maintain trespass for taking goods sent to him on sale or return. 2 Camp. 575. So a tenant for years has a qualified property in the soil growing, and may support trespass for cutting them down, unless they were excepted in the lease, though he cannot support this action for merely carrying the trees away; 2 Camp. 491; 2 M. & S. 499. And if a person have a right to cut all the thorns in such a place, he may sustain trespass against any one who cuts them down, even against the grantor; but if he have only estovers, and the grantor cuts the whole, the remedy is case, and not trespass. 2 Salk. 638; 8 East, 394; 2 M. & S. 499. And a mere gratuitous bailee may support this action, 1 B. & A. 59; or an executor de son tort.

In the third instance, that of a bailee, &c. with a mere naked authority, coupled only with an interest as to remuneration, he may also support this action for any injury done while he was in the actual possession of the thing; as a carrier, factor, paynee, a sheriff, &c. 2 Saund. 47 b; 1 Roll. Abr. 551. But it is otherwise of a mere servant. Owen, 52; 3 Inst. 103; 2 Comm. 396; 2 Saund. 47 b, c, d.

However, the master of a fly-boat, hired by a canal company at weekly wages, may maintain trespass for an injury done to a rope belonging to the boat. 2 B. & Ad. 817. See also 1 Salk. 10.

An instance of the fourth description is the finder of any article, who may maintain trespass or trover against any person but the real owner. 2 Saund. 47 d; 4 Taunt. 547. And even a person having an illegal possession may support this action against any person but the legal owner. 2 Saund. 47 c; 3 Wils. 332; 1 East, 244. And a person in possession under an assignment, fraudulent as against creditors, may support trespass against a person who cannot show that he was justified in what he did as a creditor. 2 Marsh. 233.

With respect to the nature of the injury, it may be either by an unlawful taking of the personal chattel, or by injuring it whilst in the possession of the general owner, or of a person having a special property in it, as a bailee.

Trespass is a concurrent remedy with trover for most illegal takings. 3 Wils. 336. Thus even in the case of a distress for rent, where there has been an illegal taking, as for distraining when no rent was due, or taking implements of trade or beasts of husbandry when there was sufficiency of other property, 1 Burr. 579; 4 T. R. 565; or a horse while his rider was upon him, 4 T. R. 469; 6 T. R. 138; or if a distress be made, the outer door being shut; or if the party expel the tenant, or continue in possession without leave more than five days, trespass lies, 1 East, 139; 11 East, 395; for the 11 Geo. 2. c. 19, which enacts, that a party distraining for rent shall not be a trespasser ab initio, 1 H. Bl. 13, only relates to wrongs done after a lawful taking. 1 Lyp. 382.

So if a man voluntarily take away my goods or cattle, and keep them till I pay him money, on pretence that they are his heriot, &c. when they are not so, I may have action of trespass. Bro. Tres. 354.

This action also lies though there has been no wrongful intent, 1 Camp. 497; 2 Camp. 576; as if a sheriff or a messenger, on behalf of assignees of a bankrupt, by mistake take the goods of a wrong person. 2 Camp. 576.

Thus if the sheriff have a writ against the lands and goods of one man, and he by mistake execute it upon my lands or goods; this action lies against him, and it will be no excuse that the plaintiff or any other informed him they were the goods, &c. of the defendant. Dyer, 296; Keilw. 119, 129.

But it does not lie in the case of a levy under an execution after a secret act of bankruptcy, when trover only can be supported. 1 T. R. 480. If the sheriff or a stranger illegally take the goods of another in execution, and sell and deliver them to a third person, trespass cannot be supported against the latter, because they came to him without fault on his part. 2 Roll. Abr. 556, pl. 50. But if a second trespasser take goods out of the custody of the first trespasser, the owner may support trespass against such second taker, his act not being excusable. Sid. 438. This action may be supported against a bailee who has only a bare authority, as if a servant take goods of his master out of his shop, and convert them. 1 Leon. 87; Cro. Eliz. 781. So it is sustainable by an outgoing tenant against the incoming tenant for taking manure, though the latter had a right to it on paying for it. 16 East, 116. But in general trespass is not sustainable against a bailee who has the possession coupled with an interest, unless he destroy the chattel; nor against a joint-tenant or tenant in common for merely taking away and holding exclusively the property from his co-tenant, 1 T. R. 658; Comp. 480; because each has an interest in the whole, and a right to dispose thereof. 1 Lev. 29; 8 T. R. 145. But if the thing be destroyed, trespass lies, and case may be supported for injuring the thing. 1 Ld. Raym. 737; 8 T. R. 145. A bailee of a chattel for a certain time, coupled with an interest, may support this action against the bailor for taking it away before the time; Godb. 173; and it lies, though after the illegal taking, the goods be restored. Bro. Abr. Tresp. pl. 221.

When the taking is unlawful, either the general owner or the bailee, if answerable over, may support trespass; but a recovery by one is a bar to an action by the other, 2 Saund. 47 e; and it will not lie for a refusal to deliver when the first taking was lawful, trover or detinue being in such case the only remedies. Sir T. Ray. 472; 2 Ventr. 170.

Trespass also lies for any immediate injury to personal property occasioned by actual or implied force, though the wrong-doer might not take away or dispose of the chattel, as for shooting or beating a dog or other live animal, or for hunting or chasing sheep, &c.; Barnes, 452; 3 T. R. 37; or for mixing water with wine; F. N. B. 88; or running down a ship or a carriage; 1 Camp. 497; 3 East, 593. But it is said, though without reason, that for a mere battery of a horse, not accompanied with special damage, no action can be supported.

In some instances trespass may also be supported for an injury committed to personal property whilst in the lawful adverse possession of the wrong-doer, as where he has been guilty of an abuse which renders him a trespasser ab initio. Bacon's Abr. Tresp. B. This obtains in general whenever the person who first acted with propriety under an authority or licence given by law afterwards abuses it, in which case the taking as well as the real tortious act may be stated to be illegal, as in the Six Carpenters' case, 8 Co. 146 b; or for cutting nets lawfully taken damage feasant; or for working a horse, &c. distrained. Cro. Jac. 147; 3 Wils. 20; 1 T. R. 12. But in the case of a distress for rent, we have seen that in general a party cannot become a trespasser ab initio by an irregularity when the caption was lawful. See 1 Chitty on Pleading.

III. TRESPASS, in a limited and confined sense, as relates to land, signifies no more than an entry on another man's ground without a lawful authority, and doing some damage, however inconsiderable, to his real property. For the right of meum and tuum, or property in lands, being once established, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that this right must be exclusive; that is, that the owner may retain to himself the sole use and occupation of his soil; every entry therefore thereon, without the owner's leave, and especially if contrary to his express order, is a trespass or transgression, for satisfaction of which an action of trespass will lie; but the quantum of that satisfaction is to be determined by considering how far the offence was wilful or inadvertent, and by estimating the value of the actual damage sustained. 3 Comm. c. 12.

Every unwarrantable entry on another's soil the law entitles a trespass, by breaking his close; the words of the writ of trespass commanding the defendant to show cause quare clausum quarentis fregit. For every man's land is, in the eye of the law, enclosed and set apart from his neighbour's; and that either by a visible and material fence, as one field is divided from another by a hedge; or by an ideal invisible boundary, existing only in the contemplation of law, as when one man's land adjoins to another's in the same field. And every such entry or breach of a man's close carries necessarily along with it some damage or other; for if no other special loss can be assigned, yet still the words of the writ itself specify one general damage, viz. the treading down and bruising his herbage. F. N. B. 87, 88.

A man is answerable for not only his own trespass, but that of his cattle also; for if by his negligent keeping they stray upon the land of another, (and much more if he permits, or drives them on,) and they there tread down his neighbour's herbage, and spoil his corn or his trees, this is a trespass for which the owner must answer in damages. And the law gives the party injured a double remedy in this case; by permitting him to distrain the cattle thus damage feasant, or doing damage, till the owner shall make him satisfaction; or else by leaving him to the common remedy by action. And the action that lies in either of these cases of trespass committed upon another's land, either by a man himself or his cattle, is the action of trespass vi et armis; whereby a man is called upon to answer, quare vi et armis clausum ipsius A. apud B. fregit, et blada ipsius A. ad valentiam centum solidorum ibidem nuper crescentia, cum quibusdam averiis depastus fuit, conculcavit, et consumpsit, &c. Registr. 94. For the law always couples the idea of force with that of intrusion upon the property of another. And herein, if any unwarrantable act of the defendant or his beasts, in coming upon the land be proved, it is an act of trespass for which the plaintiff must recover some damages; such however as the jury shall think proper to assess. 3 Comm. c. 12.

If A. is bound to fence his close against B., and he against C. a neighbour; and neither of them inclose against one another, so that the beasts of C., for want of inclosure, go out of the ground to that of B., and thence to A.'s ground, in this case A. shall have trespass against C., for he is bound only to fence against B., and every one ought to keep his cattle as well in open grounds, not inclosed, as in several grounds where there is inclosure. Dyer, 366; Jenk. Cent. 161.

In cases where a man misdemeanors himself, or makes an ill use of the authority with which the law entrusts him, he shall be accounted a trespasser ab initio: as if one comes into a tavern and will not go out in a reasonable time, but tarries there all night, contrary to the inclinations of the owner; this wrongful act shall affect and have relation back even to his first entry, and make the whole a trespass. Finch. L. 47; Cro. Jac. 148; 2 Roll. Abr. 361. But a bare non-feasance, as not paying for the wine he calls for, will not make him a trespasser; for this is only a breach of contract for which the taverner shall have an action of debt or assumpsit against him. 8 Rep. 147. So, if a landlord distrained for rent, and wilfully killed the distress, this, by the common law, made him a trespasser ab initio: and so indeed would any other irregularity have done, till the statute 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. See Finch. L. 47; and tit. Distress. But still, if a reversioner, who enters on pretence of seeing waste, breaks the house, or stays there all night; or if the commoner, who comes to tend his cattle, cuts down a tree: in these and similar cases the law judges that he entered for this unlawful purpose; and therefore, as the act which demonstrates such his purpose is a trespass, he shall be esteemed a trespasser ab initio. 8 Rep. 146.

Trespass lies generally for breaking a man's close; for chasing cattle, whereby they die or are injured; taking away pales, and breaking of fences, or of doors or windows of a house; for driving a cart and horses over the ground of another, where there is no way for it; fishing in another person's pond, and for breaking the pond; for eating the corn of another with cattle, and digging in any man's coal-mines, and carrying away coals; for taking away so much of the plaintiff's money; tearing a bond, &c. 1 Bro. Ab. 338; 1 Saund. 220; 2 Cro. 463; Latch. 144.

Trespass lies for setting the end of a bridge on another man's soil, though it be a highway; 2 Strange, 1004; and for erecting a stall in a market without agreeing for stallage. Ibid. 1238.

It lies, however unintentional the trespass, 3 Lev. 27; 1 Campb. 497; 2 Campb. 576; and though the locus in quo were uninclosed, Doc. & Stud. 30; 7 East, 207; or the door of the house were open, if the entry were not for a justifiable purpose, Bac. Ab. Trespass, F; 2 Roll. Abr. 555, l. 15; and even shooting at and killing game on another's land, though without an actual entry, is in law an entry, 11 Mod. 74, 130; 1 Stark. 58; though in general, when the injury was committed off the plaintiff's land; or by causing something to be suspended over it, but not touching it, the remedy must be case, 2 Burr. 1114; 11 Mod. 74, 130; 1 Stark. 59. And a mere nonfeazance, as leaving tithe on land, is not sufficient to support trespass: and it should seem, that for the mere continuance of an injury, for the inception of which the plaintiff has already recovered damages, case, and not trespass, is the proper remedy. 1 Stark. 22

With respect to the nature of the injury to real property, trespass only can be supported when the injury is committed with force, actual or implied and immediate. As to these injuries in general, see Com. Dig. Trespass, A. 2; Bac. Ab. Trespass, F.

As to the person by and against whom this action may be supported, it seems that actual possession is necessary to support the action; and if the right of possession be in reversion, it clearly cannot be sustained. Trespass lies against a mere tenant at will for pulling down a house, or cutting trees during tenancy at will, the interest being thereby determined, Cro. Eliz. 784; 5 Co. 13 b; Co. Litt. 57 a; Saville, 84; but against a lessee for years trespass for cutting down trees does not lie, and case in the nature of waste is the only remedy for the cutting, unless the trees were excepted in the lease, Atkyns, 83; 1 Saund. 322, n. 5; 4 Taunt. 316; though if he afterwards take the trees away, trespass or trover lies; id. ibid.; 7 T. R. 13; and if the trees be excepted in the lease, and he cut them down, trespass quare clausum fregit lies for such cutting, Bro. Trespass, pl. 55; 1 Saund. 322, n. 5; Bac. Ab. Trespass, C. 3. A tenant for years cannot support trespass against a stranger merely for carrying away trees cut down during his term. 2 Campb. 491; 2 M. & S. 499.

One must have a property (either absolute or temporary) in the soil, and actual possession by entry, to be able to maintain an action of trespass; or, at least, it is requisite that the party have a lease and possession of the vesture and herbage of the land. Dyer, 285; Mo. 456; 6 East, 602. Thus, if a meadow be divided annually among the parishioners by lot, then, after each person's several portion is allotted, they may be respectively capable of maintaining an action for the breach of their closes; for they have an exclusive interest and freehold therein for the time. Cro. Eliz. 421.

There is a material distinction between personal and real property as to the right of the owner: in the first case we have seen that the general property draws to it the possession sufficient to enable the owner to support trespass, though he has never been in possession. 2 Saund. 47 a; Bul. N. P. 33. But in the case of land and other real property there is no such constructive possession, and unless the plaintiff had the actual possession by himself or his servant, 16 East, 33, at the time when the injury was committed, he cannot support this action. 5 East, 485—487; Bac. Ab. Trespass, C. 3. Thus, before entry and actual possession, a person cannot maintain trespass, though he hath the freehold in law, as a parson before induction, Fin. Abr. Entry, G. 4. and Trespass, S.; Bac. Abr. Leases, M.; Plowd. 528; or a donee of a fine, 2 Leon. 147; or a purchaser by lease or release, though the statute executes the use, Carter, 66; Fin. Abr. Trespass, S. pl. 13, 14; Noy, 73; or an heir, Plowd. 142; 2 Mod. 7 n. a; devisee against an abator, 2 Mod. 7; or a lessee for years before entry, Bac. Ab. Leases, M.; Plowd. 142.

But a parson, after induction, may maintain this action for glebe land, though he make no actual entry, for the induction puts him in possession of part for the whole, 2 B. & A. 470; and a disseisee may have it against a disseisor for the disseisin itself, because he was then in possession; but not for an injury after the disseisin, 2 Roll. Abr. 553; Dyer, 98; 3 Bl. Can. 210; until he hath gained possession by re-entry; and then he may support this action for the intermediate damage; for after the entry the law, by a kind of jus postlimini, supposes the freehold to have all along continued in him. Fin. Abr. Trespass, 6; 11 Co. 51 a; 3 Comm. 210. And after recovery in ejectment this action may be supported for mesne profits, though anterior to the time of the demise in the declaration in ejectment. Run. Eject. 442; 2 Burr. 66, 67; Peake's Law of Evid. 326.

By the common law, in case of an intrusion or forfeiture, the party kept out of possession could not sue the wrong-doer by a mode of redress which was calculated merely for injuries committed against the land while in the possession of the owner. But now, by the 6 Ann. c. 18. if a guardian or trustee for any infant, a husband seized jure uxoris, or a person having any estate or interest determinable upon a life or lives, shall, after the determination of their respective interests, hold over and continue in possession of the lands or tenements, without the consent of the person entitled thereto, they are adjudged to be trespassers. See also 4 Geo. 2. c. 18. and 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. as to tenants for years, &c. holding over; and ante, tit. Distress, Rent, Suffrance, &c.

A remainder-man, after entering upon a party in possession by intrusion, may maintain trespass against the intruders, though he retains possession. 1 M. & R. 220; 7 B. & C. 399.

A grant of part of the chancel of a church by a lay improprator to A., his heirs and assigns, is not valid in law; and therefore such grantee, or those claiming under him, cannot maintain trespass for pulling down their pews there erected. 1 B. & A. 498.

The plaintiff conveyed a chapel to A. (under whom the defendant justified) by a deed, the validity of which was disputable. A. however took possession and gave the key to a servant, who, with A.'s permission, lent the chapel to the plaintiff to preach in. The plaintiff locked the chapel and retained the key, upon which the defendant ordered the chapel to be broken open. Held, that the plaintiff had not such a possession as would entitle him to sue in trespass. 4 Bing. 7.

IV. The application of the action of trespass to injuries committed under colour of a legal proceeding may be considered under the seven following heads:—

First.—In general no action whatever can be supported for any act, however erroneous, if expressly sanctioned by the judgment or direction of one of the superior courts at Westminster, or even by an inferior magistrate acting within the scope of his jurisdiction. 1 Wils. 232; 1 T. R. 545; 7 T. R. 634, n. a; 3 M. & S. 411. And no action will lie against a judge for what he does judicially, though it were done maliciously. 7 State Trials, 442; 3 M. & S. 425. And this action does not lie, though the magistrates were not duly qualified to act. 3 B. & A. 266.

So trespass does not lie against magistrates acting upon a complaint made to them on oath, by the terms of which it appeared that they had jurisdiction, though the real facts of the case might not have supported such complaint, if such facts were not laid before them at the time by the party complained against, having notice of such complaint, and being properly summoned to attend. 8 East, 113.

In the only exception to this rule, that of a judgment obtained by threats or undue influence, an action of trespass against the person guilty of such conduct appears to be the proper remedy. 2 Black. 1055; 1 T. R. 538. And when in inferior courts the error in the proceeding is such as to render it an excess of jurisdiction, trespass may be supported for any thing done under such proceeding. Sir W. Jones, 178; 1 Wils. 292; 1 T. R. 545. And in case of an error by a ministerial officer, this action may be supported, if the injury complained of was committed with force and immediate. 1 Ld. Raym. 471; 1 Salk. 395.

Secondly.—When the court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter, trespass is the proper form of action against all the parties for any act which, independently of the process, would be remediable by this action, or by trover, if goods have been taken; Hardr. 483; 1 B. & B. 432; as where commissioners find water to be wine; Hardr. 483. And it has been decided, that when the proceedings in the court, having no jurisdiction, are adopted by a party with an express malicious intent, though there be a demand recoverable elsewhere, an action on the case may be supported, 10 Co. 78 a; 2 Stra. 993; 3 Wils. 345; or where the party maliciously and unduly issues a second feri facias, Hob. 205, 206; and where a party maliciously procured a magistrate to grant an illegal warrant, it was held he was liable in case for the malice. 2 Chit. R. 304.

Trespass is also the proper remedy where an inferior court has jurisdiction over the subject-matter, but is bound to adopt certain forms in its proceedings, from which it deviates, and whereby the proceedings are rendered coram non judice. Sir W. Jones, 171; 1 East, 61. But it lies not for arresting a person privileged either personally or locally, but case is the only remedy. 10 Co. 76 b; Doug. 646; 3 Wils. 379.

Thirdly.—When a court has jurisdiction, but the proceeding is defective, as being irregular or void, trespass against the attorney and plaintiff is in general the proper form to action, 3 Wils. 341; 2 Black. 845; and where a judgment has been set aside for irregularity, this is the appropriate remedy for an act done under it, 1 Stra. 509; and in the 2 T. R. 225, it was decided that an action on the case could not be sustained against a magistrate for issuing an irregular warrant, though maliciously; and that the action should have been trespass, (see also 2 Stra. 710; 3 M. & S. 425, 627;) for in general no action can be supported against a magistrate for any thing done by him in that capacity on the ground of malice, 1 Wils. 292; 1 T. R. 545; and if there be an irregularity, that must be treated as such in an action of trespass. But with regard to a party issuing irregular process, there seems no reason why the person prejudiced should not be at liberty to support an action on the case against him where there was no cause of action, and the proceeding was malicious as well as irregular, Styler, 378; 2 Wils. 302; for it would be allowing him to take advantage of his own wrong, to suffer him to turn the plaintiff round on such an objection, after he had in an action on the case proved the malicious and unfounded conduct of the defendant; and where a party maliciously procured a magistrate to issue an illegal warrant, he was liable in an action on the case. 2 Chit. R. 304.

Fourthly.—When the process has been misapplied, as when A. or his goods be taken upon process against B. trespass is in general the only remedy, 2 Wils. 309; 2 Black. 835; or if there be a misnomer in the process, though it be executed on the person or goods of the party against whom it was in fact issued. 6 T. R. 234; 8 East, 328.

Fifthly.—When the process of a court has been abused, 2 T. R. 234, trespass against the sheriff and his officer, or other ministerial officer, 2 B. & A. 472, committing the abuse, is the proper action, if the conduct of the officer was in the first instance illegal, and an immediate injury to the body, personal or real property; as if the officer arrest out of the sheriff's bailiwick, Sir T. Jones, 214; 2 Black. 834; or after the return day of the writ, 2 Esp. 585; or if he break open an outer door, &c., Comp. 1; or seize under a feri facias fixtures of the defendant, who was a freeholder, 5 B. & A. 625. So, though the conduct of the officer was in the first instance lawful, but he abused his authority, and thereby became a trespasser ab initio. 2 Black. 1218.

And in some cases, though the abuse be merely a nonfeasance, trespass is the proper remedy; as if a sheriff neglect to discharge the party out of custody when he ought to do so, as for fees not due. 1 Wils. 153. These rules also hold as to the ministerial officers of courts of inferior jurisdiction, who abuse the trust reposed in them. However, in general, when the act complained of consists of a mere nonfeasance, as if the sheriff, or a magistrate, &c. improperly refuse bail, or to act, when they should do so, an action of trespass is not the proper remedy, but case. 3 B. & P. 551; 3 M. & S. 421.

Sixthly.—When a ministerial officer proceeds without warrant, on the information of another, trespass, and not case, is the proper form of action against the informer, if the information turn out unfounded, 6 T. R. 316; and when an officer proceeds without warrant and without foundation, upon his own apprehension, though there was probable cause, trespass is the proper form of action against him. 1 Salk. 396; 1 Ld. Raym. 454.

Seventhly.—But no person who acts upon a regular writ or warrant can be liable to this action, however malicious his conduct; but case, for the malicious motive and proceeding is the only form of action. 3 T. R. 185; 6 T. R. 315.

Trespass will not lie against a ministerial officer for any thing done merely in pursuance of his duty, though it is somewhat in support of a wrong, but a wrong to which he is no way accessory or assenting. As, where a distress is tortiously taken and impounded, an action will not lie against the pound-keeper. Comp. 476.

If a constable show to a party a magistrate's warrant against him, and the party then voluntarily accompany the constable to a magistrate without any personal arrest, and the magistrate, on examination, dismiss the party, this is not such an arrest as will enable him to support a trespass and false imprisonment against the constable. 2 New R. 211; and see 3 Comp. 139.

So also where a sheriff's officer, to whom a warrant on a writ against A. was delivered, sent a message to A. and asked him to fix a time to call and give bail; and A. accordingly fixed a time and gave bail; it was held that this was not an arrest on which an action for a malicious arrest could be supported, although the plaintiff in the action had no cause of action against A. 6 Barn. & C. 528; and see Ry. & Moo. Ca. 26; Moo. & Mal. Ca. 246; and see Ry. & Moo. Ca. 321.

Under peculiar circumstances it may be lawful to lay hands on a party to serve him with process. 10 B. & C. 44.

Where in an action for false imprisonment against a justice the jury found that the commitment was bona fide and intended for re-examination, but that it was for an unreasonable time; and it was objected that case was the proper remedy, and that trespass was not maintainable for such a commitment without improper or indirect motives; the court held the action well brought, and intimated an opinion, that where the time is unreasonable, the commitment is void from the beginning. 10 B. & C. 28.

Executors may bring trespass for goods taken out of their possession, or for goods and chattels taken in the life of the testator. Also administrators shall have it for goods of intestates; and an ordinary may bring action of trespass for goods in his own possession to administer as ordinary, &c.

Trespass will not lie against the master or seamen of a king's ship or privateer for taking a vessel as prize on the seas, though the capture is afterwards determined to be illegal in the Court of Admiralty; for questions of prize or not prize belong exclusively to that court, which gives damages for the detention. Rous v. Hassard, Doug. 580. See 1 Lev. 243; Sid. 267; Lindo v. Rodney, Doug. 501.

With respect to officers in the excise and customs various acts of parliament have been made to protect them in the exercise of their duty, that they might not be harassed with actions of trespass where they have acted bona fide. See 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 53; and 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 53.

V. The declaration in this action contains a concise statement of the injury complained of, whether to the person, or to personal or real property, and it should allege that such injury was committed vi et armis and contra pacem.

In all trespasses there ought to be a voluntary act, and also a damage; and in detinue and trover, where the thing itself is in demand, it should be particularly named; if trespass be laid in a declaration for the taking of goods, without expressing the quantity and quality of them, or the value, &c. it is bad upon a general demurrer; though, as to the omission of the value, it hath been held to be good after verdict. Latch. 13; Styl. 170, 230; Lutw. 1384; Sid. 39.

In trespasses of a permanent nature, where the injury is continually renewed, (as by spoiling or consuming the herbage with the defendant's cattle,) the declaration may allege the injury to have been committed by continuation from one given day to another; (which is called laying the action with a continuando;) and the plaintiff shall not be compelled to bring separate actions for every day's separate offence. 2 Roll. Abr. 545; Ld. Raym. 240. But where the trespass is by one or several acts, each of which terminates in itself, and being once done cannot be done again, it cannot be laid with a continuando; yet if there be repeated acts of trespass committed, (as cutting down a certain number of trees,) they may be laid to be done, not continually, but at divers days and times within a given period. Salk. 638, 639; Ld. Raym. 823; 7 Mod. 152.

Things must lie in continuance, and not terminate in themselves, or a continuando will not be good. And where a trespass is alleged with a continuance, that cannot be continued, the evidence ought only to be to the first act. 2 Salk. 638, 639.

The best way to declare for such trespasses which lie in continuance, is for the plaintiff to set forth in his declaration that the defendant, between such a day and such a day, cut several trees, &c. and not to lay a continuando transgressionis from such a day to such a day; and upon such declaration, the plaintiff may give in evidence a cutting on any day within those days. 3 Salk. 360.

Now by the rules of H. T. 4 Wm. 4. several counts in trespass for acts committed at the same time and place are not to be allowed.

If the defendant makes the place where the trespass was done material by his plea, he must show it with great certainty; but if it be a trespass quare clausum fregit in B. and the defendant pleads that the place where is his freehold, which is the common bar in this case, so justifies as in his freehold, &c. if issue be taken thereon, the defendant may give in evidence any close in which he hath a freehold; though if the plaintiff had replied and given the close a name, defendant must have a freehold in that very close. 2 Salk. 473; Cather's Rep. 170.

By the rules above mentioned in actions of trespass quare clausum fregit, the close or place in which, &c. must be described in the declaration by name, abutals, or other description, in failure whereof the defendant may demur specially.

In actions quare clausum fregit, the plea of not guilty, shall operate as a denial that the defendant committed the trespass alleged in the place mentioned, but not as a denial of the plaintiff's possession or right of possession of that place, which, if intended to be denied, must be traversed specially.

In actions of trespass, de bonis asportatis, the plea of not guilty shall operate as a denial of the defendant having committed the trespass alleged, by taking or damaging the goods mentioned, but not of the plaintiff's property therein.

Where in action of trespass quare clausum fregit, the defendant pleads a right of way with carriages and cattle and on foot in the same plea, and issue is taken thereon, the plea shall be taken distributively; and if a right of way with cattle or on foot only shall be found by the jury, a verdict shall pass for the defendant in respect of such of the trespasses proved as shall be justified by the right of way so found, and for the plaintiff in respect of such of the trespasses as shall not be so justified.

And where in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit the defendant pleads a right of common of pasture for divers kinds of cattle, ex gr. horses, sheep, oxen, and cows, and issue is taken thereon, if a right of common for some particular kind of commonable cattle only be found by the jury, a verdict shall pass for the defendant in respect of such of the trespasses proved as shall be justified by the right of common so found, and for the plaintiff in respect of the trespasses which shall not be so justified. And in all actions in which such right of way or common as aforesaid, or similar right, is so pleaded that the allegations as to the extent of the right are capable of being construed distributively, they shall be taken distributively.

A plaintiff may make a new assignment of the place where, &c. and then the defendant may vary from his first justification. As, for instance, an action of trespass assigned to be done generally in D., the defendant justified the taking damage-feasant; and the plaintiff in his replication made a new assignment, upon which the defendant justified for a heriot; and it was adjudged good. Moor, 540. The defendant in his plea may put the plaintiff to the new assignment; and every new assignment is a new declaration, to which the defendant is to give a new answer, and he may not traverse it, but must either plead or demur; yet where trespasses are alleged to be done in several places, and the defendant pleads to some, and agrees to the places wherein the plaintiff alleged the trespasses to be done, there the plaintiff may answer that part of the plea by a traverse, and show a new assignment as to the rest. Cro. Eliz. 492, 812. See Pleading, New Assignment.

One action of trespass may be brought for a trespass committed in lands which lie in several towns or villis, if they are in one and the same county; for else they cannot receive one trial, as they are local causes of action triable in the county where done. 2 Litt. Abr. 595.

As trespass quare clausum fregit is a local action, trespass for breaking and entering a house in Canada in America will not lie in this country. 4 T. R. 503.

In some cases trespass is justifiable; or, rather, entry on another's land or house shall not in those cases be accounted trespass: as, if a man comes thither to demand or pay money there payable; or to execute, in a legal manner, the process of the law. Also a man may justify entering into an inn or public house, without the leave of the owner first specially asked; because, when a man professes the keeping of such inn or public house, he thereby gives a general license to any person to enter his doors. See tit. Inns. So a landlord may justify entering to distrain for rent; a commoner to attend his cattle, commoning on another's land; and a reversioner, to see if any waste be committed on the estate; for the apparent necessity of the thing. 8 Rep. 146. Also it hath been said, that, by the common law and custom of England, the poor are allowed to enter and glean upon another's ground after the harvest, without being guilty of trespass; but modern determinations have denied this right. See Gleaning.

The common law warrants the hunting of ravenous beasts of prey, as badgers and foxes, in another man's land; because the destroying such creatures is said to be profitable to the public. Cro. Jac. 321. But in the case of hunting the fox or the badger, a man cannot justify breaking the soil, and digging him out of his earth; for though the law warrants the hunting of such noxious animals for the public good, yet it is held that such things must be done in an ordinary and usual manner; therefore, as there is an ordinary course to kill them, viz. by hunting, the court held that the digging for them was unlawful. Cro. Jac. 321. See further, Game.

If a man hurt my beasts in ground belonging to me, or some other person, he is liable to action of trespass. Though the owner of the land wherein cattle are doing this trespass, may gently by himself, or his dogs, chase them out, and justify the same. Bro. Tresp. 421; 8 Rep. 67.

A man may also justify in an action of trespass, on account of the freehold and right of entry being in himself; and this defence brings the title of the estate in question. This is, therefore, one of the ways devised, since the disuse of real actions, to try the property of estates; though it is not so usual as that by ejectment, because that being now a mixed action not only gives damages for the ejectment, but also possession of the land: whereas in trespass, which is merely a personal suit, the right can be only ascertained, but no possession delivered; nothing being recovered but damages for the wrong committed. 3 Comm. c. 12. See Ejectment.

One justification in trespass also arises from the leave or licence of the party complaining; and as to this, the following has been stated as the difference:

There is difference between a positive abuse of an authority or licence in fact, and of an authority or licence in law: the reason of this difference is in one book said to be, that the abuse in the latter case is deemed a trespass with force ab initio; because the law intends from the subsequent tortious act, that there was from the beginning a design to be guilty thereof. 8 Rep. 146. The Six Carpenters' case.

But this reason, which equally applies to both cases, is by no means conclusive; for it may be as well intended in the former case, from the subsequent tortious act, that there was from the beginning a design of being guilty thereof. Perhaps the difference between the two cases may be better accounted for in the following manner: in the one, where the law has given an authority or licence, it seems reasonable that the same law should, in order to secure the persons, who are without their direct assent made the objects thereof, from all positive abuses of such authority or licence, whenever either of these is positively abused, make the same void from the beginning; and leave the abuser thereof in the same situation as if he had acted without any authority or licence. And this agrees perfectly with the maxim, Actus legis nemini facit injuriam. But in the other case, where a man, who was under no necessity of giving an authority or licence to any person, has thought proper to give one of these to a certain person, who is afterwards guilty of a positive abuse thereof, there is no reason that the law should interpose, and make all that has been done under the authority or licence by him so voluntarily given, void from the beginning; because it was his own folly to place a confidence in a man who was not fit to be trusted. Bac. Abr. Trespass.

Where a defendant justifies a trespass for preventing a tortious act of the plaintiff, if the plaintiff relies on a licence which rendered his act lawful, he ought to reply the licence. 7 Taunt. 156.

In action of trespass against two persons for carrying away goods, &c. one lets judgment go by default, and the other justifies under a licence from the plaintiff, and has a verdict; this goes to the whole, and judgment shall be arrested as to the other defendant. 2 Ld. Raym. 1372, 1374.

In the execution of a criminal process against any man in the case of a misdemeanor, it is necessary to demand admittance before the breaking of the outer door can be legally justified. It seems otherwise in the case of felony. 2 B. & A. 592. See 5 Co. Rep. 91; and tit. Arrest.

A private person may justify breaking and entering the house of another and imprisoning his person in order to prevent him from committing murder on his wife. 2 Bos. & Pull. 260.

To trespass for assault and battery the defendant may plead that the plaintiff, with force and arms, and with a strong hand, endeavoured forcibly to break and enter the plaintiff's close, whereupon the defendant "did then and there resist and oppose such entrance, and did then and there defend his possession, as it was lawful for him to do;" and if any damage happened to the plaintiff, it was in the defence of the possession of the said close. 8 T. R. 78.

In trespass quare clausum fregit, where the defendant in his plea claims an interest in the land, a replication de injuria is bad on general demurrer. 1 C., M. & R. 258; and see 3 Lev. 65; 3 B. & Ad. 2.

A subsequent assent makes the party a co-trespasser only where the trespass was committed for his benefit. 4 B. & Ad. 614; 1 N. & M. 409.

If the defendant, in trespass quare clausum fregit, disclaim any title to the land, and the trespass is involuntary, or by negligence, he may be admitted to plead a disclaimer and tender of amends before the action brought, &c. And if it be found for the defendant, the plaintiff shall be barred. 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. See Tender.

In general the court will not stay proceedings in trespass upon payment of a sum of money and costs, not even in the action of trespass for mesne profits, because the damages in these cases cannot be ascertained without the intervention of a jury, 2 Stra. 906; 7 B. & C. 379; but under peculiar circumstances, proceedings have been stayed in this action. See 7 T. R. 53.

In order to prevent trifling and vexatious actions of trespass as well as other personal actions, it is (inter alia) enacted by the 43 Eliz. c. 8; 22 & 25 Car. 2. c. 9. § 136. that where the jury, who try an action of trespass, give less damages than 40s. the plaintiff shall be allowed no more costs than damages, unless the judge shall certify under his hand that the freehold or title of the land came chiefly in question. But this rule now admits of an exception made by the 8 & 9 Wm. 3. c. 11. which enacts, that in all actions of trespass, wherein it shall appear that the trespass was wilful and malicious, and it be so certified by the judge, the plaintiff shall recover full costs. Every trespass is wilful, where the defendant has notice, and is especially forewarned not to come on the land; as every trespass is malicious, though the damage may not amount to forty shillings, where the intent of the defendant plainly appears to be to harass and distress the plaintiff; as in cases of sportsmen warned to go off or not to come again on another's land. Esp. N. P. 4-5.

There was formerly another exception under the 1 & 5 W. & M. c. 23, which gave full costs against any intruder, tradesman, apprentice, or other dissolute person, convicted of a trespass in hawking, hunting, fishing, or fowling, on another's land; but that statute has been repealed by the 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 32. For the provisions of this act with respect to trespasses committed in pursuit of game, see Game, VII.

TRIAL,

TRIATIO.] The examination of a cause civil or criminal, before a judge who has jurisdiction over it, according to the laws of the land. 1 Inst. 124; Finch. L. 36.

I. Of the Course of Trial in Civil Cases.

II. ————— in Criminal Cases.

III. Of New Trials.

I. TRIAL is the examination of the matter of fact in issue of which there are many different species, according to the difference of the subject to be tried: as for example, trial by record, by inspection or examination, by certificate, by witnesses, and by jury.

The first four of these species of trial are only had in certain special and eccentric cases, where the trial by the country, per pais, or by jury, would not be so proper or effectual. See Certificate, Inspection, Record, as to those trials.

There were formerly two other kinds of trial, by wager of battle and by wager of law; but the former was abolished by the 57 Geo. 3. c. 46. and the latter by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. See further, Battle, Wager of Law.

Trial by witnesses, per testes, without the intervention of a jury, is the only method of trial known to the civil law, and is adopted by depositions in Chancery; the judge is thus left to form, in his own breast, his sentence, upon the credit of the witnesses examined. But it is very rarely used at common law, which prefers the trial by jury before it, in almost every instance, save only that when a widow brings a writ of dower, and the tenant pleads that the husband is not dead; this being looked upon as a dilatory plea, is in favour of the widow, and for greater expedition allowed to be tried by witnesses examined before the judges: and so, saith Finch, shall no other case in our law. But Coke mentions some others, as to try whether the tenant in a real action was duly summoned, or the validity of a challenge to a juror, so that Finch's observation must be confined to the trial of direct, and not collateral, issues. And in every case Coke lays it down that the affirmative must be proved by two witnesses at the least. 1 Inst. 6; 3 Comm. c. 22.

With respect to the summoning and appearance of the jury on the trial of civil cases by jury, see Jury, I.

Trials by the country are at bar, nisi prius, or before the sheriff, under the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. See post.

TRIALS AT BAR are those which take place before all the judges at the bar of the court in which the action is brought. Before the stat. Westm. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 30. civil causes were tried either at the bar of the court, or when of no great moment, before the justices in eyre, a practice having very early obtained, of continuing the cause from term to term in the court above, provided the justices in eyre did not previously come into the county where the cause of action arose; and if it happened that they arrived there within that interval, then the cause was removed from the jurisdiction of the justices at Westminster to that of the justices in eyre. See Jury, I. Afterwards, when the justices in eyre were superseded by the modern justices of assize, it was enacted by the above statute, "that inquisitions to be taken of trespasses pleaded before the justices of either bench, shall be determined before the justices of assize, unless the trespass be so heinous that it requires great examination; and that inquisitions of other pleas pleaded in either bench, wherein the examination is easy, shall be also determined before them: but inquisitions of many and weighty matters, which require great examination, shall be taken before the justices of the benches, &c.; and when such inquests are taken, they shall be returned into the benches, and there judgment shall be given, and they shall be inrolled." Since the making of this statute, causes in general are tried at nisi prius, trials at bar being only allowed in ejectment, and other causes which require great examination. This statute, extending only to the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, whenever an issue is joined in the Exchequer, to be tried in the country, there is a particular commission, authorising the judges of assize to try it. Bul. N. P. 304.

When the crown is immediately concerned, the attorney-general has a right to demand a trial at bar. See 8 B. & C. 717. In all other cases it is entirely in the discretion of the court, governed by the circumstances of the case; even if the parties consent, such a mode of trial cannot be had without leave of the court. The grounds on which this trial ought to be granted, are the great value of the subject-matter in question, the probable length of the inquiry, and the likelihood that difficulties may arise in the course of it. In ejectment, it is said, the rule has been not to allow a trial at bar except where the yearly value of the land is 100*l.*; and value alone, or the probable length of the inquiry, is not a sufficient ground for it, but difficulty must concur; and in order to obtain it upon that ground, it is not sufficient to say generally, in an affidavit, that the cause is expected to be difficult, but the particular difficulty which is expected to arise ought to be pointed out, that the court may judge whether it be sufficient. Tidd's Prac. and the authorities there cited.

If one of the justices of either bench, or a master in chancery, be concerned, it is a good cause for a trial at bar, be the value what it may; and it is said, that such trial was never denied to any officer of the court, nor hardly to any gentleman at the bar. The plaintiff may have a trial of this nature by the favour of the court, though he sue in forma pauperis. But where the plaintiff is poor, the court will not grant it to the defendant, unless he will agree to take nisi prius costs if he succeed; and if he fails, to pay bar costs. In London, it is said, a cause cannot be tried at bar, by reason of their charter, which exempts them from serving upon juries out of the city. But the great cause of Lockyer against The East India Company was tried at bar (Mich. 2 Geo. 3.) by a special jury of merchants of London. 2 Salk. 644; 1 T. R. 366. In that case, however, the jury consented to be sworn, and waived their privilege. 2 Wils. 136. And where the cause of action arises in a county palatine, it has been doubted whether the Court of King's Bench can compel the inhabitants of the palatinate to attend as jurors. Tidd's Prac.

A trial at bar is never granted before issue joined, except in ejectment; in which, as issue is very seldom joined till the term is over, it would afterwards be too late to make the application. This sort of trial should regularly be moved for in the term preceding that in which it is intended to be had, as in Hilary for Easter, and in Trinity for Michaelmas Term, except where lands lie in Middlesex; and it is never allowed in an issuable term, unless the crown be concerned in interest, or under very particular and pressing circumstances. In Easter Term they did not formerly allow more than ten trials at bar, and they must have been brought on a fortnight at least before the end of it, to allow sufficient time for the other business of the court. Tidd's Prac.

Now, by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 70. § 7. the judges of the court may appoint such day or days for trials at bar as they shall think fit; and the time so appointed, if in vacation, shall, for the purpose of such trials, be deemed a part of the preceding term.

Anciently there was no other notice given of such trial than the rule in the office; but now there must be fifteen days' notice. The plaintiff, however, as in other cases, may countermand his notice, and prevent the cause from being tried at the day appointed; after which it cannot be brought to trial again, unless some new day be appointed by the court. And it is said that a second rule cannot be made for a trial at bar, between the same parties, in the same term. Previous to giving notice, the day appointed for the trial must be entered with the clerk of the papers; and it could not formerly have been on a Saturday or last paper day in term, except in the king's case. Tidd's Prac.

And by a rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. c. 60. "notice of trial at bar shall be given to the proper officer of the court, before giving notice of trial to the party."

A trial at bar is had upon the venire facias or distringas, &c. as at common law, without any clause of nisi prius; and it is mostly by a special jury of the county where the action is laid. But it may be had, by consent, by a jury of a different county; and in Berwick-upon-Tweed, &c. or where an impartial trial cannot be had, the jury must come from the next adjoining county where the king's writ of venire runs,

Six days' notice at least ought to be given to the jurors before the trial; and if a sufficient number do not attend to make a jury, the trial must be adjourned, and a decem or octo tales awarded, as at common law; for the parties in this case cannot pray a tales upon the statutes. See Jury. And no writ of alias or pluries distringas, with a tales, for the trial of issues at the bar, shall be sued out, before the precedent writ of distringas, with a panel of the names of the jury annexed, shall be delivered to the secondary of the court, to the intent that the issues, forfeited by the jury for not appearing upon the precedent writ, may be duly estreated.

The chief justice (or in his absence the senior judge) sums up the evidence; see 12 St. Tri. 426; and if any question of law arise, either collaterally or as forming a part of the case, each of the judges delivers his opinion upon it seriatim. Id. A bill of exceptions lies upon the reception of improper evidence on a trial at bar. 8 B. & C. 737. And each of the presiding judges may make such observations to the jury, upon the whole case, by way of direction, as he considers to be requisite. Id. In all other respects the trial at bar is the same as a trial at nisi prius; and after a trial at bar, if the parties be dissatisfied with the verdict, they may move for a new trial as in other cases. 1 Burr. 395.

TRIALS AT NISI PRIUS are always had in the county where the venue is laid, and where the fact was or is supposed to have been committed, except where the venue is laid in Berwick-upon-Tweed, &c. or in a county where an impartial trial cannot be had; in which cases the cause shall be tried in the next English or adjoining county where the king's writ of venire runs. Tidd's Prac. By 38 Geo. 3. c. 52. where the venue is laid in the county of any city or town corporate, the trial may be had by a jury of the county next adjoining, &c. See Venue.

In Wales, trials at nisi prius were formerly had in the next English county, but by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 70. § 19. assizes shall be held for the trial and despatch of all matters criminal and civil within the county of Chester, and the several counties and county towns in Wales, under commissions of assize, oyer and terminer, gaol delivery; and other writs and commissions to be issued in like manner as for counties in England.

§ 20. regulates the manner in which such assizes shall be holden in North and South Wales. See Wales.

When the day of trial is fixed, the plaintiff or his attorney must bring down the record to the assizes, and enter it with the proper officer (the clerk of the papers), in order to its being called on in course. If it be not so entered, it cannot be tried; therefore it is in the plaintiff's breast to delay any trial by not carrying down the record, unless the defendant, being fearful of such neglect in the plaintiff, and willing to discharge himself from the action, will himself undertake to bring on the trial, giving proper notice to the plaintiff; which proceeding is called the trial by proviso, by reason of the clause then inserted in the sheriff's venire, viz. "Proviso, provided that if two writs come to your hands (that is, one from the plaintiff and another from the defendant), you shall execute only one of them." But this practice hath begun to be disused since the 14 Geo. 2. c. 17. which enacts that if after issue joined, the cause is not carried down to be tried according to the course of the court, the plaintiff shall be esteemed to be nonsuited, and judgment shall be given for the defendant as in case of a nonsuit. See Nonsuit.

Now, by the rules of H. T. no entry of the issue is necessary to entitle a defendant to take the cause down to trial by proviso; and by another rule of the same term, "no rule for trial by proviso shall be necessary;" and it is also ordered that "no trial by proviso shall be allowed in the same term in which the default of the plaintiff has been made."

A defendant in a case where the king is party cannot carry down the nisi prius record to trial by proviso. 7 T. R. 661; and see 2 East, 202, 206, note.

In case the plaintiff intends to try the cause, he is bound to give the defendant (if he lives within forty miles of London) eight days' notice of trial; and if he lives at a greater distance, then fourteen days' notice, in order to prevent surprise; and if the plaintiff then changes his mind, and does not countermand the notice, six days before the trial, he shall be liable to pay costs to the defendant for not proceeding to trial, by the same last-mentioned statute. The defendant, however, or plaintiff, may, upon good cause shewn to the court above, as upon absence or sickness of a material witness, obtain leave upon motion to defer the trial of the cause till the next assizes. 3 Comm. c. 23.

The time when the countermand is to be given, is now regulated by the rules of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. By r. 61. "in country causes, or where the defendant resides more than forty miles from town, a countermand of notice of trial shall be given six days before the time mentioned in the notice of trial, unless that notice of trial has been given." And by r. 62. "in town causes, or where the defendant lives within forty miles of town, two days' notice of countermand shall be deemed sufficient." And by r. 57, such countermand notice may be given either in town or country, unless otherwise ordered by the court or judge.

The 14 Geo. 2. c. 17. only requires ten days' notice of trial; but at the sittings in London and Westminster, the former practice of fourteen days' notice was still continued. But in all country causes ten days' notice is sufficient. As where the commission day is on the fifteenth of any month, notice of trial must be given on or before the fifth. Imp'ys Prac.

Where a defendant residing in town at the issuing of the writ, changed his residence permanently into the country, at the distance of above forty miles from town, before the delivery of the issue, the Court of King's Bench allowed him to be entitled to fourteen days' notice of trial. 1 East, 688.

If a cause be made a remand, no new notice of trial need be given; but where the trial of a cause is put off to the ensuing sittings or assizes by rule of court, and even when a plaintiff gives a peremptory undertaking to try, a new notice of trial must be given. 8 T. R. 245; 1 H. Bla. 222.

Where there have been no proceedings within four terms, a full term's notice must be given previous to the assizes or sittings, unless the cause has been delayed by the defendant himself, by an injunction or other means. Sutton's Prac. 2 Bla. Rep. 784; 3 T. R. 530; and see 3 East, 1. If the defendant proceed to trial by proviso, he need not give a term's notice. 2 B. & A. 594. In cases where a term's notice of trial is required, by a rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. it may be given at any time before the first day of term. Sometimes the courts impose it as a condition upon the defendant, that he shall accept short notice of trial, which in country causes shall be given at least four days before the commission-day, one day being exclusive, and the other inclusive. 3 T. R. 660. And see the rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. r. 58. But in town causes two days' notice seems sufficient in such a case. Tidd's Prac.

There was formerly a difference in the practice of the courts as to the place of giving notice of trial, which by a rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. r. 57. shall now be given in town.

The old rule for entering causes in London and Middlesex was, that unless they were entered with the chief justice two days before the sittings upon which they were to be tried, the marshal might enter a ne recipiatur at the request of the defendant or his attorney. And this rule still holds with regard to trials at the sittings in term. But if a cause was to be tried at the sittings after term, no ne recipiatur could be entered until after proclamation made, by order of the chief justice, for bringing in the record; and then, if the record was not brought in, the defendant's attorney might enter a ne recipiatur. Tidd's Prac.

At present the practice with regard to entering causes for trial at the sittings after term or assizes stands thus: in Middlesex, no record or writ of nisi prius will be received at any sitting after term, unless the same shall be delivered to and entered with the marshal within two days after the last day of every term; and in London no record of nisi prius will be received at any sittings after term, unless the same shall be delivered to and entered with the marshal the day before the day to which the sittings in London shall be adjourned, by nine in the evening. At the assizes the writ and record are entered together; and no writ and record of nisi prius shall be received in any county in England, unless they shall be delivered to and entered with the marshal before the first sitting of the court after the commission-day, except in the counties of York and Norfolk; and there the writs and records shall be delivered to and entered with the marshal before the first sitting of the court, on the second day after the commission-day, otherwise they shall not be received. And both in London and Middlesex, as well as at the assizes, every cause shall be tried in the order in which it is entered, beginning with remnants (those which have stood over from former sittings), unless it shall be made out to the satisfaction of the judge in open court, that there is reasonable cause to the contrary, who thereupon may make such order for the trial of the cause so to be put off, as to him shall seem just. R. H. 14 Geo. 2. Special jury causes are appointed for particular days; and in London and Middlesex no cause can be tried by a special jury, unless the rule for such jury be drawn up, and the cause marked as a special jury in the marshal's book, before the adjournment day after each term. Reg. Gen. Tr. 30 Geo. 3.

In town causes the special jury cases are always deferred until the sittings after term, after the common jury causes have been disposed of, unless the causes be undefended, in which case one or more days are sometimes appointed by the chief justice, in term, for the trial of them. 1 Stark. 31.

For the length of the sittings after term under the statute of the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 70. see Term.

At the sittings at Nisi Prius, for Middlesex and London, in order to enable the plaintiff to obtain judgment of the term, it is the practice to appoint a particular day (usually the last sittings in the term) for the trial of all actions on bills of exchange and promissory notes, unless an affidavit of defence on the merits, or of other reasonable ground for delay, be produced before the trial; and on the appointed day, such actions, unless satisfactory cause be shown, will be tried; or if counsel appear to defend, then a farther day, usually at the first day of the sittings after term, will be given, on the terms that the plaintiff shall, if he obtain a verdict, have judgment of the term, if the judge shall think fit; and such causes are tried accordingly, unless, on the latter day, it be made appear that the trial ought to be further delayed; and the same practice has also been extended since the 1 Wm. 4. c. 7. to records in actions on bills, notes, and bonds, not entered for trial until the sittings after the term, and in which it is probable that the judge will certify, so as to entitle the plaintiff to execution during the sittings, although in the vacation.

At the sittings of Nisi Prius for Middlesex and London, there are written lists of the causes, usually thirty or forty, to be tried each day, fixed on the outside of the court, and the fact of a cause being in such list is deemed notice to the parties concerned in it, that it may be tried during the day. 3 B. & A. 188. There are where a cause had been for several days in that list, and was at length tried out of its order, as an undefended cause, in the absence of the defendant's attorney, the court refused to grant a new trial, except on an affidavit of the merits, and upon payment of costs. 2 Chitly's R. 269; 3 Taunt. 384; 1 Archb. by Chitly, 321.

The cause being entered, stands ready for trial at the bar of the court, or before the judge at Nisi Prius; and previous to its coming on, a brief should be prepared for each party, and delivered to counsel, containing a short abstract of the pleadings, a clear statement of the case, and a proper arrangement of the proofs, with the names of the witnesses. The grand rule to be observed, in drawing briefs, consists in conciseness with perspicuity. Tidd's Pract. K. B.

If the cause be coming on, and you are not prepared to proceed in the trial, you may withdraw the record. This, however, can be done only by the party who entered the cause with the marshal; by the plaintiff in ordinary cases, or by the defendant if he have carried down the record by proviso, and entered it for trial. The record cannot be withdrawn by counsel who is merely retained in the cause, but to whom a brief has not been delivered. 2 Camp. 487; 3 Taunt. 225; 5 C. & P. 315.

If the record be not withdrawn, the attorneys for the plaintiff and defendant should take care to be in court, to have their counsel in court, and their evidence and witnesses in readiness when the cause is called on; otherwise, if the plaintiff's attorney and witnesses be not in attendance, the plaintiff will be nonsuited, or the court will order the cause to be struck out of the list, and the plaintiff will have to pay the costs of the day; or if the defendant's attorney and witnesses be not in attendance, the defendant will lose the benefit of his defence, and the plaintiff will most probably obtain a verdict. The counsel for the plaintiff has a right, upon his cause being called on, to request the swearing of the jury to be suspended until a necessary witness has been called upon his subpoena, and it has been ascertained whether he be present; and upon finding he is absent, the counsel may then withdraw the record, and thus avoid a nonsuit, which, if the jury had been first sworn, he must have submitted to. 1 M. & M. 115.

When the cause is called on in court in its turn, according to the list or paper, made out from the order in which the several causes are entered for hearing by the attorneys in each cause, the record is handed to the judge to peruse and observe the pleadings, and what issues the parties are to maintain and prove. If no plea puis darrein continuance (see Pleading, I. 5.) intervene, the jury being completed, sworn, and ready to hear the merits, in order to fix their attention the closer to the facts which they are impanelled and sworn to try, the pleadings are opened to them by counsel on that side which holds the affirmative of the question in issue. For the issue is said to lie, and proof is always first required, upon that side which affirms the matter in question. The opening counsel briefly informs them what has been transacted in the court above; the parties, the nature of the action, the declaration, the plea, replication, and other proceedings; and, lastly, upon what point the issue is joined, which is there sent down to be determined. Instead of which formerly the whole record and process of the pleadings were read to them in English by the court, and the matter in issue clearly explained to their capacities. The nature of the case, and the evidence intended to be produced, are next laid before them by counsel also on the same side; and, when their evidence is gone through, the advocate on the other side opens the adverse case, and supports it by evidence; and then the party which began is heard by way of reply. 3 Comm. c. 23.

As to the nature of the evidence at the trial, see Evidence, Jury, II.

When the evidence is gone through on both sides, the judge, in the presence of the parties, the counsel, and all others, sums up the whole to the jury; omitting all superfluous circumstances, observing wherein the main question and principal issue lies, stating what evidence has been given to support it, with such remarks as he thinks necessary for their direction, and giving them his opinions in matters of law arising upon that evidence: the jury then (unless the case be very clear) withdraw from the bar to consider of their verdict; and when they are unanimously agreed, return; and, before they deliver their verdict, the plaintiff is bound to appear in court, by himself, attorney, or counsel, in order to answer the amercement to which by the old law he is liable, in case he fails in his suit, as a punishment for his false claim. To be amerced, or à mercie, is to be at the king's mercy with regard to the fine to be imposed; in misericordia Domini Regis pro falso clamore suo. The amercement is disused, but the form still continues; and if the plaintiff does not appear, no verdict can be given, but the plaintiff is said to be nonsuit, non sequitur clamorem suum. Therefore it is usual for a plaintiff, when he or his counsel perceives that he has not given evidence sufficient to maintain his issue, to be voluntarily nonsuited, or withdraw himself; whereupon the crier is ordered to call the plaintiff; and if neither he, nor any body for him, appears, he is nonsuited, the jurors are discharged, the action is at an end, and the defendant shall recover his costs. The reason of this practice is, that a nonsuit is more eligible for the plaintiff, than a verdict against him; and he may elect to be nonsuited at any time before the jury have delivered their verdict. See Nonsuit; and further, Jury, II.

When a verdict will carry all the costs, and it is doubtful, from the evidence, for which party it will be given, and the action is trivial, though founded in strict law, it is a common practice for the judge to recommend, and the parties to consent, that a juror shall be withdrawn; and thus no verdict is given, and each party pays his own costs. 3 T. R. 657.

The withdrawing a juror by consent of the parties is, it seems, no bar to a future action for the same cause. R. & M. 402; 3 B. & Ad. 349. So discharging a jury by consent does not terminate the suit; and, in this respect, is like the withdrawing a juror. 3 B. & Ad. 349.

If the plaintiff appears, the clerk asks the jury who they find for? and if for the plaintiff, what damages? The jury naming the sum, and what costs, or pronouncing for the defendant, the associate enters the verdict on the back of the panel of the jurors' names, and repeats it to the jury, which finishes the trial. The verdict, nonsuit, or whatever else passes at the trial, is entered on the back of the record of nisi prius; which entry, from the Latin word it began with, is called the postea; the substance of which is, that postea, afterwards, the said plaintiff and defendant appeared by their attorneys at the place of trial, and a jury being sworn, found such a verdict; or as the case may happen. This, being added to the roll, is returned to the court from which it was sent, and the history of the cause is thus continued. See Pleading, Practice, Record.

When the cause is tried at the sittings in London or Middlesex, the associate in the Court of K. B. delivers the record to the party for whom the verdict is given; and he afterwards indorses the postea, from the associate's minutes, on the panel: but when the cause is tried at the assizes, the associate keeps the record till the next term, and then delivers it, with the postea indorsed thereon, to the party obtaining the verdict. On a motion for a new trial, the postea was brought into court; and, after the new trial had been denied, the postea could not be found: the court, on debate, ordered a new one to be made out, from the record above, and the associate's notes. If the postea be wrong, it may be amended by the plea-roll, by the memory or notes of the judge, or by the notes of the associate or clerk of assize. Tidd's Pract.

After these proceedings, the party entitled proceeds to enter up his judgment; for which a certain period is allowed, and of which notice must be given to the opposite party by a rule of court; and within the time allowed by that rule, motion must be made for a new trial, (see post, III.) or in arrest of judgment, &c. See further, Judgment, Motion, Practice, &c.

As to the granting of speedy execution, under the 1 Wm. 4. c. 7. see Execution, III. 2.

Many deserved eulogies are bestowed on this mode of trial by jury in the Commentaries; where also some defects in it are suggested; as, the want of a complete discovery by the oath of the parties; the want of power to examine witnesses abroad, (but now see Deposition,) or to compel the production of books and papers belonging to the parties; and the prejudices or inconveniences arising from the locality of trial and jurisdiction. All or most of these defects are, however, generally remedied in practice: and, on the whole, this mode of decision will be found (with all its unavoidable imperfections,) the best criterion for investigating the truth of facts ever established in any country. See Jury; and 3 Comm. c. 23.

Formerly, trials were only at bar or at nisi prius; but by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 17. "in any action depending in any of the said superior courts for any debt or demand in which the sum sought to be recovered, and indorsed on the writ of summons, shall not exceed 20*l.*, it shall be lawful for the court in which such suit shall be pending, or any judge of any of the said courts (if such court or judge shall be satisfied that the trial will not involve any difficult question of fact or law, and such court or judge shall think fit so to do,) to order and direct that the issue or issues joined shall be tried before the sheriff of the county where the action is brought, or any judge of any court of record, for the recovery of debt in such county; and for that purpose a writ shall issue directed to such sheriff, commanding him to try such issue or issues by a jury to be summoned by him, and to return such writ with the finding of the jury thereon indorsed, at a day certain, in term or in vacation, to be named in such writ; and thereupon such sheriff or judge shall summon a jury, and shall proceed to try such issue or issues."

The above statute, it will be seen, extends only to actions for a debt or demand in which the sum sought to be recovered and indorsed on the writ of summons does not exceed 20*l.* It does not, therefore, extend to a case in which the action, though not exceeding 20*l.*, is commenced by a writ of capias or detainer, or to a case where the debt is not indorsed on the writ of summons, or to a claim for a tort. 2 C. & M. 150; 2 Dowl. P. C. 215.

When the jury have found their verdict, it is provided by § 18. that it shall be "as valid, and of like force, as a verdict of a jury at nisi prius; and the sheriff or his deputy, or judge, presiding at the trial of such issue or issues, shall have the like powers with respect to amendment of such trial as are thereafter given to judges at nisi prius; and by the same section, "at the return of such writ, costs shall be taxed, judgment signed, and execution issued forthwith, unless the sheriff, deputy, or judge before whom such trial shall be had, shall certify under his hand, upon such writ, that judgment ought not to be signed until the defendant shall have had an opportunity to apply to the court for a new trial; or a judge of any of the said courts shall think fit to order that judgment or execution shall be stayed until a day to be named in such order."

To procure the above certificate of the sheriff, or order of the judge, it is not unusual to make an affidavit of the facts, to induce him to grant it; but the plaintiff, unless otherwise ordered, may in this case get his costs taxed, and sign judgment directly after the verdict is obtained, even on the same day. 2 Dowl. P. C. 613.

A motion for a new trial of a cause tried before the sheriff may be made to the court upon the production of the under-sheriff's notes, verified by affidavit. 2 Dowl. P. C. 613.

And on being applied to for that purpose by one of the parties, the sheriff ought to produce his notes of the trial had before him. Where an under-sheriff refused to produce such notes, the court made him pay the costs consequent on his refusal. 2 Dowl. P. C. 611.

II. The several methods of trial and conviction of offenders, established by the laws of England, were formerly more numerous than at present; and among them were reckoned the trial by ordeal, by corned, and by battel: all now obsolete or repealed. See those titles.

Generally with respect to the venue of indictments, or the places where offenders must be tried, see Indictment, V.

By 6 Hen. 8. c. 6. the justices of K. B. are empowered to remand and send down felons brought or removed before that court, and their indictments, into the counties where the offence was committed, there to be tried by justices of gaol delivery; who may pass sentence on them accordingly. See 4 M. & S. 442.

As to offences committed abroad, and made triable in England, see 28 Hen. 8. c. 15; title Piracy; and 46 Geo. 3. c. 54. Offences committed in the plantations, East Indies, &c. by persons in public employments, may be tried before the Court of K. B. See 11 & 12 Wm. 3. c. 12; 13 Geo. 3. c. 63; 24 Geo. 3. c. 25; 42 Geo. 3. c. 85; 55 Geo. 3. c. 155; and title East India Company, V.

The trial of peers, in cases of treason and felony, or misprision of either, is by the peers of Great Britain in the court of parliament, or the court of the lord high steward, when a peer is indicted. See Lord High Steward, Peers, IV.

The trial by jury, or the country, per patriam, is also that trial by the peers of every Englishman, which, as the grand bulwark of his liberties, is secured to him by the great charter.

As to the mode of proceeding and giving the verdict, in the trial of criminal cases, see in general Jury, IV. 1, Evidence (Introd.), Treason, V.

The following summary will give a general idea of the nature of trial in criminal cases:

The bill of indictment against an offender having been prepared, the party, prosecutor, and others being bound over to give evidence, the grand jury having found the bill, the prisoner is brought to the bar of the court, and the crier, or clerk of the arraigns, says to him, "A. B. hold up thy hand; thou standest indicted by the name of A. B. for such a felony, &c. (reciting the crime laid in the indictment): how sayest thou, art thou guilty of this felony, &c. whereof thou standest indicted, or not guilty?" To which the prisoner answers, "Not guilty." Whereupon the clerk of the peace says, "Culprit (see Pleading, II.) how wilt thou be tried?" And the offender answers, "By God and my country."

This was formerly a very significant question and answer, when there were trials by battle and by ordeal, as well as by jury; and when the offender answered the question, "By God and his country," it showed that he made choice to be tried by a jury: but now there is no other way of trial of criminals. Blount's Dict.

When the prisoner has pleaded not guilty, (which is the common plea, it is to be recorded; and then the petit jury are called upon the panel, and a full jury appearing, the prisoner is told they are to pass upon his life and death, and that he may challenge any of them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they are sworn; for not being indifferent, but partial, or other defect, &c. Then the jury are sworn well and truly to try the prisoner, and to bring in a true verdict. This being done, the indictment is recited, and the jury are acquainted with the particular crimes of which the prisoner stands indicted; and the clerk of the peace, addressing the jury, states the crime laid in the indictment; and adds, "to which indictment he hath pleaded not guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are: so that you (the jury) are to inquire whether he be guilty of the felony, &c. whereof he stands indicted, or not?" Formerly the clerk of the peace also added, "if you find him guilty, you are to make inquiry into what goods and chattels he had at the time that the said felony, &c. was committed, or at any time since: and if you find him not guilty, you shall inquire whether he did fly for it; and if he fled for it, what goods, &c. he had at the time of his flight: but if you find him not guilty, and that he did not fly, you shall then say no more." Now, however, by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 28. § 5. the jury are not to be charged either in treason or felony to inquire concerning the lands or goods of the person indicted, or whether he fled for such treason or felony. Then the clerk of the peace swears the witnesses to give true evidence; to speak the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; and when the evidence is given to the jury concerning the prisoner, the jury (if they go out of the court to consider of their verdict) are to be kept in a room, by a sworn bailiff, appointed, without meat, drink, fire, or candle, and without any persons speaking to them, till they bring in their verdict. See Jury, II. All things being given in charge, the jury go to their room, and consider of the matter; when they are all agreed, and returned within or near the bar, the prisoner is brought forth, and the jury are called over; who all appearing, and the prisoner being set to the bar, the clerk of the peace says to them, "Look upon the prisoner, you gentlemen of the jury; how say you, is A. B. guilty of the felony, &c. of which he stands indicted, or not guilty?" If the jury say not guilty, it is recorded, and the prisoner taken away; if they say guilty, the clerk of the peace says, "Gentlemen of the jury, hearken to your verdict as the court hath recorded it; you say A. B. is guilty of the felony, &c. whereof he stands indicted;" to which they answer, "Yes." Then proclamation is made for all persons to keep silence, on which the prisoner is set to the bar, and sentence passed upon him, after which an order or warrant is made for his execution. Though this part of passing sentence only takes place immediately in cases of murder, the felons being all brought up together at the end of the sessions, to receive their several sentences, although this is discretionary with the judge.

It is not customary or agreeable to the general course of proceedings, (unless by consent of parties, or where the defendant is actually in gaol,) to try persons indicted for misdemeanors at the same court in which they have pleaded not guilty, or traversed the indictment. But they usually give security to the court to appear at the next assizes or sessions, and then and there to try the traverse, giving notice to the prosecutor of the same. 4 Comm. c. 27. p. 351.

Every defendant, indicted for a misdemeanor, should give full eight days' notice of trial to the prosecutor, before the assizes, if the trial is to be there; if at the sessions, it is usual to give two or three days' notice: or the justices at sessions fix, as a general rule, what time they think a reasonable notice in such cases. Cro. Circ. Comp. 17. 48.

And see further, as to the time when trials for misdemeanors are to take place, Misdemeanor.

When the jury is sworn, if it be a cause of any consequence, the indictment is usually opened, and the evidence marshalled, examined, and enforced by the counsel for the crown or prosecution. But it is a settled rule at common law, that no counsel shall be allowed a prisoner upon his trial, upon the general issue in any capital crime, unless some point of law shall arise proper to be debated. This has been considered as so great a hardship, and so very inconsistent with the general principles of the English laws, that the judges never scruple to allow a prisoner counsel, to instruct him what questions to ask, or even to ask questions for him, with respect to matters of fact: but the counsel are not allowed to address the jury, except in cases of treason, under 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. See Treason, V. But in matters of law, or in the trial of issues, or collateral facts, prisoners are entitled to the full assistance of counsel. See 4 Comm. c. 27; see n. p. 355. Post, 232, 242.

A bill for allowing the counsel for felons to address the jury was introduced into the House of Commons during the last session, and is now (1855) again under consideration; but it is doubtful whether a measure, which is consistent with every principle of reason and justice, will at present be permitted to pass into a law.

If the jury find the prisoner Not guilty, he is then forever quit and discharged of the accusation. And upon such his acquittal or discharge, for want of prosecution, he shall be immediately set at large, without payment of any fee to the gaoler. 14 Geo. 3. c. 20.

But if the offender is convicted, two collateral circumstances immediately arise. 1. On a conviction, (or even upon an acquittal, where there was a reasonable ground to prosecute, and in fact a bona fide prosecution,) the reasonable expenses of prosecution, and also, a compensation for their trouble and loss of time, are in all cases of felony, and in certain specified misdemeanors, by the 7 Geo. 4. c. 64. allowed to the prosecutor and his witnesses. See Expenses. 2. On a conviction of larceny, in particular, the prosecutor shall have restitution of his goods; as to which see tit. Restitution.

With respect to the carrying into execution of the sentence passed on offenders in capital cases, see tit. Execution of Criminals. Since the portion of this work containing that title has been printed, the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 26. has been passed, whereby so much of the Anatomy Act (2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 75. § 16.) as authorized the bodies of persons convicted of murder to be hung in chains, has been repealed. Criminals executed for that offence are in future to be buried within the prison, both in this country and in Ireland.

III. CAUSES of suspending the judgment, by granting a new trial, (which has been substituted in modern times for a bill of exceptions, see 3 B. & Ad. 372; and which is the only remedy the injured party has, except by writ of error coram nobis in some few cases,) are wholly extrinsic; that is, arising from matters foreign to or dehors the record. Of this sort are want of notice of trial; or any flagrant misbehaviour of the party prevailing towards the jury, which may have influenced their verdict; or any gross misbehaviour of the jury among themselves; also, if it appears by the judge's report, certified to the court, that the jury have brought in a verdict without or contrary to evidence, so that he is reasonably dissatisfied therewith, or if they have given exorbitant damages; or if the judge himself has misdirected the jury, so that they found an unjustifiable verdict; for these, and other reasons of the like kind, it is the practice of the court to award a new, or second, trial. But if two juries agree in the same or a similar verdict, a third trial is seldom awarded; for the law will not readily suppose, that the verdict of any one subsequent jury can controvert the oaths of the two preceding ones. 3 Comm. c. 24. Though the court will grant any number of new trials in the same action, if the jury find verdicts contrary to the established law. 1 T. R. 167.

The exertion of these superintendent powers of the king's courts, in setting aside the verdict of a jury, and granting a new trial, on account of misbehaviour in the jurors, is of a date extremely ancient. There are instances in the Year-Books of the reigns of Edward III., Henry IV., and Henry VII. of judgments being staid, (even after trial at bar,) and new venires awarded, because the jury had eat and drank without consent of the judge, and because the plaintiff had privately given a paper to a jurymen before he was sworn. And upon these the Chief Justice Glynn, in 1655, grounded the first precedent that is reported in our books, for granting a new trial upon account of excessive damages given by the jury; apprehending, with reason, that notorious partiality in the jurors was a principal species of misbehaviour. Sty. 466. A few years before, a practice took rise in the Common Pleas, of granting new trials upon the mere certificate of the judge, (unfortified by any report of the evidence,) that the verdict had passed against his opinion, though Chief Justice Rolle (who allowed of new trials in case of misbehaviour, surprise, or fraud, or if the verdict was notoriously contrary to evidence) refused to adopt that practice in the Court of King's Bench. And at that time it was clearly held for law, that whatever matter was of force to avoid a verdict, ought to be returned upon the postea, and not merely surmised by the court; lest posterity should wonder why a new venire was awarded, without any sufficient reason appearing upon the record. But very early in the reign of Charles II. new trials were granted upon affidavits; and the former strictness of the courts at law, in respect of new trials, having driven many parties into courts of equity, to be relieved from oppressive verdicts, they are now more liberal in granting them; the maxim at present adopted being this, that (in all cases of moment) where justice is not done upon one trial, the injured party is entitled to another. 3 Comm. c. 24.

Formerly, the principal remedy for reversal of a verdict unduly given, was by writ of attain (now abolished); which was at least as old as the institution of grand assize by Henry II. in lieu of the Norman trial by battle; and as to which, see tit. Attain.

Next to doing right, the great object in the administration of public justice should be to give public satisfaction. If the verdict be liable to many objections and doubts, in the opinion of his counsel, or even in the opinion of bystanders, no party would go away satisfied unless he had a prospect of reviewing it. Such doubts would with him be decisive; he would arraign the determination as manifestly unjust; and abhor a tribunal which he imagined had done him an injury without a possibility of redress. 3 Comm. c. 24.

Granting a new trial, under proper regulations, cures all these, and many other, inconveniences; and at the same time preserves entire, and renders perfect, that most excellent method of decision, which is the glory of the English law. A new trial is a rehearing of the cause before another jury; but with as little prejudice to either party, as if it had never been heard before. No advantage is taken of the former verdict on the one side, or the rule of court for awarding such second trial on the other; and the subsequent verdict, though contrary to the first, imports no title of blame upon the former jury; who, had they possessed the same lights and advantages, would probably have altered their own opinion. The parties come better informed, the counsel better prepared, the law is more fully understood, the judge is more master of the subject, and nothing is now tried but the real merits of the case. 3 Comm. c. 24.

A sufficient ground must however be laid before the court, to satisfy them that it is necessary to justice that the cause should be farther considered. If the matter be such as did not, or could not, appear to the judge who presided at nisi prius, it is disclosed to the court by affidavit; if it arises from what passed at the trial, it is taken from the judge's information, who usually makes a special and minute report of the evidence. Counsel are heard on both sides, to impeach or establish the verdict; and the court give their reasons at large, why a new examination ought or ought not to be allowed. The true import of the evidence is duly weighed, false colours are taken off, and all points of law which arose at the trial are, upon full deliberation, clearly explained and settled. 3 Comm. c. 24.

Notice of a motion for a new trial must be given to the judge two whole days before moving, as well in cases where a point has been reserved at the trial as in others. 7 Taunt. 257.

Nor do the courts lend too easy an ear to every application for a review of the former verdict. They must be satisfied that there are strong probable grounds to suppose that the merits have not been fairly and fully discussed, and that the decision is not agreeable to the justice and truth of the case. A new trial is not granted, where the value is too inconsiderable to merit a second examination. It is not granted upon nice and formal objections, which do not go to the real merits. It is not granted in cases of strict right, or summum jus, where the rigorous exaction of extreme legal justice is hardly reconcileable to conscience. Nor is it granted where the scales of evidence hang nearly equal; that which leans against the former verdict ought always very strongly to preponderate. 3 Comm. c. 24.

And where a question was peculiarly fit for the consideration of a jury (as the soundness or unsoundness of a horse,) the Court of C. P. refused to set aside a verdict on the ground of the preponderance of contrary evidence, 7 Taunt. 153.

And where evidence has been given on both sides, the court will seldom grant a new trial unless the evidence against the verdict very strongly preponderate. 2 Str. 1142; 3 Wils. 88, 69.

In granting such farther trial, (which is matter of sound discretion,) the court has also an opportunity, which it seldom fails to improve, of supplying the defects in this mode of trial, before shortly alluded to, by laying the party applying under all such equitable terms, as his antagonist shall desire, and mutually offer to comply with; such as, the discovery of some facts upon oath; the admission of others not intended to be litigated; the production of deeds, books, and papers; the examination of witnesses, infirm or going beyond sea; and the like. And the delay and expense of this proceeding are so small and trifling, that it seldom can be moved for to gain time, or to gratify humour. The motion must be made within the first four days of the succeeding term after the verdict, within which term it is usually heard and decided. And it is worthy observation, how infinitely superior to all others the trial by jury approves itself, even in the very mode of its revision. In every other country of Europe, and in those of our own tribunals which conform themselves to the process of the civil law, (the Scotch courts, for example,) the parties are at liberty, whenever they please, to appeal from day to day, and from court to court, upon questions merely of fact; which is a perpetual source of obstinate chicane, delay, and expensive litigation. With us, no new trial is allowed, unless there be a manifest mistake, and the subject-matter be worthy of interposition. The party who thinks himself aggrieved might formerly, if he pleased, have had recourse to his writ of attain after judgment; and in the course of the trial he may still demur to the evidence, or tender a bill of exceptions. And if the first were totally laid aside, long previous to its abolition, and the other two are very seldom put in practice, it is because long experience has shown, that a motion for a second trial is the shortest, cheapest, and most effectual cure for all imperfections in the verdict; whether they arise from the mistakes of the parties themselves, of their counsel or attorneys, or even of the judge or jury. 3 Comm. c. 24.

If the verdict of the jury be agreeable to equity and justice, the court will not grant a new trial, though there may have been an error in the admission of evidence, or in the direction of the judge. 4 T. R. 468; 1 Bos. & Pull. 338.

Where the plaintiff's counsel acquiesced in the judge's opinion at the trial, and the defendant took a verdict without going into his case, the court of C. P. refused afterwards to allow the plaintiff to move for a new trial on the ground of misdirection of the judge. 6 Taunt. 386.

A new trial may be granted on account of the misconduct of the jury, as if they have referred to chance to determine the party for whom the verdict was given: but the courts have frequently refused to hear any affidavit of such conduct from the jury themselves. 1 T. R. 11.

A new trial will not be granted merely because it has been discovered, after trial, that a witness examined was incompetent. 1 T. R. 717; 3 East, 471. But where a testimony of witnesses, on which a verdict was given, derived credit from particular circumstances, which were afterwards clearly falsified, a new trial was granted. 1 Bos. & Pull. 427.

When, upon the facts proved, an inference of law arose on a statute not recollected at the trial, the Court of C. P. granted a new trial, though the point was not taken at the trial. 7 Taunt. 309.

If the issue tried in any cause is not joined, it is not a good trial; except it be an issue in Chancery in the petit bag side, which is to be sent from thence to be tried in B. R.

Hil. 22 Car. It is a mis-trial for a thing to be tried before a judge, who hath interest in the thing in question; and if a cause is tried by a jury out of a wrong county, or there be any error in the process against the jurors, or it is directed to a wrong officer, &c. it is a mis-trial; likewise, where matter of record is tried by a jury, it will be a mis-trial; but if the matter of record be mixed with matter of fact, trial by jury is good. Hob. 124. A mis-trial is helped by the statute of jeofails. See further, Amendment, Pleading, Variance.

Where a common jury panel was returned together with a special jury panel, and no special jury man appearing, the cause was tried by a common jury, the trial was set aside. 4 M. & S. 467.

Excessive damages in all cases, except in actions for adultery, are a sufficient ground to grant a new trial. 5 T. R. 257. In aggravated cases, however, the court will direct that the verdict shall stand as a security for the damages which may be given on the second trial. 7 T. R. 529.

For excessive damages, the court will grant a new trial of course, or set aside the execution of a writ of inquiry, in all cases where the damages may be ascertained by mere calculation, 1 Taunt. 491; and in other cases of actions ex contractu, if it appear clearly that the damages are excessive. But in actions ex delicto, such as actions for trespass, 3 Burr. 1845; 1 T. R. 277; 5 Taunt. 442; 1 Marsh. 139, S. C.; for diverting a watercourse, 7 T. R. 529; 1 Chit. Rep. 729; for criminal conversation, 4 T. R. 651; 1 Burr. 609; 6 East, 244; seduction, 11 East, 23; 3 Wils. 18; battery, 5 T. R. 257; 2 Wils. 252; false imprisonment, 2 Wils. 160, 205, 244; or other personal torts, 2 H. Bl. 929; Comp. 230; malicious prosecution, 2 H. Bl. 1327; 1 Comp. 87; slander, 2 Salk. 641; or the like, 2 T. R. 166; a new trial is seldom granted on this account, unless the damages be outrageous, 7 Bingh. 316; 2 H. Bl. 942, 1327; 7 T. R. 529; 3 Wils. 61; or the court be satisfied that the jury acted under the influence of undue motives, or of gross error or misconception, 6 East, 244; and the same, as to the executions of writs of inquiry, 3 Burr. 1485; 3 Wils. 61, 63; 11 East, 23. It is very usual in cases of assault, where an excessive verdict has been given, for the judge to suggest to the counsel to agree on a sum, to prevent the necessity of a new trial. 7 Bingh. 320.

On the other hand, a new trial will not be granted, or the execution of a writ of inquiry set aside, on account of the smallness of the damages, 2 Str. 940, 1051; 2 Doug. 509, 510; unless it have arisen from some mistake in point of law, either upon the part of the court, 2 Str. 1259; 2 Doug. 510; or of the jury, 1 Str. 425; 7 Bingh. 349; or from some unfair practice upon the part of the defendant. 2 Salk. 647; 1 Str. 515. Also, the court will not grant a new trial, where the value of the matter in dispute, or the amount of damages to which the plaintiff would be fairly entitled, is too inconsiderable to merit a second examination, 2 H. Bl. 851; 1 Burr. 11; 2 Burr. 664; 1 Taunt. 495; and see 2 T. R. 113. The value or amount must be twenty pounds at least to induce the court to interfere, unless, perhaps, on trials before the sheriff, 2 Dowl. P. C. 642, sed vide Id. 767; 3 M. & Scott, 818, S. C. contra; or the verdict involve some particular right, independent of the damages, Tidd, 9th ed. 910; 1 Chit. Rep. 265; 1 Y. & J. 402; 2 Y. & J. 264; and this, whether the verdict be for the plaintiff or defendant. 2 C. & J. 14. The court will, however, sometimes grant a new trial on the ground of a misdirection of the judge, though the verdict be under twenty pounds, where they can grant it without costs. 1 C. & M. 26; 1 C. & M. & R. 93.

In an action brought under an order of the lord chancellor, a new trial may be moved for in the court where the action is depending, though the action could not be sustained without the aid of the chancellor's order. 4 M. & S. 192. But see Barker v. Nixon, 6 Taunt. 444. as to a new trial on an issue directed out of a court of equity, in which case it was held that application must be first made to such court.

It would seem, however, from the cases, that the application may be either to the court of law or the court which directed the issue. See 1 Archb. Pr. by Chitty, 539.

The presence of all the defendants convicted on an indictment for a conspiracy is necessary, in order to move for a new trial on behalf of any of them. 3 M. & S. 9. and Rex v. Cochrane, Ltd., id. p. 10. n.

In penal actions, if there be a verdict for the plaintiff, the court will grant a new trial as in other cases.

It is generally said, that there cannot be a new trial in penal actions and criminal prosecutions, when there is a verdict for the defendant; the principle of this being the great favour which the law shows to the liberty of the subject. But the rule does not extend to informations in the nature of quo warranto. See that title, and 2 T. R. 484; 5 B. & Ad. 52. Nor does it extend to an action on a penal statute, in which a verdict is given for the defendant in consequence of the misdirection of the judge. 4 T. R. 753; 1 C., M. & R. 310.

The Court of King's Bench refused to grant a rule nisi for a new trial, after verdict for the defendant upon an indictment for non-repair of a church-yard fence, which was moved on the ground of the verdict being against evidence. 6 East, 315.

And where the defendant was acquitted on an indictment for not repairing a road, the court refused to grant a new trial; but under special circumstances suspended the entry of the judgment, so as to enable the parties to have the question reconsidered upon another indictment, without the prejudice of the former judgment. Rex v. Wandsworth, 1 B. & A. 63; and see the case of Kingston Bridge, there cited. But the court will be cautious of such proceedings being drawn into a precedent to defeat the general rule. See Rex v. Chigwell, par. in a note in the case of Wandsworth.

So, after a verdict for the defendant upon Not guilty to an indictment for a nuisance to a highway, the Court of King's Bench refused a new trial. 4 M. & S. 337.

TRIDINGMOTE. The court held for a trading, or trithing. See Trithing.

TRILLION. A word used by merchants in accounts, to show that the word million is thrice mentioned. Merch. Dict. It signifies millions of millions of millions.

TRINITY, Trinitas.] The number of three Persons in the Godhead, or Deity; heretofore supposed to be so peculiarly distinctive of the Christian religion, that the denying any one of the Persons in the Trinity to be God subjected the parties to divers penalties and incapacities under 9 & 10 Wm. 3. c. 32. But by the 53 Geo. 3. c. 160. the provisions of the above act, so far as related to the denying of the Trinity, were repealed: and the like provisions of an Irish act 6 Geo. 1. c. 5. were repealed by the 57 Geo. 3. c. 70.

TRINITY HOUSE. This society was incorporated by Henry VIII., in 1515, for the promotion of commerce and navigation, by licensing and regulating pilots, and ordering and erecting beacons, light-houses, buoys, &c. A similar society, for the like purposes, was afterwards established at Hull, and also another at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in 1537; which three establishments, says Hakluyt, were in imitation of that founded by the Emperor Charles V. at Seville, in Spain; who, observing the numerous shipwrecks in the voyages to and from the West Indies, occasioned by the ignorance of seamen, established, at the Casa de Contratacion, lectures on navigation, and a pilot major for the examination of other pilots and mariners, having also directed books to be published on that subject for the use of navigators.

Henry VIII., by his charter, confirmed to the Deptford Trinity House Society all the ancient rights, privileges, &c. of the shipmen and mariners of England, and their several possessions at Deptford, from which it is plain that the society had existed long previously. The corporation was confirmed, in 1685, in the enjoyment of its privileges and possessions, by letters-patent of the 1st of James II. by the name of the Master, Wardens, and Assistants, of the Guild or Fraternity of the most glorious and undivided Trinity, and of St. Clements, in the parish of Deptford Strand, in the county of Kent. At first, the corporation seems to have consisted of seamen only; but many gentlemen, and some noblemen, are now amongst its members, or elder brethren. It is governed by a master, four wardens, eight assistants, and thirty-one elder brothers: but the inferior members of the fraternity, named younger brethren, are of an unlimited number; for every master or mate, expert in navigation, may be admitted as such. Besides the power of erecting light-houses, and other sea-marks, on the several coasts of the kingdom, for the security of navigation, (see Beacons.) the master, wardens, assistants, and elder brethren, are invested by charter with the following powers: viz. the examination of the mathematical scholars of Christ's Hospital, and of the masters of his majesty's ships; the appointment of pilots to conduct ships into and out of the Thames; the amercement of such unlicensed persons as presume to act as masters of ships of war, or pilots, in a pecuniary fine; settling the several rates of pilotage; granting licences to poor seamen, not free of the city, or past going to sea, to row on the river Thames for their support; preventing aliens from serving on board English ships without licence; hearing and determining the complaints of officers and seamen of British ships, subject to an appeal to the Lords of the Admiralty, &c. To this company belongs the Ballast Office, for clearing and deepening the Thames, by taking up a sufficient quantity of ballast for the supply of all ships that sail out of the river, for which they pay certain rates. The corporation is authorized to receive voluntary subscriptions, benefactions, &c. and to purchase, in mortmain, lands, tenements, &c. to the amount of 500*l.* per annum. The ancient Hall of the Trinity House at Deptford, where the meetings of the brethren were formerly held, was pulled down in 1787, and an elegant building erected for the purpose in London, near the Tower. The gross revenue under the management of the Trinity House amounts to about 135,000*l.* a year, but the net revenue is rather less than the half of that sum.

By the 52 Geo. 3. c. 115. its jurisdiction is extended to light-houses round the coast of Ireland.

TRINODA NECESSITAS. Signified the threefold necessary tax, to which all lands were liable in the Saxon times, i. e. for repairing of bridges; the maintaining of castles or garrisons; and for expeditions to repel invasions: and in the king's grants, and conveyances of lands, these three things were excepted in the immunities from other services, &c. *Paroch. TRISTEGA. The uppermost room in the house; a garret or room three stories high. Matt. Paris, an. 1247.

TRITHING; TRITHING-REEVE. The third part of a county, or three or more hundreds or wapentakes, were called a triding, or trithing; such sort of portions are the laths in Kent, the rapes in Sussex, and the ridings (corrupted from the word trithing) in Yorkshire; and those who governed these trithings were thereupon called trithing-reeves, before whom were brought all causes that could not be determined in the wapentakes or hundreds. See Spelman of the ancient Government of England, p. 52.

The term trithing is also used for the court held within the circuit of a trithing, of the nature of a court-leet, but inferior to the county-court, to which causes might be removed from them. Magna Charta, c. 36.

TRIUMVIR. A trithing-man, or constable of three hundreds. Hist. Eliens.

TRONAGE, tronagium. A customary duty or toll for weighing of wool: according to Fleta, trona is a beam to weigh with, mentioned in stat. Westm. 2. c. 25. Tronage being used for the weighing of wool in a staple or public mart, by a common trona, or beam; which, for the tronage of wool in London, was fixed at Lenden-Hall. Fleta, lib. 2. c. 12. The mayor and commonalty of London are ordained keepers of the beams and weights for weighing merchants' commodities, with power to assign clerks and porters, &c. of the great beam and balance; which weighing of goods and wares is called tronage; and no stranger shall buy any goods in London, before they are weighed at the king's beam, on pain of forfeiture. Chart. King Hen. VIII.

TRONATOR, from trona, i. e. statera. An officer in the city of London, who weighs the wool brought thither.

TROPER, troperium. A book of alternate turns or responses in singing masses; called liber sequentiarum, by Lindewoode. Hoved. Hist. p. 283.

TROPHY-MONEY. Money formerly raised and collected in London and the several counties of England, towards providing harness and maintenance for the militia, &c. See Militia.

TROVER, from the Fr. trouver, to find. An action which lies where one man gets possession of the goods of another, by delivery, finding, or otherwise, and refuses to deliver them to the owner, or sells or converts them to his own use, without the consent of the owner, for which the owner, by this action, recovers the value of his goods. Esp. Ni. Pr. cap. 12; 2 Lill. Abr. 618.

The action of trover and conversion was in its original an action of trespass on the case for recovery of damages against such person as had actually found another's goods, and refused to deliver them on demand, but converted them to his own use; from which finding and converting it is called an action of trover and conversion. The freedom of this action from wager of law, and the less degree of certainty requisite in describing the goods, gave it so considerable an advantage over the action of detinue, that, by a fiction of law, actions of trover were at length permitted to be brought against any man who had in his possession, by any means whatsoever, the personal goods of another, and sold them or used them without the consent of the owner, or refused to deliver them when demanded. The injury lies in the conversion; for any man may take the goods of another into possession, if he finds them; but no finder is allowed to acquire a property therein, unless the owner be for ever unknown: and therefore he must not convert them to his own use, which the law presumes him to do, if he refuses to restore them to the owner: for which reason, such refusal alone is, prima facie, sufficient evidence of a conversion. The fact of the finding, or trover, is therefore now totally immaterial: for the plaintiff needs only to suggest (as words of form) that he lost such goods, and that the defendant found them; and, if he proves that the goods are his property, and that the defendant had them in his possession, it is sufficient. But a conversion must be fully proved: and then in this action the plaintiff shall recover damages, equal to the value of the thing converted, but not the thing itself; which nothing will recover but an action of detinue or replevin. (See those titles.) 3 Comm. c. 9.

Action of trover or detinue, at the plaintiff's election, may be brought for goods detained; for it is but justice that the party should have his goods detained if they may be had, or else damages to the value for the detaining and conversion of them. 2 Lil. Abr. 618. Action of trespass or trover lies for the same thing, though they cannot be brought in one declaration; and the allegation of the conversion of the goods in trespass is for aggravation of the damages, &c. Cro. Jac. 50; Lutw. 1526. See Detinue, Trespass.

In trover, the conversion is the gist of the action; and the manner in which the goods come to the defendant's hands is but inducement; the plaintiff may therefore declare upon a devenerunt ad manus generally, or specially by finding; (though in fact the defendant came to them by delivery;) or that the defendant fraudulently obtained them; as by winning them at cards from the plaintiff's wife: and this being inducement, need not be proved: but it is sufficient to prove property in the plaintiff; the possession of, and conversion by, the defendant. Bull. N. P. 33; Esp. N. P. c. 12.

I. For what Trover lies.

II. By and against whom it may be maintained.

III. Of the Interest requisite to support the Action.

IV. Of the Conversion, &c.

I. This action is confined to the conversion of some personal chattel, and it does not lie for fixtures eo nomine, nor for injuries to land or other real property, even by a severance of a part of what properly belongs to the freehold, unless there has also been an asportation; but the form of action should be trespass, (or case where the interest in the property is in reversion.) Cro. Jac. 129; 2 Mod. 244; Bul. N. P. 44; Bac. Abr. Trover, B.; 4 T. R. 504, 505; Co. Lit. 145; 2 B. & A. 167; 7 Taunt. 188; 2 Marsh. 495. And an in-coming tenant, though entitled to the growing crops, cannot support trover against the out-going tenant for taking them away; nor is that form of action proper to try a right to land. 16 East, 77, 79; 1 Price, 53; 2 B. & A. 165.

But if after the severance from the freehold, as in the case of trees or fixtures, the property severed be taken away, or if coals dug in a pit be afterwards thrown out, trover may be supported. Noy, 125; Sir Wm. Jones, 246; 3 Wils. 336; 7 T. R. 13; 4 B. & A. 206.

So where a tenant during the tenancy removes virgin soil, it becomes, by operation of law, the property of the landlord, and he may maintain either trespass de bonis asportatis or trover. 6 C. & P. 616.

But where the assignee of a term in a house took forcible possession of the house and fixtures in it, it was held not to be a conversion of the fixtures. 4 N. & M. 213.

Trover does not lie for goods sold to a party, but not set apart by the vendor; for it is sustainable only for specific articles. 4 Taunt. 648.

So the purchaser of goods cannot maintain trover for them without paying the price; for though he acquires the right of property by the purchase, he can only acquire the right of possession by the payment or tender of the price; and in order to maintain trover he must have both the right of property and the right of possession. 7 D. & R. 396; 4 B. & C. 341.

So the buyer of a chattel ordered to be made for him, acquires no property in the chattel till it is finished and delivered to him; and therefore he can not maintain trover for it, though he has paid the price beforehand. 1 Taunt. 218.

Trover will not lie for goods irregularly sold, under a distress: the 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. § 19. having declared that the party selling shall not be deemed a trespasser ab initio, and having given an action on the case to the party grieved by such a sale. 1 H. Blackst. 13.

So trover does not lie for goods taken as a distress, if any rent be due, though the distress be irregular. 1 M. & R. 193.

But if a party pay money in order to redeem his goods from a wrongful distress for rent, he may maintain trover against the wrong doer. 6 T. R. 298.

Detinue doth not lie for money numbered; but trover and conversion lies for it: for though, in the finding and converting generally, the money of one person cannot be distinguished from that of another, all money being alike; yet the proof that the plaintiff lost, and the defendant converted so much, maintains the action, if the verdict finds it. Jenk. Cent. 208. Where money is given to a person to keep, though it be not in bags, action of trover will lie; because this action is not to recover the money, but damages. Poph. 91; 3 Salk. 365; 4 Taunt. 24.

But trover does not lie for money had and received generally. 5 B. & A. 652; 4 Rep. 92; 1 New Rep. 43.

Where however money has been paid by a debtor, in contemplation of his bankruptcy, by way of fraudulent preference to his creditor, it has been thought that the assignees should proceed for the recovery thereof in trover or by bill in equity, and not by action of assumpsit for money had and received, because by adopting the latter form of action, they might enable the defendant to avail himself of his original debt as a set-off. 4 T. R. 211; 2 H. Bla. 145; Cullen, 201, 202. But this doctrine seems questionable. 10 East, 378, 418; 16 East, 135. However, trover is preferable to an action of assumpsit, when the defendant has converted the produce of a bill, &c. and has become bankrupt, and obtained his certificate, because, to the former action, the certificate would afford no defence. 6 T. R. 695.

In other respects trover in general lies for the conversion of any personal property in which the plaintiff has a general or special property. Com. Dig. Action, Case, Trover, C.; Bac. Abr. Trover, D.; Bul. N. P. 32 to 49. But it does not lie for the conversion of a record, because a record is not private property; but it may be supported for the copy of a record which is private property. Hardr. 111.

So trover may be maintained for deeds. Thus, where one agreed to purchase the remainder of a term, and received the lease to get an assignment made out, but afterwards refused to accept such assignment, or to deliver up the lease on demand made, action of trover was held maintainable against him for the lease. 2 Ros. & Pul. 451.

It lies for an unstamped agreement. 4 Taunt. 861. And, it should seem, for a deed relating to land. 2 T. R. 708.

A person having three bills of exchange, applied to a country banker to give him a bill on London for the amount; this bill was afterwards dishonoured; the Court of King's Bench held, that this was a complete change of securities, and that trover would not lie for the three bills of exchange. 2 B. & A. 327.

II. TROVER lies for the finder of a jewel, against a goldsmith who defrauded him of it; 1 Str. 503; for possession alone gives a sufficient title to maintain this action against all persons, except against the actual owner. Drawing out part of a vessel, and filling it up with water, is conversion of all the liquor. 1 Str. 576.

An uncertificated bankrupt may maintain trover, for goods acquired by him after his bankruptcy, against all the world, except his assignees. 7 T. R. 391.

One tenant in common may maintain trover against his co-tenant, in case where the subject matter of tenancy (e. g. a ship) is actually destroyed mediately or immediately. 4 East, 110, 121; and see 1 Taunt. 241.

Where a lease was deposited by one with the authority of another, and received by the bailee on account of both, the Court of King's Bench held that one alone could not demand it of the bailee without the authority of the other, so as to maintain trover on the bailee's refusing to deliver it. 13 East, 197.

Where certain lands, together with woods, were conveyed under a marriage settlement to trustees, during the life of a married woman, in trust for her and her issue, and in default thereof to the use of her right heirs, the Court of Common Pleas held that the trustees could not maintain trover against a stranger for trees cut down by order of the woman's husband, and carried away by the defendant. 1 New Rep. 26.

In case a master delivers corn to his servant to sell, who does so, and converts the money, the master may bring trover against the servant. 2 Bulst. 307; 1 Rob. Rep. 59.

If goods are delivered to one to deliver over to another, and he to whom they were first delivered do afterwards refuse to deliver them over, and converts them to his own use, he is liable to action of trover, not only by him who first delivered them, but also by him to whom they were to be delivered; and a plaintiff may choose to have his action of trover against the first finder of goods, or any other who gets them afterwards by sale, &c. 1 Bulst. 68; 1 Leon. 183.

A servant may be charged in trover, although the fact of conversion may be done by him for the benefit of his master. 4 M. & S.

A. entrusted B. with goods to sell in India, agreeing to take back from B. what he should not be able to sell, and allowing him what he should obtain beyond a certain price, with liberty to sell them for what he could get, if he could not obtain that price. B. not being able to sell the goods in India himself, left them with an agent to be disposed of, directing the agent to remit the money to B. himself in England; the Court of Common Pleas held that A. could not maintain trover against B. for the goods. 2 B. & P. 438.

Trover doth lie against a common carrier for negligence in losing goods; though it doth not for an actual wrong: and if goods are stolen from a carrier, he may not be charged in trover and conversion; but by action upon the case on the custom of the realm, &c. 2 Salk. 655.

It is settled that trover does not lie against a carrier for a bare non-delivery; but it lies of the goods being in his possession, if he refuse to deliver them on demand. 1 Taunt. 391. But his assertion that he has delivered the goods to the consignee, which is false, is no evidence of conversion. 1 Camp. 409. So trover lies if he deliver them to a wrong person, though by mistake. Peake's Ca. 68; 4 Bing. 476. And it lies against a warehouseman under similar circumstances; 2 B. & A. 702; or where he delivers them under a forged order. 1 Stark. Ca. 104. And if a carrier refuse to deliver the goods without mentioning his lien, he cannot afterwards set up a lien as a defence to the action. 1 Camp. 410.

Where goods are stolen, and before prosecution of the offender by indictment the party robbed brings action of trover, it lies not; for so felonies might be compounded; but where A. steals the goods or money of B. and is convicted, and hath his clergy, upon the prosecution of B., if B. brings trover and conversion for the money, and on not guilty pleaded this special matter is found, the plaintiff shall recover. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 546.

The owner of stolen cattle, who prosecutes the thief to conviction, may recover their value in trover from a person who purchased them from the thief by a bond fide sale, but not in market overt, and sold them again in market overt before the conviction, notice of the felony having been given to the defendant whilst the cattle was in his possession. Peer v. Humphrey, 1 New Term Rep. K. B. 28.

But if goods be obtained from A. by fraud, and pawned to B. without notice, and A. prosecute the offender to conviction, and get possession of his goods, B. may maintain trover for them; for this is distinguishable from the case of felony where the owner's right of restitution is given by positive statute. 5 T. R. 175. See Restitution.

Where the plaintiff lost a bank-note, which the defendant tortiously converted to his own use, but subsequently paid the plaintiff part of the proceeds; it was held, that the acceptance of such part did not waive the tort, but the plaintiff might notwithstanding sue for the note in trover, the amount received going in reduction of damages. 4 Tyr. 485.

III. In order to support this action, the plaintiff must, at the time of the conversion, have had a property in the chattel, either general or special. 3 Campb. 417; 2 Saund. 47 a, n. 1; 1 T. R. 56.

He must also have had the actual possession, or the right to immediate possession, at the time of such conversion. 3 Campb. 417. And therefore where goods leased as furniture with a house, or otherwise let to hire, were taken in execution and absolutely sold by the sheriff, it was decided that the landlord or letter to hire could not maintain trover against the sheriff pending the lease, but should have declared specially in an action on the case. 7 T. R. 9; 3 Campb. 187; 3 Lev. 209. So when A. paid a Bank of England note to B., who paid it to C., who presented it at the Bank, where it was stopped, C. only could sue, and not A. 3 Campb. 417; 2 T. R. 770. But a landlord has such an implied possession of timber wrongfully cut down during a lease, as to enable him to support trover if it be removed. 7 T. R. 15; 1 Saund. 322, n. 5; 2 Campb. 491; 2 M. & S. 424; 1 Price, 57. And a remainder-man may support this action against a tenant for life for taking away trees. Com. Dig. Bians, H.; 1 T. R. 55. So if corn be sown by the out-going tenant, and cut down and taken by him after the purchase of tenancy, under a mistaken claim to it as a way-going crop, the owner of the estate may support trover. 1 Price, 58.

The person who has the absolute or general, and not the mere special property in a personal chattel, may support this action, although he has never had the actual possession; for it is a rule of law, that the general property of personal chattels creates a constructive possession. 2 Saund. 47 a, n. 1; Bac. Abr. Trover, C.; 3 Wils. 136; 1 B. & P. 47. And where the plaintiff, as executor, declared on the possession of his testator, the court held it to be sufficient, because the property was vested in the executor, and no other person having the right of possession, the property drew after it the possession. Latch 211; 3 Bac. Abr. 58. And where a person has delivered goods to a carrier or other bailee, who has not the right to withhold the possession from the general owner, and so parted with the actual possession, yet he may maintain trover for a conversion by a stranger, for the owner has still the possession in law against a wrong-doer, and the carrier or other bailee is considered merely as his servant. 1 Taunt. 391; 7 T. R. 12; 2 Saund. 47 b. And this rule prevails in the case of a gratuitous loan, but not where there has been a letting to hire. 2 Campb. 464; 3 Campb. 187; 7 T. R. 9. And an executor or an administrator is by legal construction possessed of the goods of the testator or intestate from the time of his death. 7 T. R. 13; Latch. 214; 2 Saund. 47 b, 47 k.

So a person having a special property in the goods, may support trover against a stranger who takes them out of his actual possession, as a sheriff, 2 Saund. 47; a carrier, 1 Roll. Abr. 4; 1 Mod. 31; 1 Lord Raym. 276; Bul. N. P. 33; a factor, consignee, pawnee, or trustee, or an agister of cattle, or a gratuitous bailee, 1 B. & A. 59; or an executor de son tort, or any other person who is responsible over to his principal, 2 Saund. 47 b; 11 East, 626; but a mere servant cannot support this action. Owen, 52; 1 Campb. 369.

In general also a special property is sufficient to support trover against a stranger, who has no better title; and the bare possession of goods, whether lawfully obtained or not, is prima facie evidence of property. 2 Saund. 46 c, d; 1 East, 244. And a party entitled to the temporary possession may support trover against the general owner. 2 Taunt. 268. And trover lies by a person possessed of a ship not registered. 2 Taunt. 302; 1 East, 246.

In general it has been considered that in the case of a special property it must have been accompanied with possession, in order to support trover. 4 East, 214. But where the person having such special property has also an interest in the goods, there are exceptions; and therefore it was observed by Eyre, C. J. 1 B. & P. 47 (and see 2 Saund. 47 d; see Bac. Abr. Trover, C.; 8 T. R. 22; 11 East, 626) that it is not true, that in cases of special property the party must once have had possession in order to maintain trover; for a factor to whom goods have been consigned, and who has never received them, may maintain such an action.

However, without such absolute or special property, this action cannot be maintained, therefore, as we have seen, trover cannot be supported by a party in a suit for a record, nor can a tenant in tail expectant on the determination of an estate for life, without impeachment for waste, bring trover for timber which grew upon and was severed from the estate; for such a tenant for life has a right to the trees immediately when they are cut down. 1 T. R. 55; 3 Campb. 417. And the plaintiff must not only prove that the goods which are the subject of the action are his property, but also that they were so when they were converted. 2 T. R. 750.

The plaintiff, an agent to P., held a bill of exchange for 3500*l.* as a security for 1000*l.* advanced by P. to E., by whom the bill was deposited, and who expressly authorized its detention till money due to the plaintiff from E. was also paid. The acceptor improperly obtained possession of the bill, and was sued by P., who, on the cause being referred, had damages awarded him to the amount of his advances. Held, that the plaintiff might also maintain trover, the general property in the bill being in him, notwithstanding the prior recovery by P. 4 Bing. 589.

In the case of a general as well as special property, the action may in most cases be brought either by the general or special owner, and judgment obtained by one is a bar to an action by the other. See 1 Chitty on Pleading.

IV. CONVERSION may be either, 1. by a wrongful taking a personal chattel; 2. by some other illegal assumption of ownership, or by illegally using or misusing it; or 3. by a wrongful detention.

The wrongful taking of the goods of another who has the right of possession, is of itself a conversion, and so is the compelling of a party to deliver up goods; and whenever trespass will lie for taking goods of the plaintiff wrongfully, trover will also lie. 3 Wils. 19; Willes, 83; 2 Saund. 47 k; Cro. Eliz. 824. Thus trover lies against the assignees under a commission of bankrupt, where they compel a party to deliver up his property when he was not subject to the bankrupt laws. 3 B. & B. 2; 6 J. B. Moore, 56, S. C. And if goods be wrongfully seized as a distress, though they be not removed from the place in which they were, yet trover may be supported, because the possession in point of law is changed by their being seized as a distress. Willes, 56. And a seizure of goods under a feri facias after a party's bankruptcy, and a removal of them to a broker's, is a sufficient conversion. 3 Campb. 396. And this action may be supported after an acquittal of the defendant for the felonious taking of goods. 12 East, 409.

And where a toll-gatherer to the owner of a market, in taking toll of corn, varied from the regular mode so as to take a larger quantity, it was held trover was maintainable against him for the excess. 2 B. & Ad. 190.

In the case of a conversion by wrongful taking, it is not necessary to prove a demand and refusal. 1 Sid. 164; 6 Mod. 212; Bul. N. P. 44; 1 Mark. 173; 3 B. & B. 2; 6 J. B. Moore, 56, S. C. And the intent of the party is immaterial; for, although the defendant acted under a supposition that he was justified in what he did, he will be equally liable to this action. 4 M. & S. 260. But if the possession was obtained under colour of a contract, trover cannot be sustained, 3 Campb. 299, 352; 3 Taunt. 274; unless a case of fraud can be proved. 7 Taunt. 59; 1 B. & C. 514.

So the wrongful assumption of the property or right of disposing of goods, may be a conversion in itself, and render unnecessary a demand and refusal, 5 East, 407; 6 East, 540; 4 Taunt. 24; 2 B. & B. 2; 6 J. B. Moore, 56, S. C.; 4 Taunt. 799; as well as any tender of charges, 1 Campb. 410; 2 M. & S. 298; 3 Campb. 472, 473. Thus a sale of a ship, which was afterwards lost at sea, made by the defendant, who claimed under a defective conveyance from a trader before his bankruptcy, is a sufficient conversion to enable the assignees of the bankrupt to maintain trover, without showing a demand and refusal. 5 East, 407, 420.

So where a person entrusted with the goods of another, puts them into the hands of a third person, contrary to orders, it is a conversion. 4 T. R. 264. And if one tenant in common sell the other's goods without his consent, it is a conversion, and trover is maintainable, 5 B. & A. 395; and where a carrier, Peake, C. N. P. 49; 5 Burr. 2825; see 1 Taunt. 391; 1 Campb. 409, 439, ante; or a wharfinger, 2 B. & A. 702, by mistake, delivers goods to a wrong person, trover may be supported, though it would be otherwise if they were left by accident, Id. 41, n.; and if a person illegally make use of a thing found or delivered to him, it is a conversion in itself, Cro. Eliz. 219; or if a bailee, merely to keep or carry, and having no beneficial interest, misuse a chattel entrusted to him, Id. ibid.; as if a carrier draw out part of the contents of a vessel, and fill it with water, 1 Str. 576; or if a carrier or wharfinger break open a box containing goods, or sell them. 2 Salk. 655. So an irregularity in a distress taken damage feasant may amount to a conversion, Cro. Jac. 148; Bac. Ab., Trover, B.; though not in the case of a distress for rent, when we have seen trover cannot be supported, 1 Hen. Bla. 10; and a party will be personally liable for the conversion to the use of another, although he acted under a supposition that he was justified in what he did. 4 M. & S. 259.

But unless there be an illegal assumption of property, trover cannot in general be supported for a mere non-feasance, 6 East, 540; 2 B. & A. 704; and therefore if a carrier, or other bailee, by negligence, lose goods entrusted to his care, the remedy in general must be case or assumpsit, 5 Burr. 2825; 2 Saund. 47; Peake, C. N. P. 240; and an agent selling at an underprice is not liable to an action of trover, 3 Taunt. 117; and the retention of property under the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, is no conversion. 4 J. B. Moore, 361.

In the preceding instances proof of the act of the defendant is sufficient without evidence of a demand and refusal, 4 Taunt. 801; but where the plaintiff is not prepared to prove some such actual assumption of property, trover cannot be supported without proof of a demand and refusal, or at least a neglect to deliver the goods. Bul. N. P. 44; 2 Saund. 47 c.; 13 East, 177, 197; 1 Campb. 439; 5 M. & S. 105.

If in trover an actual conversion cannot be proved, then proof is to be had of a demand made, before the action brought, of the thing for which the action is commenced, and that the thing demanded was not delivered. In this case, though an actual conversion may not be proved, a demand, and refusing to deliver the things demanded, is a sufficient evidence to the jury that he converted the same, till it appears to the contrary. 10 Rep. 56, 491; 2 Lil. 619.

Where a defendant really comes to the possession by finding, denial is a conversion; but if he had the goods, &c. by delivery, there denial is no conversion, but evidence of conversion; and in both cases the defendant hath a lawful possession, either by finding or by delivery; and where the possession is lawful, the plaintiff must show a demand and a refusal, to make a conversion: though if the possession was tortious, as if the defendant takes away the plaintiff's hat, the very taking is a sufficient proof of the conversion, without proving a demand and refusal. Sid. 264; 3 Salk. 365.

By Holt, C. J., the denial of goods to him who hath a right to demand them, is a conversion; and after a demand and refusal, if the defendant tender the goods, and the plaintiff refuse to receive them, that will go only in mitigation of damages, not to the right of the action of trover, for the plaintiff may have that still. Mod. Cas. 212.

An action of trover and conversion may be brought for goods, although the goods came into possession of the plaintiff before the action is brought, which doth not purge the wrong, or make satisfaction for that which was done to the plaintiff by detaining the goods. If a man takes my horse and rides him, and afterwards delivers him to me, trover lies against him, for this is a conversion, and the re-delivery is no bar to the action. 1 Dunn. Abr. 21; 2 Lil. 618.

But it has been recently held, that a demand and refusal are evidence only, and are not conclusive of the fact of conversion, and they are cured by a subsequent tender of the goods before action brought. 1 Moo. & Sc. 459.

Where a trader, on the eve of his bankruptcy, made a collusive sale of his goods to the defendant, it was decided that the assignees could not maintain trover without proving a demand and refusal, 2 Hen. Bla. 135; 2 Esp. Rep. 96; or where the sheriff, having taken goods in execution after a secret act of bankruptcy, has not proceeded to sell. 3 Campb. 396; sed vide 4 M. & S. 268.

Such a demand and non-compliance are prima facie evidence of a conversion, and will induce a jury to find it, unless the defendant adduce evidence to negative the presumption; as that he being a carrier, &c. lost the goods by negligence, &c. Bul. N. P. 44; 2 Saund. 47 c.; Peake's Law of Evidence, 298; or that he had reasonable grounds for doubting the plaintiff's right, and offered to deliver them to the right owner. 3 Campb. 215 n.; 2 Bulst. 310; 5 J. B. Moore, 559, 286, n.; 2 B. & P. 464; 5 B. & A. 247. And where the demand of the things for which the action is brought is not made by the plaintiff himself, who is the owner, but by another person on his account, a refusal by the defendant, on the ground that he does not know to whom the things belong, or that the person who applies for them is not properly empowered to receive them, or until he is satisfied by what authority the application is made, this will not be such a refusal as to create a conversion. 1 Esp. N. P. C. 87; and see J. B. Moore, 259. In an action of trover against an agent, if the plaintiff rely on a refusal to deliver up the property as evidence of a conversion, it must amount to an absolute and not a mere qualified one; and on an agent's refusal to deliver up the goods without his master's directions, it is not sufficient to render him personally liable. 5 B. & A. 247; 2 Mod. 242.

A refusal by a bailee to deliver goods to the real owner without the authority of the bailor, who has in fact no lien, is sufficient evidence of a conversion. 1 B. & A. 450.

Where the plaintiff sold utensils in a brewhouse to T. who paid for them, and was to take them away, but the defendant being possessed of the brewhouse, the utensils were demanded of him by the plaintiff's attorney, accompanied by T., when the defendant said he would not deliver them to any body, and afterwards the plaintiffs repaid T. and brought trover for the goods: the Court of King's Bench held that this demand and refusal were sufficient evidence of conversion to support the action, without any new demand after the re-payment to T. 5 M. & S. 105.

A. brought an action of trespass against B. for taking away a filly; B. justified the taking as the servant of C.; the jury found a verdict for A., with damages, subject to a reference to D. one of the jurors, to ascertain to whom she belonged (which was to depend on whether a scar should appear on a certain part of her body, and in case it should, the verdict for A. was to stand; if not, it was to be entered for B.) The filly was delivered to D. by consent of all parties, and he made his award, and found her to belong to A., and accordingly ordered the verdict for him to stand. C., ten days after the award, demanded the filly of D., who refused to deliver her, and a fortnight afterwards C. brought an action of trover for her recovery: held that the detention of the filly by D. did not, under the circumstances, amount to a conversion; as C. was no party to the original action, and as it did not appear that he was authorized by B. to make the demand, to whom alone D. was bound to deliver her, he only being liable to the damages awarded to A. 5 Moore, 259; 2 B. & B. 417.

In trover against several defendants, all cannot be found guilty on the same count, without proof of a joint conversion by all. 1 M. & S. 588.

In trover for a bond, the plaintiff need not show the date, for the bond being lost or converted, he may not know the date; and if he should set out the date and mistake it, he would fail in his action. Cro. Car. 202. If the defendant find the bond and receive the money, action of account lieth against the receiver, and not trover. Cro. Eliz. 723.

Where the trover of goods is in one county, and the conversion in another county, the action brought for these goods may be laid in the county where the conversion was, or in any other county, as it is only a transitory action; and neither the place of trover nor conversion, are traversable. Pash. 23 Car. B. R.

Formerly under the general issue Not Guilty the special matter might have been given in evidence to prove the plaintiff had no cause of action, or to entitle the defendant to the thing in controversy. 2 Bulst. 313. Vide also 2 Salk. 654; Fete. 198; Cro. Car. 27; 2 Lil. 622.

But the plea of Not Guilty now operates as a denial only if the breach of duty or wrongful act alleged to have been committed by the defendant, and all other pleas in denial must take issue on some particular matter of fact alleged in the declaration. See further, Not Guilty.

The jury are not limited to find as damages the mere value of the property at the time of the conversion, but they at their discretion find the value at a subsequent time, as damages. 1 C. & P. 62.

In trover for a bill of exchange, the damages are to be calculated according to the amount of the principal and interest due upon the bill at the time of the conversion. 3 Campb. 477.

After a plaintiff had recovered damages under a writ of inquiry in trover for the conversion of his title-deeds, the court permitted satisfaction of the damages to be entered on the roll, on the terms of the defendant's delivering up the deeds and paying all the costs as between attorney and client incurred by the plaintiff in the cause, and placing the plaintiff in as good a situation as he stood in before the cause of action accrued. 1 D. & R. 201.

None shall be held to special bail in action of trover or detinue without a judge's order. Reg. Gen. K. B. and C. P. III. 48 Geo. 3. 9 East, 325; 1 Taunt. 203.

TROY-WEIGHT, pondus Trojæ.] A weight of twelve ounces to the pound, having its name from Troyes, a city in Champaign, whence it came first to be used here. But see tit. Pondus Regis for a different etymology. See further, Measure.

TRUCE, treuga.] A league or cessation of arms. TRUCK SYSTEM. A name given to the practice that has prevailed, particularly in the mining and manufacturing districts, of paying the wages of workmen in goods instead of money. The plan has been for the masters to establish warehouses or shops, and the workmen in their employment have either got their wages accounted for to them by supplies of goods from such depots, without receiving any money, or they have got the money with an express understanding that they were to resort to the warehouses or shops of their masters for the articles of which they stood in need. See further, McCulloch's Com. Dict.

This system of dealing, which was so susceptible of abuse, has very properly been abolished by the 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 52. For an outline of the principal provisions of the act, see Servant.

TRUG-CORN, truga frumenti. A measure of corn. At Leominster, at this day, the vicar hath trug-corn allowed him for officiating at some chapels of ease within that parish. Liber Niger, Heref.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.

FIDUCIA, CONFIDENTIA.] A trust is a confidence which one man reposes in another; but, as generally used in law, it is a right to receive the profits of land, and to dispose of the land itself (in many cases) for particular purposes, as directed by the lawful owner, or pointed out by settlement, &c. or by that deed of conveyance which created the trust. A trust is but a new name given to an use.

For the origin of trusts, and their former and present connexion with uses, see tit. Uses. What follows here is chiefly miscellaneous information on the nature and property of trusts, and trust terms, and the duty of trustees; as to which see more at large Fonblanque's Treatise of Equity, in the notes passim; and particularly, as to trusts Executory and Executed, and the existing distinctions between them, lib. i. c. 6. § 8. As to who may be seised to use, or may be a trustee, lib. ii. c. 6. § 1. in n. What acts may or ought to be done by a trustee, to alter or perfect the intent of his trust, lib. ii. c. 7. § 2. in n. And on the whole of the subject, Fin. Abr. tit. Trust. And Mr. Butler's disquisition on this subject, in his note on 1 Inst. 290, b.

I. Of Trusts generally.

II. Of Trusts arising by implication of Law, &c.

III. Of Trustees; their Powers, Duties, and Liabilities, &c.

I. A TRUST, generally speaking, is a right on the part of the cestui que trust to receive the profits, and to dispose of the lands in equity. 1 Mod. 17. But there may be special trusts for the accumulation of profits, the sale of the estates, or the conversion of one trust-fund into another, which may prevent all power of interference on the part of the cestui que trust until such special trust be satisfied; and there is a distinction between trusts executed and executory.

A trust does not include every equitable interest. An equity of redemption is said to be a title in equity, and not merely a trust. And see Hard. 465. Lord Eldon, in 17 Ves. 133, observes, that a trust-estate and an equity of redemption are, in many respects, most materially different.

Trusts may be created of real or personal estates, and are either express or implied; under which head of implied trusts may be included resulting trusts, and all such trusts as are not express. Express trusts are created by deed or by will; implied trusts arise in general by construction of law upon the acts or situation of parties. 1 Mad. Ch. 446.

The courts of equity have an original, a peculiar, and an exclusive jurisdiction over a trust, which has been called a "creature of equity," see 2 Bulstr. 837; and of which the courts of law take no cognizance. The ecclesiastical courts have no jurisdiction over trusts; and therefore, where a party sued as a trustee was arrested on a writ de contumace capiendo, the Court of King's Bench discharged him out of custody. 1 B. & C. 655.

Trusts and legal estates are to be governed by the same rules; and this is a maxim which has universally prevailed. It is so in the rules of descent, as in gavelkind, and borough-English lands; and there was formerly a possession fratris of a trust, as well as of a legal estate. So the like rules prevail in limitations, and also in barring entails of trusts, as of legal estates; per the master of the rolls, who said he thought there was no exception out of this general rule, nor is there any reason that there should; and that it would be impossible to fix boundaries, and show how far, and no farther, it ought to go; and that perhaps in early times the necessity of keeping thereto was not seen, or thoroughly considered. 2 P. Wms. 645.

In some cases, however, the assistance of the legislature has been required to preserve the uniformity between legal and trust-estates.

Declarations and creations of trust, of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, are to be in writing, signed by the party empowered to declare such trust, &c. 29 Car. 2. c. 3. But it is provided that this shall not extend to resulting trusts, or trusts arising by implication or construction of law; which shall be of like force as before that act. See post, as to Resulting Trusts.

The statute does not extend to the declaration or creation of trusts of mere personality. 10 Mod. 404; 3 Bro. C. C. 587; 1 P. W. 9.

By virtue also of the above statute, trust-estates are liable to executions upon judgments, statutes, and recognizances.

Previous to that statute the trust of an estate in fee simple was not assets at law or in equity, in the hands of the heir of the cestui que trust, to satisfy bond debts. See Cha. Cas. 12. But by the tenth section of that statute, the trust is now made legal assets. 2 Barn. 248.

A trust may be devised with the solemnities required by the statute of frauds, upon the devise of legal estates. 2 Cox's P. W. 258, n. 1; 3 Atk. 151.

A fine and recovery of cestui que trust formerly barred and transferred a trust, as it did an estate at law, if it were upon a consideration. Chanc. Rep. 49. See titles Fine of Lands, Recovery; and Treat. Eq. lib. i. c. 3. § 1. in n.

It has been decreed, that a trust for a son, &c. shall pass with the lands into whose hands soever they come, and cannot be defeated by any act of the father or trustees. And though a husband and wife have no children in many years, and they and the trustees agree to sell the land settled, &c. it will not be permitted in chancery. Abr. Cas. Eq. 391; 1 Vern. 181. A termor grants his lands in trust for himself for life, and to his wife for life, and after to his children for their lives, and then to A. B.; this trust to A. B. is good; though, if it had been to the heirs of their bodies, it would be otherwise. Chanc. Rep. 230, 239.

For much useful information as to the manner in which the courts have remedied the mischiefs arising from the secret nature of trusts, both with respect to the cestui que trust, and the public at large, see 1 Inst. 290, b. &c. and the long and learned note there.

This, with respect to the cestui que trust, has been effected, in some degree, by courts of equity having held that persons paying money to trustees, with notice of the trust, are, generally speaking, obliged to see it properly applied. It is perhaps to be wished that the operations and consequences of trusts had been confined to the trustee and cestui que trust; there is no doubt but the doctrine is, in many instances, of great service to the cestui que trust, as it preserves his property from the speculations, and other disasters, to which, if it were left solely to the discretion of the trustee, it would necessarily be subject. Yet it may be questioned whether the admission of it is not in general productive of more inconvenience than real good; for if the cestui que trust is a married woman, an infant, or otherwise incapable of giving assent to the payment of the money to the trustee, the persons paying it cannot be indemnified against the trustee's misapplication of it, but by paying it under the sanction of a court of equity. This retards and often absolutely impedes the progress of the business, involves the parties in an expensive and intricate litigation, and puts them to very great and, in other respects, useless expense. To avoid this, it is become usual to insert a clause in deeds or wills, that the receipts of the trustees shall, of themselves, discharge the persons to whom they are given, from the obligation of seeing to the application of money paid by them as purchasers, &c. See tit. Purchase; and further, 1 Inst. 290, b. in n.

The prevention of the mischief arising from trusts, with respect to the public, has been effected in some measure by the rule laid down in courts of equity, that in any competition of claims, where the equity of the parties is equal, he who has the law shall prevail. If a person has the legal estate or interest of the subject matter in contest, he must necessarily prevail at law over him whose right is only equitable, and therefore not even noticed by the courts of law; this advantage he carries with him even into a court of equity, so far, that if the equitable claims of the parties are of equal force, equity will leave him who has the legal right in full possession of it; and not do any thing to reduce him to an equality with the other, who has the equitable right only. This very important rule of equity is most fully illustrated by an inquiry into the doctrine of courts of equity respecting trust terms of years attendant upon the inheritance; in this inquiry, the origin and effect of these terms, and the general rules as to the cases in which it is necessary that they should be from time to time assigned to trustees to attend the inheritance, and protect a purchaser from all mesne incumbrances, are very clearly and explicitly stated; though these rules must, from their nature, be subject to an endless variety of modifications. It is concluded by the learned writer, that, in all cases of this description, it is infinitely better to err by an excess of care, than to trust any thing to hazard. There is no doubt that the precautions used for the security of purchasers appear sometimes to be excessive, and satisfactory reasons cannot always be given for requiring some of them; yet the more a person's experience increases, the more he finds the reason and real utility of them; and the more he will be convinced that very few of the precautions required, by the general practice of the profession, are without their use, or can be safely dispensed with. 1 Inst. 290, b. 292, b. 294, b. in n.; and see Treat. Eq. lib. ii. c. 4. § 3. in n.; and also tit. Mortgage.

By the operation of these long terms, the legal estate being separated from the beneficial interest, many inconveniences would have resulted from them, had not courts of equity interposed, and laid down certain rules, restrictive of the legal rights of the trustee. Hence it became a rule in equity, that where the tenant for years is but a trustee for the owner of the inheritance, he shall not keep out his cestui que trust; nor, pari ratione, obstruct him in doing any act of ownership, or in making any assurances of his estates; and therefore, in equity, such a term for years shall yield and be moulded according to the uses, estates, or charges which the owner of the inheritance declares or carves out of the fee. See 1 T. R. 765. Courts of law, feeling the reasonableness of this rule, allow it to prevail as an exception to the general rule, which requires a plaintiff in ejectment to recover by the strength of a legal title; so that it is now established by many decisions, that, even at law, an estate in trust, merely for the benefit of the cestui que trust, shall not be set up against him: any thing shall rather be presumed. See Comp. 46; Doug. 721; Bull. N. P. p. 110; 1 T. R. 758; 2 T. R. 698.

By the 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 50. (the provisions of which were extended to Ireland by 58 Geo. 3. c. 46.) for relief of persons entitled to entailed estates to be purchased with trust-moneys, reciting that by the practice of courts of equity in cases where money was to be laid out in the purchase of lands to be limited to uses capable of being barred by fine, such courts directed the money to be paid to the party who could by fine bar the uses, without requiring the actual investment of the money in land; but nevertheless, in cases where a recovery was requisite to bar such uses, the said courts refused to direct the money to be paid to the party who might suffer such recovery; it was enacted that in future in all cases where money under the controul of a court of equity, or which any trustees should be possessed of or entitled to, should be subject to be invested in the purchase of freehold or copyhold premises to be settled in such manner that it would be competent to the first tenant in tail to bar estates tail and remainders, it should not be necessary to have such money actually invested; but the court, on the petition of the first tenant in tail, and the parties having any antecedent estates (being adults, or if females covert, separately examined,) might order such money to be paid to them, or applied as they should appoint. Funds or other securities in which such money was vested might be transferred under orders of the court.

By the 7 Geo. 4. c. 45, the above act was repealed, and its provisions re-enacted and extended; but by the recent statute for the abolition of fines and recoveries, the 7 Geo. 4. c. 45, is also repealed, and other provisions substituted. See Tail.

By the 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 98. to restrain trusts in deeds or wills, it is provided that no person by deed or will shall settle or dispose of any real or personal property, so that the produce shall accumulate for a longer term than the life of the settler, or twenty-one years after his decease, or during the minority of any party living at his decease, or the minorities of parties beneficially interested. See Executory Devise, 1.

As to trusts for charitable purposes, see statutes 59 Geo. 3. c. 81, 91. in addition to those mentioned under title Charitable Uses.

A trust of a fee-simple estate, or fee-tail, is forfeited by treason, under the 33 Hen. 8. c. 20. § 2. but not by felony; for such forfeiture is by way of escheat, and an escheat cannot be but where there is a defect of a tenant; and here is a tenant. Hard. 495. See Jenk. Cent. 245. A trust for a term is forfeited to the king in case of treason or felony; and the trustees in equity shall be compelled to assign to the king. Cro. Jac. 513. If a bond be taken in another's name, or a lease be made to another in trust for a person, who is afterwards convicted of treason or felony, they are as much liable to be forfeited as a bond or lease made in his own name, or in his possession. See Forfeiture; and Treat. Eq. lib. ii. c. 7. § 1. in n.

By the 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 88; 47 Geo. 3. st. 2. c. 24; and 59 Geo. 3. c. 94. his majesty was empowered to direct the execution of any trusts to which lands vested in him by escheat for want of heirs, or by forfeiture or alienage, might be subject, and to make grants for such purposes, or for restoring them to the family, or to persons adopted as part of the family, or to carry into effect any grant, conveyance or devise, or for rewarding discoverers, &c. and that either unconditionally or on payment of any sum of money, or to grant to trustees to be sold, and the money applied as the crown should direct.

Now by the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 23. § 2. if a trustee or a mortgagee of any land die without an heir, the Court of Chancery may appoint a person to convey it pursuant to the provisions of the 1 Wm. 4. c. 60; and by § 3. lands and chattels vested in any trustee or mortgagee shall not be escheated or forfeited by his attainer or conviction for any offence, but shall remain in such trustee, &c. or survive to his co-trustee, or descend to his representative.

Although the trust of an estate of inheritance is subject to curtesy, yet it was not until recently liable to dower. 2 Atk. 525; 1 Bro. 326. But now by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 105. § 2. a wife is entitled in equity to dower out of any land of which her husband died beneficially interested. See Dower, II. 2.

For the provisions of the recent statute of limitations, with respect to trust-estates, see Limitation of Actions, II. 1.

II. It was ruled by Lord Chancellor Comper, that the statute of frauds, 29 Car. 2. c. 3. § 8. which says, "That all conveyances, where trusts and confidences shall arise or result by implication of law, shall be as if that act had never been made," must relate to trusts and equitable interests, and cannot relate to any use which is a legal estate. 1 P. Wms. 112. See Treat. Eq. l. ii. c. 5. § 8. and note there.

Where a daughter's portion was charged upon the father's land, she, at the request of her father, had released her interest in the land, to the intent that he might be enabled to make a clear settlement thereof upon the son. It was declared by the Lord Keeper, that if this was done by the daughter without any consideration, there would be a resulting trust in the father, whereby he should be chargeable to the daughter for so much money. Freem. 305.

There are only two kinds of trusts by operation of law; either where the deed or conveyance has been taken in the name of one man, and the purchase money paid by another; or where the owner of an estate has made a voluntary conveyance of it, and declared the trust with regard to one part to be for another person, but hath been silent as to the other part: in which case he himself ought to have the benefit of that, it being plainly his intent. Barnardist. 388.

No rule is more certain than that if a man makes a conveyance in trust for such persons, and such estates as he shall appoint, and makes no appointment, the resulting trust must be to him and his heirs. The trust in equity must follow the rules of law in the case of an use; and that it would be so in the case of an use is undoubtedly true; and that was Sir Edward Cleeve's case, in 6 Rep. per Lord Chancellor. Fitz-Gib. 223.

If a man buys land in another person's name, and pays the money for the land, this will be a trust for him that paid the money, though there be no deed declaring the trust; because the statute of frauds extends not to trusts raised by the implication of law: and a bare declaration by parol, on a deed assigned, may prevent any resulting trust to the assignor. 2 Vent. Rep. 361; 2 Vern. 294. Where there has been fraud in gaining a conveyance from another, that is a reason of making the grantee considered as a trustee. 1 P. Wms. 113.

If a man purchase an estate and do not take the conveyance in his own name only, the clear result of all the cases, without a single exception is, that the trust of the legal estate, whether freehold, copyhold, or leasehold; whether taken in the name of the purchaser and others jointly, or in the names of others without that of the purchaser; whether in one name or several; whether jointly or successive, results to the man who advances the purchase money, unless such a resulting trust would break in upon the policy of an act of parliament. See 17 Ves. 251; and 3 Ridg. P. C. 106.

Where a trustee purchases lands out of the profits of the trust-estate, and takes the conveyance in his own name, it was formerly held, that though probably, if he could not make other satisfaction for the misapplication, these lands might be sequestered, yet they could not be declared to be a trust for Cestui-que-Use, no more than if A. borrows money of B. for it is not a trust in writing; and a resulting trust it could not be, because that would be to contradict the deed by parol proof, directly against the statute of frauds. But it was allowed, that if this purchase had been recited to have been made with the profits of the trust-estate, this appearing in writing might ground a resulting trust. And on appeal to the House of Lords, this decree was affirmed. Kirk v. Webb, Chan. Prec. 84, pl. 77. 2 P. Wms. 414.

So, where a testator empowered the executor to lay out the personal estate in land, and settled it on A. and his heirs; and the executor being about to purchase, told A.'s mother of it, and asked her consent, but took the conveyance in his own name, and no trust in writing was declared, but it was proved that he at several times declared it must be sold to make A. satisfaction; yet the court, (though inclined to decree a conveyance to A., the executor being dead insolvent,) declared it could not, because there was no express proof of the application of the trust-money. Chan. Prec. 168, pl. 139. It has however been held, in more modern cases, that evidence abundè is admissible to show that the purchase was made with the trust-money; and that, upon such fact being clearly proved, a trust will result. See Ambl. 409.

But unless the trust arise on the face of the deed itself, the proofs must be very clear, 1 Vern. 366; 2 Atk. 71; and however clear they may be, it seems doubtful whether parol evidence be admissible against the answer of the trustee denying the trust. 2 Freem. 289; Prec. Chan. 103; 2 Atk. 155; 4 East, 571, n. (b). And in cases of this nature the claimant, in opposition to the legal titles, should not delay asserting his rights, as a stale demand would meet with little attention. 7 Bro. P. C. by Tomlins, 279.

Where the evidence is merely parol, although clearly admissible, it will be received with great caution. Evidence of naked declarations made by the purchaser himself is, as Sir William Grant observed, in all cases most unsatisfactory, on account of the facility with which it may be fabricated, and the impossibility of contradicting it. Besides, the slightest mistake or failure of recollection may alter the effect of the declaration.

So Lord Hardwick laid it down that parol evidence might be admitted to show the trust from the mere circumstances of the pretended owner of the real estate or inheritance which made it impossible for him to be the purchaser. 2 Atk. 71; and see 1 Atk. 59; Ambl. 413; 10 Ves. 511.

However, parol evidence will be allowed to prove the purchaser's intention that the person to whom the conveyance was made should take beneficially, and if satisfactory he will be entitled to the estate, 2 East, 534, n.; 1 Ves. Sen. 57; but the proof rests upon him to show that the name from whom the consideration moved did not mean to purchase in trust for himself, but intended a gift to him. 3 Ridg. P. C. 178.

Lord Hardwick appears to have been of opinion that this doctrine of resulting trust only extended to cases where the whole consideration is paid by one person, and the conveyance taken in the name of the other. See 9 Mod. 233. But in a more modern case the late vice chancellor following the true principle, decided in favour of the resulting trust, where joint purchase had been made by several individuals. 2 Ves. & Beam. 388. See Sugden's Vendors.

When an estate is subject to a trust or equitable interest, and a person purchases it for a valuable consideration with notice of the trust or equitable interest, the estate will be subject to it in the hands of the purchaser, 2 Vern. 271; 3 Atk. 238; 16 Ves. 249; and a person acquiring an estate as a mere voluntary grantee, even without notice, see 1 Coke, 121, b; 2 Salk. 680; or as a devisee, 2 P. W. 200, will take it subject to every beneficial or equitable lien. The principle has been extended to that equitable lien which a vendor has for any part of his purchase money remaining unpaid. 15 Ves. 829; 2 V. & B. 306. See Saunders on Uses, 319.

With respect to the cases in which a trust shall result to the heir, where the particular purpose for which land was to be converted into money may have failed, see 3 P. Wms. 20. and Mr. Cox's note (1) there, where the cases are collected and referred to their respective principles.

III. A trust to pay portions, legacies, &c. out of the rents and profits of the lands, at the day prefixed, gives the trustees power to sell; if the annual profits will not do it within that time, then they may sell the land, being within the intention of the trust: and they cannot sell to raise the money, except it be to be paid at a certain time. Rep. Chan. 176. A trustee for sale of lands for payment of debts, paying debts to the value of the land, thereby becomes a purchaser himself. Ibid. 199. But where a trustee for paying portions pays one child his full share and the trust estate decays, he shall not be allowed such payment. 2 Chan. Ca. 132.

If one devises land to trustees until his debts are paid, with remainder over, and the trustees misapply the profits, they shall hold the land only till they might have paid the debts, if the rents had been duly applied; and after that the land is to be discharged, and the trustees are only answerable. 1 P. Wms. 519. A person having granted a lease of land to trustees, in trust to pay all the debts which he should owe at his death, in just proportion, without any preference; it was here declared, that the simple contract debts became as debts due by mortgage and should carry interest. Ibid. 229.

In a case where a power of sale was reserved to three trustees and their heirs, one of the trustees died, and the two surviving trustees executed the power: the Court of King's Bench held, that the power was not well executed, although the deed expressly provided that the money arising from the sale should be trusted to the trustees for the time being, and also reserved a power in case of death to appoint new trustees. 1 B. & A. 608.

A trust for sale vested in A. and his heirs is incapable of being delegated, and cannot therefore be executed by an assignee of A. although the deed declared that the receipts of A., his executors, administrators, and assigns should be sufficient discharges for the purchase money. Bradford v. Bulfield, 2 Sim. 264.

A trustee for sale who has renounced is not a necessary party to the conveyance, or to the receipt of the purchase money. 5 Mad. 435.

In equity, trusts are so regarded, that no act of a trustee will prejudice the cestui que trust; for though a purchaser for valuable consideration, without notice, shall not have his title any ways impeached, yet the trustee must make good the trust; but if he purchases, having notice, then he is the trustee himself, and shall be accountable. Abr. Cas. Eq. 384.

The power of the trustee over the legal estate vested in him exists only for the benefit of the cestui que trust. He may indeed, by means of that power, prejudice the cestui que trust, by alienating the estate wholly or partially (as by a mortgage, 1 P. Wms. 279,) to a purchaser for a valuable consideration; for, as we have already seen, a voluntary conveyance would not have the effect; but such an abuse of trust can hardly occur, unless where a trustee is in possession of the trust-estate and of the title-deeds, and even then very rarely.

Where trustees in a settlement join with tenant for life in any conveyance, to defeat a remainder, before it comes in esse, this is a plain breach of trust; and those who claim under such deed, having notice of the trust, will be liable to make good the estates. 2 Salk. 680. Yet in case a trustee joins with cestui que trust in tail, in a deed to bar the entail, as it is no more than what he may be compelled to, it is no breach of his trust. 1 Chan. Cas. 49, 213.

See the provisions of the recent statute appointing protectors of settlements, title Tail.

A judgment or a commission of bankruptcy against a trustee, 1 P. Wms. 278; 2 P. Wms. 318; 3 P. Wms. 187. will not in equity affect the estate; nor can his wife claim dower or freebench out of it, 2 Ves. 634, 8; 2 Freem. 43; nor can the husband of a female trustee be entitled as tenant by the curtesy. 1 Atk. 603; S. C. 2; Eq. Abr. 723.

With respect to the escheat or forfeiture, by the trustee of a trust-estate, see ante, II.

A trustee may devise the trust-estate, but the devisee takes the estate subject to the original trust. 8 Ves. 417. But though even under general words (1 P. Wms. 197.) the trust-estate may be devised, yet wherever the trusts under which the trustee's property is devised are inconsistent with the supposition that the trust-estate was meant to be included in the devise, it will be presumed it was not intended to pass, and will not pass. 8 Ves. 435; 8 T. R. 118.

A trustee cannot (without an express power for that purpose) alter the nature of the trust property, Amb. 211, either by converting land into money, investing money in the purchase of land, 1 Ves. 461; Amb. 370; or by taking a lease for lives instead of renewing a lease for years, 3 P. Wms. 99; 18 Ves. 214, so as to vary the right of succession to such property, unless it be under particular circumstances, and evidently for the benefit of the trust-estate. Proc. Cha. 5.; 3 Brown, 513; Amb. 417.

A trustee selling stock, and investing it in other stock, or annuities, for the purpose of increasing the income of tenant for life, at the expense of the remainder-man, was declared answerable for the original fund or the sum produced by the sale, at the option of the remainder-man, with interest or dividends according to his option. 4 Russ. 263.

Neither can trustees lend money on different securities than those authorized by the instrument creating the trust. And a power to lend trust money upon real or personal security does not enable trustees to accommodate a trader with a loan upon his land. Coop. 33. And wherever trustees take upon themselves to lend another's money on a private security, they are responsible for the failure of the security. 2 Cor. 1. So one trustee suffering the other to have trust money on a note of hand, is liable to make it good. 3 Bro. C. C. 112.

Courts of equity view purchases by trustees of trust-estates with great jealousy, and to set aside such a purchase it is not necessary to show they have made an advantage. 8 Ves. 348, 10 Ves. 393. There is however no rule that a trustee to sell cannot be the purchaser; but however fair the transaction, it must be subject to an option in the cestui que trust, if he comes in a reasonable time, to have a re-sale, unless the trustee, to prevent that, purchase under an application to the court. 5 Ves. 678.

When a trustee or guardian renews a lease, the new lease shall be subject to the trust affecting the old lease. 1 Cha. Ca. 191; 1 Atk. 430; 2 Atk. 597; 3 Atk. 538; 17 Ves. 228; 2 Ves. & B. 45; 18 Ves. 259, 274. And if a lease be settled upon A. for life, with remainders over, and A. obtain a renewal of the lease, the renewed lease shall be bound by the trusts of the will or settlement. Amb. 658, 715, 731; 1 Bro. 197; 2 Bro. 291; 4 Bro. 161; 11 Ves. 383; 15 Ves. 236. So, if one of three lessees, under a lease from a dean and chapter, surrender the old lease, and take a new lease to himself, it shall be a trust for all of them. 1 Vern. 276; Cro.

Eliz. 302. In these cases the rule of equity is enforced even against the express intention and contract of the lessor. Sel. Ca. Chan. 61; 3 Mer. 190, 347; 3 Atk. 2.

If a person jointly interested with an infant in a lease, obtain a renewal to himself only, and the lease prove beneficial, he shall be held to have acted as trustee; and the infant may claim his share of the benefit: but if it do not prove beneficial, he must take it upon himself. 1 Bos. & Pul. 376.

Where an agent employed to purchase an estate buys it for himself, equity will consider him as a trustee for the principal. 1 Russ. & M. 53.

It is, generally speaking, a rule, that a trustee releasing or compounding a debt due to the trust-estate must answer for the loss occasioned by such release or composition. 1 Vern. 342; 1 Chu. Rep. 125. Yet the rule must always depend upon the particular circumstances of the case; for where a trustee, in releasing or compounding a debt, acts from prudential motives, and with a view to benefit the trust property, the courts will consider his conduct not only excusable, but in many instances laudable. 3 P. Wms. 381. On the other hand, where a trustee buys in an incumbrance for less money than is actually due, the trust-estate shall receive the benefit of the composition. 3 P. Wms. 251; 1 Vern. 49; 2 Atk. 54.

Trustees being obliged to join in receipts one, is not chargeable for money received by the other; in the case of executors it is otherwise. 1 Salk. 318; 2 Vern. Rep. 515.

But where trustees so join in a receipt, that it cannot be distinguished what was received by one, and what by the other, there they shall both be charged with the whole: so, where one trustee, having received the trust money, handed it over to his companion, he shall be charged; for where, by any act or any agreement of a trustee, money gets into the hands of his companion, whether a trustee or co-executor, they shall both be answerable. So, if a trustee be privy to the embezzlement of the trust-fund by his companion, he shall be charged with the amount. Treat. Eq. lib. ii. c. 7. § 5, in n.

Payment by bankers to one of several trustees, of the proceeds of stock sold out under a joint power of attorney from the trustees, does not discharge the bankers as against the other trustees, unless previously authorized by them. 1 R. & M. 361, (N. P.)

A clause in a settlement that trustees shall not be chargeable, except for money actually received, does not bind the trustees as a covenant, but is a cause of indemnity to take away that responsibility which each would otherwise be subject to for the acts of the others: and only leave each of them accountable for what he actually receives as for a simple contract debt. 1 T. R. 42.

Where a settlement directs that a new trustee shall be appointed, on any trustee retiring, and that the trust-property shall be vested in the new and continuing trustees, if a retiring trustee does not appoint a successor, but vests the trust property in the continuing trustee alone, this is a breach of trust; and the retiring trustee is liable for misapplication of the trust funds. 4 Russ. 272.

A trustee, robbed by his own servant, shall be discharged of it in account; though great negligence may charge him with more than he hath received in the trust. 2 Cha. Ca. 2; 1 Vern. 144.

It seems now to be settled, notwithstanding some old determinations to the contrary, that a trustee (or executor) is chargeable in equity with interest on the trust-fund in his hands, wherever it appears that he has made interest; and not only so, but that he appear to have employed the trust-money in trade, whence he has derived profits beyond the rate of interest, he shall account for the whole of such profits: and still further, if a trustee or executor retain money in his hands for any length of time, which he might by application to the court, or by vesting in the funds, have made productive, he shall be charged with interest thereon. Treat. Eq. in c. 7. § 6. in n. See Interest.

A trustee is entitled to no allowance for his trouble in the trust; but he will be paid his costs in case of an unfounded suit against him. Treat. Eq. ii. c. 7. § 3. in n.

Where a corporation is in possession of funds arising from rates granted to them by act of parliament, and to be appropriated to certain beneficial purposes, they are as it seems, trustees; but at all events, they are accountable persons; and the act having provided that they should furnish parliament with an annual account of the sums received, this was held not to oust the jurisdiction of the Courts of Chancery, which in such a case can only be taken away expressly or by necessary implication. Att. Gen. v. Dublin Corp. 1 Bligh, 312.

The current of decisions, where a legatee might be construed into a trustee, has lately been against the creating such a trust, the question being purely matter of intention, to be collected from the words of the testamentary instrument; and in all the cases where a trust has been created, its objects have been defined. See Meridith & al. v. Keneage & al. in Dom. Prec., 1 Sim. 542; and also pp. 534, 540, 550, 565.

Where personal property is bequeathed to the executors, as trustees, the probate of the will is an acceptance of the trusts. 1 Jac. 198.

Lord Hobart is stated to have been of opinion, that an action at law might be maintained against a trustee for breach of trust. See 1 Eq. Ab. 384, in n. But this opinion is inconsistent with Lord Hardwicke's definition of a trust; which is, that it is such a confidence between parties, that no action at law will lie, but is merely a case for the consideration of courts of equity. 2 Atk. 612. That a trustee is liable in equity for a breach of trust, was expressly determined in Vernon v. Vaudrey, Barn. C. 303. But it is material to observe, that even in equity the cestui que trust is considered but as a simple-contract creditor, in respect of such breach of trust; unless the trustee has acknowledged the debt to the trust-estate under hand and seal. See 2 Atk. 119; Forest. 109.

There is no primary liability between the parties to a breach of trust, they are all equally liable; and it is no objection to a suit by parties seeking relief against a breach of trust, that one of the defendants against whom no relief is prayed may have been a party to such breach of trust. 1 Milne & K. 127.

Where trustees become bankrupt, the chancellor may, by the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. § 79. order a conveyance or assignment of the trust estate to other trustees.

By the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 60. all former acts relating to the transfer of estates and funds vested in trustees and mortgagees were repealed with the view of giving to the courts of equity ampler powers than they before possessed, and of extending their jurisdiction to cases, as, for instance, constructive trusts, which were not within the former statutes.

By § 3. where trustees or mortgagees of land are lunatic, the lord chancellor may direct the committees of such persons to convey such land to such persons as he shall think proper.

Or (§ 4.) he may direct the committee or other person to transfer stocks or funds standing in the name of a lunatic trustee, and receive and pay over the dividends.

And by § 5. the lord chancellor, before inquisition, may appoint a person to convey or transfer.

By § 6. infant trustees or mortgagees are empowered to convey by the direction of the Court of Chancery.

By § 7. infant trustees or mortgagees of land within the jurisdiction of the courts of Lancaster and Durham, may convey by the direction of such courts.

§ 8. When trustees of real estates are out of the jurisdiction, or it is uncertain whether they be alive or who may be the heir, the Court of Chancery may appoint a person to convey.

§ 9. When trustees of leasehold estates are out of the jurisdiction of Chancery, or it shall be uncertain whether the trustee last known to have been possessed as aforesaid be living or dead; or if any trustee, or the executor of any such trustee, shall neglect or refuse to assign or surrender such land for twenty-eight days, after a proper deed shall have been tendered for his execution, the Court of Chancery may direct any person whom such court may think proper to appoint, to assign or surrender such land to such person and in such manner as the court shall think proper.

And by § 10. a provision nearly similar is made for the transfer of stocks or funds standing in the names of trustees out of the jurisdiction, &c.

§ 11. Directions or orders of the Court of Chancery, or by the lord chancellor, &c. under the authority of the act, are to be made upon petition.

But (§ 12.) the lord chancellor or court may direct a bill to be filed to establish the right.

§ 13. Any committee, infant, or other person directed by the act to make or join in making any conveyance or transfer or receipt or payment, shall be compelled, by the order to be obtained as therein-before is mentioned, to make and execute the same.

§ 14. Mortgage money belonging to infants is to be paid into the bank, or as the court shall direct.

§ 15. The act is to extend to trustees having an interest, or having duty to perform.

§ 16. The representatives of vendors are to be trustees within the act, after a decree for specific performance; and persons in whose names purchases are made to be such trustees.

So (§ 17.) tenants for life, &c. of estates devised in settlement, and contracted to be sold, may be directed to convey, after a decree for specific performance.

§ 18. The act is to extend to other constructive and resulting trusts, when declared by decree.

§ 19. Husbands of female trustees to be deemed trustees within the act.

§ 20. The provisions as to lunacy are to extend to all persons compellable to convey.

§ 21. The act is to extend to petitions in cases of charity and friendly societies.

§ 22. The lord chancellor or Court of Chancery may appoint new trustees, upon petition, although there is no power in any deed or instrument creating or declaring the trusts of land or stock to appoint new trustees.

By § 23. the Court of Chancery is empowered to appoint new trustees of charities.

§ 24. Enacts the manner of proceeding where trustees, defendants in equity, cannot be found.

§ 26. And the powers and authorities given by the act to the lord chancellor of Great Britain, intrusted as aforesaid, shall extend to all land and stock within any of the dominions, plantations, and colonies, belonging to his majesty (except Scotland and Ireland).

§ 27. The powers and authorities given by the act to the chancellor of Great Britain may be exercised in like manner by the lord chancellor of Ireland, intrusted as aforesaid, with respect to all land and stock in Ireland.

§ 28. The powers given to the lord chancellor are to extend to the lord keeper and commissioners.

§ 29. The powers and authorities given by the act to the chancery in England shall extend to all land and stock within any of the dominions and colonies belonging to his majesty (except Scotland).

And (§ 30.) may be exercised by the Court of Exchequer.

§ 31. The powers given to courts in England may be exercised by the same courts in Ireland.

§ 33. The act is to be an indemnity to the bank and other companies.

TURKEY COMPANY. The trade to the Levant subsisted under a charter in the 3d year of King James I. confirmed by letters patent of 13 Car. 2. The incorporation was by the name of The Governor and Company of Merchants of England trading into the Levant Seas. The qualifications for admission to this company were these: they were to be mere merchants; and no person residing within twenty miles of London was to be admitted, unless he was made free of the city. The fee of admission was, by the charter of Jac. 1. 25l. for those under twenty-six years old, and 50l. for those above that age. The greatness of this fee, and the peculiarity of the description of candidates, were thought unnecessary restraints: and by 26 Geo. 2. c. 18. it was enacted, that every subject of Great Britain might be admitted, upon proper application, into The Turkey Company, upon paying the sum of 20l. By 20 Geo. 3. c. 18. the like privileges were extended to the Irish traders. By 32 Geo. 3. c. 65. British subjects resident in foreign parts might be admitted into the company, on taking the oaths before persons whom the company are enabled to appoint for that purpose.

The limits of this trade were mentioned very generally in the first charter granted in 1581; the liberty there given was "to trade to Turkey." In the 2d charter in 1593, the trade was specified more particularly; namely, "to Venice, Zante, Cephalonia, Candia, and other Venetian territories, the dominions of the grand seignior, by land and sea, and through his countries over land to the East Indies."

This company was abolished by the 6 Geo. 4. c. 33. and all its property at Smyrna or elsewhere vested in the crown.

TURN, or TOURN. The great court-leet of the county, or the county-court is the court-baron; of this the sheriff is judge, and this court is incident to his office; wherefore it is called the sheriff's tourn: and it had its name originally from the sheriff's taking a turn or circuit about his shire, and holding this court in each respective hundred. See 4 Comm. 279; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 10.

The nature of the jurisdiction of this and the court-leet are exactly the same, the former being only a larger species of the latter, extending over more territory; but not over more causes. Much of the business of both has now, (we will not say whether properly or not,) by degrees devolved on the court of quarter sessions. See County-Court, Court Leet; and 2 Hawk. P. C. ubi supra; and Comm. Dig. tit. Leet.

The turn is a court of record; and, by the common law, every sheriff ought to make his turn or circuit throughout all the hundreds in his county, in order to hold a court in every hundred for redressing common grievances, and preservation of the peace; and this court might be holden at any place within the hundred, and as often as the sheriff thought fit: but this having been found to give the sheriff too great power of oppressing the people, by holding his court at such times and places at which they could not conveniently attend, and thereby increase the number of his amercements; by the statute of Magna Charta, c. 35. it was enacted, that no sheriff shall make his turn through a hundred but twice in a year, viz. once after Easter, and once after the feast of St. Michael; and at the place accustomed. Also a subsequent statute ordained, that every sheriff shall make his turn yearly, one time with the month after Easter, and another time within the month after Michaelmas; and if they hold them in any other manner, they shall lose their turn for that time. 31 Edw. 8. st. 1. c. 15.

Since these statutes, the sheriff is indictable for holding this court at another time than what is therein limited, or at an unusual place: and it has been held, that an indictment found at a sheriff's turn, appearing to have been holden at another time, is void. Dalt. Sher. 390, 391; Dyer, 151; 38 Hen. 6.

At common law, the sheriff might proceed to hear and determine any offence within his jurisdiction, being indicted before him, and requiring a trial, till sheriffs were restrained from holding pleas of the crown by Magna Charta, cap. 17. But that statute doth not restrain the sheriff's turn from taking indictments or presentments, or awarding process thereon; though the power of awarding such process being abused, was taken from all the sheriffs, (except those of London,) by 1 Edw. 4. c. 2. and lodged in the justices of peace at their sessions; who are to award process on such indictments delivered to them by the sheriff, as if they had been taken before themselves, &c. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 10.

The sheriff's power in this court is still the same as anciently it was in all cases not within the statutes above-mentioned; he continues a judge of record, and may inquire in his turn of treasons and felonies, by the common law; as well as the lowest offences against the king, such as purprestures, seizure of treasure-trove, of weights, estrays, goods wrecked, &c. All common nuisances and annoyances, and other such like offences; as, selling corrupt victuals, breaking the assise of beer and ale, or keeping false weights or measures, are here indictable; also all common disturbers of the peace, barretors, and common oppressors; and all dangerous and suspicious persons, &c.

The sheriff, in his turn, may impose a fine on all such as are guilty of contempts in the face of the court; and upon a suitor to the court making a default, or refusing to be sworn on the jury; or on a bailiff not making a panel; or a tithing man neglecting to make his presentment; or a person whose constable refusing to be sworn, &c. He may amerce for offences; which fines and amerciements are leviable and recoverable by distress, &c. See 2 H. P. C. c. 10.

TURPIS CAUSA. A base or vile confederation, on which no action can be founded. See Fraud, Wager.

The principle of public policy is this: ex dolo malo non oritur actio. No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or illegal act. If, from the plaintiff's own stating, or otherwise, the action appears to arise ex turpi causa, or the transgression of a positive law of the country, then the court says he has no right to be assisted: it is upon this ground that the court goes, not for the sake of the defendant, but because they will not lend their aid to a plaintiff in such a cause. Spelman v. Johnson, Comp. 341.

The use of these tylwiths was to show not only the originals of families as to the pedigree, but the several distinctions and distances of birth, that in case there should be a failure in any line, the next in degree may claim their interest according to the rule of descent, &c. Cowell. See Descent.

UNCIA TERRÆ; UNCIA AGRI. These phrases often occur in the charters of the British kings, and signify some measure or quantity of land. It was the quantity of 12 modii, and each modius possibly 100 feet square. Mon. Angl. iii. 198.

UNCORE PRIST. The plea of a defendant, in nature of a plea in bar; where, being sued for a debt due on bond at a day past, to save the forfeiture of the bond, he says that he tendered the money at the day and place, and that there was none there to receive it; and that he is also still ready to pay the same. See Tender.

UNDER-CHAMBERLAIN OF THE EXCHEQUER.

An officer there that cleaved the tallies written by the clerk of the tallies, and read the same, that the clerk of the pell and comptrollers thereof might see their entries were true. He also made searches for all records in the treasury, and had the custody of Domesday-book. There were two officers of this name. Conell. This office is now abolished. See Exchequer

UNI

UNDER-ESCHEATOR, sub-eschaetor.] Mentioned in 5 Edw. 3. c. 4. See Escheator.

UNDER-SHERIFF, sub-vicecomes.] See Sheriff, V.

UNDERTAKERS. Such as the king's purveyors employed as their deputies. 12 Car. 2. c. 24. The name is given in several statutes to persons who undertake any great work, as draining of fens, &c. See 2 & 3 P. & M. c. 6; 43 Eliz. c. 11, and formerly in Ireland to grantees of forfeited lands.

UNDER-TREASURER OF ENGLAND, vice-thesaurarius Angliæ.] An officer in the time of King Henry VII.; but some think he was of a more ancient original. His business was to chest up the king's treasure at the end of every term, to note the content of money in each chest, and see it carried into the king's treasury, for the ease of the lord treasurer, as being a thing beneath him, but fit to be performed by a man of great trust and secrecy. And, in the vacancy of the lord treasurer's office, he did all things in the receipt, &c. This officer is mentioned in 39 Eliz. c. 7. § 2, as under-treasurer of the Exchequer.

When there is a lord high treasurer, the chancellor of the exchequer is under-treasurer. Madox, Hist. Exch. 198. n. b. 580, 619, 737, note n. There was also formerly a vice-treasurer for Ireland. See Treasurer.

UNDERWOOD. See Malicious Injuries, Trees.

UNDERWRITER. The person who undertakes to insure or indemnify another against losses by sea or fire. He is called underwriter from his signing his name under or at the foot of the policy or instrument by which the insurance is effected. See Insurance.

UN DIEU ET UN ROY. One God, and one king. The learned judge Littleton's motto.

UNDRESS. A word used for minors, or persons under age, not capable to bear arms, &c. Fleta, l. 1. c. 9.

UNFRID. One that hath no quiet or peace. Sax.

UNGELD. A person out of the protection of the law; so that, if he were murdered, no gold or fine should be paid, or composition made, by him that killed him. Leg. Ethelred.

UNGILDA AKER. This is mentioned in Brompton, Leg. Ethelred, p. 898; and it signifies almost the same as ungeld, viz. where a man was killed attempting any felony, he was to lie in the field unburied, and no pecuniary compensation was to be paid for his death: from the Sax. un, without, gilda solutio, and acera, ager. Conell.

UNIFORMITY, uniformitas.] One form of public prayers, and administration of sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the church of England, is prescribed by 1 Eliz. c. 2; 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4. See Dissenters, Nonconformists.

UNION, clause of, in an infestment. By such a clause, or by a charter from the crown for that purpose, lands or tenements lying discontiguous are incorporated, so that one seignie may suffice for them all. Scotch Dict.

UNION, unio.] A combining and consolidating of two churches into one. Also, it is when one church is made subject to another, and one man is rector of both; and where a conventual church is made a cathedral. Lyndemede. In the first signification, if two churches were so mean that the tithes would not afford a competent provision for each incumbent, the ordinary, patron, and incumbents, might unite them at common law, before any statute was made for that purpose; and in such case it was agreed which patron should present first, &c.; for though, by the union, the incumbency of one church was lost, yet the patronage remained, and each patron might have a quare impedit upon a disturbance to present it in his turn. 3 Nels. Abr. 480. The licence of the king is not necessary to an union, as it is to the appropriation of advowsons; because an appropriation is a mortmain, and the patronage of the advowson is lost, and, by consequence, all tithes and first-fruits. Dyer, 259; Moor, 409, 661. See Appropriation.

By assent of the ordinary, patron, and incumbent, two churches, lying not above a mile distant one from the other, and whereof the value of the one is not above 6*l.* a year in the king's books of first-fruits, may be united into one. 37 Hen. 8. c. 21. And by another statute, in cities and corporation-towns, it shall be lawful for the bishop, patrons, and mayors, or chief magistrates of the place, &c. to unite churches therein; but where the income of the churches united exceeds 100*l.* a year, the major part of the parishioners are to consent to the same; and after the union made, the patrons of the churches united shall present, by turns, to that church only which shall be representative, in such order as agreed; and, notwithstanding the union, each of the parishes united shall continue distinct as to rates, charges, &c. though the tithes are to be paid to the incumbent of the united church. 17 Car. 2. c. 3. A union made of churches of greater yearly value than mentioned in the 37 Hen. 8. was held good at common law; and, by the canon law, the ordinary, with consent of the patron, might make an union of churches, of what value soever; so, by statute, with the assent of the king. Dyer, 259; 2 Roll. Abr. 778.

When two parochial churches were thus united, the reparations continued several as before; and therefore the inhabitants of the parish where any such church was demolished were not obliged to contribute to the repairs of the remaining church to which it was united. Hob. 67. This occasioned the 4 & 5 Wm. & M. c. 12. by which it is ordained, that where any churches have been united, by virtue of the 17 Car. 2. c. 3. and one of them is demolished; when the other church shall be out of repair, the parishioners of the parish whose church is down shall pay in proportion towards the charge of such repairs, &c.

Union of England and Scotland, and of Great Britain, and Ireland. See Ireland, Scotland.

UNITY OF POSSESSION, unitas possessionis.] Is where a man hath a right to two estates, and holds them together jointly in his own hands; as if a man take a lease of lands from another at a certain rent, and after he buys the fee-simple, this is an unity of possession, by which the lease is extinguished, because that he who had before the occupation only for his rent, is now become lord and owner of the land. Terms de la Ley.

A lessee for years of an advowson, on the church becoming void, was presented by the lessor, and instituted and inducted; and it was held that this was a surrender of his lease; for they cannot stand together in one person, and by the unity of possession one of them is extinguished. Hut. 105.

No unity will extinguish or suspend tithes, but, notwithstanding any unity, they remain, &c. 11 Rep. 14; 2 Lill. 638.

Unity of possession extinguisheth all privileges not expressly necessary; but not a way to a close, or water to a mill, &c. because they are thus necessary. A way of ease is destroyed by unity of possession; and a rent, or easement, do not exist during the unity, wherefore they are gone. Latch. 153, 154;

1 Vent. 95. See further, Extinguishment, Suspension, Way, &c.

Both joint tenants and tenants in common hold by unity of possession, but the estates of the former must necessarily have commenced at one and the same time, whereas those of the latter may have been created at different periods; and there may exist between them an entire disunion of interest and title as well as of time. See Joint-tenants, Tenants in Common.

UNIVERSITY,

UNIVERSITAS; the civil law term for a corporation. 1 Comm. 469.] A place where all kinds of literature are universally taught.

The Universities, with us, are taken for those two bodies which are the nurseries of learning and liberal science in this kingdom, viz. Oxford and Cambridge, endowed with great privileges.

By 13 Eliz. c. 29. it was enacted, That each of the universities shall be incorporated by a certain name, though they were ancient corporations before; and that all letters patent and charters granted to the universities shall be good and effectual in law: that the chancellor, masters, and scholars of either of the said universities, shall enjoy all manors, lands, liberties, franchises, and privileges, and all other things which the said corporate bodies have enjoyed, or of right ought to enjoy, according to the intent of the said letters patent; and all letters patent, and liberties, franchises, &c. shall be established and confirmed; any law, usage, &c. to the contrary notwithstanding.

The universities have the keeping of the assise of bread and beer, and are to punish offences concerning it: also they have the assise of wine and ale, &c. and the chancellor, his commissary, and deputy, are justices of peace for the vill of Oxon, county of Oxon, and Berks, by virtue of their offices; see 51 Hen. 3; 31 Edw. 1. (both repealed); 7 Edw. 6; 2 & 3 P. & M.; and the chart. 29 Edw. 3; 14 Hen. 3; 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 50. § 24. &c.

And the Vice-chancellor of Cambridge may act as justice of the county, without the landed qualification. 7 Geo. 2. c. 10. See Justices of Peace.

Persons acting theatrical performances within the precincts of either university, or five miles thereof, shall be deemed vagrants; and the chancellor, &c. may commit them to the house of correction, or common gaol for one month. 10 Geo. 2. c. 19. But it is doubtful whether this provision is not repealed by the 3 Geo. 4. c. 40. and players generally are not now within the vagrant act. See Vagrant.

Their courts are called the chancellors' courts. The chancellors are usually peers of the realm, and are appointed over the whole university. But the courts are kept by their vice-chancellors, their assistants, or deputies; their causes are managed by advocates or proctors. See chart. 14 Hen. 8.

As to the power of these courts in civil cases, see Courts of the Universities. The following particulars are also deserving notice.

These courts have jurisdiction in all causes, ecclesiastical and civil, (except those relating to freehold,) where a scholar, servant, or minister of the university, is one of the parties in suit. Cro. Car. 73.

Their proceedings are in a summary way, according to the practice of the civil law; and in their sentences they follow the justice and equity of the civil law, or the laws, statutes, privileges, liberties, and customs of the universities, or the laws of the land, at the discretion of the chancellor. Cro. Car. 73; Hatley, 25; Hard 508.

If there is an erroneous sentence in the chancellor's court of the university of Oxford, an appeal lies to the congregation, thence to the convocation, and thence to the king in chancery, who nominates judges delegates to hear the appeal; the appeal is of the same nature in Cambridge. Wood's Inst. 549; 2 Ld. Raym. 19, 46.

As cognizance is granted to the university of all suits arising any where in law or equity, against a scholar, servant or minister of the university, depending before the justices of the King's Bench, Common Pleas, and others there mentioned, and before any other judge, though the matter concern the king; therefore, if an indebitatus assumpsit is brought by quo minus in the exchequer against a scholar or other privileged person, the university shall have consuance, for the court of exchequer is included in the general words. Cro. Car. 73; Hard. 505.

But if a debtor and accountant to the king sues a scholar by bill in equity in the exchequer, or if an attorney sues a scholar by writ of privilege, it is said that the universities shall not have consuance, for a general grant shall not take away the special privilege of any court. Hard. 189; Lit. Rep. 304; 3 Leon. 149.

But in the cases where privilege is allowable, a scholar, &c. cannot waive his privilege and have a prohibition in the courts of Westminster; for the university by right has the consuance of the plea, where one is a privileged person; and a stranger is forced to sue a privileged person in the courts, by reason of that right vested in them. Cro. Car. 73; Heth. 28.

But a scholar ought to be resident in the university at the time of the suit commenced; and no other ought to be joined in the action with him, for in such case he shall not have privilege. Heth. 28. Though it is said that servants of the university are privileged, yet it has been held that a bailiff of a college was not capable of privilege. Brownl. 74. Neither is a townsman entitled to privilege, to exempt him from an office in the town, if he keeps a shop and follows a trade, though he is matriculated as servant to a scholar. 2 Vent. 106.

It is to be observed, that though cases as to freehold appear, as above, to be the only causes excepted in their charter, yet it has been held that in actions for the recovery of the possession of a term, without claiming title to the freehold, the universities shall have no privilege, because the freehold may come in question. Cro. Car. 87, 88; Litt. R. 252.

It hath been disputed how far the words of the grant entitled them to privilege in matters of equity. And the general principle of construction seems to be, that where chattels only are concerned, or where damages only are to be given, there their privilege is allowable; but where the suit is for the thing itself, there their privilege cannot be allowed. Vide 2 Vent. 362.

Thus if a scholar of Oxford or Cambridge be sued in Chancery for a special performance of a contract to lease lands in Middlesex, the university shall not have consuance, because they cannot sequester the lands. Gibb. Hist. of C. P. 194, cites 2 Vent. 363.

Consuance was granted to the university of Oxford (no cause being shown to the contrary) in Easter Term, 9 Geo. 2. in the case of Woodcocke and Brooke. Hurdw. 241.

A claim of consuance made by the vice-chancellor of the university of Oxford (in the vacancy of the office of chancellor by death,) on behalf the university, was allowed in a plea of trespass. 11 East, 513.

Consuance of a plea of trespass sued against a resident member of the university of Cambridge for a cause of action, verified by affidavit to have arisen within the town and suburbs of Cambridge, over which the university court has jurisdiction, was allowed upon the claim of the vice-chancellor, on behalf of the chancellor, masters, and scholars of the university, entered a bill in due form, set out the jurisdiction under charters confirmed by acts of parliament, and averring the cause of action to have arisen within such jurisdiction. 12 East, 12.

So claim of consuance by the university of Oxford was allowed in an action of trespass against a proctor, a pro-proctor, and the marshal of the university, though the affidavit of the latter, describing him as of a parish in the suburbs of Oxford only, verified that he then was, and for the last fourteen years had been, a common servant of the university, called marshal of the university, and that he was sued for an act done by him in discharge of his duty, and in obedience to the orders of the other two defendants, without stating that he resided within the university, or that he was matriculated. 15 East, 634. See further, Cognizance.

The jurisdiction of the criminal courts in the university of Oxford, is thus stated by Blackstone, and it is believed that of Cambridge is nearly similar. See 2 Ld. Raym. 13, 46.

The chancellor's court of Oxford hath authority to determine all causes of property, wherein a privileged person is one of the parties, except only causes of freehold; and also all criminal offences or misdemeanors under the degree of treason, felony, or mayhem. The prohibition of meddling with freehold still continues; but the trial of treason, felony, and mayhem, by a particular charter, is committed to the university jurisdiction in another court, namely, the court of the lord high steward of the university.

For by the charter of 7th June, 2 Hen. 4. (confirmed among the rest by the 13 Edw. c. 29.) cognizance is granted to the university of Oxford of all indictments of treasons, insurrections, felony, and mayhem, which shall be found in any of the king's court against a scholar or privileged person; and they are to be tried before the high steward of the university, or his deputy, who is to be nominated by the chancellor of the university for the time being. But when his office is called forth into action, such high steward must be approved by the lord high chancellor of England; and a special commission under the great seal is given to him and others to try the indictment then depending, according to the law of the land and the privileges of the said university. When, therefore, an indictment is found at the assizes or elsewhere, against any scholar of the university or other privileged person, the vice-chancellor may claim the cognizance of it; and (when claimed in due time and manner) it ought to be allowed him by the judges of assize; and then it comes to be tried in the high steward's court. But the indictment must first be found by a grand jury, and then the cognizance claimed; for it seems that the high steward cannot proceed originally ad inquirendum; but only, after inquest in the common law courts, ad audiendum et determinandum. Much in the same manner as when a peer is to be tried in the court of the lord high steward of Great Britain, the indictment must first be found at the assizes, or in the Court of King's Bench, and then (in consequence of a writ of certiorari.) transmitted to be finally heard and determined before his grace the lord high steward and the peers. See Parliament, Peers.

When the cognizance is so allowed, if the offence be inter minora crimina, or a misdemeanor only, it is tried in the chancellor's court by the ordinary judge. But if it be for treason, felony, or mayhem, it is then, and then only, to be determined before the high steward, under the king's special commission to try the same. The process of the trial is this: the high steward issues one precept to the sheriff of the county, who thereupon returns a panel of eighteen freeholders; and another precept to the headles of the university, who thereupon return a panel of eighteen matriculated laymen, "laicos privilegio universitatis gaudentes." And by a jury formed de medietate, half of freeholders and half of matriculated persons, is the indictment to be tried, and that in the Guildhall of the city of Oxford. And if execution be necessary to be awarded in consequence of finding the party guilty, the sheriff of the county must execute the university process, to which he is annually bound by an oath. 4 Comm. c. 19. p. 277, 278.

The universities and royal colleges are excepted out of the Statute of Charitable Uses, 43 Eliz. c. 4. § 2. See Charitable Uses.

They are also excepted out of the Mortmain Act. Colleges possessed of more advowsons than a moiety of the fellows, were not to purchase more, by that statute § 4. 5; but this was repealed by 45 Geo. 3. c. 101. See Mortmain.

Universities may file a bill in equity to discover trusts, 12 Ann. st. 2. c. 14. § 4. Pending quare impedit, a rule may be made for examining patron and clerk, 12 Ann. st. 2. c. 14. § 5.

The presentation of benefices belonging to Papists was given to the two universities by the 1 W. & M. st. 1. c. 26; 12 Ann. st. 2. c. 14; and grants made by papists of ecclesiastical livings vested in the universities, were declared void by the 11 Geo. 2. c. 17. § 5.

Collegians refusing to take the oaths, the king may nominate persons to succeed. Mandamus lies to admit the king's nominee, 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 13. See title Mandamus.

In the 4 T. R. 244, the Court of King's Bench thought that a mandamus was the proper mode of trying the validity of an election made by the fellows of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, which was disputed by the master. And see further, as to the election of fellows, &c. 5 Russ. 65, 73, 76, 85.

Independent members of a college are mere boarders, and have no corporate rights; nor can they appeal to the visitor. And if a college do not exceed its jurisdiction, the king's courts have no cognizance, and expulsion of a member is a matter entirely within its jurisdiction. Comp. 319. And see 6 T. R. 89.

UNKNOWN PERSONS, Larceny from. An indictment will lie for stealing the goods of a person unknown. 1 Hale's P. C. 512. See Larceny.

UNLAGE. A Saxon word denoting an unjust law; in which sense it is used in Leg. Hen. 1. c. 34.

UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY, illicita congregatio.] See Riot.

UNLAWFUL GAMES. See Gaming.

UNLAWFUL OATHS. See Oaths, Unlawful.

UNQUES PRIST. See Tender, Uncore prist.

UPHOLDERS, UPHOLSTERS, or UPHOLSTERERS.

By two old and obsolete statutes, none shall put to sale any beds, holsters, &c. except such as are stuffed with one sort of dry pulled feathers or clean down, and not mixed with scalded feathers, fen-down, thistle-down, sand, &c. on pain to forfeit the same or the value; and they are to stuff quilts, mattresses, and cushions, with clean wool and flocks, without using horse-hair, &c. therein, under the like forfeiture. 11 Hen. 7. c. 19; 5 & 6 Edw. 6. c. 23.

UPLAND. High ground or terra firma, in contradistinction to marshy and low ground. Ingulph.

URBAN SERVITUDES. Tenures in cities. Stillicidium is the rain water falling from the roof of a house, which the proprietor (in Scotland) cannot throw on his neighbour's house without the other is bound by tenure or servitude to that purpose. Scotch Law Dict.

URE. Use, custom, practice, habit. "Put in ure." 13 Eliz. c. 2. § 1 (English.) 10 Hen. 7. c. 11 (Irish.) Johnson quotes Hooker for a like sense.

USA. The river Isis, which river was termed Isis from the goddess of that name; for it was customary among the Pagans to dedicate hills, woods and rivers to favourite goddesses, and to call them after their names. The Britons, having the greatest reverence for Ceres and Proserpina, who was also called Isis, did for that reason name the river Isis; she being the goddess of the night, thence they computed days by nights, as seven-night, &c. Blount.

USAGE. Differs from custom and prescription. No man may claim a rent, common, or other inheritance by usage, though he may by prescription. 6 Rep. 65. See Custom, Prescription, Ways, &c.

USANCE. A calendar month, as from May 20th to June 20th, and double usance is two such months. See further, Bills of Exchange, I. 1.

USE,

Usus.] Is, in application of law, the profit or benefit of lands and tenements, or a trust and confidence reposed in a man for the holding of lands, that he to whose use the trust is made shall take the profits thereof. West. Sym. par. 1; 1 Inst. 272.

USE AND OCCUPATION. The current of ancient authorities is against the action on the case upon promises, for rent, in respect of a lease for years. It was a matter savouring of the realty, for which debt was the proper remedy; and therefore they seem to have agreed that assumpsit would not lie, except in the case of an express promise made to pay the rent after the expiration of the term, in consideration of previous enjoyment, where no certain sum was agreed upon, and the plaintiff merely went upon his quantum meruit, in consideration of the defendant's previous occupation. See Comyn's Land. & Ten. and the authorities there cited.

But assumpsit lay for rent at common law, on an express promise made at the same time as the lease, although not an implied promise. Bul. N. P. 138. However, all difficulties in the case of demises not under seal are removed by the 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. § 14. See the clause, Rent, II.

This act, in the case of houses, lands, &c. gives a right of action against the occupier for rent, without the necessity of setting forth the particulars of the demise. 6 T. R. 62; 6 East, 348.

The statute only gives a remedy where there is no demise by deed. 2 Ves. jun. 307. But where there were articles of agreement under seal, by which A. agreed to let and make a lease to the defendant, Lord Kenyon, C. J. held the defendant might be charged in assumpsit for his use and occupation of the premises, because he did not hold under a deed, but only an agreement for a lease. 4 Esp. 59. And so where a lease by deed has expired, and the tenant holds over, the landlord may recover for the subsequent occupation of the lessee or his under-tenant, in an action of assumpsit. 1 Esp. 57.

The action for use and occupation is founded on a contract, and unless there be a contract express or implied, it cannot be maintained. 1 T. R. 378. It follows, therefore, that it cannot be supported where an ejectment is pending for the same premises, as the two remedies are inconsistent. But after a recovery in ejectment, the landlord may maintain use and occupation for the rent to the time of the demise bid in the ejectment, but not after. Comp. 246. So use and occupation will not lie where the title is in dispute, ejectment being the proper action to try such title. See Woodfall's Land. & Ten. 607, 2d ed.

Where an express contract can be proved between the parties, the defendant is liable, whether he occupies the premises or not, for the action lies for a constructive as well as an actual occupation. 6 Bing. 206.

So where there is no other contract than is to be inferred from the fact of occupation, as tenant by permission of the plaintiff, the defendant is liable.

If A. agree to let lands to B., who permits a third person to occupy them, A. may recover the rent against B. in an action for use and occupation. 8 T. R. 327.

There must, however, be an occupation by some one; for it has been decided, that a tenant who agrees to take furnished lodgings, but does not enter, is not liable in an action for use and occupation. 1 C. & J. 391.

There must also be a beneficial enjoyment. Thus, where the defendant agreed "to become tenant by occupying," and it appeared that the house was not fit for comfortable occupation, it was held the plaintiff could not recover. 4 C. & P. 65; and see 7 D. & R. 117. So where the premises are unwholesome for want of draining, if the evil cannot be remedied by ordinary and reasonable care and expense on the part of the tenant. 1 Moo. & R. 112.

But where premises have been demised for a term, the landlord may recover, in an action for use and occupation, the rent accruing due after the premises are burnt, and of course are no longer inhabited by the tenant. See 4 Taunt. 45.

The action will not lie where premises are let, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, for an immoral purpose, as for prostitution. See 1 Esp. 13; 1 B. & P. 340; and see 2 C. & P. 347; R. & M. 251.

Whenever it appears that the defendant has come in under the plaintiff, the rule of law that a tenant shall not dispute his landlord's title prevails, and he will not be permitted to show that the plaintiff has no legal estate. Thus, where premises had been let to B. for a term determinable by a notice to quit, and pending such term C. applied to A. the landlord, for leave to become the tenant instead of B., and A. consenting, C. agreed to stand in B.'s place, and offered to pay rent: it was held, that (though B.'s term had not been determined either by a notice to quit, or a surrender in writing) A. might maintain an action for use and occupation against C., and the latter could not set up B.'s title in defence to that action. 1 B. & A. 50.

And although in ejectment, where the tenant is equally debarred from proving that his landlord never had any title, he may show that the landlord's title was expired. 4 T. R. 682. Yet it seems, that, in an action for use and occupation, the defendant will not be permitted, though he admit the landlord's original title, to show that it has ceased to exist, unless he solemnly renounce the plaintiff's title at the time, and commenced a fresh holding under another person. 2 Camp. 11.

Where premises are let at an entire rent, an eviction from part, if the tenant thereupon gives up possession of the residue, is a complete defence to this action. 3 Camp. 513. But if he continue in possession of such residue, he is liable for that portion. 3 Camp. 514, n.

Use and occupation lies where the tenant quits the premises without any regular determination of the demise; and in such a case the plaintiff will not be debarred from recovering by having put up a bill at the window to let the apartments. 3 Esp. 225.

Where, however, a tenant from year to year quitted at the expiration of a year without giving notice, and before the next half year expired, the landlord let the premises to another person, who occupied them, it was held he was not entitled to recover rent from the first tenant from the time the latter quitted to the period when the premises were relet. 5 B. & C. 332; and see 3 Bing. 462.

USES AND TRUSTS. The following extract from the Commentaries (lib. 2. c. 20.) seems to afford the clearest and most perspicuous view of the doctrine of uses and trusts, as the most intricate part of our law, and on which our modern conveyances are in general founded. See further, as connected with the subject, titles Conveyance, Deed, Fine of Lands, Lease and Release, Mortmain, Recovery, Trusts, &c.

Uses and trusts are, in their original, of a nature very similar, or rather, exactly the same; answering more to the fidei commissum than the usus fructus of the civil law, which latter was the temporary right of using a thing without having the ultimate property or full dominion of the substance. But in our law a use was a confidence reposed in another, who was tenant of the land or terre-tenant, that he should dispose of the land according to the intention of cestui que use, or him to whose use it was granted, and suffer him to take the profits. As if a feoffment was made to A. and his heirs, for the use of (or in trust for) B. and his heirs: here at the common law, A., the terre-tenant, had the legal property and possession of the land, but B., the cestui que use, was in conscience and equity to have the profits and disposal of it. Plowd. 352.

This notion was transplanted into England from the civil law, about the close of the reign of Edward III. by means of the foreign ecclesiastics, who introduced it to evade the statutes of mortmain, by obtaining grants of lands, not to their religious houses directly, but to the use of the religious houses, which the clerical chancellors of those times held to be fidei-commissa, and binding in conscience; and therefore assumed the jurisdiction of compelling the execution of such trusts in the Court of Chancery. See 50 Edw. 3. c. 6; 1 Rich. 2. c. 9; 1 Rep. 139; and title Mortmain. And as it was most easy to obtain such grants from dying persons, a maxim was established, that though by law the lands themselves were not devisable, yet if a testator had enfeoffed another to his own use, and so was possessed of the use only, such use was devisable by will. But this evasion was crushed by 15 Rich. 2. c. 5. with respect to religious houses. See Mortmain. Yet the idea being once introduced, however fraudulently, it afterwards continued to be often innocently, and sometimes very laudably, applied to a number of civil purposes; particularly as it removed the restraint of alienations by will, and permitted the owner of lands, in his lifetime, to make various designations of their profits, as prudence or justice, or family convenience, might from time to time require; till at length, during our long wars in France, and the subsequent civil commotions between the houses of York and Lancaster, uses grew almost universal; through the desire that men had (when their lives were continually in hazard) of providing for their children by will, and of securing their estates from forfeitures, when each of the contending parties, as they became uppermost, alternately attainted the other. Wherefore, about the reign of Edward IV. (before whose time Lord Bacon remarks there are not six cases to be found relating to the doctrine of uses) the courts of equity began to reduce them to something of a regular system. See Bacon on Uses, 313.

Originally it was held that the Chancery could give no relief but against the very person himself intrusted for cestui que use, and not against his heir or alienee. This was altered in the reign of Henry VI. with respect to the heir; and afterwards the same rule, by a parity of reason, was extended to such alienees as had purchased either without a valuable consideration, or with an express notice of the use. Keilw. 42, 46; Y. B. 22 Edw. 4. c. 6; Bac. Uses, 312. But a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, might hold the land discharged of any trust or confidence. And also it was held that neither the king or queen on account of their dignity royal, nor any corporation aggregate on account of its limited capacity, could be seised to any use but their own, that is, they might hold the lands, but were not compellable to execute the trust. Bac. Uses, 346, 347. And if the feoffee to uses died without heir, or committed a forfeiture, or married, neither the lord who entered for his escheat or forfeiture, nor the husband who retained the possession as tenant by the curtesy, nor the wife to whom dower was assigned, were liable to perform the use, because they were not parties to the trust, but came in by act of law, though doubtless their title in reason was no better than that of the heir. 1 Rep. 122.

On the other hand, the use itself, or interest of cestui que use, was learnedly refined upon, with many elaborate distinctions: and 1. It was held that nothing could be granted to a use, whereof the use is inseparable from the possession, as annuities, ways, commons, and authorities, quæ ipso usu consumuntur, or whereof the seisin could not be instantly given. 1 Jon. 127; Cro. Eliz. 401.—2. A use could not be raised without a sufficient consideration. For where a man makes a feoffment to another without any consideration, equity presumes that he meant it to the use of himself, unless he expressly declares it to be to the use of another, and then nothing shall be presumed contrary to his own expressions. 1 And. 37. But if either a good or a valuable consideration appears, equity will immediately raise a use correspondent to such consideration. Moor, 684.—3. Uses were descendible according to the rules of common law, in the case of inheritances in possession; for in this and many other respects, equitas sequitur legem, and cannot establish a different rule of property from that which the law has established. 2 Rel. Abr. 780.—4. Uses might be assigned by secret deeds between the parties, or be devised by last will and testament: for as the legal estate in the soil was not transferred by these transactions, no livery of seisin was necessary; and as the intention of the parties was the leading principle in this species of property, any instrument declaring that intention was allowed to be binding in equity. Bac. Uses, 312, 318. But cestui que use could not, at common law, alien the legal interest of the lands, without the concurrence of his feoffee, to whom he was accounted by law to be only tenant at sufferance. See 1 Rich. 3. c. 1.—5. Uses were not liable to any of the feudal burdens, and particularly did not escheat for felony, or other defect of blood; for escheats, &c. are the consequence of tenure, and uses are held of nobody: but the land itself was liable to escheat, whenever the blood of the feoffee to uses was extinguished by crime or by defect; and the lord (as was before observed) might hold it discharged of the use. Jenk. 190.—6. No wife could be endowed, or husband have his curtesy of a use; for no trust was declared for their benefit at the original grant of the estate. 4 Rep. 1; 2 And. 75. And therefore it became customary, when most estates were put in use, to settle before marriage some joint estate to the use of the husband and wife for their lives, which was the original of modern jointures. See Jointure.—7. A use could not be extended by writ of elegit or other legal process, for the debts of cestui que use. For being merely a creature of equity, the common law, which looked no farther than to the person actually seised of the land, which looked no farther than to the person actually seised of the land, could award no process against it. Bro. Abr. tit. Executions, 90.

It is impracticable here to pursue the doctrine of uses through all the refinements and niceties which the ingenuity of the times (abounding in subtle disquisitions) deduced from this child of the imagination, when once a departure was permitted from the plain simple rules of property established by the ancient law. These principal outlines will be fully sufficient to show the ground of Lord Bacon's complaint, that this course of proceeding "was turned to deceive many of their just and reasonable rights. A man that had cause to sue for land, knew not against whom to bring his action, or who was the owner of it. The wife was defrauded of her thirds; the husband of his curtesy; the lord of wardship, relief, heriot, and escheat; the creditor of his extent for debt; and the poor tenant of his lease." Bac. Use of the Law, 153. To remedy these inconveniences, abundance of statutes were provided, which made the lands liable to be extended by the creditors of cestui que use; allowed actions for the freehold to be brought against him, if in the actual pernaney or enjoyment of the profits; made him liable to actions of waste; established his conveyances and leases, made without the concurrence of his feoffees; and gave the lord the wardship of his heir, with certain other feudal perquisites. See 50 Edm. 3. c. 6; 2 Rich. 2. st. 2. 3; 19 Hen. 7. c. 15; 1 Rich. 2. c. 9; 4 Hen. 4. c. 7; 11 Hen. 6. c. 3; 1 Hen. 7. c. 1; 11 Hen. 6. c. 5; 1 Rich. 3. c. 1; 4 Hen. 7. c. 17; 19 Hen. 7. c. 15.

These provisions all tended to consider cestui que use as the real owner of the estate; and at length that idea was carried into full effect by the 27 Hen. 8. c. 10, usually called the statute of uses, or, in conveyances and pleadings, the statute for transferring uses into possession. The hint seems to have been derived from what was done at the accession of King

Richard III.: who, having, when Duke of Gloucester, been frequently made a feoffee to uses, would upon the assumption of the crown (as the law was then understood) have been entitled to hold the land discharged of the use. But, to obviate so notorious an injustice, an act of parliament was immediately passed, which ordained, that, where he had been so enfeoffed jointly with other persons, the land should vest in the other feoffees, as if he had never been named, and that, where he stood solely enfeoffed, the estate itself should vest in cestui que use, in like manner as he had the use. 1 Rich. 3. c. 5. And so the statute of Henry VIII., after reciting the various inconveniences before mentioned, and many others, enacts, that "when any person shall be seised of lands, &c. of the use, confidence, or trust, of any other person or body politic, the person or corporation entitled to the use in fee-simple, fee-tail, for life, or years, or otherwise, shall from thenceforth stand and be seised or possessed of the land, &c. of and in the like estates as they have in the use, trust, or confidence; and that the estate of the person so seised to uses shall be deemed to be in him or them that have the use in such quality, manner, form and condition, as they had before in the use." The statute thus executes the use, as the lawyers term it; that is, it conveys the possession to the use, and transfers the use into possession; thereby making cestui que use complete owner of the lands and tenements as well at law as in equity. 2 Comm. c. 20.

It is a curious circumstance that, after having been disregarded for a period of two centuries and a half, from the passing of this statute of uses, one of the previous acts above cited (1 Rich. 3. c. 1) was relied upon in argument as applicable to the cestui que use of a term of years in the case of Goodtitle v. Jones, 7 T. R. 47; it was held not to apply to the circumstances of that case: but in Blake v. Foster, 8 T. R. 494, it was referred to by Lawrence, J. as still in force. But see Gilbert on Uses, p. 67, and Sugden's notes there, that the act 1 Rich. 3. c. 1. has now no operation whatever.

The statute having thus not abolished the conveyance to uses, but only annihilated the intervening estate of the feoffee, and turned the interest of cestui que use into a legal, instead of an equitable ownership; the courts of common law began to take cognizance of uses, instead of sending the party to seek his relief in chancery. And, considering them now as merely a mode of conveyance, very many of the rules before established in equity were adopted, with improvements, by the judges of the common law. The same persons only were held capable of being seised to a use, the same considerations were necessary for raising it, and it could only be raised of the same hereditaments as formerly. But as the statute, the instant it was raised, converted it into an actual possession of the land, a great number of the incidents, that formerly attended it in its fiduciary state, were now at an end. The land could not escheat or be forfeited by the act or defect of the feoffee, nor be aliened to any purchaser discharged of the use, nor be liable to dower or curtesy on account of the seisin of such feoffee; because the legal estate never rests in him for a moment, but is instantaneously transferred to cestui que use, as soon as the use is declared. And, as the use and the land were now convertible terms, they became liable to dower, curtesy, and escheat, in consequence of the seisin of cestui-que-use, who is now become the terre-tenant also; and they likewise were no longer devisable by will. 2 Comm. c. 20.

The various necessities of mankind induced also the judges very soon to depart from the rigour and simplicity of the rules of the common law, and to allow a more minute and complex construction upon conveyances to uses than upon others. Hence it was adjudged, that the use need not always be executed the instant the conveyance is made; but, if it cannot take effect at that time, the operation of the statute may wait till the use shall arise upon some future contingency, to happen within a reasonable period of time; and in the meanwhile the ancient use shall remain in the original grantor: as, when lands are conveyed to the use of A. and B., after a marriage shall be had between them, or to the use of A. and his heirs, till B. shall pay a sum of money, and then to the use of B. and his heirs. 2 Roll. Abr. 791; Cro. Eliz. 439; Bro. Abr. tit. Feoffm. al. Uses, 30. Which doctrine, when devised by will were again introduced, and considered as equivalent in point of construction to declarations of uses, was also adopted in favour of Executory Devises. See that title.

But herein these, which are called contingent or springing uses, differ from an executory devise; in that there must be a person seised to such uses at the time when the contingency happens, else they can never be executed by the statute; and therefore if the estate of the feoffee to such use be destroyed by alienation, or otherwise, before the contingency arises, the use is destroyed for ever; whereas by an executory devise the freehold itself is transferred to the future devise. 1 Rep. 134, 138; Cro. Eliz. 439. And in both these cases a fee may be limited to take effect after a fee; because, though that was forbidden by the common law in favour of the lord's escheat, yet, when the legal estate was not extended beyond one fee simple, such subsequent uses (after a use in fee) were before the statute permitted to be limited in equity: and then the statute executed the legal estate in the same manner as the use before subsisted. Follexf. 78; 10 Mod. 423.

It was also held, that a use, though executed, may change from one to another by circumstances ex post facto; as, if A. makes a feoffment to the use of his intended wife and her eldest son for their lives, upon the marriage the wife takes the whole use in severalty; and upon the birth of a son, the use is executed jointly in them both. Bac. Us. 331. This is sometimes called a secondary, sometimes a shifting use.

Whenever the use limited by the deed expires, or cannot vest, it returns back to him who raised it, after such expiration, or during such impossibility, and is styled a resulting use. As if a man makes a feoffment to the use of his intended wife for life, with the remainder to the use of her first-born son in tail: here, till he marries, the use results back to himself; after marriage, it is executed in the wife for life; and, if she dies without issue, the whole results back to him in fee. Bac. Us. 350; 1 Rep. 120.

It was likewise held, that the uses originally declared may be revoked at any future time, and new uses be declared of the land, provided the grantor reserved to himself such a power at the creation of the estate; whereas the utmost that the common law would allow was a deed of defeasance coeval with the grant itself (and therefore esteemed a part of it) upon events specifically mentioned. And, in case of such a revocation, the old uses were held instantly to cease, and the new ones to become executed in their stead. Co. Litt. 237. And this was permitted, partly to indulge the convenience, and partly the caprice of mankind, who, as lord B. once observes, have always affected to have the disposition of their property revocable in their own time, and irrevocable ever afterwards. Bac. Us. 316. See Power.

By this equitable train of decisions in the courts of law the power of the court of chancery over landed property was greatly curtailed and diminished. But one or two technical scruples, which the judges found it hard to get over, restored it with tenfold increase. They held, in the first place, that "no use could be limited on a use;" and that when a man bargains and sells his land for money, which raises a use by implication to the bargainee, the limitation of a farther use to another person is repugnant, and therefore void. Dy. 155; 1 And. 37, 136. And therefore, on a feoffment to A. and his heirs, to the use of B. and his heirs, in trust for C. and his heirs, they held that the statute executed only the first use, and that the second was a mere nullity; not adverting, that the instant the first use was executed in B., he became seised to the use of C.; which second use the statute might as well be permitted to execute as it did the first; and so the legal estate might be instantaneously transmitted down, through a hundred uses upon uses, till finally executed in the last cestui-que-use. [It is now the practice to introduce only the names of the trustee and cestui-que-trust; the estate being conveyed to A. and his heirs, to the use of A. and his heirs in trust for B. and his heirs. See post.]

Again, as the statute mentions only such persons as were seised to the use of others, this was held not to extend to terms of years, or other chattel interests, whereof the termor is not seised, but only possessed; and therefore, if a term of one thousand years be limited to A., to the use of (or in trust for) B. the statute does not execute this use, but leaves it at common law. Bac. Us. 335; Jenk. 244; Poph. 76; Dyer, 369.

And lastly, (by more modern resolutions,) where lands are given to one and his heirs, in trust to receive and pay over the profits to another, this use is not executed by the statute; for the land must remain in the trustee to enable him to perform the trust. 2 Comm. c. 20.

And if there be a conveyance in trust to pay over the profits, 15 Ves. 371; 4 Taunt. 772; or to convey, 1 Atk. 607; 7 Ves. 201; or to sell, 2 Atk. 578; or any act to be done, the legal estate must necessarily vest in the trustee. So it is if a trust to permit a feme covert to receive the profits for, or to pay the same to her separate use.

But although it is not necessary that an estate of freehold should vest in the trustees, the general rule is, that the legal estate shall vest in them so far only, as is proper to give effect to the intention of the settler or deviser. See 5 Taunt. 382; 9 East, 1.

See further, Sanders on Uses, 231—263, where the cases on the subject of uses not executed by the statute are fully considered.

Of the two more ancient distinctions above mentioned, the courts of equity quickly availed themselves. In the first case it was evident that B. was never intended by the parties to have any beneficial interest; and in the second the cestui-que-use of the term was expressly driven into the court of chancery to seek his remedy. And therefore the court determined, that though these were not uses, which the statute could execute, yet still they were trusts in equity, which in conscience ought to be performed. To this the reason of mankind assented, and the doctrine of uses was revived, under the denomination of trusts: and thus by this strict construction of the courts of law a statute made upon great deliberation, and introduced in the most solemn manner, has had little other effect than to make a slight alteration in the formal words of a conveyance. Vaugh. 50; Atk. 591; 2 Comm. 336.

This last observation, however, does not seem quite warranted by the fact: as it is manifest that, in consequence of the statute, many modifications of real property have been introduced for the convenience of families, of which the common law was not susceptible: and, how little soever the retention of what was formerly known by the name of uses, under the substituted appellation of trusts, may have been warranted upon the true principles of judicial construction, it certainly has been attended in many respects with considerable practical convenience.

An important question formerly arose upon the effect of a limitation (to such uses as a party shall appoint, and, in default of and until appointment, to himself and his heirs) with respect to the claim of dower against the appointee under the power: the great weight of professional and judicial opinion was in favour of the validity of the appointment, as opposed to the claim of dower: the discussion of this point by lord Eldon, (in Maundrell v. Maundrell, 10 Ves. 246.) precluded all reasonable litigation on the question, which was ultimately decided against the claim of dower. See 5 B. & A. 561; 5 Mad. 310.

The doubt formerly raised whether the power given to the above limitation, would, on being exercised, defeat the claim of dower, gave rise to another limitation, (usually called dower uses), which, by the intervention of a vested estate in a trustee, prevented dower from attaching. The law of dower has been recently materially altered. See Dower.

The courts of equity, in the exercise of their new jurisdiction over trusts, have wisely avoided, in a great degree, those mischiefs which made uses intolerable. The statute of frauds, 29 Car. 2. c. 3. having required that every declaration, assignment, or grant of any trust, in lands and hereditaments, (except such as arise from implication or construction of law,) shall be made in writing signed by the party, or by his written will; the courts now consider a trust-estate (either when expressly declared or resulting by such implication) as equivalent to the legal ownership, governed by the same rules of property, and liable to every charge in equity, which the other is subject to in law: and, by a long series of uniform determinations, for now near a century past, with some assistance from the legislature, they have raised a new system of rational jurisprudence, by which trusts are made to answer in general all the beneficial ends of uses without their inconvenience or frauds. The trustee is considered as merely the instrument of conveyance, and can in no shape affect the estate, unless by alienation for a valuable consideration to a purchaser without notice; which, as cestui-que-use is generally in possession of the land, is a thing that can rarely happen. 2 Freem. 43. The trust will descend, may be aliened, is liable to debts, to executions on judgments, statutes, and recognizances, (by the express provision of the statute of frauds,) to forfeiture, to leases, and other incumbrances, nay, even to the curtesy of the husband, as if it was an estate at law. It was not until recently subjected to dower (see now that title), more from a cautious adherence to some hasty precedents, than from any well-grounded principle. 1 Chanc. Rep. 254; 2 P. Wms. 640. It hath also been held not liable to escheat to the lord, in consequence of attainer or want of heirs; because the trust could never be intended for his benefit. Hardw. 494; Burgess and Wheat, 1 Black. 129. See Trusts.

The statute of uses has given efficacy to certain new and secret species of conveyances; introduced in order to render transactions of this sort as private as possible, and to save the trouble of making livery of seisin, the only ancient conveyance of corporeal freeholds; the security and notoriety of which public investiture (Blackstone considers) abundantly overpaid the labour of going to the land, or of sending an attorney in one's stead: but which has yielded among other assurances to a species of conveyance called a covenant to stand seised to uses; by which a man, seised of lands, covenants, in consideration of blood or marriage, that he will stand seised of the same to the use of his child, wife, or kinsman; for life, in tail, or in fee. Here the statute executes at once the estate; for the party intended to be benefited, having thus acquired the use, is thereby put at once into corporal possession of the land, without ever seeing it, by a kind of parliamentary magic. But this conveyance can only operate, when made upon such weighty and interesting considerations as those of blood or marriage. 2 Comm. c. 20. See Conveyance, Covenant to stand seised.

And the most usual mode of assurance is by lease and release, by which the necessity of giving possession by livery of seisin is also avoided through the instrumentality of the statute of uses. See Conveyance, Lease and Release.

SUPERSTITIOUS USES. A devise of lands or goods to superstitious uses, is where it is to find or maintain a chaplain or priest to pray for the souls of the dead; or a lamp in a chapel, a stipendiary priest, &c. These, and such like, are declared to be superstitious uses; and the lands and goods so devised are forfeited to the king by 1 Edw. 6. c. 14; see also 23 Hen. 8. c. 10, and tits. Charitable Uses, Mortmain.

A man devised lands to trustees and their heirs to find a priest to pray for his soul, so as the laws of the land would permit; and if the laws would not permit it, then to apply the profits to the poor, with power to convert the profits to either of the said uses; adjudged this was not a devise to any superstitious use. 3 Nels. Abr. 259. Where certain profits arising out of lands are given to superstitious uses, the king shall have only so much of the yearly profits which were to be applied to the superstitious uses; though when the land itself is given to the testator, declaring that the profits, without saying how much, shall be employed for such uses, in this case the king shall have the land itself. Moor, 129. If a sum certain is given to a priest, and other goods which depend upon the superstitious use, all is forfeited to the king; yet if land, &c. is given to find an obit, or anniversary, and for another good use, and there is no certainty how much shall be employed to the superstitious use, the gift to the good use shall preserve the whole from forfeiture. 4 Rep. 104; 2 Roll. 205. Where a superstitious use is void, so that the king could not have it, it is not so far void as to result to the heir at law, and therefore the king may apply it to charity. 1 Salk. 163.

It seems now that, independent of the statutes, devises of this kind could not have effect: for either they would be void by the Mortmain statutes, or when not within the reach of any of them, would be deemed superstitious by the courts of equity; which would therefore direct the money to be applied to some use really charitable, at the court's discretion; or should the determined uses not be thought strong enough to warrant the exercise of a discretion so large, would consider the devisee as a trustee, for such as would be entitled if there were no devise. 1 Inst. 112, b. n. 2. See Charitable Uses, Mortmain.

USER DE ACTION. Is the pursuing or bringing an action in the proper county, &c. Broke, 64.

USHER, Fr. huisier, a door-keeper. An officer in the king's house, as of a privy chamber, &c.

There are also ushers of the Courts of Chancery and Exchequer.

USUCAPTION, usucapio. The enjoying, by continuance of time, a long possession, or prescription. Termes de la Ley. Property acquired by use or possession.

USUFRUCT. Is a tenure introduced by the Scotch law from the civil law: it is the right of life-rent possession, without destroying or wasting the subject over which the tenure extends. The proprietor of the subject is termed the fiar; the property the fee; and the person possessed, the life-renter.

USUFRUCTUARY, usufructuarius. One that hath the use, and reaps the profit of a thing.

USURPATION, usurpatio. The using that which is another's; an interruption or disturbing a man in his right and possession, &c.

Usurpations in the civil and canon law are called intrusions; and such intruders, having not any right, shall submit, or be excommunicated and deprived, &c. by Boniface's Const. Gibs. Codex, 817.

For usurpations of advowsons, see Advowson, III.

As to usurpations of franchises, see Corporation, Quo Warranto.

USURY.

USURA. Money given for the use of money; it is particularly defined to be the gain of any thing by contract above the principal, or that which was lent, exacted in consideration of loan thereof, whether it be of money, or any other thing. 3 Inst. 151. Some make usury to be the profit exacted for a loan made to a person in want and distress; but properly it consists in extorting an unreasonable rate for money, beyond what is allowed by positive law.

The letting money out at interest, or upon usury, was against the common law; and in former times, if any one, after his death, had been found to be an usurer, all his goods and chattels were forfeited to the king, &c. And, according to several ancient statutes, all usury is unlawful; but at this time neither the common or statute law absolutely prohibit usury. 3 Inst. 151, 152. By this is meant interest for money lent, not exceeding the settled rate: interest being the lawful gain; usury the extortion of unlawful gain. See Interest.

The church, at common law, held jurisdiction over usurers "for the good of their souls." Pro reformatione morum et pro salute animarum. 15 Edw. 1. c. 6; Roll. Abr. tit. Usurers, and was wont to punish them by excommunication and censure, until they made restitution; and to grant them pardon only on condition, "on dum tamen," that they forsook their evil courses. Canon, 109; Ex. of Neshech, 31. Most of the early acts of parliament contain a saving clause in favour of such jurisdiction. It seems, however, that it either had not exclusive authority over usurers, or if so, that it was invaded at an early period by the temporal courts; for it appears that in the fifteenth year of the reign of Edward III. A. D. 1341, the clergy, through the archbishop of Canterbury, and other bishops, complained that "the justices had punished usurers," to which an answer was returned, making a distinction between the living and the dead usurers, "that the king and his heirs shall have the cognizance of usurers dead. That his majesty might take possession of their wealth; and the ordinances of the holy church, the cognizance of them in life, as to them appertaineth, to make compulsion by the censures of the holy church for the sin, to make restitution of the usuries taken against the laws of the holy church." 15 Ed. 3. c. 6; Roll. Abr. tit. Usurers. And it was a charge to justices in eyre to enquire who had died usurers, which being then a crime second only to murder, was punishable by forfeiture of the usurer's goods and chattels to the king, and the disherison of his heir. Brac. lib. 2. c. 26; Glamm. lib. 7. c. 16; Ibid. lib. 10. c. 8. § 3; vide Mirror des Justices, lib. 17. c. 1. § 17; but this was confined to those who were found by inquest, within a year and a day of their deaths, to have died "habitual usurers," and not when before death they had discontinued the practice, and done penance for it. 3 Hen. 7. c. 5. Kelly on Usury, 16.

Spiritual censures have failed to check usury; various statutes (3 Hen. 7. c. 5; 3 Hen. 7. c. 6; 11 Hen. 7. c. 8.) were passed for its suppression previous to the 37 Hen. 8. c. 9; which was the first act recognising the legality of taking interest upon loans; yet the old statutes, even when legalizing interest at certain rates, bear witness to the violent prejudices still existing against the practice.

By the 37 Hen. 8. c. 9. 10*l. per cent.* was allowed as the legal rate of interest; but by 5 & 6 Edm. 6. c. 20. it was observed that the above statute, allowing this rate of interest, had been construed to give a license and sanction to all usury, not exceeding 10*l. per cent.*; and this construction was declared to be utterly against Scripture; and therefore all persons were forbid to lend or forbear by any device, for any usury, increase, lucre, or gain whatsoever, on pain of forfeiting the thing, and the usury or interest, and of being imprisoned and fined.

And so the law stood till the 13 Eliz. c. 8. which reciting "that all usury being forbidden by the laws of God, is sin, and detestable," revived the 37 Hen. 8. c. 9. and ordained that all brokers should be guilty of a præmunire who transacted any contracts for more, and the securities themselves should be void.

By the 21 Jac. 1. c. 17. which reduced the rate of interest to 8*l. per cent.*, it was provided, that "nothing in the law shall be construed to allow the practice of usury at point of religion or conscience." Rolle says, that this clause was introduced to satisfy the bishops, who would not pass the bill without it. Oliver v. Oliver, Roll. R.

The rate of interest having been lowered in 1650, during the Usurpation, to 6*l. per cent.* the same reduction was re-enacted after the Restoration, by 12 Car. 2. c. 13. And lastly, this rate of interest was reduced to 5*l. per cent.* by 12 Ann. st. 2. c. 16.

The prejudices of early times (Blackstone remarks) against the taking of interest appear to have worn off in some degree in the reign of Henry VIII.; a rational commerce having taught the nation, that an estate in money, as well as an estate in land, houses, and the like, might be let out to hire, without the breach of one moral or religious duty. And indeed, when the source of this prejudice is examined, it will be found to have originated in a political, and not a moral precept; for though the Jews were prohibited from taking usury, that is interest, from their brethren, they were in express words permitted to take it from a stranger. 2 Comm. 455, 456.

And that the prohibition to the Jews was political, not moral, and consequently does not extend to other nations, was the opinion of Grotius and Puffendorf; who have treated the subject at length. For a full statement of the reasonings on the question, whether receiving money is against conscience and natural law, and for a refutation of old and vulgar errors which held it to be so, see Grotius de Jure, B. et P. lib. xi. c. xii. § 20; Puffendorf, Droit de la R. lib. v. c. vii. § 8, 9, 10; Rutherford's Instit. N. L. B. i. c. xiii. The passage in St. Luke, c. 19, v. 22, "Wherefore then gavest thou not thy money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury?" (see St. Matthew, c. xxv. v. 27), seems to show that the usage existed at Jerusalem of placing money at interest in the hands of bankers, and was not deemed unlawful.

Calvin and St. Thomas Aquinas both agree that the receipt of usury is not contrary to Scripture. Calv. Epist. de Usura, St. Thomas Aqu. Op. de Usur. c. 4.

Now by the 12 Ann. st. 2. c. 16. no person shall take, directly or indirectly, for loan of any money, or any thing, above the value of 5*l.* for the forbearance of 100*l.* for a year, and so proportionably for a greater or less sum; and all bonds, contracts, and assurances made for payment of any principal sum to be lent on usury, above the rate of 5*l. per cent.* shall be utterly void; and whoever shall take, accept, or receive by way of corrupt bargain, loan, &c. a greater interest, shall forfeit treble the money borrowed, one half of the penalty to the prosecutor, the other to the king; and if any scrivener or broker takes more than 5*s. per cent.* procurator money, or more than 12*d.* for making a bond, he shall forfeit 20*l.* with costs, and suffer half a year's imprisonment.

By 58 Geo. 3. c. 93. reciting that by the laws in force all contracts and assurances whatsoever for payment of money, made for a usurious consideration, are utterly void; and also reciting that in the course of mercantile transactions negotiable securities often pass into the hands of persons who have discounted the same, without any knowledge of the original considerations for which the same were given; and that the avoidance of such securities in the hands of such bond fide indorsees without notice is attended with great hardship and injustice: it is enacted "that no bill of exchange, or promissory note, (drawn or made after the passing the act) shall, though it may have been given for a usurious consideration, or upon a usurious contract, be void in the hands of an indorsee for a valuable consideration, unless such indorsee had, at the time of discounting or paying such consideration for the same, actual notice that such bill or note had been originally given for a usurious consideration, or upon a usurious contract." It may be doubted whether this act received all the consideration due to the subject; and whether an exception ought not to have been made as to the first and immediate indorsees of the parties to the usury, which latter seem the principal persons benefited by the act.

Before the passing of the above statute, 58 Geo. 3. c. 93. it was held that a bill of exchange, or note, given in consequence of an usurious contract, was absolutely void, even in the hands of an innocent person, who might have taken it in the fair and regular course of business, without any notice of the usury: and that evidence of usury was a good defence, in an action brought upon such bill or note against the drawer, acceptor, or indorser. Lowe v. Waller, Doug. 708. But where A. for an usurious consideration gave his promissory note to B., who transferred it to C. for a valuable consideration, without notice of the usury, and afterwards A. gave a bond to C. for the amount, the Court of K. B. determined that the bond was valid: though they held that if the bond had been given in consideration of the note, it would have been void. 8 T. R. 390.

By the act, renewing the Bank charter, (3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 98. § 7), bills of exchange and promissory notes, not exceeding three months' date, or not having more than that time to run, may be discounted at any rate of interest that may be agreed on without incurring the penalties of usury.

A warrant of attorney given to secure the amount of a bill at three months, discounted at more than 5l. per cent. interest, and which was dishonoured when due, was held to be also protected by the above statute. 4 N. & M. 302.

With respect to the propriety of repealing all restraints on the amount of interest, or consideration, to be taken for the loan of money, much discussion has lately taken place; and great differences between those who ought to be well informed on the subject. For a statement of the general arguments, see Evans's Collection of Statutes, Part III., Class v. note on the 37 Hen. 8. c. 9.

And see the question as to the policy of laws regulating the rate of interest, discussed with ingenuity and clearness, by Mr. Bentham, "Defence of Usury, showing the impolicy of the present legal restraints," 1818.

Having given this historical summary of the law of usury, we will now proceed to enquire more particularly,

I. What is Usury.

II. Of Relief from Usury at Law and in Equity.

III. Of the Penalties for Usury.

I. It is not necessary that money should be actually advanced to constitute the offence of usury; but any contrivance or pretence whatever to gain more than legal interest, where it is the intent of the parties to contract for a loan, will be usury; as where a person applies to a tradesman to lend him money, who, instead of cash, furnishes him with goods, to be paid for at a future day, but at such an exorbitant price as to secure to himself more than legal interest upon the amount of their intrinsic value, this is an usurious contract. The question of usury, or whether a contract is a colour and pretence for an usurious loan, or is a fair and honest transaction, must, under all its circumstances, be determined by a jury, subject to the correction of the court by a new trial. Comp. 112, 770; Doug. 708; 3 T. R. 531.

It is remarkable that one particular species of indirect usury is guarded against by the 37 Hen. 8. c. 9. and this part of the statute seems still in force. By this it is enacted that no person shall sell his merchandizes to any other, and within three months after buy the same, or any part thereof, upon a lesser price, knowing them to be the same, on pain to forfeit treble the value; half to the informer and half to the king; and also to be punished by fine and imprisonment.

By Holt, chief justice: if A. owes B. 100l., who demands his money, and A. acquaints him that he hath not the money ready, but is desirous to pay it, if B. can procure it to be lent by any other person; and thereupon B., having present occasion for his money, contracts with C. that if he will lend A. 100l. he will give him 10l., on which C. lends the money, and the debt is paid to B.; this is a good and lawful contract, and not usurious between B. and C. Carth. 252. It is not usury if there be not a corrupt agreement for more than the statute interest; and the defendant shall not be punished unless he receive some part of the money in affirmation of the usurious agreement. 3 Salk. 390.

A lent B. 500l., and at the time of the loan it was agreed that B. should give something more than legal interest as a compensation, but no particular sum was specified. After the execution of the deed B. gave A. 50l.—B. continued to pay interest on the whole 500l. for five years, at the end of which time an action was brought against A. for usury. The Court of C. P. held, that the action was not barred by lapse of time, for that the loan was substantially for no more than 450l. and consequently the interest at the rate of 5l. per cent. on the 500l. received within the last year was usurious. 2 Bos. & Pul. 381.

There can be no usury without a loan; and the court hath distinguished between a bargain and a loan. 1 Lutw. 273; Sid. 27. If a man lend another 100l. for two years, to pay for the loan 30l., and if he pays the principal at the year's end, he shall pay nothing for interest; this is not usury, because the party may pay it at the year's end and so discharge himself. Cro. Jac. 509; 5 Rep. 69. And it is the same where a person by special agreement is to pay double the sum borrowed, &c. by way of penalty for nonpayment of the principal debt; the penalty being in lieu of damages, and the borrower might repay the principal at the time agreed, and avoid the penalty. 2 Inst. 89; 2 Roll. Abr. 801. But if these clauses be inserted merely to evade the statute, the contract is void, and the lender is liable to the penalties of usury. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 82. § 19.

To make usury there must be either a direct loan and a taking of more than legal interest for the forbearance of payment; or there must be some device for the purpose of concealing or evading the appearance of a loan and forbearance where in truth it was such. 4 East, 55.

In all questions, in whatever respect repugnant to the statute, the nature and substance of the transaction, and the view of the parties, must be ascertained to satisfy the court that there is a loan and borrowing; and where the real truth is a loan of money, the wit of man cannot find a shift to take it out of the statutes. Comp. 115, 796; Doug. 712.

A man surrenders a copyhold estate to another upon condition that if he pays 80l. at a certain day, then the surrender to be void; and after, it is agreed between them that the money shall not be paid, but that the surrenderor shall forfeit, &c.: in consideration whereof the surrenderor promises to pay to the surrenderor on a certain day 60l. or 6l. per annum from the said day pro usu et interesse of the said 80l. till that sum is paid; this 6l. shall be taken to be interesse damnorum, and not lucris, and but limited as a penalty for nonpayment of the 80l. as a nomine poenae, &c. 2 Roll. Rep. 469; 1 Dane. Abr. 41. On a loan of 100l. or other sum of money for a year, the lender may agree to take his interest half-yearly or quarterly, or to receive the profits of a manor or lands, &c. and it will be no usury though such profits are rendered every day. Cro. Jac. 26.

Where a bond was conditioned for the payment of 100l. by quarterly payments of 5l. each, and interest at 5l. per cent. with a memorandum indorsed, that at the end of each year the year's interest due was to be added to the principal, and then the 20l. received in the course of the year was to be deducted, and the balance to remain as principal; this was held not to be usurious, 4 T. R. 613; and this judgment was affirmed in the Exchequer chamber. 2 H. Bl. 144.

If a grant of rent, or lease for 20l. a year of land which is worth 100l. per annum, be made for one hundred pounds, it is not usurious, if there be not an agreement that this grant or lease shall be void upon payment of the principal and arrears, &c. Jenk. Cent. 219. But if two men speak together, and one desires the other to lend him an hundred pounds, and for the loan of it he will give more than legal interest; and, to evade the statute, he grants to him 30l. per annum out of his land for ten years, or makes a lease for one hundred years to him, and the lessee regrants it upon condition that he shall pay 30l. yearly for the ten years; in this case it is usury, though the lender never have his own hundred pounds again. 1 Cro. 27. See 1 Leon. 119.

A man granted a large rent for years for a small sum of money; the statute of usury was pleaded; and it was adjudged, that if it had been laid to be upon a loan of money, it had been usurious, though it is otherwise if it be a contract for an annuity. 4 Shep. Abr. 170. If one hath a rent-charge of 50*l.* a year, and another asketh what he shall give for it, and they agree for 100*l.*, this is a plain contract for the rent-charge, and no usury. 3 Nels. 510.

So an agreement for the payment of the purchase money of an estate by instalments, with interest beyond the legal rate, held not to be usurious, where the sum stipulated for as interest was in fact part of the purchase money. 1 M. & R. 143; 7 B. & C. 453.

H. having taken a building lease of land at 108*l.* per annum, assigned over the lease to R. for 2300*l.* (the value of the premises being proved to be about 800*l.*) and on the same day agreed to take the premises as tenant to R. and subject to the same covenants as in the building lease, but at an increased rent of 395*l.*; and there was a stipulation that H. should be at liberty, upon giving six months' notice, to repurchase the lease for the sum of 2300*l.* On H.'s becoming bankrupt his assignees brought an ejectment against the tenant, claiming under R., and the learned judge left it to the jury to say whether the transaction was substantially a purchase or a lease by R. to H.: if they thought the latter, the deed was void for usury: and the jury having found it the latter, the court refused to disturb the verdict. In such cases it is a question of fact for the jury, whether the transaction is bona fide or a colour for an usurious loan. 3 B. & A. 664; and see 5 Price, 560; 4 Camp. 1. As to cases where a lease granted in consideration of a loan of money is considered usurious, see 1 Ball & Beal, 116, 125, 129; 1 Scho. & Lef. 182; 2 Id. 218.

Loans on contingencies are not usurious, on account of the risk incurred. Thus the grant of an annuity for lives, not only exceeding the rate allowed for interest, but also the proportion for contracts of this kind, in consideration of a certain sum of money, is not within the statutes against usury; and so of a grant of an annuity on condition, &c. Cro. Jac. 252; 2 Lev. 7. See 1 Sid. 182; and ante, tit. Annuities for Lives.

Where an annuity of 500*l.* was granted in consideration of 3500*l.* redeemable upon payment of the original consideration with all arrears, costs, and expenses, upon six months' notice or payment of half a year's annuity; and an agreement was entered into for the cessation of the annuity in consideration of a bill of exchange for 5000*l.* payable in three years, which 5000*l.* was made up by the original purchase money and arrears of the annuity, an allowance for redeeming without notice the interest of 5000*l.* for three years, and the balance paid in cash, this deduction of the three years' interest, in the first place, and at the time of the advance, being held to exceed the legal rate of interest, the transaction was deemed usurious. 3 Bos. & Pull. 154.

Where an annuity was granted for a term of years, to be paid half-yearly, and the grantor gave to the purchaser promissory notes, each for half a year's payment, payable at the times when the instalments became respectively due; and it appeared that the payments would discharge the principal sum together with interest at the rate of nearly 12*l.* per cent.; the transaction was held to be usurious. 1 Russ. & M. 45.

The grantor of an annuity, having agreed with the grantee to redeem, drew a bill of exchange for 5000*l.* at three years, which the grantee discounted in the following manner: he took 4083*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* as the amount of the purchase money and arrears; advanced 168*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* to the grantor in cash, and retained 750*l.* as interest for three years on 5000*l.* Held that the transaction was usurious. 3 B. & P. 154.

The risk of the insolvency of the grantor of an annuity otherwise usurious is not such a risk of the principal as will make the grant good. 3 N. & M. 665.

Where interest exceeds 5*l.* per cent. per annum on a bond, if possibly the principal and interest are in hazard, upon a contingency or casualty, or if there is a hazard that one may have less than his principal, as when a bond is to pay money upon the return of a ship from sea, &c. these are not usury. 2 Cro. 208, 508; 1 Cro. 27; Show. 8. Though where B. lends to D. three hundred pounds on bond, upon an adventure during the life of E. for such a time; if therefore D. pays to B. twenty pounds in three months, and at the end of six months the principal sum, with a farther premium at the rate of 6*d.* per pound a month; or if before the time mentioned E. dies, then the bond to be void; this, differing from the hazard in a bottomry bond, was adjudged an usurious contract. Carthem, 67, 68; Comberb. 125. One hundred pounds is lent to have one hundred and twenty pounds at the year's end upon a casualty; if the casualty goes to the interest only, and not the principal, it is usury. The difference is, that where the principal and interest are both in danger of being lost, there the contract for extraordinary interest is not usurious; but when the principal is well secured, it is otherwise. 3 Salk. 391. See Insurance, IV, as to Bottomry Bonds.

The loan of money produced by the sale of stock (or valued with reference to the price of stock at the time of the loan) on an agreement that the borrower shall, at a certain day, replace (or purchase) stock to the amount of the stock sold (or purchasable at the time of the loan) with such interest in the mean time as the stock itself might have produced, is not usurious; not even if there is a condition in the alternative to repay the money on a subsequent day; unless the transaction be colourable, and a mere device to obtain more than the legal interest. 3 T. R. 531; 8 T. R. 162; 8 East, 304.

Where stock was lent upon a bond to replace it on a given day, with interest at 5*l.* per cent. in the mean time upon the sum which the stock produced, the stock not having been replaced at the time, it was held that the lender was entitled to the amount produced by the sale of the stock with interest, and not compellable to accept the amount of the stock (which had fallen) with the dividends which had accrued due in the mean time. 4 Ves. 492. But where a certain amount of stock was to be transferred, or the value thereof (at a particular day then past, when a loan ought to have been repaid) paid at the option of the lender, with interest in the mean time, the master of the rolls ruled the contract to be usurious, as it reserved the capital with legal interest, and likewise a contingent advantage, without putting either capital or interest in any kind of risk, and it was usurious to stipulate for the chance of that advantage. 17 Ves. 44.

So where A. lent 400*l.* stock to B. taking as security an agreement from B. to replace the stock on request, and a bond for the payment of the produce of the stock, and reserving to himself the dividends of the stock for interest, and the option either to have the stock replaced or the produce of it paid in money with interest at 5*l.* per cent.; this was held an usurious bargain. White v. Wright, 5 D. & R. 110; 3 B. & C. 273; and see 11 East, 612; 1 Moo. & Mulk. Ca. 411; 3 B. & C. 267.

Where bankers agreed to give credit on account in a certain sum, for which the person credited was to purchase stock of a certain amount, and which, at the then current price, was more than the money credited would purchase, and was to account for the dividends from the last dividend day, and the sum was credited accordingly, and drafts honoured by the bankers; the Court of K. B. held, that the contract was usurious, though the price of the stocks was less than when several of the sums were advanced; but that the party was entitled to credit in account for the amount agreed upon. 11 East, 612.

Where money was advanced on the security of omnium, which was to be taken back by the borrower at a fixed advance of price at a day certain, and the difference in price exceeded the rate of 5*l.* per cent. for the period, the transaction was held to be usurious. 2 Campb. 607.

But where a person, having a vested interest in stock which he could not transfer till a certain day, sold his interest in the principal and dividends at a sum below the current price, this was helden not to be usurious. Esp. 164.

If the original contract be not usurious, nothing done afterwards can make it so. A counter-bond to save one harmless against a bond made upon a corrupt agreement, will not be void by the statutes. But if the original agreement be corrupt between all the parties, and so within the statute, no colour will exempt him from the danger of the statutes against usury. 1 Brownl. 73; 2 And. 428; 4 Shep. Abr. 170. A bond fide debt is not destroyed by being mingled with an usurious contract relating to it. 1 H. Bl. 462; 1 East, 92.

A fine levied, or judgment suffered as a security for money, in pursuance of an usurious contract, may be avoided by an averment of the corrupt agreement, as well as any common specialty or parol contract. It is not material whether the payment of the principal and the usurious interest be secured by the same or by different conveyances, for all writings whatsoever for the strengthening such a contract are void; also a contract reserving to the lender a greater advantage than allowed, is usurious, if the whole is reserved by way of interest, or in part only under that name, and in part by way of rent for a house let at a rate plainly exceeding the known value; so where part is taken before the end of the time, that the borrower hath not the profit of the whole principal money, &c. 1 Hank. P. C. c. 82. § 22.

It is now clearly settled that bankers and others, discounting bills, may not only take 5*l.* per cent. for interest, but also a reasonable sum besides, for their trouble and risk in remitting cash, and for other incidental expenses. 2 T. R. 52. But still, whether such a charge is reasonable or usurious must be decided by a jury, assisted by the direction of the judge. See 1 Bos. & Pull. 376.

A. having a bill for 2000*l.* at two months' date, which he could not readily negotiate in London, requested B. to give him in exchange an acceptance of B.'s London banker, at the same date and for the same sum; B. did so, deducting 16*l.* 10*s.* for commission: held no usury. 4 Bingh. 81.

Where a broker carried bills to be discounted, and allowed to the person discounting interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, and in addition 1*l.* per cent. on the account of the bills, towards the payment of the debt due from a third person to the discounter, but which the broker thought himself bound in honour, though not in law, to pay, and the broker accounted to his principal for the whole amount of the bills, minus lawful discount and commission; it was held, that the transaction was not usurious. If the discounter of a bill engage with the holder that he shall pay the agent procuring the discount a premium in addition to the legal interest, this is usurious, although the discounter himself only take the legal discount. 7 B. & C. 431; Moo. & Malk. Ca. 121.

A. being indebted to B. for different usurious loans, applies to B. for a further advance, which B. agrees to make at the legal rate of interest, if A.'s father will give his security for that and also for part of the previous debt: A.'s father consents, and accepts three bills, the two first of which exactly cover the amount of the legal debt: the parties paid when due. In an action on the second, held, that the acceptances having been given partly as a security for an illegal debt, were all tainted with the illegality, and therefore void. 1 Marsh. 349; 5 Taunt. 780.

The restrictions of the statutes against usury, however, do not apply to contracts made in foreign countries; for on such contracts our courts will direct the payment of interest according to the law of the country in which such contract was made. 1 P. Wms. 396; 2 Bro. P. C. 72. Thus Irish, American, Turkish, and Indian interest have been allowed in our courts to the amount of even 12*l.* per cent.; for the moderation or exorbitance of interest depends upon local circumstances; and the refusal to enforce such contracts would put a stop to all foreign trade. By 14 Geo. 3. c. 79. and 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 51. all mortgages and other securities upon estates and other property in Ireland, or the plantations, bearing interest not exceeding 6*l.* per cent. were declared legal, though executed in the kingdom of Great Britain; and though bonds are given as collateral securities for payment of such interest in Great Britain, unless the money lent shall be known at the time to exceed the value of the thing in pledge; in which case also, to prevent usurious contracts at home, under the colour of such foreign securities, the borrower shall forfeit treble the sum so borrowed. 2 Comm. 463, 464. And now, by the 3 Geo. 4. c. 47. securities made in Great Britain on estates, &c. in Ireland, or in the West Indian colonies, with interest not exceeding the rate of interest payable by the law of the country, &c. where the estate is situate, are declared valid. See further, Mortgage.

II. As usury (with the exceptions already noticed) avoids every security into which it enters, it necessarily follows that none such can be enforced at law; and advantage may be taken of such securities, by pleading the statute in bar to actions brought on them to recover the sum secured. 12 Mod. 493.

Formerly, to an action of assumpsit brought on an usurious contract, the general issue might have been pleaded and the usury given in evidence; Str. 498; but a defendant could not do both; 9 Mod. 359. Now, however, by the rule of H. T. 4 Wm. 4. usury must be pleaded specially.

Money paid by A. to B. in order to compromise a qui tam action of usury brought by B. against A. on the ground of an usurious transaction between the latter and one E., may be recovered back in an action by A. for money had and received. For the prohibition and penalties of the 18 Eliz. c. 5. attach only on the "informer or plaintiff, or other person suing out process in the penal action," making composition, &c. contrary to the statute; and not upon the party paying the composition; and therefore the latter does not stand, in this respect, in pari delicto, nor is particeps criminis, with such compounding informer or plaintiff. And such recovery may be had, although E.'s assignees had before recovered from B. the money so received by him, as money received to their use (the money paid by way of composition being at the time stated to be E.'s money), there being no evidence to show that A. the present plaintiff was privy to that suit. 8 East, 378.

In one case the Court of Common Pleas refused to set aside a judgment and execution, founded on an usurious consideration, until the defendant had paid the legal principal and interest. 1 Bos. & Pul. 270.

But in a latter case the Court of King's Bench expressed their disapprobation of this decision, and set aside a judgment founded on an usurious consideration, without compelling the defendant to pay the principal and interest. 4 B. & A. 92.

Where, however, usurious securities have been acted on, and the money partly paid by the borrower, the court will not set aside a judgment and execution, except on the terms of the defendant paying the principal and legal interest. Hindle v. O'Brien, 1 Taunt. 413.

But though the securities are void, the debt is not destroyed, if it were originally good and lawful.

Thus if an usurious security be given for a legal subsisting debt, although the security is void, the debt is not extinguished. 3 Campb. 119. So if a bond, void on the ground of usury, be cancelled, and another taken for the original principal, after deduction of a payment made under the former one, the latter bond is valid. 1 Campb. 165, n. So after usurious securities given for a loan have been destroyed by mutual consent, a promise by the borrower to repay the principal and legal interest is valid. 2 Taunt. 184; 1 Campb. 157, 190.

Relief from usury in courts of equity differs from that afforded by courts of law; for in the former it is a maxim, that he that would have equity must do equity, the statutes of usury precluding the remedy merely; and this court will only grant relief upon the terms of the party seeking it consenting to pay what is really due.

Although a court of equity will not, in general, relieve against an usurious contract, except on the terms of paying the principal with legal interest, yet a suit by the assignees of a bankrupt for delivering up an assignment of stock, founded on a usurious contract, was sustained on the ground that as the assignment was usurious, it followed in consequence that it was wholly void. 17 Ves. 44. In all cases of bankruptcy, if usury is made out, the security is cut down altogether, not leaving the party a creditor for the money actually advanced. 9 Ves. 84.

Where securities had been given for legal interest, and more was afterwards received by taking advantage of the necessitous circumstances of the borrower; upon a suit for redemption, the account was directed to be taken upon the principle of applying the payments beyond legal interest in satisfaction of the principal, and in case the lender was overpaid, that he should refund. Rep. temp. Talb. 37.

As to the general principles of relief in equity on payment of principal and legal interest, see Henckle v. Royal Assurance Comp. 1 Ves. 319; Scott v. Nesbitt, 2 Bro. C. C. 641; Bamfield v. Solomons, 9 Ves. jun. 84. But a bill in equity requiring a discovery of usury is demurrable to, as tending to subject the defendants to penalties. See Chauncey v. Fohorn-den, 2 Atk. 322; 2 Eq. Ab. 70, pl. 7; Harrison v. Southcote, 1 Atk. 534.

In several cases in the Irish Court of Chancery relief has been given against leases granted by borrowers to the lenders of money, and which in that country appears to have been a frequent practice; and the subject is familiarly described by the expression of lease and loan. See Scholes and Lefroy's Reports in Chancery, i. 115, Browne v. O'Dea; 182, Drew v. Power; 310, Molloy v. Irwin; ii. 218, Gubbins v. Creed. See also the following cases, in which the inclination of the court is against extending the doctrine. Merredith v. Saunders, Don's Purl. Ca. 514; Ball's Rep. C. i. 27, Prior v. Dunphy; 126, Willen v. Browne; ii. 93, Corbet v. Seagrove.

III. To constitute usury and consummate the offence there must be an actual taking of money or money's worth; and therefore the re-payment of the sum lent, with usurious interest, either by bill of exchange, promissory note, or banker's cheque, is not completed until it has been paid; the lender having, in fact, as yet received nothing for payment, may be refused. 7 T. R. 184; 1 Camp. 445; 2 Camp. 53.

The forfeitures under the statute of Anne are recoverable by action of debt, plaint, or information.

An action qui tam for penalties may be brought by a stranger; and the borrower may be produced as a witness to prove the usury in an action for the penalty, if he swears that he has repaid the sum borrowed. 4 Burr. 2251. See Raym. 191.

It was formerly held, that the borrower could not be admitted to prove the re-payment of the money; for, till that was proved, he was no witness at all. 1 Stra. 633.

But now the borrower may be a witness, though the money is not paid, if the usury neither affects the debt, nor avoids the contract: and where the matter is doubtful, the objection shall only go to his credit, and not to his competency as a witness. 1 T. R. 153.

Informations and qui tam actions upon the statute must be brought within twelve calendar months from the commission of the usurious act; but the crown may sue within two years after the end of the first year. 31 El. c. 5. See Limitation of Actions.

An action to recover penalties for usury may be compounded by leave of the court; which, by the rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. shall not be granted in cases where part of the penalty goes to the crown, unless notice has been given to the proper officer.

If judgment cannot be given on the statute against usury, it hath been said that if it be found that a person took money for forbearance by corrupt agreement, judgment may be given against him at common law of fine and imprisonment. 3 Salk. 391.

See Plowden and Comyn on usury, the former of whom contends that usury is still an offence at common law, while the latter seems to adopt the contrary opinion. It has been thought by some that no indictment will lie for usury since the statute of Anne. But upon the principles laid down in a former part of this work (Indictment, II.) there does not seem any reason why an indictment may not be sustained for this offence. There is indeed one dictum (for it can hardly be called a case) reported in a book of not very great authority, from which it would appear that such an indictment will not lie, and that the party prosecuting must sue for the penalty, as being the method prescribed by the statute. 11 Mod. 174. But that case was decided in the absence of Lord C. J. Holt, and is certainly at variance with the doctrine deducible from many other decisions.

The statute, however, having given such heavy penalties to the informer, there is no instance of an indictment having been brought in modern times for usury. And it is quite clear that where there is not actual taking of the illegal interest, an indictment in that case is not sustainable, however corrupt the contract may be, or however void under the provisions of the statute. 2 Str. 316.

An indictment will not lie at the sessions for usury; for the statute gives the justices there no jurisdiction of the offence. 2 Salk. 680; 2 Ld. R. 1144.

V.

VAC

VACARIA. A void place, or waste ground. Mem. in Scacc. Mich. 9 Edw. 1.

VACANT POSSESSION. A vacant possession is where a tenant has entirely abandoned the premises which he held, for if he still retains the virtual possession of them, though he has ceased to occupy, the possession can not be treated as vacant, but the landlord must proceed by ejectment in the ordinary way. See Ejectment.

Many nice distinctions have been drawn as to what is a vacant possession.

Where the tenant of a house locked it up, and quitted it, the court held that the landlord should treat it as a vacant possession. 4 B. & C. 259.

But where there is any thing left by the tenant on the premises, however trifling, (for almost any matter will suffice to prevent a vacant possession, see 2 Chitty's R. 177), as if the tenant leave beer in a cellar; or hay in a barn, 2 Str. 1064; Bul. N. P. 97, S. C.; and in case of ground on which there is no house or building, if it be known where the tenant lives, the lessor of the plaintiff cannot proceed as in a vacant possession. Ibid.

The mode of proceeding in ejectment on a vacant possession is according to the ancient practice in ejectments, and is as follows.—A lease for years being previously prepared, and when necessary, a power of attorney executed, the party claiming title, or his attorney, enters upon the premises before the first day of the term, and there seals and delivers the lease to the lessee, who is usually some friend of the lessor, and at the same time delivers him the possession, but an attorney cannot be lessee. R. M. 1654; 2 Doug. 486. The lessee remains on the premises until some third person enters thereon by previous agreement, and turns him out of possession, upon which a declaration in ejectment, which has been previously prepared, is delivered on the premises to the ejector, founded upon the demise contained in the lease.

The declaration is similar to that in ordinary cases, except that the parties to it are real, and not fictitious parties, the lessee being made plaintiff on the demise of the lessor, and the ejector defendant. In lieu of the ordinary notice for the tenant to appear and be made defendant instead of the casual ejector, a notice is subscribed to the declaration, signed by the plaintiff's attorney, and addressed to the real defendant, informing him that unless he appear in court on the first day, or within the first four days, in London or Middlesex, or in any other county within the first eight days of the next term, at the writ of the plaintiff, and plead to the declaration, judgment will be entered against him by default. Tidd's Pr. 532, 8th edit.; Adams' Eject. 174, 2d edit. In cases of vacant possession, no person claiming title will be let in to defend, but he that can first seal a lease upon the premises must obtain possession. Barnes, 177.

In moving for judgment against the defendant, in case of a vacant possession, in the King's Bench, an affidavit must be made of the sealing of the lease, entry of the lessee, and ouster, and the delivery of the copy of the declaration; so also of the power of attorney, if the entry was made by a third person; but in the Common Pleas such an affidavit is unnecessary, it being only requisite to give a rule to plead, as in common cases. Tidd's Pr. 536, 8th edit.; Adams' Eject. 176, 2d edit. And see Roscoe on Real Actions, 548; 1 Archb. by Chitty, 642.

VACATION, vacatio.] Is all the time between the end of one term and the beginning of another; and it begins the last day of every term, as soon as the court rises. See Term.

The time from the death of a bishop, or other spiritual person, till the bishopric or dignity is supplied with another, is also called vacation. Stats. Westm. 1. c. 21; 14 Edw. 3. st. 4. c. 4. See Plenarty.

VACATURA. An avoidance of an ecclesiastical benefice; as prima vacatura, the first avoidance, &c.

VACCARY, vaccaria.] A house or place to keep cows in; a dairy-house, or cow-pasture. Fleta, lib. 2.

VACCARIUS. The cow-herd, who looks after the common herd of cows. Fleta.

VADIUM PONERE. To take security, bail, or pledges, for the appearance of a defendant in a court of justice. Reg. Orig. See Pone.

VADIUM MORTUUM. See Mortgage.

VADIUM VIVUM. A living pledge: as when a man borrows a sum of another, and grants him an estate, as of 20*l.* per annum, to hold until the rents and profits shall repay the sum borrowed. See Mortgage.

VAGABOND, vagabundus.] One that wanders about, and has no certain dwelling; an idle fellow. See Vagrants.

VAGRANTS,

VAGRANTES.] Some of the ancient statutes contained very severe regulations respecting vagrancy. By 22 Hen. 8. c. 12. a vagrant, after being whipped, was to take an oath to return to the place where he was born, or where he had last dwelt before the punishment, for the space of three years, and there labour as a true man ought to do. By 27 Hen. 8. c. 25. persons found a second time in a state of vagrancy were not only to be whipped, but to have the upper part of the gristle of the right ear clean cut off: for a third offence, the punishment was death. By 1 Edw. 6. c. 3. a vagabond was to be marked with a hot iron on the breast with V., and adjudged to be a slave for two years to the person who took him. He was to be kept on bread and water, or small drink; and made to work by beating, chaining, or otherwise, at any work however vile. If he absented himself for fourteen days, he was to be marked on the forehead or cheek with S., and adjudged a slave to his master for ever: and, if he ran away a second time, was declared guilty of felony. Children of the age of five years and under fourteen were adjudged to the apprehenders until twenty-one, if females; or twenty-four, if male; to be treated as slaves: and if they beat or wounded their masters, or conspired with others to do so, they were to suffer as felons, unless the party injured agreed to take them as slaves for ever. This act was repealed by 3 & 4 Edm. 6, c. 16. which restored the provisions of 22 Hen. 8, c. 12. with some additions. By 14 Eliz. c. 5; 18 Eliz. c. 3. provisions were made for the punishment of vagabonds by whipping, gaoling, boring the ears, and death, for a second offence. These were repealed by 35 Eliz. c. 7. § 6. By 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12. § 23. the justices at quarter sessions were empowered to order incorrigible rogues to be transported to the English plantations. General directions concerning vagrants, conformable to the principles of the present system, were given by the 12 Anne, st. 2, c. 23; 13 Geo. 2, c. 24.

In Scotland the laws against vagrants were formerly equally severe, for all between the age of fourteen and seventy, who begged without a badge, were, by the act 1424, c. 42, burned in the cheek and banished: and by act 1535, c. 22, none were permitted to beg in any other parish than where they were born. Vagabonds offending a second time against the act 1424, were to suffer death; act 1570, c. 74. These and other acts were confirmed by act 1698, c. 21.

Under the 17 Geo. 2, c. 5. vagrants in England were divided into three classes; viz. Idle and Disorderly Persons—Rogues and Vagabonds—and Incorrigible Rogues: which classification is adhered to in the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83.

By that act all provisions theretofore made relative to idle and disorderly persons, rogues, and vagabonds, incorrigible rogues, or other vagrants, in England, are repealed, as well as the provisions of the 32 Geo. 3, c. 45. relating to passes given on their discharge from prison, or to persons acquitted or discharged at the assizes or sessions.

By § 3. every person being able wholly or in part to maintain himself or herself, or his or her family, by work or by other means, and wilfully refusing or neglecting so to do, by which refusal or neglect he or she, or any of his or her family whom he or she may be legally bound to maintain, shall have become chargeable to any parish, township, or place;

every person returning to and becoming chargeable in any parish, township, or place, from whence he or she shall have been legally removed by order of two justices of the peace, unless he or she shall produce a certificate of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of some other parish, &c. thereby acknowledging him or her to be settled in such other parish, &c.;

every petty chapman or pedlar wandering abroad and trading, without being duly licensed, or otherwise authorized by law;

every common prostitute wandering in the public streets or public highways, or in any place of public resort, and behaving in a riotous or indecent manner;

every person wandering abroad, or placing himself or herself in any public place, street, highway, court, or passage, to beg or gather alms, or causing or procuring or encouraging any child or children so to do;

shall be deemed an idle and disorderly person; any justice of the peace may commit such offender (being thereof convicted before him by his own view, or by the confession of such offender, or by the evidence on oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses) to the House of Correction, there to be kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding one calendar month,

By § 4. every person committing any of the offences therein-before mentioned, after having been convicted as an idle and disorderly person;

every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on any of his majesty's subjects;

every person wandering abroad and lodging in any barn or outhouse, or in any deserted or unoccupied building, or in the open air, or under a tent, or in any cart or waggon, not having any visible means of subsistence, and not giving a good account of himself or herself;

every person wilfully exposing to view, in any street, road, highway, or public place, any obscene print, picture, or other indecent exhibition;

every person wilfully, openly, lewdly, and obscenely exposing his person in any street, road, or public highway, or in the view thereof, or in any place of public resort, with intent to insult any female;

every person wandering abroad and endeavouring by the exposure of wounds or deformities to obtain or gather alms;

every person going about as a gatherer or collector of alms, or endeavouring to procure charitable contributions of any nature or kind, under any false or fraudulent pretence;

every person running away and leaving his wife, or his or her child or children, chargeable, or whereby she or they or any of them shall become chargeable to any parish, township, or place;

every person playing or betting in any street, road, highway, or other open and public place, at or with any table or instrument of gaming, at any game or pretended game of chance;

every person having in his or her custody or possession any picklock key, crow, jack, bit, or other implement, with intent feloniously to break into any dwelling house, warehouse, coach-house, stable, or outbuilding, or being armed with any gun, pistol, hanger, cutlass, bludgeon, or other offensive weapon, or having upon him or her any instrument, with intent to commit any felonious act;

every person being found in or upon any dwelling-house, warehouse, coach-house, stable, or outhouse, or in any inclosed yard, garden, or area, for any unlawful purpose;

every suspected person or reputed thief, frequenting any river, canal, or navigable stream, dock, or basin, or any quay, wharf, or warehouse, near or adjoining thereto, or any street, highway, or avenue leading thereto, or any place of public resort, or any avenue leading thereto, or any street, highway, or place, adjacent, with intent to commit felony; and every person apprehended as an idle and disorderly person, and violently resisting any constable or other peace officer so apprehending him or her, and being subsequently convicted of the offence for which he or she shall have been so apprehended;

shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond, and any justice of the peace may commit such offender (being thereof convicted before him by the confession of such offender, or by the evidence on oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses) to the house of correction, there to be kept to hard labour for any term not exceeding three calendar months.

By § 5. every person breaking or escaping out of any place of legal confinement before the expiration of the term for which he or she shall have been committed or ordered to be confined by virtue of the act;

every person committing any offence against this act which shall subject him or her to be dealt with as a rogue and vagabond, such person having been at some former time adjudged so to be and duly convicted thereof; and every person apprehended as a rogue and vagabond, and violently resisting any constable or other peace officer so apprehending him or her, and being subsequently convicted of the offence for which he or she shall have been so apprehended, shall be deemed an incorrigible rogue, and any justice of the peace may commit such offender (being thereof convicted before him by the confession of such offender, or by the evidence on oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses) to the House of Correction to hard labour, there to remain until the next general or quarter sessions of the peace.

By § 10. when any incorrigible rogue shall have been committed to the House of Correction, there to remain until the next general or quarter sessions, the justices of the peace there assembled may examine into the circumstances of the case, and order, if they think fit, that such offender be further imprisoned in the House of Correction, and kept to hard labour for not exceeding one year, and may order further, such offender (not being a female) to be punished by whipping, at such time during his imprisonment, and at such place within their jurisdiction, as they shall deem expedient.

§ 6. Any person may apprehend any person offending against the act, and forthwith take him or her before some justice, or deliver him or her to any constable or other peace officer of the place where he or she shall have been apprehended, and so taken as aforesaid; and in case any constable, &c. shall refuse or wilfully neglect to take such offender into custody, and to convey him or her before some justice, it shall be deemed a neglect of duty, and he shall on conviction be punished as therein-after directed.

By § 7. any justice may issue a warrant to apprehend offenders. And by § 13. any justice, upon information on oath before him made, that any person therein-before described to be an idle and disorderly person, or a rogue and vagabond, or an incorrigible rogue, is or is reasonably suspected to be harboured in any house kept for the entertainment of travellers, by warrant may authorize any constable or other person to enter at any time such house, and to bring before him or any other justice every such idle and disorderly person, &c. found therein, to be dealt with in the manner therein-before directed.

By § 8. any constable, peace officer, or other person apprehending any person charged with being an idle and disorderly person, or a rogue and vagabond, or an incorrigible rogue, may take any horse, mule, ass, cart, car, caravan, or other vehicle, or goods in the possession or use of such person, and convey the same as well as such person before some justice; and every justice by whom any person shall be adjudged to be an idle and disorderly person, &c. may order that such offender shall be searched, and his or her trunks, &c. shall be inspected in the presence of the said justice, and of him or her, and also any cart, or other vehicle, found in his or her possession, shall be searched in his or her presence; and the said justice may order any money found upon such offender to be applied towards the expense of apprehending, conveying to the House of Correction, and maintaining such offender during the time for which he or she shall have been committed; and if upon such search money sufficient for the purposes aforesaid be not found, such justice may order a part, or the whole of such other effects then found, to be sold, and the produce of such sale applied as aforesaid, the overplus of such money or effects, after deducting the charges of such sale, to be returned to the said offender.

By § 9. justices may bind persons by recognizance to prosecute vagrants at sessions, who shall give notice of their intention to appeal against their conviction, and empowers the sessions to order payment of expenses to prosecutors and witnesses.

§ 11. Penalty on officers neglecting their duties, &c. of 5*l*. And § 12. on conviction, &c. justices may make an order upon them for payment of the expenses of prosecution.

§ 14. Any person aggrieved by any act or determination of any justice out of sessions, concerning the execution of the act, may appeal to the next quarter sessions, giving to the justice notice in writing of such appeal, and of the ground thereof, within seven days after such act or determination, and before the next quarter sessions, and entering within such seven days into a recognizance, with sufficient surety, before a justice for the county or place in which such person shall have been convicted, personally to appear and prosecute such appeal; and upon such notice and recognizance, such justice may discharge such person out of custody; and the court at such quarter sessions shall hear and determine the matter of such appeal, and make such order therein as shall seem meet, and in case of the dismissal of the appeal, or the affirmation of the conviction, shall issue the necessary process.

By § 15. the visiting justices of gaols, &c. are empowered to grant certificates for enabling persons discharged from prison to receive alms in their route.

§ 16. Justices are not to grant certificates enabling persons to ask relief on route, except to soldiers and sailors. 43 Geo. 3. c. 61. See Soldiers.

§ 18. Where actions are brought against justices, &c. they shall have treble costs if judgment be in their favour.

§ 20. Persons convicted under the act are to be chargeable to the parish in which they shall reside.

§ 21. Provided, wherever by any acts of parliament now in force it is directed that any person shall be punished as an idle and disorderly person, or as a rogue and vagabond, or as an incorrigible rogue, for any offence specified in such acts, and not therein-before provided for, whether such person shall or shall not have committed any offence against that act, every such person shall be punished under the provisions thereof.

By the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 5. (repealing the former statutes on the subject) the justices may, on the complaint of the churchwardens and overseers of any parish, make an order for the removal, at the expense of such complaining parish, to the place of their birth, of chargeable poor born in Jersey and Guernsey, who have not gained a settlement in England.

And by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 40. which repeals the former statutes relating to the removal of poor persons born in Scotland and Ireland, two justices may make an order for the removal to the place of their birth of poor persons born in Scotland or Ireland, or in the Isle of Man, or Scilly, with their families, who have become chargeable to parishes in England. The expense is in the first instance to be borne by the complaining parish, but is to be repaid by the county, or division, in which such parish is situate.

See further, Police.

VALET, VALECT, or VADELET, valettus, vel valectus. Was anciently a name specially denoting young gentlemen, though of great descent or quality; but afterwards attributed to those of lower rank, and now a servitor, or gentleman of the chamber. Cambd.; Selden's Tit. Hon.; Bract. lib. 3.

In the accounts of the Inner Temple, it is used for a benchers clerk or servant; and the butlers of the house corruptly call them varlets.

VALENTIA. The value or price of any thing. See Value.

VALESHERIA. Signifies the proving by the kindred of the slain, one on the father's side, and another on the side of the mother, that a man was a Welshman. It is mentioned in stat. Wallæ, 12 Edm. 1. c. 4. See Englecery.

VALOR BENEFICIORUM. See Taxatio Ecclesiastica.

VALOR MARITAGII, value of marriage. Under the ancient tenures, while an infant was in ward, the guardian had the power of tendering him or her a suitable match, without disparagement or mequality, which, if the infants refused, they forfeited the value of the marriage to their guardian; that is, so much as a jury would assess, or any one would bond fide give to the guardian for such an alliance; and if the infants married themselves without the guardian's consent, they forfeited double the value. This was one of the greatest hardships of our ancient tenures. But the tenures being taken away by 12 Car. 2. c. 24. the law is abolished. See Tenures, II. 4.

VALUABLE CONSIDERATION. See Consideration.

VALVASORS. See Vassors.

VALUE, valentia, valor. Is a known word; and the value of those things as to which offences are committed, is usually comprised in indictments; which was formerly necessary in theft to make a difference from petit larceny, and in trespass to aggravate the fault, &c.

But now that the distinction between grand and petit larceny has been abolished, the exact value in cases of simple larceny is immaterial.

In other cases a distinction has been made between value and price. If a plaintiff declares in an action of trespass for the taking away of live cattle, or one particular thing, he ought to say that the defendant took them away, pretii so much; if the declaration be for taking of things without life, it must be alleged ad valentiam, &c. so that live cattle are to be prized at such a price as the owner of them did esteem them to be worth; and dead things to be reckoned at the value of the market, which may be certainly known. Of coin, not current, it shall be pretii; but of common coin, current, it shall be neither said pretii nor ad valentiam, for the value and price thereof is certain. The difference between pretii and ad valentiam may proceed from the rule in the register of writs, which shows it to be according to the ancient forms used in the law. West. Symb. par. 2; 2 Lill. Abr. 629.

A jewel, it is said, is not valuable in law, but only according to the valuation of the owner of it, and is very uncertain. But there seems to be a certain value for diamonds among the merchant jewellers, according to their weight and lustre, &c. Hil. 21 Car. B. R.; 2 Lill. 628. A man cannot say that another owes him so much, when the value of the thing owing is uncertain; for which reason, actions in these cases are always brought in the definet, and the declaration ad valentiam, &c. 1 Lutw. 484. See Money, Pleadings, &c.

VANTARIUS, præcursor.] As vantarius regis, the king's fore footman. Rot. de finibus. Term Mich. 2 Ed. 2.

VARIANCE, variantia, from the Fr. varier, i. e. alterare.] An alteration of a thing formerly laid in a plea; or where the declaration in a cause differs from the writ, or from the deed upon which it is grounded, &c. 2 Lill. Abr. 629. If there is a variance between the declaration and the writ, it is error, and the writ should formerly abate.

But the defendant can no longer take advantage of such a defect, as the court will not now grantoyer of the writ. See Oyer.

Where there is a variance, omission, or a mistake in the name of a defendant in a writ, or in the number of parties in the cause of action, in the testa, in the indorsements, or the like, the court will discharge the defendant out of custody, or order the bail-bond (if any) to be delivered up to be cancelled, and a common appearance entered, and in some cases will set aside the proceedings.

The courts and judges have, since the introduction of the new writs under the uniformity of process act, resolved not to allow any amendments in the writ itself, or in any form of the memorandum or indorsement, if prescribed by the statute, unless great injustice would be occasioned by the refusal, and that only in cases where the statute of limitations would be a bar. But in the forms of indorsement as prescribed by the rules of court, and not by statute, the court or a judge will allow an amendment. 3 Dow, P. C. 101; 1 Archb. Pr. by Chitty, 129.

If there appear to be a material variance between the matter pleaded and the manner of the pleading of it, this is not a good plea; for the manner and matter of pleading ought to agree in substance, or there will be no certainty in it. Cro. Jac. 479; 2 Lill. 629.

But when the pleading is good in substance, a small variance shall not hurt. 3 Mod. 227. If the record of Nisi

Prius agrees with the declaration delivered, a variation from the issue is not material. 2 Strange, 1131.

The 9 Geo. 4. c. 15. allowing of amendments by the judge on the trial of civil actions, or indictments or informations for misdemeanors, has already been noticed under the title Amendment. That statute, however, was confined to variances which appeared between any matter in writing or in print, and the recital upon the record on which the trial was pending. But by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 23. the powers of amendment given to the courts and judges have been greatly extended.

By § 1. any court of record holding plea in civil actions, and any judge sitting at nisi prius, if such court or judge shall see fit, may cause the record, writ, or document, on which any trial may be pending before any such court or judge, in any civil action, or in any information in the nature of a quo warranto, or proceedings on a mandamus, when any variance shall appear between the proof and the recital, or setting forth of the record, writ, or document, on which the trial is proceeding, of any contract, custom, prescription, name, or other matter in any particular or particulars in the judgment of such court or judge, not material to the merits of the case, and by which the opposite party cannot have been prejudiced in the conduct of his action, prosecution, or defence, to be forthwith amended by some officer of the court or otherwise, both in the part of the pleadings where such variance occurs, and in every other part of the pleadings in which it may become necessary to amend, on such terms, as to payment of costs to the other party, or postponing the trial, to be had before the same or another jury, or both payment of costs and postponement, as such court or judge shall think reasonable; and in case such variance shall be in some particular or particulars, in the judgment of such court or judge, not material to the merits of the case, but such as that the opposite party may have been prejudiced thereby in the conduct of his action, prosecution, or defence, then such court or judge shall have power to cause the same to be amended upon payment of costs to the other party, and withdrawing the record, or postponing the trial as aforesaid, as such court or judge shall think reasonable; and after any such amendment the trial shall proceed, in case the same shall be proceeded with, in the same manner in all respects, both with respect to the liability of witnesses to be indicted for perjury and otherwise, as if no such variance had appeared; and in case such trial shall be had at nisi prius, or by virtue of such writ as aforesaid, the order for the amendment shall be indorsed on the postea or the writ, as the case may be, and returned together with the record or writ, and thereupon such papers, rolls, and other records of the court from which such record or writ issued, as it may be necessary to amend, shall be amended accordingly; and in case the trial shall be had in any other court of record, then the order for amendment shall be entered on the roll or other document upon which the trial shall be had, provided that any party dissatisfied with the decision of such judge at nisi prius, sheriff, or other officer, respecting his allowance of any such amendment, may apply to the court from which such record or writ issued, for a new trial upon that ground; and in case any such court shall think such amendment improper, a new trial shall be granted accordingly, on such terms as the court shall think fit, or the court shall make such other order as to them may seem meet.

By § 24. the court or judge may, in all such cases of variance, instead of causing the record or document to be amended, direct the jury to find the fact or facts according to the evidence, and thereupon such finding shall be stated on such record or document; and notwithstanding the finding on the issue joined, the said court, or the court from which the record has issued, shall, if they shall think the said variance immaterial to the merits of the case, and the misstatement such as could not have prejudiced the opposite party in the conduct of the action or defence, give judgment according to the very right and justice of the case.

VASSAL, vassalus.] In our ancient customs signified a tenant or feudatary; or person who vowed fidelity and homage to a lord on account of some land, &c. held of him in fee; also a slave or servant, and especially a domestic of a prince. Du-Cange. Vassalus (in Scotland) is said to be quasi inferior socius, as the vassal is inferior to his master, and must serve him; and yet he is in a manner his companion, because each of them is obliged to the other. Skene. The vassal is the person who receives a feudal right; the giver is the superior. See 2 Comm. 58; and tit. Tenures.

VASSALAGE. The state of a vassal, or servitude and dependency on a superior lord. Liege Vassalage belonged only to the king.

VASSELERIA. The tenure or holding of vassal. Cowell.

VASTO. A writ against tenants for term of life or years, committing waste. F. N. B. 55; Reg. Orig. 72. See Waste.

VASTUM. A waste or common lying open to the cattle of all tenants who have a right of commoning. Paroch. Antiq. 171.

VASTUM FORESTÆ VEL BOSCI. That part of a forest or wood wherein the trees and underwood were so destroyed that it lay in a manner waste and barren. Paroch. Antiq. p. 351.

VAVASORS. The first name of dignity, next beneath a peer, was anciently that of vidames, vice-domini, valvasors, or vavasors, who are mentioned by our ancient lawyers, as virī magnæ dignitatis; and Sir Edward Coke speaks highly of them. Yet they are now quite out of use; and our legal antiquarians are not agreed upon even their original or ancient office. 1 Comm. c. 12. p. 403.

The vavassores, in dignity, were next to the barons and higher thanes. Selden says they either held of a mesne lord, and not immediately of the king, or at least of the king as of an honour or manor, and not in chief. Kelham, 354. Vavassores, however, are mentioned but twice in the first volume of the Domesday Survey, at least under that denomination. At the close of the account of Suffolk, however, we find a distinct title of "Verra Vavassorum," Domesday, tom. 2. fol. 448; the perusal of the contents of which satisfactorily proves that throughout the greater part of the survey the title was sunk in the general name of liberi homines.

"The grantees," says Sir Henry Spelman, "that received their estates from the barons or capitanei, and not from the king, were called valvasores, (a degree above knights,) and were unto their lords (the capitanei or barones regis) as they the capitanei were unto the king; and did in like manner subdivide their lands among their socmen and military followers, who in old time were called valvasini, whom I take to be the same at this day that are the lords of every manor, if not those themselves that we call knights, as owners of a knight's fee. For in this, the feudal law itself is doubtful and various, as of a thing lost by antiquity, or made uncertain by the differing manners of several nations. Inasmuch, that valvasores and valvasini grew to be confounded, and both of them at last to be out of use, and no other military tenures to be known amongst us than tenere per baronium, and tenere per feudum militare. But in a charter of Henry I. De tenend. Comitatus, it is said, "Si exurgat placitum de divisione territorum, si interest barones meos dominicos, tractetur in curia mea; et si inter valvasores duorum dominorum, tractetur in comitatu, &c." where the valvasores were also, and the barons themselves suitors and attendants. LL. Hen. 1. c. 8. Bracton mentioneth them in Henry III.'s time to be virī magnæ dignitatis. Bract. lib. i. c. 8. nu. 4. Nor was their memory clean gone in Richard II.'s days; as appeareth by Chaucer. Yet do I not find in any of our ancient laws or monuments that they stood in any classic kind of tenure, other than that we may account the baron, vavator, and knights, to be (as our lawyers at this day term them) the chief lord, mesne and tenant." Spelm. English Works, of Parliaments, 58. Compare also Seld. Tit. Hon. 625; and Spelm. Glossar. ed. 1617, p. 550.

Fleta, whose book was written after the 13 Edw. 1. places the vavassores next to the milites. Kelham, 398. Kelham, from Madox's Baronia Anglica, says, "We read of vavassours in the time of Henry the First, belonging to the barony of the Archbishop of York; to the barony of Robert Fossard, and others; but they were not numerous." Kelham, 354.

The relief of the vavator or the Conqueror's laws follows that of the baron. Leges Guil. Cong. 22; Wilk. 223; 1 Ellis's Domesday, 54.

VAVASORY, vavatoria.] The lands that a vavator held. Bract. lib. 2.

VEAL MONEY. The tenants within the manor of Bradford, in the county of Wilts, pay a yearly rent by this name to their lord, in lieu of veal paid formerly in kind. Blount's Ten.

VECTIGAL JUDICIARIUM. Is applied to money or fines paid to the king, to defray the charge he is at in maintaining the courts of justice, and protection of the people. 3 Salk. 33.

VEJOURS, visores, from the Fr. veier, i. e. cernere.] Such persons as are sent by the court to take a view of any place in question, for the better decision of the right thereto. It is also used for those that are appointed to view an offence. Old Nat. Br. 112; Bract. lib. 5. See View.

VELTRAIA, ministerium de veltraia.] The office of dog-leader, or a courser. Rot. Pip. 5 Steph.

VELTRARIUS. One who leads greyhounds; which dogs, in Germany, are called welters; in Italy, voltres, &c. Blount's Tenures, p. 9.

VELUM QUADRAGESIMALE. A veil or piece of hangings drawn before the altar in Lent, as a token of mourning and sorrow. Synod. Exon. anno 1217.

VENARIA. Beasts which are caught in the woods by hunting. Leg. Canut. c. 108.

VENATIO. In the statute of Charta de Foresta, signifies venison, in Fr. venaison. It is called venaison, of the means whereby the beasts are taken, quoniam ex venatione capiuntur, and being hunted are most wholesome. And they are termed beasts of venary because they are gotten by hunting. 4 Inst. 316.

VENDITIONI EXPONAS. A judicial writ, directed to the sheriff, commanding him to expose to sale goods which he hath already taken into his hands for the satisfying a judgment given in the king's court. Reg. Judic. 33; 14 Car. 2. c. 21. If the sheriff upon a fieri facias takes goods in execution, and returns that he hath so done, and cannot find buyers; or if he delay to deliver them to the party, &c. then the writ venditioni exponas shall issue to the sheriff, reciting the former writ and return, and commanding the sheriff to make sale of the goods, and bring in the money. 13 Hen. 7. 1; Dyer, 363. If a supersedeas be not delivered to the sheriff till he hath in part executed a writ of execution, he may afterwards be authorized to go through with it by a venditioni exponas; as he may also in the like case after a writ of error. Dyer, 98; Cro. Eliz. 597; 1 Roll. Abr. 894.

After the delivery of the venditioni exponas to the sheriff, he is bound to sell the goods, and have the money in court on the return day of the writ. Comp. 403; 3 Camp. 405, 524. And he cannot a second time return that the goods remain in his hands for want of buyers; although if he do make such a return, the court will not on that account grant an attachment against him. 1 B. & N. 359. But one way of proceeding against the sheriff, if he do not sell and pay over the money on or before the return of the venditioni, is to sue out a distingas against him, directed to the coroner, and if he do not sell the goods, and pay over the money before the return of the writ, he shall forfeit issues to the amount of the debt. 2 Saund. 47, n.; 6 Mod. 295. If there has been laches on the part of the plaintiff, or collusion between him and the officer, the court will not grant a distringas. 3 B. & Ald. 204. It is also to be observed that an action on the case may be supported against the sheriff for his neglect in not selling the goods within a reasonable time. 2 C. & M. 413.

In making sale of goods under a venditioni exponas, the sheriff is not bound by the value set upon the goods in his return to the fi. fa. Cro. Eliz. 598; Cro. Jac. 515; Godb. 276; but see 2 Show. 89. But otherwise, if they be rescued from him, or the like, so that he cannot make sale of them. 2 Ld. Raym. 1075; 1 Archb. Pr. by Chitty, 469.

If goods are not taken to the value of the whole, the plaintiff may have a venditioni exponas for part, and a feri facias for the residue, in the same writ. Thes. Brev. 305. And it seems that a venditioni exponas may be directed to the new sheriff, where the old one returns that he has taken goods, which remain in his hands for want of buyers. 2 Saund. 343. But the more usual way of proceeding in such case is by writ of distringas nuper vicecomitem to the new sheriff, commanding him to distrain the old one, till he sell the goods, &c. Of this writ there are two sorts; the first, which is the more ancient, commands the sheriff, to whom it is directed, to distrain the late sheriff, so that he exposes the goods to sale, and cause the monies arising therefrom to be delivered to the present sheriff, in order that such sheriff may have those monies in court at the return. Gillb. Ex. 21; 34 Hen. 6, 36. The other writ, which is the most usual, is to distrain the late sheriff to sell the goods, and have the money in court himself. 6 Mod. 299; Rast. 164; Thes. Brev. 90; Off. Bar. 15; 2 Ld. Raym. 1074, 1075; 1 Salk. 323.

VENDITOR REGIS. The king's salesman; being the person who exposed to sale goods and chattels seized or distrained to answer any debt due to the king.

This office was granted by King Edward I. to Philip de Lardiner, in the county of York; but the office was seized into the king's hands for the abuse thereof, anno 2 Ed. 2.

VENDOR AND VENDEE. Vendor is the person who sells any thing, and vendee the person to whom it is sold.

Where a man sells a thing to another, it is implied that the vendor shall make assurance by bill of sale to the vendee, but not unless it be demanded. Per Finch, chancellor. 2 Chan. Cases. 5. See 21 Fin. Abr. title Vendor and Vendee.

See further Agreement, Contract, Purchase, Sale, Stoppage in Transitu, Warranty, &c.

VENELLA. A narrow or strait way. Monast. i. 408.

VENIA. A kneeling or low prostration on the ground by penitents. Walsing. 196.

VENIRE FACIAS. A writ judicial awarded to the sheriff to cause a jury in the neighbourhood to come, or appear, when a cause is brought to issue, to try the same. Old Nat. Br. 157.

Formerly many questions arose concerning the place or places from whence a jury should come, but these are now set at rest. See Jury, I.; Venue, I.

One venire facias is sufficient to try several issues between the same parties, and in the same county. 2 Cro. 550.

If the matter to be tried be within divers places, and one and the same county, the venire facias shall be general; and if in several counties, it shall be special. 2 Lill. Abr. 637.

By the jury act, 6 Geo. 4. c. 50. § 23. in either civil or criminal cases, where jurors are to view, the court may order special writs of venire facias to issue. See View.

In all cases, where there is to be a special jury, the venire must be special.

Where an action was brought against two, they both joined issue, and one died; and after, the venire facias was awarded to try the issue between both, which was done, and held to be no error, because one of the defendants was living. Cro. Car. 308. See Amendment.

If a venire facias is returned by the coroner for defect of the sheriff, &c. when it ought to be returned by the sheriff, the trial is wrong, and not remedied by any statute of jeofails. 5 Rep. 36.

At a trial at nisi prius, the plaintiff changed the venire facias and panels, and had a jury the defendant knew not of; and ruled, that the defendant cannot be aided, if the first venire was not filed. And a difference was taken when the first venire was not filed, that he cannot be aided, because he may resort to the sheriff, and have a view of the panel, to be prepared for his challenges; but if the first venire was filed, then the defendant shall have a new trial. Raym. 79.

A venire facias, after filed, cannot be altered without consent of parties. Though where a verdict in a cause is imperfect, so that judgment cannot be given upon it, there shall be a new venire facias to try the cause, and find a new verdict. 2 Lill. 634, 635.

The want of a venire is aided after verdict. Cro. Eliz. 259; Bul. N. P. 320.

A venire facias ad respondendum is the common process upon any presentment, being in nature of a summons for the party to appear; and is a proper process to be first awarded on an indictment for any crime, under the degree of treason, felony, or maihem, except in such cases wherein other process is directed by statute. See Process, II.

The venire facias ad respondendum may be without a day certain, because by an appearance the fault in this process is cured; but a venire facias ad triand. exdum must be returnable on a day certain, &c. 3 Salk. 371.

Before the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 67. § 2, the latter writ of venire facias must have been tested and returned in term time only; and it used to be tested on the first day of the term in or after which the cause was to be tried, and was made returnable on some day certain in term before the trial; or if it were a country cause, then on the last day of the term. But now by that statute, except in trials at bar, it may be tested on the day it is issued, and be made returnable forthwith.

VENIRE FACIAS tot Matronas. See Ventre Inspiciendo.

VENIRE FACIAS, de Novo; the ancient proceeding of the common law, to send a cause or a prosecution for a misdemeanor to a new trial. And this proceeding is still preserved in certain cases.

New trials are generally granted where a general verdict is found: a venire facias de novo, upon a special verdict. But the most material difference between them is this, that a venire facias de novo must be granted upon matter appearing upon the record; while a new trial may be granted upon things out of it, if the record be never so right.

But a venire de novo is not awarded for every defect appearing upon the face of the record, but for a defective finding in the verdict only. 7 T. R. 52; 2 Wils. 144; 4 B. & C. 69.

A venire de novo is granted, 1st. If it appears upon the face of the record that the verdict is so imperfect that no judgment can be given upon it. 2d. Where it appears that the jury ought to have found facts differently from what they do. See 1 Wils. 55; and tit. Trial.

The following seem to be cases in which a venire de novo is grantable. 1st. Where the jury are improperly chosen, or there is any irregularity in returning them. So where a person not summoned on the jury was sworn at nisi prius in the name of a person for whom a summons to serve on that jury was delivered, and to whose house he had succeeded; the irregularity being noticed before verdict, the Court of C. P. awarded a venire de novo. 6 Taunt. 460. 2dly. Where they have improperly conducted themselves. 3dly. Where they give general damages, upon a declaration consisting of several counts; and it afterwards appears that one or more of them is defective. 4thly. Where the verdict, whether general or special, is imperfect, by reason of some ambiguity or uncertainty; or by finding less than the whole matter put in issue; or by not assessing damages. Tidd's Pr.; and the authorities there cited.

Where a verdict can be amended, a venire de novo is never awarded. See further Trial, III.; Verdict.

A venire de novo may be granted by a court of error, but see 1 Arch. Pr. by Chitty, 336, contra; or after a demurrer to evidence, 5 T. R. 367; or bill of exceptions, 2 T. R. 125; Tidd's Pr.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 50. § 16. if a plaintiff after suing out a venire should not go to trial, he may afterwards sue out a venire de novo, and try at any subsequent assizes; and where the plaintiff does not proceed on the venire first sued out, the defendant may also sue out a venire de novo if he wishes to proceed to trial by proviso.

VENITARE. The Book of Ecclesiasticus; so called because of the venite exultemus Domino, jubilate Deo, &c. written in the hymn-book or psalter as it is appointed to be sung, &c. It often occurs in the history of our English synods; and is called venitarium. Mon. Ang. iii. 432.

VENTER, Lat.] Literally the belly; it is used in law to distinguish the issue, where a man hath children by several wives; (said to be by a first or second venter.) How they shall take in descents of lands, see Descent.

VENTRE INSPICIENDO. A writ to search a woman who saith she is with child, and thereby withholdeth lands from the next heir. The trial whereof is by a jury of women. Reg. Orig. 227.

Where a widow is suspected to feign herself with child, in order to produce a supposititious heir to the estate, the heir presumptive may have this writ to examine whether she be with child or not; and if she be, to keep her under proper restraint till delivered. But if the widow be, upon examination, found not pregnant, the presumptive heir shall be admitted to the inheritance, though liable to lose it again on the birth of a child within forty weeks from the death of a husband. 1 Comm. c. 16. See Bustard.

See further on the writ de ventre inspiciendo, Aiscough's Case, Mosel. 391; and 2 P. Wms. 591, S. C.; in which King, C., on petition, granted the writ, though the persons applying were only tenants in tail. And this writ is now granted, not only to an heir at law, but to a devisee, whether for life, or in tail, or in fee; and whether his interest is immediate or contingent. Ex parte Bateman, at the Rolls, 16th Dec. 1784; ex parte Bellett, at the Rolls, 20th Dec. 1786; ex parte Browne, in Chancery, Trin. T. 1792. See 4 Bro. C. R. 90. In Moseley's report of Aiscough's case, a case of personal estate is cited, in which the then master of the rolls, in conformity to the reason of the common law, directed that the master should appoint two matrons to inspect a woman. See 1 Inst. 8, b. note 3; where the necessity of an act of parliament to regulate the proceedings on the writ is suggested.

Thomas de Aldham of Surrey, brother of Adam de Aldham, anno 4 Hen. 3. claimed his brother's estate. But Joan, widow of the said Adam, pleaded she was with child; whereupon the said Thomas obtained the writ ventre inspiciendo, directed to the sheriff. Quod assumptis tecum discretis et legalibus militibus et discretis et legalibus mulieribus de comitatu tuo, in propria persona accedat ad ipsam Joannam, et ipsam a prædictis mulieribus coram præfatis militibus videri facias et diligenter tractari per ubera et ventrem, et inquisitionem factam certificari, facias sub sigillo tuo et sigillo duorum militum, justiciarum nostris apud Westm. &c. In Easter term, 39 Eliz. this writ was sued out of the Chancery into C. B. at the prosecution of Percival Willoughby, who had married the eldest of the five daughters of Sir Francis Willoughby, who died without any son, but left a wife named Dorothy, that at the time of his death pretended herself to be with child by Sir Francis; which, if it were a son, all the five sisters would thereby lose the inheritance descended unto them; which writ was directed to the sheriffs of London, and they were commanded to cause the said Dorothy to be viewed by twelve knights, and searched by twelve women, in the presence of the twelve knights, et ad tractandum per ubera et ad ventrem inspiciendum, whether she were with child, and to certify the same to the Court of Common Pleas; and if she were with child, to certify for how long in their judgments, et quando sit paritura; upon which the sheriffs accordingly caused her to be searched, and returned that she was twenty weeks gone with child, and that within twenty weeks more fuit paritura. Thereupon another writ issued out of C. B. requiring the sheriffs safely to keep her in such a house, and that the doors should be well guarded; and that every day they should cause her to be viewed by some of the women named in the writ; and when she should be delivered, that some of them should be with her to view her birth, whether it be male or female, to the intent that there should be no falsity. And upon this writ the sheriffs returned, that they had caused her accordingly to be kept and viewed, and that such a day she was delivered of a daughter. Cro. Eliz. 566.

The sheriffs of London, with a jury of women, whereof two were midwives, came to the lady's house, and into her chamber, and sent to her the women, sworn by the sheriffs before, to search, try, and speak the truth whether she was with child or not. The men all went out, and the women searched the lady, and gave their verdict that she was with child; whereupon the sheriffs returned the writ accordingly. Moore, 523, pl. 692.

In the 22d year of King James I., the widow of one Duncomb married within a week after the death of her first husband; and his cousin and heir brought the writ ventre inspiciendo directed to the sheriff of L. who returned that he had caused her to be searched by such matrons, who found her with child, et quod paritura fuit within such a time; and thereon it was prayed, that the sheriff might take her into his custody, and keep her till she was delivered; but because she ought to live with her husband, they would not take her from him; but he was ordered to enter into a recognizance not to remove her from his dwelling house, and a writ was awarded to the sheriff to cause her to be inspected every day by two of the women which he had returned had searched her, and that three of them should be present at her delivery, &c. Cro. Jac. 685.

VENUE,

VICINETUM, or VISNETUM.] A neighbouring place, locus quem vicini habitant: the place from whence a jury are to come for trial of causes. F. N. B. 115.

The want of a venue is only curable by such a plea as admits the fact, for the trial whereof it was required to lay a venue. 3 Salk. 381.

- II. Of Local and Transitory Actions.

- V. Of altering the place of Trial of Actions.

I. THE nature of the trial by jury, while conducted in the form which first belonged to the institution, was such as to render particularity of place absolutely essential in all cases which a jury was to decide. Consisting as the jurors formerly did of witnesses, or persons in some measure cognizant of their own knowledge of the matter in dispute, (see Stephen on Plead. 134, 3d edit.) they were of course, in general, to be summoned from the particular place or neighbourhood where the fact happened; see Co. Lit. by Harg. 125 a, n (1); Gibb. Hist. C. P. 84; and in order to know into what county the venire facias for summoning them should issue, and to enable the sheriff to execute that writ, it was necessary that the issue, and therefore the pleadings out of which it arose, should show particularly what that place or neighbourhood was. 2 H. Bl. 161; Comp. 176; Co. Lit. 125 a, b. Such place or neighbourhood was called the venue or visne (from vicinetum), Bac. Abr. Visne or Venue (A.), and the statement of it in the pleadings obtained the same name; to allege the place being, in the language of pleading, to lay the venue.

Until the change of system introduced by the late rule of court, Hl. T. 4 Wm. 4. it was accordingly the rule that every allegation in the pleadings, upon which issue could be taken, that is, every material and traversable allegation (supposing it to be in the affirmative form), should be laid with a venue; that is, should state the place at which the alleged fact happened. This venue was to consist (according to the more rigorous and ancient practice at least) not only of the county, but also of the parish, town, or hamlet in the county. Co. Lit. 125 a; Com. Dig. Abatement, (H. 13); Ibid. Pleading, (C. 20); Cro. Eliz. 260; 3 M. & S. 143; 5 B. & A. 712.

A venue was also laid in the margin of the declaration at its commencement, by inserting there the name of the county in which the several facts mentioned in the body of the declaration, or some principal part of them, occurred. See 4 B. & A. 175, 176; 7 Rep. 1; 2 T. R. 238. The venue so laid in the margin was called the venue in the action, and the action was said to be laid, or brought, within that county; because it was always the same county as that into which the original writ had issued at the commencement of the suit, and because the action was always tried by a jury of that county, unless a new and different venue happened to be laid in the subsequent pleadings.

Though the original object of thus laying a venue, was to determine the place from which the venire facias should direct the jurors to be summoned, in case the parties should put themselves upon the country, that practice had nevertheless, so far as regarded the laying of a venue in the body of the pleadings, become an unmeaning form, the venue in the margin having been long found sufficient for all practical purposes. It may be convenient to explain here by what process this change took place.

The most ancient practice, as established at the period when juries were composed of persons cognizant of their own knowledge of the fact in dispute, was of course to summon the jury from that venue which had been laid to the particular fact in issue; and from the venue of parish, town, or hamlet, as well as county. Co. Lit. 125 a; Bac. Ab. Visne or Venue. Thus in an action of debt on bond, if the declaration alleged the contract to have been made at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, and the defendant in his plea denied the bond, issue being joined on this plea, it would be tried by a jury from Westminster. Again, if he pleaded an affirmative matter, as for example, a release, he would lay this new traversable allegation with a venue, and if this venue happened to differ from that in the declaration, being laid, for example, at Oxford, in the county of Oxford, and issue were taken on the plea, such issue would be tried by a jury from Oxford, and not from Westminster. 1 Saund. 246 b; Com. Dig. Action, (N. 12); 3 Reeves, 110. And it may here be incidentally observed, that as the place or neighbourhood, in which the fact arose, and also the allegation of that place in the pleadings, was called the venue; so the same term was often applied to the jury summoned from thence. Thus it would be said in the case last supposed, that the venue was to come from Oxford.

With respect to the form of the venue at this period, it was as follows: venire facias duodecim liberos et legales homines de vicineto de W. (or O.) (i. e. the parish, town, or hamlet,) per quos rei veritas melius sciri poterit, &c. De vicineto tali (is the expression of Bracton) per quos rei veritas melius sciri poterit, &c. Bract. 309 b, 310 a, 376 b, 397 a. In the 27 Eliz. c. 6. § 1. the form is: 12 liberos et legales homines de vicineto de B. per quos rei veritas, &c. And see Litt. § 234.

While such appears to have been the most ancient state of practice, it soon sustained very considerable changes. When the jury began to be summoned no longer as witnesses, but as judges, and instead of being cognizant of the fact of their own knowledge, received the fact from the testimony of others judicially examined before them, the reason for summoning them from the immediate neighbourhood ceased to apply; and it was considered as sufficient if, by way of partial conformity with the original principle, a certain number of the jury came from the same hundred in which the place laid for venue was situate, though their companions should be of the county only, and neither of the venue nor even of the hundred. This change in the manner of executing the venire did not however, occasion any alteration in its form, which still directed the sheriff, as in former times, to summon the whole jury from the particular venue. 27 Eliz. c. 6. § 1; Litt. § 234. The number of hundredors which it was necessary to summon, was different at different periods; in later times, no more than two hundredors were required in a personal action. 27 Eliz. c. 6. § 5.

In this state of the law, was passed the 16 & 17 Car. 2. c. 8. By this act, (which is one of the statutes of jeofails,) it is provided "that after verdict, judgment shall not be stayed or reversed, for that there is no right venue; so as the cause were tried by a jury of the proper county or place where the action is laid." This provision was laid to apply to the case (among others) where issue had been taken on a fact laid with a different venue from that in the action; but where the venue had improperly directed a jury to be summoned from the venue in the action, instead of the venue laid to the fact in issue. 1 Saund. 247. This formerly had been a matter of error, and, therefore, ground for arresting or reversing the judgment; 1 Saund. 247, n. 1; 1 Saund. 248, n. 3; Cro. Eliz. 468; 6 Rep. 15 b; Co. Litt. by Harg. 125 a, n. (1); but by this act (passed with a view of removing what had become a merely formal objection), the error was cured, and the staying or reversal of the judgment disallowed. While such was its direct operation, it had a further effect, not contemplated perhaps by those who devised the enactment. For, what the statute only purported to cure as an error, it virtually established as regular and uniform practice; and issues taken on facts laid with a different venue from that in the action, were afterwards constantly tried, not by a jury of the venue laid to the fact in issue, but by a jury of the venue on the action. 2 Saund. 5, n. (3).

Another change was introduced by the 4 Ann. c. 16. § 6. This act provides, that "every venire facias for the trial of any issue shall be awarded of the body of the proper county where such issue is triable," instead of being (as in the ancient form) awarded from the particular venue of parish, town, or hamlet. From this time, therefore, the form of the venue has been changed; and directs the sheriff to summon twelve good and lawful men, &c. "from the body of the county;" and they are accordingly, in fact, all summoned from the body of the county only, and no part of them necessarily from the hundred in which the particular place laid for the venue is situate. And even in criminal proceedings it is now expressly enacted, that no jurors shall be required to be returned from any hundred or hundreds, or from any particular venue within the county; and that the want of hundredors shall be no cause of challenge. 5 Geo. 4. c. 50. § 13.

It thus appears, that by the joint effect of the two statutes, 16 & 17 Car. 2. c. 2. and 4 Ann. c. 16. the venue, instead of directing the jury to be summoned from that venue which had been laid to the fact of an issue, and from the venue of parish, town, or hamlet, as well as county, directed them in all cases to be summoned from the body of the county in which the action is laid, whether that be the county laid to the fact in issue or not, and without regard to the parish, town, or hamlet.

In this altered state of things it is evident that there was no longer any real utility in the practice of laying a venue to each traversable fact in the body of the pleadings. This practice however continued to be observed until the making of the Regula Generalis of the H. T. & Wm. 4. above mentioned. By that rule it is provided, that "in future the name of a county shall in all cases be stated in the margin of a declaration, and shall be taken to be the venue intended by the plaintiff, and no venue shall be stated in the body of the declaration or in any subsequent pleading." This rule was recommended by the common law commissioners. See their Second Report, p. 38.

On the whole then the rule of pleading as to the necessity of laying venue is now reduced to this, that the venue in the action, that is, the county in which the action is intended to be tried, and from the body of which the jurors are accordingly to be summoned, must be stated in the margin of the declaration; and that in the few cases in which the proceeding is still by original writ, this must be the same county into which the original writ issued.

There is however another very important point still remaining to be considered, viz. how far it is necessary to lay the venue truly.

Before the change in the constitution of juries above mentioned, the venue was of course always to be laid in the true place where the fact arose, for so the reason of the law of venue evidently required. But when, in consequence of that change, this reason ceased to operate, the law began to distinguish between cases in which the truth of the venue was material, or of the substance of the issue, and cases in which it was not so. A difference began now to be recognized between local and transitory matters. The former consisted of such facts as carried with them the idea of some certain place, comprising all matters relating to the realty, and hardly any others; the latter consisted of such facts as might be supposed to have happened any where, and therefore comprised debts, contracts, and generally all matters relating to the person or personal property. With respect to the former it was held, that if any local fact were laid in pleading at a certain place, and issue was taken on that fact, the place formed part of the substance of the issue, and must therefore be proved as laid, or the party would fail as for want of proof. But as to transitory facts the rule was, that they might be laid as having happened at one place, and might be proved on the trial to have occurred at another. Vin. Ab. Trial (M. f.); Co. Lit. 282 a.

The late rule of H. T. & Wm. 4. having abolished the allegation of venue, except as it regards the county in the margin of the declaration (or venue in the action), the present state of the law with respect to the necessity of laying the true venue, is accordingly as follows:—

Actions are either local or transitory. An action is local, if all the principal facts on which it is founded be local; and transitory, if any principal fact be of the transitory kind. In a local action the plaintiff must lay the venue in the action truly. In a transitory one, he may lay it in any county that he pleases.

From this state of the law it follows, first, that if an action be local, and the facts arose out of the realm, such action cannot be maintained in the English courts, 4 T. R. 503; for as the venue in the action is to be laid truly, there is no county which, consistently with that rule, can be laid in the margin of the declaration. But, on the other hand, if the action be transitory, then, though all the facts arose abroad, the action may be maintained in this country, because the venue in the action may be laid in any English county, at the option of the plaintiff.

The same state of law also leads to the following inference, that in a transitory action the plaintiff may have the action tried in any county that he pleases; for (as we have seen) he may lay the venue in the action in any county, and upon issue joined, the venue issues into the county where the venue in the action is laid. And such accordingly is the rule, subject only to a check interposed by another regulation, viz. that which relates to the changing of the venue.

The court established about the reign (as it is said) of James I., 2 Salk. 670; a practice by which defendants were enabled to protect themselves from any inconvenience they might apprehend from the venue being laid contrary to the fact, and enforce, if they pleased, a compliance with the stricter and more ancient system. By this practice, when the plaintiff by a transitory action lays a false venue, the defendant is entitled to move the court to have the venue changed, i. e. altered to the right place; and the court, upon affidavit that the cause of action arose wholly in the county to which it is proposed to change the venue, will in most cases grant the application and oblige the plaintiff to amend his declaration in this particular; unless he, on the other hand, will undertake to give at the trial some material evidence arising in the county where the venue was laid. (See post, II.) Stephen on Plead. 280—290, 3d edit.

II. Where the action could only have arisen in a particular county it is local, and the venue must be laid in that county; (or where several facts material to an action, in its nature local, arise in different counties, the venue must be laid in one or other of those counties;) for if it be laid elsewhere, the defendant may demur to the declaration; or the plaintiff, on the general issue, will be nonsuited at the trial. Where the action might have arisen in any county, it is transitory, and the plaintiff may in general lay the venue where he pleases; subject to its being changed by the court, if not laid in the very county where the action arose. Thus, in an action upon a lease for rent, &c. founded on the privity of estate, as in debt by the assignee or devisee of the lessor against the lessee; or by the lessor, or his personal representatives, against the assignee of the lessee; or against the executor of the lessee, in the debet and detinet; or in covenant, by the grantee of the reversion against the assignee of the lessee; the action is local, and the venue must be laid in the county where the estate lies. But in an action upon a lease for rent, &c. founded on the privity of contract; as in debt by the lessor against the lessee, or his executor, in the detinet only; or in covenant, by the lessor or grantee of the reversion against the lessee, the action is transitory, and the venue may be laid in any county, at the option of the plaintiff. Tidd's P. See Trial.

There are, however, some actions of a transitory nature, wherein the venue must be laid in the county where the facts which are the ground of the action were committed, and not elsewhere. Such are all actions upon penal statutes, 31 Eliz. c. 5. § 2; 21 Jac. 1. c. 4. § 2. For the general effect of these acts, as connected with each other, see 2 M. & S. 429; and that the 31 Eliz. extends to penal actions, given by subsequent statutes, 9 East, 296.

Actions upon the case, or trespass against justices of peace, mayors, or bailiffs of cities, or towns corporate, headboroughs, portreeves, constables, tithingmen, churchwardens, &c. or other persons acting in their aid and assistance, or by their command, for any thing done in their official capacity. 31 Jac. 1. c. 12. § 5. Actions against any person or persons, for any thing done by an officer or officers of the excise or customs, or others acting in his or their aid, in execution, or by reason of his or their office. See 20 Geo. 3. c. 70. § 34; 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 53. § 115; 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 53. § 107. In these actions, the venue must be laid in the county where the facts were committed, and not elsewhere.

So with respect to actions against persons in public employment, civil or military, in or out of the kingdom, having authority to commit to safe custody, if the fact be committed out of the kingdom the venue may be laid in Westminster or in the county where the defendant resides, 42 Geo. 3. c. 85. § 6.

Where by consent of both parties the venue was laid in London, it was held no objection could afterwards be taken, although it ought under an act of parliament to have been laid in Surrey. 1 Bing. N. C. 68.

On the other hand, the venue in a transitory action is, in some cases, altogether optional in the plaintiff; as where the action formerly arose in Wales, or where it arises beyond the sea, or is brought upon a bond or other specialty, promissory note, or bill of exchange; for scandalum magnatum, or a libel dispersed throughout the kingdom; against a carrier or lighterman; for an escape or false return; and, in short, wherever the cause of action is not wholly and necessarily confined to a single county. In these cases, the venue cannot be changed by the court, but upon a special ground. Tidd's Pr. and the authorities there cited. See post, III.

III. 1. The law having settled the distinction between local and transitory actions, it seems that, towards the reign of Richard II. this distinction was but little attended to; for a litigious plaintiff would frequently lay his action in a foreign county, at a great distance from where the cause of it arose, and by that means oblige the defendant to come with his witnesses into that county. To remedy which, it was ordained by 6 Rich. 2. c. 2. "To the intent that writs of debt and account, and all other such actions, be from henceforth taken in their counties, and directed to the sheriffs of the counties where the contracts of the same actions did arise; that if from henceforth, in pleas upon the same writs, it shall be declared, that the contract thereof was made in another county than is contained in the original writ, that then incontinently the same writ shall be utterly abated." The design of this statute was to compel the suing out of all writs arising upon contract, in the very county where the contract was made; agreeably to a law of Hen. 1. c. 81; Gillb. C. P. 89 n. But the statute only prescribes, that the count shall agree with the writ in the place where the contract was made, it did not effectually prevent the mischief: and therefore the 4 Hen. 4. c. 18. directed all attorneys to be sworn, that they will make no suit in a foreign county; and there is an old rule of court, which makes it highly penal for attorneys to transgress this statute. R. Mich. 1654.

Soon after the statute of Henry IV. a practice began of pleading, in abatement of the writ, the impropriety of its venue even before the plaintiff had declared. At first, in the reign of Henry V. they examined the plaintiff, upon oath, as to the truth of his venue. But soon after they began to allow the defendant to traverse the venue, and to try the traverse by the country. This practice being subject to much delay, the judges introduced the present method of changing the venue upon motion, on the equity of the above statutes; which, Lord Holt says, began in the time of James I. 2 Salk. 670. The forms of the rule and affidavit are also stated by Styles, as established in 23 Car. 1. Sty. P. R. 670. (ed. 1707.)

It is now settled that, in transitory actions, the venue may be changed upon motion, either by the plaintiff or defendant. The plaintiff shall not directly alter his venue after the first day of the next term after appearance; though he would pay costs or give time. Yet he may in effect do it, by moving to amend; and that after the defendant has changed the venue, or pleaded, and even after two terms have elapsed from the delivery of the declaration. Tidd's Pr.

2. The defendant is, in general, allowed to change the venue in all transitory actions arising in a county different from that where the plaintiff has laid it; and he may even change it from London to Middlesex, or vice versa. But in transitory actions, where material evidence arises in two counties, the venue may be laid in either. R. M. 10 Geo. 2. reg. 2. (c.) And if it be laid in a third county, the court will not change it; for the defendant in such case cannot make the necessary affidavit, that the cause of action arose in a particular county, and not elsewhere. 1 Wils. 178.

In order to change the venue, therefore, it is indispensably necessary that the cause of action should be wholly confined to a single county; and, therefore, where that is not the case, the court will not change it. Thus, in an action of debt on bond or other specialty, the court will not change the venue, unless some special ground be laid; for debitum et contractus sunt nullius loci; and bonds and other specialties are bona notabilia, wherever they happen to be. In analogy to which it is now holden, agreeably to the practice of the Court of Common Pleas, that the venue cannot be changed in an action upon a promissory note or bill of exchange, 1 T. R. 571; 1 B. & B. 20; 5 Taunt. 576; 1 Dowl. 426, except on special ground, see post; but the venue may still be changed in an action upon a policy of insurance, not being by deed; or in any other action, the right of which is founded upon simple contract. Tidd's Pr. See 7 Taunt. 306. that the Court of Common Pleas will not change the venue in an action upon any written instrument, the exception not being confined to promissory notes and bills of exchange.

In an action on a promissory note, and for goods sold and delivered, the defendant can not change the venue without disclosing his grounds of defence, nor until after issue joined. 3 Dowl. P. C. 66. And where part of the cause of action arises in a bill of exchange, the venue can not be changed on the common affidavit; in such a case it can only be changed on special grounds. 3 Dowl. P. C. 160.

In covenant upon a lease, a view being proper to be had, the venue was changed to the county where the premises lay, though most of the plaintiff's witnesses resided in the county where the venue was laid, 8 East, 268; but in another case the application was refused. 2 Chitty, 419.

In a recent case, however, the venue having been changed from London to Hereford, in an action of covenant on a lease for nonpayment of rent of premises in the latter place, the court refused to bring it back. 4 Tyrw. 56.

In an action of covenant on a farming lease the court refused to allow the venue to be changed on special grounds (the impossibility of a fair trial in the original county, &c.) until after issue joined, when the nature of the defence would appear. 4 Tyr. 275; 2 Dowl. P. C. 609. See also 3 B. & C. 552; 3 Tyr. 705. And the same was done in an indictment for misdemeanor. 2 Dowl. P. C. 440.

In an action for scandalum magnatum, the court will not change the venue; because a scandal raised of a peer of the realm is not confined to any particular county, but reflects on him through the whole of the land; and he is a person of so great notoriety, that there is no necessity for obliging him to try his cause in the neighbourhood; though this was denied in the case of Lord Sandrich v. Miller. So in an action for a libel, published in a newspaper in one county, and circulated in other counties, or contained in a letter written by the defendant in one county, and directed into another, the court will not change the venue; because the defendant cannot make the common affidavit, that the cause of action arose in a single county, and not elsewhere: and, for a similar reason, the venue cannot be changed in an action against a carrier or lighterman, or for an escape, or false return. Tidd. But in an action for a libel, the court will change the venue into a county in which it is both written and published. And the distinction seems to be, between a libel which is dispersed through several counties, and a letter which is written in one county, and opened in another; on the former the venue cannot be changed, on the latter it may. See 3 T. R. 306, 652.

In all the above cases however, the court will change the venue when special grounds are shown for the application.

Thus in an action for a libel published in a local newspaper, the venue was allowed to be changed on a special affidavit. 2 Dougl. P. C. 645.

Though the court in general will not change the venue, where it is laid in the proper county; yet they will change it even then upon a special ground. Thus, in debt on bond, where the venue was laid in London, and the plaintiff's and defendant's witnesses lived in Lincolnshire, the court changed it into the latter county. 1 T. R. 781; but see Id. 782; 1 Wils. 162.

Where a transitory action is brought in the county in which the cause of action arose, the court will never change the venue, unless a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county where it is already laid, 2 Str. 811; Comp. 510; 3 Burr. 1333; or unless the witnesses on both sides live at a great distance from the place where the venue is laid; or unless the expense of trying the cause in the county where the venue is laid greatly preponderates, 8 Bing. 733; 2 Dougl. P. C. 260; 2 C. & J. 473; or under other very special circumstances, 1 T. R. 782; 8 East, 268; 10 Bing. 1; or with the consent of parties, 1 Wils. 298; 2 Archb. Pr. by Chitty, 824.

On the other hand, though the court will in general change the venue, where it is not laid in the proper county, yet if an impartial or satisfactory trial cannot be had there, they will not change it; as in an action for words spoken of a justice of the peace, by a candidate, upon the hustings, at a county election. Comp. 510.

So, where the venue is not laid in the proper county, the privilege of the plaintiff will, in some cases, prevent the court from changing it. Thus, in an action brought by a barrister, attorney, or other officer of the court, if the venue be laid in Middlesex, the plaintiff, suing as a privileged person has a right to retain it there, on account of the supposed necessity of his attendance on the court. But if the venue be laid in any other county, as in London; or the plaintiff sue as a common person, by original or otherwise, or en autre droit, as executor, or administrator, or jointly with his wife or other persons, he has no such privilege. And where a barrister, attorney, or other officer of the court, is defendant, it seems that he has not any privilege respecting the venue. Tidd's Pr.; and see Privilege, I.

3. When the venue is changed upon the common affidavit it is always changed to the county in which the cause of action arose; when changed, because a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county where it is laid, it is usually changed to the next adjoining county; when changed for any other special cause, it is changed into such county as the circumstances of the case suggest. 2 Archb. by Chitty, 825.

When the cause of action arises in an English county, where the assizes are regularly holden twice a year, it is a matter of course to change the venue into that county. R. M. 1654. § 5. But where the cause of action arises out of the realm, the court will not change the venue, because the action may as well be tried in the county where the venue is laid, as in any other where the cause of action did not arise. And, in order to avoid delay, the court will not change the venue, except by consent, into a northern county, where there are no lent assizes, in Michaelmas or Hilary term; nor into Hull, Canterbury, &c. where the justices of nisi prius seldom come; nor into the city of Worcester or Gloucester, out of the county at large, because the assizes for the city and county at large are holden at the same place. Tidd's Pr.

4. In order to change the venue, the defendant must make a positive affidavit, that the plaintiff's cause of action (if any) arose in the county of A. and not in the county of B. (where the venue is laid,) or elsewhere out of the county of A. R. M. 10. Geo. 2. reg. (2). An affidavit was necessary, because, if the motion succeeded, it was equivalent to a plea in abatement, and the form of the affidavit is always most strictly adhered to. Tidd's Pr.

Where the cause of action arose partly in Derbyshire and partly in Ireland, the Court of King's Bench refused to change the venue from London to Derbyshire, on affidavit that the cause of action arose in Derbyshire and Ireland, and not in London, nor elsewhere than in Derbyshire and Ireland. 4 East, 495. and see 1 New Rep. 110. And the Court of Common Pleas refused to discharge a rule for changing the venue upon an affidavit that the cause of action arose principally in Ireland. 2 New Rep. 397.

The motion for the defendant to change the venue is a motion of course, and by the rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. § 103. is absolute in the first instance; and it must formerly have been made within eight days after the declaration delivered, which was the time allowed by the rules of the court for pleading. And accordingly it was said, that if a declaration were delivered so early in term, that the defendant had eight days in that term, he could not move to change the venue the next term. But it is now settled that the defendant may move to change the venue, at any time before plea pleaded. R. M. 1654. § 5. And he is even allowed to change it, after an order for time to plead, though upon the terms of pleading issuably; but not after an order for time to plead, where the terms are to plead issuably, and take short notice of trial, at the first or other sittings within term, in London or Middlesex, because a trial would by that means be lost. And the venue cannot be changed after plea pleaded, unless under special circumstances: even though the defendant afterwards have leave to withdraw his plea, and plead it de novo with a notice of set off. Tidd's Pr. But if the defendant plead, pending a rule nisi for changing the venue, the court will allow him to change it notwithstanding his plea. 3 Bos. & Pul. 12.

IV. As it would be hard to conclude the plaintiff by the single affidavit of the defendant, he is at liberty to aver that the cause of action arose in the county where the venue is laid, and to go to trial thereon at the same time that the merits are tried, by undertaking to give material evidence arising in that county. And, upon such undertaking, the court will discharge the rule for changing the venue (and this undertaking the Court of King's Bench required even where the venue had been changed by the defendant on a false affidavit. 6 East, 433.) This practice is equivalent to joining issue, before alluded to, that the cause of action arose in the first county: and if the plaintiff fail in proving it, he must be nonsuited at the trial; which has, in this case, the same effect as quashing the writ by a judgment on a plea in abatement, viz. quod act sine die, and the plaintiff must begin again. 2 Salk. 669. Originally it was required that the plaintiff should give no evidence at the trial but what arose in the county wherein the venue was retained; and if he gave no such evidence, he must have been nonsuited of course. But when it was laid down (more liberally) that the plaintiff might lay his venue in any county wherein part of the cause of action arose, he was then bound only to give some evidence, and not the whole, (dare aliquam evidentiā;) in the county where the venue was laid.

In uniformity with the former practice, it is declared by a rule of court, H. T. 2 Wm. 4. r. 103. that "the venue shall not be brought back, except upon an undertaking of the plaintiff to give material evidence in the county in which the venue was originally laid."

The evidence, however must be material; and therefore it is not sufficient merely to prove that the witnesses to the contract reside in the county where the venue is laid. Tidd's Pr. But where a rule to change the venue from Middlesex to London was discharged, on the plaintiff's undertaking to give material evidence in Middlesex, the court held, that the undertaking was complied with, by proving a rule of court, obtained by the defendant in Middlesex for paying money into court; although that rule was obtained, after the rule for changing the venue was discharged. 2 T. R. 275.

And further, as to what has been held to be sufficient, see 2 Archb. Pr. by Chitty, 825.

If the plaintiff fail in doing that which he has undertaken, namely, to give material evidence at the trial of some matter in issue, arising in the county where the venue is laid, he shall be nonsuited. 2 W. Bl. 1031. and see 2 T. R.

The court will, under very special circumstances, discharge the rule to change the venue without requiring the above undertaking from the plaintiff. See several instances enumerated, 2 Archb. Pr. by Chitty, 826.

It was formerly holden, that the plaintiff must move to discharge the rule for changing the venue, before replication; and therefore that he came too late after issue was joined, and delivered to the defendant's agent. But now, as the plaintiff may alter his venue, by moving to amend; so, for avoiding circuitry, he may move to discharge the rule for changing the venue, on undertaking to give material evidence in the county where it is laid, at any time before the cause is tried; and it was accordingly discharged in one case, after the cause had been twice taken down for trial. Comp. 409; Tidd's Pr.

V. By the 38 Geo. 3. c. 52, reciting, "that there exists in counties of cities and of towns corporate an exclusive right that all causes and offences arising within their particular limits should be tried by a jury of persons residing within the limits of such cities and towns, which privilege has been found not to be conducive to the ends of justice;" it is enacted that in actions in any court of record at Westminster, and in indictments removed into the King's Bench by certiorari, and on informations filed by the attorney general, or by leave of the Court of King's Bench, and on pleas or traverses to writs of mandamus, if the venue be laid in the county of any city or town corporate in England, the court may direct the issue to be tried by a jury of the county next adjoining. § 1. Indictments for offences committed within any such county of a city, &c. may be preferred to juries of next adjoining county. § 2. Indictments, inquisitions, &c. found by a grand jury of any county of a city, &c. may be ordered by the Court of Oyer, &c. (if requisite) to be filed in the next adjoining county, and offenders may be removed to the gaol thereof. § 3, 4, &c. But recognizance is to be given to pay extra costs. § 12. Yorkshire is to be considered as the next county to the town of Hull, and Northumberland next to Newcastle. § 9. London, Bristol, and Chester, are wholly excepted out of the act: Exeter is also excepted in criminal cases, except where the indictment is removed by certiorari into King's Bench, § 10. See Trial.

And in order to avoid unnecessary delay and expense, it is enacted, by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 22. that in any local action depending in the superior courts, the court, or any judge may, on the application of either party, order the issue to be tried, or writ of inquiry to be executed in any other county or place than that in which the venue is laid, and for that purpose may order a suggestion to be entered on the record, that the trial may be more conveniently had, or writ of inquiry executed in the county, &c. where the same is ordered to take place.

So, in local actions, where a fair and impartial trial cannot be had where the venue is laid, instead of moving to change the venue it is more usual to apply to the court, by motion supported by affidavit, to enter a suggestion upon the issue, which the court, on a proper case being made out, will grant, with a nient dedere and an award of the venue to the sheriff of the next adjoining county. 3 Burr, 1333; 1 T. R. 365; 3 B. & A. 444. And it seems immaterial whether the next adjoining county be a county palatine or not. 7 T. R. 735.

VERDEROR, viridarius, from the Fr. verdeur, i. e. custos nemoris.] An officer in the king's forest, whose office is properly to look to the vert, and see it well maintained; and he is sworn to keep the assizes of the forest, and view, receive, and inrol, the attachments, and presentments of trespasses of vert and venison, &c. Mann, par. 1. p. 332. See Forest.

VERDICT,

VEREDICTUM; QUASI DICTUM VERITATIS. The answer of a jury given to the court, concerning the matter of fact in any cause committed to their trial; wherein every one of the twelve jurors must agree, or it cannot be a verdict: and the jurors are to try the fact, and the judges to adjudge according to the law that ariseth upon it. 1 Inst. 226. See Jury, II. III.

A jurymen withdrawing from his fellows, or keeping them from giving their verdict, without giving good reason for it, shall be fined; but if he differ from them in judgment, he shall not. Dyer, 58. If one of the jury that found a verdict were outlawed at the time of the verdict, it is not good: and where a verdict is given by thirteen jurors, it is said to be a void verdict; because no attain would lie. 2 Lill. 644, 650. If there be eleven jurors agreed, and but one dissenting, the verdict shall not be taken, nor the refuser fined, &c. Though it is said, anciently, it was not necessary that all the twelve should agree in civil causes. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 297.

In capital cases, a verdict must be actually given; and if the jury do not all agree upon it, they may be carried in carts after the judges round the circuit, till they agree: and in such case they may give their verdict in another county. 1 Inst. 227, 281; 1 Vent. 97. If the jury acquit a person of an indictment of felony against evidence, the court, before the verdict is recorded, may order them to go out again and reconsider the matter; but this hath been thought hard, and of late years is not so frequently practised as formerly. 2 Hank. P. C. c. 47. § 11.

In case a jury acquits a man upon trial against full evidence, and being sent back to consider better of it, are peremptory in, and stand to their verdict, the court must take it, but may respite judgment upon the acquittal: and here the king might formerly have had an attain: and if the jury will, by verdict, convict a person against or without evidence, and against the opinion of the court; they may reprieve him before judgment, and certify for his pardon. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 310.

OF SPECIAL VERDICTS. On a general verdict, the jury were formerly liable to be attainted if they gave a false verdict. To relieve them from this difficulty, it was enacted by Westm. 2. (13 Edw. 1.) c. 30. § 2. "that the justices of assize should not compel the jurors to say precisely whether it were disseisin or not, so as they stated the truth of the fact, and prayed the aid of the justices; but if they would say of their own accord, that it was disseisin, their verdict should be admitted at their own own peril." Upon this statute, it has become the practice for the jury, when they have any doubt as to the matter of law, to find a special verdict, stating the facts, and referring the law arising thereon to the decision of the court. See further, Jury, III.

If a special verdict, in a criminal case, do not sufficiently ascertain the fact, a venire de novo ought to issue. Skin. 667; Ld. Raym. 1521; for a special verdict ought not to be amended in criminal cases, Ld. Raym. 141; unless there are unobjectionable minutes to amend it by, see Stra. 514, 1197; and in forgery, a special verdict has been amended where the fault was committed by the defendant. Stra. 844. If a special verdict find only part of the matter in issue, or do not take in the whole issue, or if the imperfection is such that judgment cannot be given, it is bad. Ld. Raym. 1522; Cra. Jac. 31. But if there be several issues, and the jury find only some of them, the court may give judgment. Stra. 845. For in a general verdict on several counts, if any one of them is good, it is sufficient in criminal cases. Salk. 384; Doug. 730.

It may be doubted, however, whether the language of the Westm. 2. does by any means import that special verdicts were previously unknown to the law. See 2 Inst. 425.

In all cases, and all actions, the jury may give a general or special verdict; and the court is bound to receive it, if pertinent to the point in issue; and if the jury doubt, they may refer themselves to the court, but are not bound so to do. 3 Salk. 378.

In finding special verdicts, where the points are single and not complicated, and no special conclusion, the counsel, if required, are to subscribe the points in question, and agree to amend omissions or mistakes in the mesne conveyance, according to the truth, to bring the point in question to judgment. And unnecessary finding of deeds in hæc verba, where the question rests not upon them, but are only derivation of title, ought to be spared; or they ought to be found shortly, according to the substance they bear in reference to the deed, as feoffment, lease, grant, &c. It is also a general rule, that, in a special verdict, the jury must find facts, and not merely the evidence of facts: and if in this, or any other particular, the verdict be defective, so that the court are not able to give judgment thereon, they will amend it, if possible, by the notes of counsel, or even by an affidavit of what was proved upon the trial; or, otherwise, they will supply the defect by awarding a venire de novo. Tidd's Pr. and the references there.

If, at the prayer of a plaintiff or defendant, a special verdict is ordered to be found, the party praying it is to prosecute the special verdict, that the matter in law may be determined; and if either party delay to join in drawing it up, and pay his part of the charges, or if the counsel for the defendant refuses to subscribe the special verdict, the party desiring it shall draw it up and enter it ex parte. Where the parties disagree, or the special verdict is drawn contrary to the notes agreed upon, the court on motion will rectify it; and the court may amend a special verdict, to bring the special matter into question. 2 Lil. Abr. 645, 646, 653.

The special verdict ought to be dictated by the court at the trial, and signed by counsel on both sides, before the jury is discharged. If in settling it any difference of opinion arise about a fact, the opinion of the jury is taken, and the fact is stated accordingly. 1 Burr. in Pref. IV.; 8 Taunt. 183.

But this in practice is seldom done, as the plaintiff's attorney generally gets it drawn afterwards from the minutes taken at the trial, and settled by his counsel, who signs the draft. It is then delivered over to the opposite attorney, who gets his counsel to peruse and sign it. If the counsel differ in the mode of settling it, the judge who tried the cause, being attended by the parties and their counsel upon summons, will settle it according to his notes. When the verdict is thus settled and signed, it is left with the clerk of nisi prius in a town cause, or with the associate in the country, who makes copies for each party. The whole proceedings are then entered, docketed, and filed of record; the cause entered with the clerk of the papers, (a rule for a concilium is no longer necessary. R. H. T. 4. Wm. 4. c. 6), copies of the record made and delivered to the judges, and counsel instructed and heard, in like manner as upon arguing a demurrer; only that a special verdict must be set down in the paper for argument within four days, and cannot be set down afterwards without leave of the court. After judgment given, the prevailing party is immediately entitled to tax his costs, and take out execution, without giving a four day rule for judgment; but the other party may have a rule to be present at taxing costs. Tidd's Pr.; and see Arch. Pr. by Chitty.

The cause will be called on for argument in the order in which it stands in the paper. The plaintiff's counsel then states the pleadings shortly, and the special verdict at length; and then argues the case. The defendant's counsel is next heard in answer; and lastly the plaintiff's counsel in reply. Only one counsel on each side is allowed to be heard. The court then deliver their judgment. If the judges coincide in opinion, they deliver their opinions in the order of their precedence: but if they differ, then in the inverse order, namely the junior puisne judge first, and the chief justice last.

OF SPECIAL CASES. A special case (see Jury, II.) has this advantage over a special verdict, that it is attended with much less expense, and obtains a much speedier decision; the postea being staid in the hands of the officer at nisi prius till the question is determined, and the verdict is then entered for the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may happen. But as nothing appears upon the record, except the general verdict, the parties are precluded hereby from the benefit of a writ of error, if dissatisfied with the judgment of the court or judge, in point of law; which makes it a thing to be wished, that a method could be devised of either lessening the expence of special verdicts, or else of entering the case at length upon the postea. 3 Comm. c. 23.

In a special case, as in a special verdict, the facts proved at the trial ought to be stated, and not merely the evidence of facts. It also ought to be dictated by the court, and signed by the counsel, before the jury are discharged; but in practice it is usually drawn afterwards, and settled in the same manner as a special verdict. For the argument of a special case, the same steps must be taken as for that of a special verdict, except that it is not entered of record. Tidd's Pr. When a special case is reserved, the verdict ought always to be for the plaintiff; and the rule of Nisi Prius ought to be of opinion for the defendant, then judgment of nonsuit should be entered; otherwise the defendant could have no remedy in case of the plaintiff's death. Barnes, 460. Selton's Pr.

In comparing special verdicts with special cases, it is a well known distinction that the latter form no part of the record, and therefore cannot be made the subject of review. Upon a special verdict, if the judges are equally divided, nothing can be done, but the matter remains in suspense: but if the verdict be taken for the plaintiff, subject to a case, and the court be equally divided, it seems that the judgment must be given according to the verdict; and this may sometimes operate materially to the disadvantage of defendants, as the statement of the case by no means necessarily imports an opinion of the court, on the trial, in favour of the plaintiff. Another distinction suggested to exist between special cases and special verdicts is, that in the latter every thing must be formally found, and nothing can be presumed (as the actual conversion in trover,) but that the same particularity is not absolutely requisite with respect to special cases, these being considered as rather in the nature of a reference to the court as to the direction which should properly have been given to the jury at the trial.

A practice has lately been introduced of reserving a special case, with liberty to turn it into a special verdict, which is a very convenient mode of proceeding, as it is attended with a saving of expense in the first instance, and allows the benefit of a further revision of the disputed question.

Or it may be done by consent of the parties, and frequently is done, upon the suggestion of the court, before or after the argument of the special case. Unless the judge expressly reserves the power of turning a special case into a special verdict, it cannot be done. 2 Dowl. P. C. 78; 1 C. & M. 714; Archb. by Chitty, 364.

It is lamented, by a late writer, that the facility of granting special cases, and the mode of stating them in Lord Mansfield's time under the dictation of the judge in court after the trial, (not only for the satisfaction of the parties, but to prevent other disputes by making the rules of law, and the grounds on which they are established, certain and notorious,) have been abandoned: and that in modern practice the reservation of a special case generally induces a cavil upon some verbal nicety, some bye point, or some collateral and incidental question, upon which a decision may be obtained of the particular case, independently of the general question which was the object of the case being reserved: and that this course has too frequently met with the encouragement of the courts, who have preferred resting upon the special grounds of some incidental finding to entering into the discussion of such general question. See Evans's Collection of Statutes, Pt. IV. Class xiii. nu. 2. in n.

Where the parties in an action are agreed upon the facts, it is no longer necessary to incur the expense of a trial, but a special case may be framed and argued under the provisions of the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 25. which enacts that the parties in any action or information after issue joined, by consent and order of any of the judges of the superior courts, may state the facts of the case in the form of a special case, for the opinion of the court, and may agree that a judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff or defendant by confession, and of nolle prosequi immediately after the decision, or otherwise as the court may think fit.

Where a point of law arises in the course of a suit in equity, the chancellor or other judge of the court of equity, may, if he wish to have the opinion of a court of law upon it, direct a special case to be made out and sent to a particular court of law, there to be argued, and returned with the opinion of such court certified upon it. This has always been the practice of the court of chancery; but until the case of Daintry v. Daintry, 6 T. R. 313, the courts of common law would not certify their opinion to the master of the rolls. See 1 Doug. 344, n.

After the case has been argued, the judges will sometimes state the grounds of the opinion they intend to certify, openly in court, and they afterwards certify their opinion to the court of equity, usually without stating the grounds of it.

If the judge in the court of equity be dissatisfied with their opinion, or if the point be of such importance that he may wish to have the opinion of another court upon it; he may direct it to be sent to the judges of another court of law. There is only one instance in which a case has been sent back to the same court. 10 Ves. 500; 3 T. R. 539; 4 Id. 570; Newl. Ch. Pr. 181.

A case cannot be sent by the committee of appeals of the privy council for the opinion of a court of law. See 1 Doug. 344, n; but by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 41 § 10. the judicial committee of the privy council appointed under that act, may direct feigned issues to be tried in the courts of law. See Privy Council.

GENERALLY OF VERDICTS. If the fact upon which the court was to judge be not found by the verdict, a new venire facias may be granted. 1 Rob. Abr. 693. A verdict being given where no issue is joined, there can be no judgment upon it; but a repleader is to be had. Mod. Ca. 4. And if a verdict be ambiguous, insufficient, repugnant, imperfect, or uncertain, judgment shall not pass upon it. 1 Saund. 154, 155. See Venire facias de Novo.

Verdicts must in all things directly answer the issue, or they will not be good; and if a verdict finds only part of the issue, it may be ill for the whole. 3 Salk. 374. But there is a difference between actions founded on a wrong, and on a contract; for where it is founded on a wrong, as on a trespass, or escape, &c. it is maintainable, if any part of it is found so in debt for rent, a less sum than demanded may be found by the verdict, because it may be apportioned: but where an action is founded on a contract, there it is entire, and otherwise. 2 Cro. 380. If several persons are indicted, or jointly charged in an information, a verdict may find some of the defendants guilty, and not others. And if the substance of an issue be found, or so much as will serve the plaintiff's turn, although not directly according to the issue, the verdict is good. 1 Lev. 142; Hob. 73; 1 Mod. 4. Where only two are found guilty of a riot, (which cannot be committed by less than three,) or only one found guilty of a conspiracy, (to which two at least are required,) they having in both cases been indicted with others, judgment shall be given against them, even though the others who were indicted do not come to trial. Stra. 193, 1227. So where six were indicted for a riot, and two died before trial, two were acquitted, and two only found guilty, judgment was given. For they must have been found guilty with one or both of those who had not been tried, or it could not have been a riot. Burr. 1262.

If the jury find the issue and more, it is good for the issue, and void for the residue: and where a jury find a point in issue, and a superfluous matter over and above, that shall not vitiate the verdict. 2 Lev. 253. Yet where a man brought an action of debt, and declared for 20*l.* and the jury, upon nil debet pleaded, found that the defendant owed 40*l.* this verdict was held ill; for the plaintiff cannot recover more than he demands; and in the above case he could not recover what he demanded, because the court could not sever their judgment from the verdict. 3 Salk. 376. See Debt.

A verdict found against a record, which is of a higher nature than any verdict, is not good: but where a verdict may be any ways construed to make it good, it shall be so taken, and not to make it void. 2 Lill. 644, 651. Upon a general issue, a verdict which is contrary to another record may be allowed; but not where the verdict found is against the same record upon which it is given. Dyer, 300. A verdict against the confession of the party is void: but it has been held that the verdict may be good in the disjunctive, though it be not formal; but if it find a thing merely out of the issue, it is not good. Jenk. Cent. 257; Hob. 53, 54. Where the jury begin with a direct verdict, and end with special matter, &c. that shall make the verdict: also if they begin with any special matter and after make a general conclusion upon it, contrary to law, the judges will judge of the verdict according to the special matter. Hob. 53.

No verdict will make that good, which is not so by law, of which the court is to judge; judgments to be given on verdicts that stand with law; and what both parties have agreed in the pleading, must be admitted so to be, though the jury find it otherwise, it being a rule in law. Hob. 112; 2 Cro. 678; 2 Mod. 4. See Jury.

At common law, where any thing is omitted in the declaration, though it be matter of substance, if it be such as, without proving it at the trial, the plaintiff could not have had a verdict, and there be a verdict for the plaintiff, such omission shall not arrest the judgment. This rule, however, is to be understood with some limitation; for, on looking into the cases, it appears to be, that where the plaintiff has stated his title, or ground of action, defectively, or inaccurately, (because, to entitle him to recover, all circumstances necessary, in form or substance, to complete the title so imperfectly stated, must be proved at the trial,) it is a fair presumption after a verdict, that they were proved: but that, where the plaintiff totally omits to state his title or cause of action, it need not be proved at the trial, and therefore there is no room for presumption. And hence it is a general rule, that a verdict will aid a title defectively set out, but not a defective title. Thus, where the grant of a reversion is stated, which cannot take effect without attornment, that being a necessary ceremony, may be presumed to have been proved. But where, in an action against the indorser of a bill of exchange, the plaintiff did not allege a demand on, and refusal by the acceptor, when the bill became due, or that the defendant had notice of the acceptor's refusal, this omission was held to be error, and not cured by the verdict: for, in this case, it was not requisite for the plaintiff to prove, either the demand on the acceptor, or the notice to the defendant, because they were neither laid in the declaration, nor were they circumstances necessary to any of the facts charged. Doug. 679. See Tidd's Pr.

Another rule at common law is, that surplusage will not vitiate after verdict; utile per inutile non vitiatur; and therefore, in trover, if the plaintiff declare that on the 3d of March he was possessed of goods, which came to the defendant's hands; and that afterwards, to wit, on the first of March, he converted them to his own use: this is cured after verdict; for that he afterwards converted them is sufficient, and the surplusage is void. Cro. Jac. 428. Tidd's Pr.

The statute of jeofails helps, in certain cases, after verdict; as it supposes the matter left out was given in evidence, and that the judge directed accordingly. 1 Mod. 292. See Amendment.

Where a verdict is found for the plaintiff, and he will not enter it, the defendant may compel him to do it, on motion; or the defendant may enter it himself. 2 Lill. After a verdict is returned into court, it cannot be altered; but if there be any misprision, it is to be suggested before: and a mistake of the clerk of the assizes appearing to the court, was ordered to be amended. Cro. Eliz. 112, 150. See Amendment.

The court of C. P. refused to set aside a verdict upon the affidavit of a jurymen that it was decided by lot. 1 New Rep. 326.

In a case where a general verdict was taken for the plaintiff, the court refused to entertain an application for entering the verdict on particular counts, according to the evidence on the judge's notes; after a lapse of eight years, and after the judgment had been reversed in error for a default in one count. 1 B. & A. 161.

As to the power of the court to direct the jury to find the facts according to the evidence in cases of variance, see Variance.

VERGE, or VIRGE, virgata.] The compass of the king's court which bounds the jurisdiction of the lord steward of the household; and that seems to have been twelve miles about. 13 R. 2. cap. 3; Britton, 68; F. N. B. 24. See Marshalsea, Palace.

There is also a verge of land; which is an uncertain quantity, directed by the custom of the country, from fifteen to thirty acres. See Yard-Land. 28 Edw. 1.

The word verge has also another signification, of a stick or rod, whereby one is admitted tenant to a copyhold estate. Old Nat. Br. 17. See Copyhold.

VERGERS, virgatores.] Are such as carry white wands before the judges. Fleta, lib. 2. cap. 38. Otherwise called Portatores Virgæ.

VERONICA. It is a piece of ancient superstition, that as our Saviour was led towards the cross, the likeness of his face was formed on his handkerchief in a miraculous manner: this handkerchief is pretended to be still preserved in St. Peter's church at Rome, and called veronica. Matt. Paris, anno 1216, p. 514; Brompt. 121.

VERT, Fr. Verd, i. e. Viridis, otherwise called Greenhue.] In the forest laws signifies every thing that beareth a green leaf within a forest, that may cover a deer; but especially great and thick coverts. Of vert there are divers kinds; some that bear fruit, which may serve for food, as chestnut trees, service trees, nut trees, crab trees, &c. And for the shelter of the game, some are called haut-boys, (high-wood,) serving both for food and browse; also for the defence of them, as oaks, beeches, &c.; and for shelter and defence, such as ashes, poplars, maples, alder, &c.; of sub-boys, (underwood,) some are for browse and for food of the game; of bushes and other vegetables, some are for food and shelter, as the hawthorn, black-thorn, &c. And some for hiding and shelter, such as brakes, gorse, heath, &c. But herbs and weeds, although they be green, our legal vert extendeth not to them. 4 Inst. 327.

Manwood divides vert into overt-vert and nether-vert: the overt-vert is that which the law-books term haut-boys; and nether-vert what they call sub-boys; and into special-vert, which is all trees growing within the forest that bear fruit to feed deer: called special, because the destroying of it is more grievously punished than of any other vert. Manw. par. 2, p. 33.

Vert is sometimes taken for that power which a man hath by the king's grant to cut green wood in the forest. See Forest.

VERVISE. A kind of cloth, mentioned in the (repealed) 1 Rich. 3. c. 8.

VERY LORD AND VERY TENANT, verus dominus, et verus tenens.] They that are immediate lord and tenant one to another. Broke. See Old Nat. Br.; and tit. Tenures.

VEST, vestire.] To invest with, to make possessor of, to place in possession. Plenum possessionem terræ vel prædii tradere, seisinam dare, infeodare. Spelman.

VESTA. The vest, the vesture, or crop on the ground. Hist. Croyl. contin. p. 454.

VESTED ESTATES. See Estate, Remainder.

VESTED LEGACIES. See Legacy.

VESTRY. See Churches, III. 1. A place or room adjoining to a church, where the vestments of the minister are kept.

It is also a meeting at such place: heretofore the bishop and priests sat together in vestries, to consult of the affairs of the church; in resemblance of which ancient custom the ministers, churchwardens, and chief men of most parishes, do at this day make a parish vestry: and in general a person is chosen in every parish to act as vestry clerk, whose duty is to attend at all parish meetings, to draw up and copy all orders and other acts of vestry, and to give out copies thereof when necessary; for which purpose he has the custody of all books and papers relating thereto. See 58 Geo. 3. c. 69. § 6.

His office is not a fixed and permanent one for which a mandamus will lie. 5 T. R. 714.

The Sunday before a vestry is to meet, public notice ought to be given either in the church after divine service is ended, or else at the church-door as the parishioners come out, both of the calling of the said meeting, and also of the time and place of the assembling of it; and it ought also to be declared for what business the said meeting is to be held, that no one may be surprised, but that all may have full time before to consider of the subject-matter of the meeting. It is also usual to toll one of the church-bells for half an hour preceding the time when the vestry is to assemble, in order to remind the parishioners of the appointed time. See 5 Mod. 68; La. 21; Heil. 61; Litt. 263; Poph. 137; 1 Mod. 194; 2 Vent. 167; Burn, Eccl. L. And see now the notice required by statute, post.

Vestries for church matters regularly are to be called by "the churchwardens with the consent of the minister." The 58 Geo. 3. c. 69. has not altered the general authority under which or the persons by whom vestries are to be called.

Every parishioner who is assessed to, and pays the church-rates, or scot and lot, is, of common right, entitled to be admitted into a general vestry, and to give his vote therein. Thus where Phillibrown, an inhabitant and parishioner, paying scot and lot in the parish of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate, in London, was excluded from the vestry-room of that parish by Ryland, the churchwarden, he brought his action for this injury, and, on a demurrer to the declaration, it was insisted that vestries are voluntary meetings only, and therefore the exclusion was neither an injury or damage to Phillibrown; but that, admitting the shutting of the door against him, and keeping him out was a damage, yet it was no more than a public damage, for which no action would lie. But, on the other side, it was contended that every inhabitant has a right to be present at such meetings, and give his vote, and the court made no difficulty but that such an action was maintainable; but they gave judgment for the defendant, because it was not stated in the declaration that the parishioners had a right to hold their vestry in this room; for that, in an action of this nature, the plaintiff must first show a right in the thing claimed, and then a disturbance in the enjoyment of it. 2 Lord Raym. 1388; 1 Stra. 624; 8 Mod. 52, 53.

So also, all out-dwellers, occupying land in the parish, have a right to vote in the vestry as well as the inhabitants. Burn, Eccl. L. And see 59 Geo. 3, c. 85.

The rector, vicar, or curate, also has a right to be admitted into the vestry, and to vote upon the question therein propounded, although not assessed to the church-rates.

And the minister has a right to preside over the meeting, whether he be rector or vicar, Shaw's Par. L. c. 17; and in sound legal principle he is the head and præses of the meeting. 3 Phill. Eccl. Ca. 87; 3 B. & Ald. 246, notis. And see the provision of the 58 Geo. 3, c. 69. § 2. post, for nominating a chairman in the absence of the rector, vicar, or perpetual curate, which seems to admit by implication the right of these parties, if present, to preside. See also 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 60. post.

When the parishioners, thus qualified, are assembled at the time and place appointed, those who are present include all those who are absent, and the votes of the major part of those present bind all the rest. Vent. 367; 2 Phill. Eccl. Ca. 350.

The vestry has the right to investigate and restrain the expenditure of the parish funds, to determine the expediency of enlarging or altering their churches or chapels, or of adding to or disposing of the "goods and ornaments" connected with those edifices. The election of some of the parish officers is either wholly or in part to be made by the vestry, and it has either directly or indirectly a superintending authority in all the weightier matters of the parish. Steele's Parish Law, 257.

The acts of one vestry are not absolutely binding on a succeeding vestry, and they may be confirmed or rescinded by such succeeding vestry, but the confirmation of the succeeding vestry is not necessary to make the acts of the preceding one valid. 2 Esp. 687.

The persons assembled at a vestry being all upon an equal footing, the power of adjourning it does not reside singly in the minister, or in any other person as chairman, nor in the churchwardens, but in the whole assembly; for inter pares non est potestas; and therefore the adjournment, as well as every other act of the vestry, must be decided by the majority of votes. 2 Stra. 1045.

To prevent disputes, it may be convenient that every vestry act be entered in the parish books of accounts, and that every man's hand consenting be set thereto. Burn, Eccl. L.

By the 58 Geo. 3, c. 69. (amended by 59 Geo. 3, c. 85.) for the regulation of parish vestries, three days' notice shall be given of the holding all vestries by publication in the church on a Sunday, and affixing a notice on the church-door. If the rector, vicar, or perpetual curate, is not present at the vestry, a chairman shall be elected by the persons present: in cases of equality of votes, the chairman shall have the casting vote, in addition to his vote as a vestryman: votes shall be proportioned to the amount of the poor's rate upon the parties voting, not exceeding six votes; the parties not having neglected or refused to pay the rates when called on. The minutes of the proceedings shall be entered in the parish-books, and signed by the chairman, and such vestry-men as choose so to do: and that such books shall be carefully kept, &c. Provision is made for vestries regulated by special acts, &c. By the 59 Geo. 3, c. 85. persons rated to the poor, though not inhabitants, and the clerks, &c. of corporations, are allowed to attend and vote.

By the 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 60. an act was passed "for the better Regulation of Vestries, and for the Appointment of Auditors of Accounts, in certain Parishes of England and Wales."

By § 2. any number of rate-payers amounting at least to one-fifth of the rate-payers of any parish, or any number of rate-payers amounting at least to fifty parishioners, may, between the first day of December and the first day of March, deliver a requisition to the churchwardens, requiring of them to ascertain, according to the manner therein-after mentioned, whether or not a majority of the rate-payers of the said parish wish that the act should be adopted therein.

§ 3. Upon receipt of requisition, the churchwardens are to give notice of time and place for receiving votes, which the ratepayers are to signify by printed or written declarations.

§ 5. Churchwardens are to declare whether the votes are in favour of adopting the act.

§ 6. Rate-payers may inspect votes.

§ 7. No person to vote unless he has been rated one year.

§ 8. Notice of adoption of the act is to be given in the London Gazette, &c.

§ 9. If the rate-payers determine against the adoption of the act no similar requisition is to be made within three years.

§ 11. Churchwardens and others refusing to call meetings, &c. according to the act, are guilty of a misdemeanor.

§ 12. And on some Sunday, at least twenty-one days previous to the annual election of vestrymen, notice of election, pursuant to the act, signed by the churchwardens, shall be affixed to the principal doors of every church and chapel of the said parish, and at other usual places, in the form therein given.

§ 13. Rate-collectors, &c. may be summoned to assist at the election.

§ 14. On the day of annual election for vestrymen and auditors in any parish adopting the act, each parishioner then rated, and having been rated to the relief of the poor one year, desirous of voting, shall meet at the place appointed for such election, to nominate eight rate-payers of the said parish as fit persons to be inspectors of votes, four of such eight to be nominated by the churchwardens, and the other four to be nominated by the meeting; and after such nomination the said parishioners shall elect such parishioners duly qualified as may be proposed for vestrymen and auditors; and the chairman shall declare the names of the parishioners elected by a majority of votes.

§ 15. Five rate-payers may demand a poll, to be taken by ballot, each rate-payer to have one vote for the vestry, and one vote for the auditors.

§ 19. Persons forging or falsifying any voting list, or obstructing the election, shall forfeit 50*l.*, &c.

§ 20. Public notice to be given of vestrymen and auditors chosen by parishioners.

§ 22. Election of vestrymen and auditors of accounts to be held annually in the month of May.

§ 23. In all parishes adopting the act the vestry as therein-before mentioned shall consist of twelve vestrymen for every parish in which the number of rated householders shall not exceed one thousand; twenty-four vestrymen, where they exceed one thousand; thirty-six vestrymen, where they exceed two thousand; and so on at the proportion of twelve additional vestrymen for every thousand rated householders: provided, that in no case the number shall exceed one hundred and twenty: provided always, that in any parish wherein a greater number of vestrymen are given by special act of parliament, the number shall remain the same as given by such act: and provided, that the rector, district rectors, vicar, perpetual curate, and churchwardens, of the said parish, shall constitute a part of the said vestry, and shall vote therein, in addition to the vestrymen elected under the act: provided always, that no more than one such rector or other such minister, from any one parish, shall ex officio be a part of or vote at any vestry meeting.

§ 24. One third of existing vestry to go out of office at each of three first elections under the act, and afterwards (§ 25.) vestrymen are to quit office after three years, and one third of the whole number to be elected annually.

§ 26. The vestry elected under this act in any parish not within the Metropolitan Police District, or the city of London, shall consist of resident householders rated to the poor upon a rental of not less than ten pounds; if the parish adopting the act should be within the Metropolitan Police District, or the city of London, or if the resident householders therein amount to more than three thousand, the vestry elected under the act shall consist of resident householders rated to the poor upon a rental of not less than forty pounds per annum.

§ 27. Vestries appointed after the adoption of the act to exercise the authority of former vestries. But the act is not to affect local acts regarding vestries, divine worship, &c. except as therein expressed.

§ 28. The acts of a quorum of the vestry at any meeting to be considered as the acts of the vestry.

§ 29. In any case in which the vestry room of any parish in any city or town shall not be sufficiently large for any vestry meeting, such meeting shall be held elsewhere within the said parish, but not in the church.

§ 30. At every meeting of any vestry, in the absence of the persons authorized by law or custom to take the chair, the members present shall elect a chairman before proceeding to other business.

§ 31. Proceedings of the vestry are to be entered in books to be open to inspection.

And § 32. account-books are to be kept, and be open to inspection.

§ 33. In every parish adopting the act the parishioners qualified to vote for vestrymen shall elect five rate-payers, who shall have signified in writing their assent to serve, to be auditors of accounts, which auditors shall be elected on the first day on which the vestrymen shall be chosen after such parish shall have adopted the act, and according to the same forms of voting as therein-before prescribed for the election of the vestry: provided, that no person shall be eligible to the office of auditor not qualified according to the act to fill the office of vestryman; and provided, that no person shall be eligible to fill the said office of auditor who shall be one of the vestry; provided also, that no person shall be eligible to fill the said office of auditor who shall be interested in any contract, office, business, or employ, or in providing or supplying any materials or articles for the parish for which he is to serve.

§ 34. specifies the mode of audit.

And by § 35. auditors may call for persons and books.

§ 36. Accounts to be signed by auditors.

And § 37. accounts after audit to be open for inspection.

And § 38. abstracts of accounts are to be published fourteen days after being audited, and copies delivered to rate-payers on the payment of a shilling.

§ 39. Vestry to make out and publish yearly a list of estates, charities, and bequests, &c. with the application thereof, which list shall also be open to inspection.

§ 43. The act is not to extend to parishes where there are not more than eight hundred rate-payers, except in cities or towns.

For a recent decision upon the qualification and manner of election of vestrymen under the above act, see 3 N. & M. 311.

SELECT VESTRIES. In large and populous parishes, especially in and about the metropolis, a custom has obtained of yearly choosing a select number of the chief and most respectable parishioners to represent and manage the concerns of the parish for that year; and this has been held to be a good and reasonable custom. 2 P. Wms. 8; Lutw. 1027; Burn, Eccl. L.

It seems also to have been held a good and reasonable custom to choose a certain number of parishioners as a select vestry: and that as often as any one of the members die, the rest shall choose one other fit and able parishioner of the same parish to fill up the vacancy of him so deceased; but this can only be supported upon the basis of prescription, and constant immemorial usage.

The custom, however, differing in different parishes as to the election, government, and proceedings of select vestries, it is enacted by the 10 Ann. c. 11. § 20. for building fifty new churches in or near London and Westminster, that the commissioners shall appoint a convenient number of sufficient inhabitants to be vestry-men; and from time to time, upon the death, removal, or other avoidance of any such vestry-man, the rest, or majority of them, may choose another.

In several local and personal acts, the legislature has described the persons of whom a select vestry shall respectively consist. Thus, in Spitalfields, by 2 Geo. 2. c. 10. the rector, churchwardens, overseers, and all other persons who have served or fined for those offices, shall, so long as they continue householders within the parish, and pay the poor-rate, be vestrymen of the said parish for the time being, and have the management of the affairs of the parish. So also, in the parish of Wapping, Stepney, by 2 Geo. 2. c. 30. the rector, churchwardens, overseers, and all other persons who shall pay two shillings a month, or more, towards the relief of the poor, and no other, shall be vestrymen of the said parish. So also in several more modern local acts for the relief and management of the poor.

By the 59 Geo. 3. c. 12. § 1. an act was made for the better regulation of the laws for the relief of the poor, under which the inhabitants of any parish in vestry assembled may appoint not more than twenty, or less than five, householders to be a select vestry; and the rector, vicar, or other minister of the parish, and in his absence the curate (such curate being resident and rated,) and the churchwardens and overseers, with the inhabitants elected as aforesaid (such inhabitants being first appointed by writing under the hand and seal of a justice of peace,) shall constitute a select vestry for the management of the poor, and any three (two of whom shall neither be churchwardens or overseers) shall be a quorum.

Magistrates are bound to appoint persons elected by the parishioners under the above act, and have no discretion to reject any elected. A magistrate acting within the parish may, if an inhabitant, be a select vestryman, and an overseer may be a member by election, though he be also a member by virtue of his office. 4 N. & M. 299.

Wherever a select vestry is appointed under this act, the right of the common law vestry has always in practice been considered as superseded. It is optional with the parishioners, whether they will or will not proceed upon the old law, or upon the statutes, by appointing a select vestry, but if they pursue the latter course, they delegate their authority to that body. See Steer's Par. Law, 267.

As to the persons by whom relief is now to be administered under the late act for the amendment of the poor laws, see Poor, VII. 6.

VESTURA, vestura. A crop of grass or corn: an allowance of some set portion of the products of the earth, as corn, grass, wood, &c. for part of the salary or wages to some officer, servant, or labourer, for their livery or vest. So foresters had a certain allowance of timber and underwood yearly out of the forest for their own use. Paroch. Antiq. p. 620. See Vesture.

VESTURE. A garment; metaphorically applied in law to a possession or seisin. Stat. Westm. 2. c. 5.

Vesture of an acre of land is the profit of it; "It shall be inquired how much the vesture of an acre of ground is worth, and how much the land," &c. 4 Edw. 1. § 14 Edw. 3. By grant of vestura terræ, the soil will pass; and the vesture being the profit of land, it is generally all one to have that, as the land itself. 1 Vent. 393; 2 Roll. Abr. 2. See Vestura.

VETITUM NAMUM. See Replevin, Withernam.

VIA SERVITUS, servitude of way. A right of road over another's ground, or rather the tenure (in Scotland) by which such right accrues against the possessor of land. This may be for a foot road, a horse road, or a carriage road, and must be established either by prescription or by grant followed by possession. Bell's Scotch Dict.

VIA REGIA. The highway or common road, called the king's way, because authorized by him, and under his protection: it is also denominated via militaris. Leg. Hen. 1. c. 80; Bract. lib. 4. See tit. Ways.

VICAR, vicarius, quasi vice fungens rectoris.] The priest of every parish is called rector, unless the predial tithes are appropriated, and then he is styled vicar, as acting vice, instead of, the rector; and when rectories are appropriated, vicars are to supply the rectors' places. See Parson, I.

Where the vicar is endowed, and comes in by institution and induction, he hath curam animarum actualiter; and is not to be removed at the pleasure of the rector, who in this case hath only curam animarum habitualiter; but where the vicar is not endowed, nor comes in by institution and induction, the rector hath curam animarum actualiter, and may remove the vicar. 1 Vent. 15; 3 Salk. 378.

Upon endowment, the vicar hath an equal, though not so great an interest in the church as a rector; the freehold of the church, church-yard, and glebe is in him; and as he hath the freehold of the glebe, he may prescribe to have all the tithes in the parish, except those of corn, &c. Many vicars have a good part of the great tithes; and some benefices, that were formerly severed by impropriation, have, by being united, had all the glebe and tithes given to the vicars: but tithes can no other way belong to the vicar than by gift, composition, or prescription; for all tithes de jure appertain to the parson; and yet generally vicars are endowed with glebe and tithes, especially small tithes, &c. If a vicar be endowed of small tithes by prescription, and afterwards land, which had been arable time out of mind, is altered, and there are growing small tithes thereon, the vicar shall have them; for his endowment goes to such tithes, in any place within the parish. Cro. Eliz. 467; Hob. 39. But where the vicar is endowed out of the parsonage, he shall not have tithes of the parson's glebe, or of land that was part thereof at the time of the endowment, but now severed from it: yet it seems to be otherwise, if the glebe lands are in the hands of the parson's lessee. Cro. Eliz. 479; Mallor. Q. Imped. 4. See further, tit. Tithes.

VICARAGE, vicaria.] Of places did originally belong to the parsonage or rectory, being derived out of it.

The rector of common right is patron of the vicarage; but it may be settled otherwise; for if he makes a lease of his parsonage, the patronage of the vicarage passes as incident to it. 2 Roll. Abr. 59. And if a vicarage become void, during the vacancy of the parsonage, the patron of the parsonage shall present to such vicarage. 19 Edw. 2, 41.

The parson, patron, and ordinary, may create a vicarage, and endow it; and in time of vacancy of the church, the patron and ordinary may do it: but the ordinary alone cannot create a vicarage, without the patron's assent. 17 Edw. 3, 51; Cro. Jac. 516.

Where there is a vicarage and parsonage, and both are vacant, and in one person's patronage; if he presents his clerk as parson, who is thereupon inducted, this shall unite the parsonage and vicarage again. 11 Hen. 6, 3.

Upon the appropriation of a church, and endowment of a vicar out of the same, the parsonage and vicarage are two distinct ecclesiastical benefices: and it hath been held, that where there is a parsonage and vicarage endowed, that the bishop in the vacation may dissolve the vicarage; but if the parsonage be impropriated, he cannot do it; for on a dissolution the cure must revert, which it cannot, into lay-hands. 2 Cro. 518; Palm. 219.

For the most part, vicarages were endowed upon appropriations; but sometimes vicarages have been endowed without any appropriation of the parsonage.

If the profits of the parsonage or vicarage fall into decay, that either of them by itself is not sufficient to maintain a parson and vicar, they ought again to be re-united: also, if the vicarage be not sufficient to maintain a vicar, the bishop may compel the rector to augment the vicarage. 2 Roll. Abr. 337; Pars. Counsell. 195, 196.

The provisions of the 29 Car. 2. c. 8. "for confirming and perpetuating Augmentations made by Ecclesiastical Persons to small Vicarages and Curacies," which have already been slightly noticed under Parson, I., have been greatly extended by the 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 45.

By § 1. the provision in the above act, by which the amount of any augmentation was limited to one moiety of the clear yearly value of the rectory impropriate out of which the same should be granted, is repealed.

By § 3. the above act is to extend to augmentations by colleges and hospital; and also (§ 4.) to extend to augmentations made by spiritual persons, colleges, and hospitals, out of any hereditaments, to any church or chapel being in their patronage.

By § 5. all such augmentations are to be in the form of annual rents.

By § 11. archbishops, bishops, deans, deans and chapters, &c. ecclesiastical corporations, colleges, &c. holding impropriate rectories or tithes, may annex the same to any church or chapel within the parish in which the rectory lies or the tithes arise.

And § 12. empowers the above persons by deed to annex lands, &c. held by them to any church or chapel under their patronage.

§ 16. Benefices exceeding in yearly value 300*l.* are not to be augmented, and no others to be raised above 350*l.*, or 300*l.*, not taking account of surplice fees.

§ 19. Provided that the incumbent of any benefice or living shall not exercise any of the powers aforesaid with respect to hereditaments to which he may be entitled in right of his benefice.

But (§ 20.) the incumbent may annex tithes, &c. to which he is entitled, arising out of the limits of his benefice, to the church or chapel of the parish where they arise.

§ 21. Empowers rectors or vicars to charge their rectories and vicarages with annual sums for the benefit of chapels of ease, &c.; but by § 22. the last provision is not to extend to new churches built under the 58 Geo. 3. c. 45.

By § 29. the act is to apply to all heads of colleges under whatever denomination.

Vicarage, or not, is to be tried in the spiritual court, because it could not begin to be created but by the ordinary. 3 Salk. 378. See further, tits. Appropriation, Parson; and 1 Comm. c. 11. n. 21.

VICARAGE TEINDS, are small teinds of lambs, wool, eggs, due to the vicar, who serves the cure. Scotch. Dict. See Tithes.

VICARIAL TITHES. Privy or small tithes. See Tithes.

VICARIO deliberando occasione ejusdam recognitionis, &c. An ancient writ for a spiritual person imprisoned, upon forfeiture of a recognizance, &c. mentioned in Reg. Orig. 147.

VICE-ADMIRAL. An under-admiral at sea; or admiral on the coasts, &c. See Admiral.

VICE-ADMIRALTY COURTS. By the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 51. his majesty was empowered to regulate the practice and the fees in the vice-admiralty courts abroad, and to obviate doubts as to their jurisdiction. See further, Admiralty.

VICE-CHAMBERLAIN. A great officer next under the lord chamberlain, who, in his absence, hath the rule and controul of all officers appertaining to that part of his majesty's household, which is called the chamber above stairs. 13 Rich. 2.

VICE-CONSTABLE OF ENGLAND. An officer whose office is set forth in Pat. 22 Edw. 4. See Constable.

VICE-CONSUL. The same as vicecomes, or sheriff. Leg. Ed. Conf. c. 12.

VICE-DOMINUS. The same with vicecomes. Leg. Hen. 1. c. 7; Selden's Tit. Hon. par. 2; Ingulphus.

VICE-DOMINUS EPISCOPI. The vicar-general, or commissary of a bishop. Blount.

VIC-GERENT. A deputy or lieutenant. 31 Hen. 8. c. 10.

VICE-MARSHAL. Is mentioned with vice-constable in Pryn's Animad. on 4 Inst. 71.

VICE-ROX, pro rex.] The king's lord-lieutenant over a kingdom, as Ireland.

VICE-TREASURER. See Under-Treasurer.

VICINAGE, Fr. voisinage, vicinetum.] Neighbourhood, or near dwelling. Magna Charta, c. 14. See Venue.

As to common by reason of vicinage, see Common.

VICIOUS INTROMISSION, is when any one meddles with the moveables of the deceased without confirmation (or probate) of his will, or other probable title. Scotch Dict.

VICIS ET VENELLIS MUNDANDIS. An ancient writ against a mayor or bailiff of a town, &c. for the clean keeping of their streets and lanes. Reg. Orig. 267.

VICOUNT, or VISCOUNT, vicecomes.] Signifies as much as sheriff. Between which two words, there seems to be no other difference, but that the one comes from the Normans, the other from our ancestors the Saxons; of which, see Sheriff.

Viscount also signifies a degree of nobility next to an earl, which Camden (Brittan. page 170,) says, is an old name of office, but a new one of dignity, never heard of amongst us, till Henry VI. who, in the eighteenth year in parliament, created John Lord Beaumont, Viscount Beaumont; but far more ancient in other countries. See Selden's Tit. Hon. 761; and Peers of the Realm, I.

VICONTIEL, or VICONTIEL, an adjective, from viscount, and signifieth any thing that belongeth to the sheriff; as, writs viscontiel are such writs as are triable in the county or sheriff's court; of which kind there are divers writs of nuisance, &c. mentioned by Fitzherbert. Old Nat. Brev. 109; F. N. B. 184.

Vicontiels are certain farms, for which the sheriff formerly paid a rent to the king, and he made what profit he could of them. Vicontiel-rents usually came under the title of firma comitatus; of these the sheriff had a particular roll given in to him, which he delivered back with his accounts. See 34 & 35 Hen. 8. c. 16; 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 4; 22 Car. 2. c. 6.

Now by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 99. § 12. these rents (among others) are to be considered parcel of the land-revenue of the crown, and are placed under the management of the Commissioners of the Woods and Forests.

By § 13. "after reciting that many of the said acts are very ancient and have become obsolete, and it is not known out of or from what hereditaments and premises the same are issuing or payable, so that payment thereof cannot be enforced," the treasury are empowered by warrant to release the same rents, and the arrears thereof. See further, Sheriff, V.

VICONTIEL JURISDICTION. That jurisdiction which belongs to the officers of a county; as to sheriffs, coroners, escheators, &c.

VICTUALS, victus.] Sustenance, things necessary to live by, as meat and provisions. Victuallers are those that sell victuals; and we call now all common alehouse-keepers by the name of victuallers.

Victuallers shall sell their victuals at reasonable prices, or forfeit double value: victuallers, fishmongers, poulterers, &c. coming with their victuals to London, shall be under the governance of the lord mayor and aldermen; and sell their victuals at prices appointed by justices, &c. See 23 Edw. 3. c. 6; 7 Rich. 2. c. 11. No person during the time that he is a mayor, or in office in any town, shall sell victuals, on pain of forfeiture, &c. But if a victualler be chosen mayor, whereby he is to keep the assize by statute, two discreet persons of the same place, who are not victuallers, are to be sworn to assize bread, wine, and victuals, during the time that he is in office; and then, after the price assessed by such persons, it shall be lawful for the mayor to sell victuals, &c. 3 Hen. 8. c. 8. If any one offend against these statutes, the party grieved may sue a writ directed to the justices of assize commanding them to send for the parties, and to do right; or an attachment may be had against the mayor, officer, &c. to appear in B. R. In some manors they choose yearly two surveyors of victuals, to see that no unwholesome victuals be sold, and destroy such as are corrupt. 1 Mod. 202.

These ancient acts seem now totally disregarded, though the provisions in some of them are not unworthy attention. See further, Food, Forestalling, Monopoly, Regrating, &c.

VIDAME. See Vasators, Vice-Dominus.

VIDELICET. See Scilicet.

VIDUITATIS PROFESSIO. The making a solemn profession to live a sole and chaste widow; which was heretofore a custom in England. Dugd. Warwicksh. 313, 654.

VI ET ARMIS, with force and arms. Words used in indictments, &c. to express the charge of a forcible and violent committing any crime or trespass.

Where the omission of Vi et armis, &c. is helped in indictments, see 4 & 5 Ann. c. 16; 7 Geo. 4. c. 64. § 20. and tit. Indictment, VI.

VIEW, Fr. Veue, i. e. Visus.] Originally, where a real action was brought, and the tenant did not know certainly what was in demand, he might pray that the jury might view it. Britton, c. 45; F. N. B. 178.

The view was for the jury to see the land or thing claimed, and in controversy: formerly, a view was not granted in personal actions; and by the 13 Edw. 1. c. 48. it was restrained in certain real actions.

In personal actions before the 4 & 5 Ann. c. 16. (which did not extend to criminal cases,) there could be no view, till after the cause had been brought on to trial; when if the court saw the question involved in any obscurity which might be cleared up by a view, the cause was put off, that the jurors might have a view before it came on again. 1 Burr. 253.

That statute as well as a subsequent one was repealed by the jury act, 6 Geo. 4. c. 50.

Now where in any case, either civil or criminal, it may appear to the court, or to a judge in vacation, to be proper and necessary that the jury should have a view of the premises in question previously to the trial, they have authority by the above statute (§ 23.) to order in the istringas or habeas corpora, that the sheriff shall have six or more of the jurors returned to try the cause, (who shall be consented to by the parties, or nominated by the sheriff in case the parties cannot agree,) at the place in question some convenient time before the trial; and that the place in question shall be then and there shewn to them by two persons to be named in the writ, and appointed by the court or judge. And the sheriff shall afterwards, by a special return upon the istringas or habeas corpora, certify that the view has been had according to the command of the said writ, and shall specify the names of the viewers. (Id.) The court or judge may also, if they think fit, require by the rule that the party applying for it shall deposit in the hands of the under-sheriff a certain sum of money for payment of the expenses of the view. (Id.) And by a rule of court made since this statute, (R. T. 7 Geo. 4. 5 B. & C. 795.) "upon every application for a view there shall be an affidavit stating the place at which the view is to be made, and the distance thereof from the office of the under-sheriff, that the sum to be deposited shall be 10*l.* in case of a common jury, and 16*l.* in case of a special jury, if such distance do not exceed five miles; and 15*l.* in case of a common jury, and 21*l.* in case of a special jury, if it be above five miles; and if such sum shall be more than sufficient to pay the expenses of the view, the surplus shall be forthwith returned to the attorney of the party who obtained the view; and if such sum shall not be sufficient to pay such expenses, the deficiency shall forthwith be paid by such attorney to the under-sheriff, and it is further ordered that the under-sheriff shall pay, and shall account for the money so deposited according to the scale set down in the rule."

The court will disallow the costs of a view, unless the names of the viewers are inserted in the writ of view, as directed by the 23rd section of the above act. 7 Bing. 403.

In actions of waste, of trespass quare clausum fregit, and nuisance, the motion for a view was always of course, and required only counsel's signature; but in other cases a special application must formerly have been made to the court in term time, or to a judge in vacation, for a rule nisi, or order upon an affidavit of the circumstances. Tidd, 797; Imp. B. R. 399. Now, however, by the rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. r. 63. "the rule for a view may in all cases be drawn up by the officer of the court, on the application of the party, without affidavit or motion for that purpose." And in all cases it is made part of the rule or order, that if no view be had, or if had by less than the number of jurors mentioned in the rule, &c. the trial shall nevertheless proceed without any objection being made on that account, or on account of any defect in the return of the distingus or habeas corpora, that no evidence shall be given on either side, at the time of taking the view, and, in ordinary cases, that the expenses of taking it shall be equally borne by both parties. Archb. Pr. by Chitty, 313.

If a rent or common is demanded, the land out of which it issues must be put in view. 1 Leon. 56. And if a view be denied where it ought to be granted, or granted where it ought not to be, &c. it is error. 2 Lev. 217.

Where, in action of waste, several places were assigned, and the jury had not the view of some of them, they might have found no waste done in that part which they did not view: in waste for wasting of wood, if the jury viewed the wood without entering into it, it was good: also waste being assigned in every room of an house, the view of an house, generally, was sufficient. 1 Leon. 259, 267.

For the ancient practice with regard to granting views in real actions, and in which actions it was demandable, see Roscoe on Real Actions, 247, and see 1 Burr. 252.

VIEW OF FRANK-PLEDGE. See Frank-Pledge.

VIGIL, vigilia.] The eve, or next day before any solemn feast; because then Christians were wont to watch, fast, and pray in their churches. 2 & 3 Edw. c. 19.

VI LAICA REMOVENDA. A writ that lies where two persons contend for a church, and one of them enters into it with a great number of laymen, and holds out the other vi et armis; then he that is holden out shall have this writ directed to the sheriff, that he remove the lay force: but the sheriff ought not to remove the incumbent out of the church, whether he is there by right or wrong, but only the force. F. N. B. 54; 3 Inst. 161; and see 15 Rich. 2. c. 2.

The writ Vi laicâ removendâ ought not to be granted until the bishop of the diocese where such church is hath certified into the chancery such resisting and force, &c. though it is said in the New Natura Brevium, it lieth upon a surmise made by the incumbent, or by him that is grieved, without any such certificate of the bishop. New Nat. Brev. 121.

The writ is made returnable in the king's bench, in which court the offenders shall be fined and punished for the force; and restitution also shall be awarded by the same court as it seemeth. Wats. c. 30.

A restitution was awarded to one who was put out of possession by the sheriff upon a vi laicâ removendâ. Cro. El. 466; 5 Mod. 443.

VILL, or VILLAGE, villa.] Is sometimes taken for a manor, and sometimes for a parish, or part of it: but a vill is most commonly the out-part of a parish, consisting of a few houses, as it were separate from it. Villa est ex pluribus mansionibus vicinata, et collata ex pluribus vicinis. 1 Inst. 115. Fleta mentions the difference between a mansion, a village, and a manor, viz. a mansion may be of one or more houses, but it must be but one dwelling-place, and none near it; for, if other houses are contiguous, it is a village; and a manor may consist of several villages, or one alone. Fleta, lib. 6. c. 51. According to Fortescue, the boundaries of villages are not by houses or streets; but by a circuit of ground, within which there may be hamlets, woods, and waste ground, &c. Fortesc. de LL. Ang. c. 24.

The word town, or vill, is now, by the alteration of times and language, become a general term, comprehending under it the several species of cities, boroughs, and common towns. 1 Comm. Introd. § 4.

When a place is named generally, in legal proceedings, it is intended to be a vill, because, as to civil purposes, the kingdom was first divided into vills; and it is never intended a parish, that being an ecclesiastical division of the kingdom to spiritual purposes, though in many cases the law takes notice of parishes as to civil purposes. 1 Mod. 250.

A vill and a parish by intendment shall be all one; and in process of appeal, a parish may be intended a vill. Cro. Jac. 623; 2 Salk. 380. If a venue be laid in Gray's Inn, which is no parish or vill, the defendant must plead there is no such vill as Gray's Inn, or it shall be intended a vill after verdict, &c. 3 Salk. 381.

If no vill, &c. is alleged, where a messuage and lands lie, no trial can be had concerning it: but some counties in the north of England, and in Wales, have no vills but parishes. Jenk. Cent. 33, 328.

Two houses in an extraparochial place are not enough to denominate a vill. 2 Str. 1304, 1071. See further Poor, I. 1.; City, Town.

VILLA REGIA. A title given to those country villages where the kings of England had a royal seat, and held the manor in their own demesne, having there commonly a free chapel, not subject to ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Paroch. Antiq. 53.

VILLAIN, VILLEIN, villanus, Fr. vilain, i. e. vilis.] A man of base or servile condition; a bondman or servant.

Of these bondmen or villains there were two sorts in England; one termed a villain in gross, who was immediately bound to the person of the lord, and his heirs; the other, a villain regardant to a manor, being bound to his lord as a member belonging and annexed to a manor, whereof the lord was owner. And he was properly a pure villain, of whom the lord took redemption to marry his daughter, and to make him free; and whom the lord might put out of his lands and tenements, goods and chattels, at his will, and chastise, but not maim him: for if he maimed his villain, he might have appeal of maihem against the lord; as he could bring appeal of the death of an ancestor against his lord, or appeal of rape done to his wife. Bract. lib. 1. c. 6; Old Nat. Br. 8; Termes de Ley.

Some were villains by title or prescription, that is to say, that all their blood had been villains regardant to the manor of the lord time out of mind: and some were made villains by their confession in a court of record, &c. Though the lord might make a manumission to his villain, and thereby enfranchise him: and if the villain brought any action against his lord, other than an appeal of maihem, &c. and the lord, without protestation, made answer to it; by this the villain was made free. Termes de Ley, 576.

Villain estate was contradistinguished to free estate, by the 8 Hen. 6. c. 11. The villains were such as dwelt in villages, and of that servile condition, that they were usually sold with the farm to which they respectively belonged; so that they were a kind of slaves, and used as such; villenage, or bondage, it is said, had beginning among the Hebrews. Termes de Ley, 455.

For the best account of the tenure of villani, see 2 Comm. 92—96. and see 1 Ellis's Domesday, 80.

VILLENAGE cometh of villain, and was a base tenure of lands or tenements, whereby the tenant was bound to do all such services as the lord commanded, or were fit for a villan to perform. See further, Tenures, III. 1; 13; Villanage.

VILLANIS REGIS SUBTRACTIS REDUCENDIS. A writ that lay for the bringing back of the king's bondmen, that had been carried away by others out of his manors, whereto they belonged. Reg. Orig. 87.

VILLANOUS JUDGMENT, villanum judicium.] Is that which casts the reproach of villany and shame upon him against whom it was given.

Formerly, where the conspiracy was to accuse another of a capital offence, the defendant was liable to receive what was called the villanous judgment, which was like the ancient judgment in attain, viz. that the offender should not be of any credit afterwards; nor should it be lawful for him to approach the king's court; and his land and goods should be seized into the king's hands, his trees rooted up, and body imprisoned, &c. Staudf. P. C. 157; Lamb. Erren. 63.

But this judgment was not inflicted for conspiracies of a less aggravated character, and it has long been obsolete, not having been pronounced since the reign of Edm. 3. though the punishment at this day appointed for perjury may partake of the name of villanous judgment, as it hath somewhat more in it than corporal or pecuniary pain, i. e. the discrediting the testimony of the offender for ever. 1 Hawk. c. 72. § 6. 4 Comm. c. 10. p. 186. See Infamous Crims.

VILLEIN FLEECES. Bad fleeces of wool, shorn from scabbed sheep. 31 Edw. 3. c. 8. (repealed.)

VILLENAGE, villenagium, from villan.] A servile kind of tenure belonging to land or tenements, whereby the tenant was bound to do all such services as the lord commanded, or were fit for a villain to do. Ubi sciri non poterit vespere quale servitium fieri debet mans. For every one that held in villenage was not a villain or bondman: villenagium vel servitium nihil detrahit libertatis, habita tamen distinctione utrum tales sunt villani et teneant in villano socagio de dominico domini Regis. Bract. l. 1. c. 6. num. 1.

The division of villenage was into villenage by blood, and villenage by tenure. Tenure in villenage could make no freeman villain, unless it were continued time out of mind, nor even free land make a villain free.

Bracton (l. 2. c. 8. num. 3.) divides it into purum villenagium & quo præstator servitium incertum & indeterminatum, ubi sciri non poterit vespere, quale servitium fieri debet mans, viz. ubi quis facere tenetur quicquid ei præceptum fuerit. The other he calls villanum socagium, and was tied to the performance of certain services agreed upon between the lord and tenant; and was to carry the lord's dung into his field, to plough his ground at certain days, to reap his corn, plash his hedges, &c.; as the inhabitants of Bickton were bound to do for those of Clunccastle in Shropshire, which was afterwards turned into a rent, now called Bickton Silver, and the service excused.

There were likewise villani sockmanni, which were those who held their land in socage; and there were villani adventitii, who were those who held land by performing certain services expressed in their deeds. Bract. l. 2. c. 8. See Tenures, III. 1; 2 Comm. c. 5.

The tenure of villenage was abolished by the 12 Car. 2. c. 24. at which time there was hardly a pure villain left in the nation.

VINAGIUM, tributum à vino.] A payment of a certain quantity of wine instead of rent, to the chief lord, for a vineyard. Mon. Ang. ii. 980.

VINCULO MATRIMONII, Divorce à. See Divorce.

VINERIAN PROFESSOR. See 1 Comm. 27.

VINEYARDS. The owners of vineyards may make wine of British grapes only growing there, free from any duty. 10 Geo. 2. c. 17.

VINET, or vignet, Fr.] A flower or border which printers use to ornament printed leaves of books; mentioned in 14 Car. 2. c. 33.

VIOLATION OF WOMEN AND GIRLS. See Rape.

VIOLENCE, violentia.] All violence is unlawful. If a man assault another with an intention of beating him only, and he dieth, it is felony. And where a person knocks another on the head who is breaking his hedges, &c. this will be murder, because it is a violent act, beyond the provocation. Kel. Rep. 64, 131. See Homicide, Riots.

VIOLENT PRESUMPTION. See Evidence.

VIOLENT PROFITS. Are the double value of a tenement within a burgh, and the highest rent for lands in the country; recoverable against a tenant for refusing to remove. Scotch Dict.

VIRGA. A rod, or white staff, such as sheriffs, bailiffs, &c. carry as a badge or ensign of their office. Covell.

VIRGATA TERRÆ. A yard land, ex 24 acris constat, quatuor virgatæ ludam faciunt, & quinque ludæ feodum militis. Kenet's Gloss.

VIRGE. Tenant by. A species of copyholders, i. e. such as are said to hold by the virge or rod. In fact, copyholders and customary tenants differ not so much in nature as in name; for, though called by different names, yet they all agree in substance and kind of tenure. Their lands are holden in one general kind, that is, by custom and continuance of time. See Calthorp on Copyholds, 51, 54; 2 Comm. c. 9. p. 148; and tit. Copyhold, Verge.

VIRIDARIO ELIGENDO. A writ for the choice of a verderer in the forest. Reg. Orig. 177.

VIRIDIS ROBA. A coat of many colours; for, in the old books, viridis is used for varius. Bract. l. 3.

VIRILIA. The privy members of a man; to cut off which was felony by the common law, though the party consented to it. Bract. l. 3. p. 144. See Maimem.

VIS, Lat.] Any kind of force, violence or disturbance, relating to a man's person, or his goods, right in lands, &c. See Assault, Force, &c.

VISCOUNT. See Vicount.

VISITATION, visitatio.] That office which is performed by the bishop of every diocese once every three years, or by the archdeacon once a year, by visiting the churches and their rectors throughout the whole diocese. Reform. Leg. Eccl. 124.

The chapels and donatives (unless such donative has received the augmentation of Queen Anne's bounty) are exempt from the visitation of the ordinary, the first being visitable only by commission from the king, and the second by commission from the donor; and there are also other churches and chapels exempted, which did belong to the monasteries; having heretofore obtained exemptions from ordinary visitations, and being visitable only by the pope; which by the statute of 25 Hen. 8. c. 31. were made visitable by the king, or by commission under the great seal. 4 Burn's Eccles. Law, 13.

When a visitation is made by the archbishop, all acts of the bishop are suspended by inhibition, &c. A commissary at his court of visitation cannot cite lay parishioners, unless it be churchwardens and sidesmen; and to those he may give his articles, and enquire by them. Noy, 123; 3 Salk. 370. Proxies and procurations are paid by the parsons whose churches are visited, &c. See those titles.

VISITATION BOOKS OF HERALDS. When admissible in evidence, see tit. Court of Chivalry.

VISITOR. An inspector of the government of a corporation, &c. The ordinary is visitor of spiritual corporations; but corporations instituted for private charity, if they are lay, are visitable by the founder, or whom he shall appoint; and from the sentence of such visitor there lies no appeal. By implication of law, the founder and his heirs are visitors of lay foundations, if no particular person is appointed by him to see that the charity is not perverted. 3 Salk. 381. See further Charities, Corporation, IV.; Mandamus.

VISITOR OF MANNERS. In ancient time, was wont to be the name of the regarder's office in the forest. Manwood, par. 1. p. 195.

VISNE, visnetum.] A neighbouring place, or place near at hand. See Venue.

VISUS. View, or inspection; as wood is to be taken per visum forestarii, &c. Hoved. 784.

VIVARY, vivarium.] A place by land or water, where living creatures are kept. In law, it is most commonly used for a park, warren, piscary, &c. 2 Inst. 100.

VIVA VOCE. Is where a witness is examined by voice, not by writing, personally in open court. See Evidence.

VOCIFERATIO. An outcry, or bue and cry. Leg. Hon. 1. c. 12. See Hue and Cry.

VOIDANCE, vacatio. The want of an incumbent upon an ecclesiastical benefice. See Avoidance.

VOID AND VOIDABLE. In the law, some things are absolutely void, and some are voidable.

Where a lease is absolutely void, acceptance of rent will not affirm it; it is otherwise when a lease is only voidable, there it will make it good. A lease for life, which is voidable only, must be made void by re-entry, &c. 3 Rep. 64. It is generally held that covenants made in a void lease or deed, are also void. Yelv. 18. Owen, 136. See Lease, III.

A deed of exchange, entered into by an infant, or one non sanæ memoriæ, is not void; but may be avoided by the infant when arrived at age, or by the heir of him who is non sanæ memoriæ. Perk. 281. But it hath been adjudged, that a bond of an infant, or of one non compos, is void, because the law hath not appointed any thing to be done to avoid such bonds; for the party cannot plead non est factum, as the cause of nullity does not appear upon the face of the deed. 2 Salk. 675. See Idiots, Infants.

Where the condition of a bond is void in part by statute, it may be void totally; though it is otherwise if void in part by the common law, for there it shall be good for the residue. Moor, 856; 1 Brownl. 64. A deed being voidable, is to be avoided by special pleading; and where an act of parliament says, that a deed, &c. shall be void, it is intended that it shall be by pleading, so as it is voidable, but not actually vacated. 5 Rep. 119.

A judgment given by persons who had no good commission to do it, is void, without writ of error, 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 50. § 3. But an erroneous attainder is not void, but voidable by writ of error, &c. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 29. § 40. See Attainder, Judgment.

VOIRE DIRE, Fr. veritatem dicere. Is when it is prayed upon a trial at law, that a witness may (previously to his giving evidence in a cause) be sworn to speak the truth, whether he shall get or lose by the matter in controversy; and if it appears that he is disinterested, his testimony is allowed, otherwise not. Blount.

On a voire dire, a witness may be examined by the court, if he be not a party interested in the cause, as well as the person for whom he is a witness; and this has been often done, where a busy evidence, not otherwise to be excepted against, is suspected of partiality. Terms de Ley, 581.

And a witness may be examined on the voire dire in criminal as well as civil causes. 10 Mod. 192.

The rule formerly was, that the objection of interest ought to be made on the voire dire, and was not to be allowed after the examination in chief. But for the convenience of the court, and because the incompetency may not be at first suspected, a greater latitude has been allowed: and now, if it is discovered during any part of the trial that a witness is interested, his evidence will be struck out. 7 T. R. 720; 2 Camp. 14.

Yet it seems that a party who is cognizant of the interest of the witness at the time he is called, is bound to make his objection in the first instance, according to the general principle, for otherwise he might obtain an unfair advantage, by having it in his power to establish or to destroy the evidence just as was more beneficial to himself. This appears to be a matter entirely within the discretion of the court. 1 Starkie on Ev. 124.

A witness may be examined on the voire dire as to the contents of a will or deed, or other written evidence under which he is supposed to acquire an interest in the subject matter of the trial, although the instrument be not produced. 1 Phil. on Ev. 132. Any objection arising from a witness's answer on the voire dire, may be likewise removed by his examination thereon. 15 East, 57.

If the witness discharge himself on the voire dire, the party who objects may still support his objection by evidence, 10 Mod. 192, although the old rule is said to have been different. See 1 Phil. on Ev. 132.

So in case of trial of infancy by inspection, the court may examine the infant himself upon the oath of voire dire, to make true answer to such questions as the court shall demand of him. See 3 Comm. c. 22, and tit. Infant.

VOLUMUS. The first word of a clause in the king's writs of protection and letters patent. See Protection.

VOLUNTARY. As applied to a deed, is where any conveyance is made without a consideration, either of money, or marriage, &c. Thus remainders limited in settlements, to a man's right heirs, &c. are deemed voluntary in equity, and the persons claiming under them are called volunteers. Abr. Cas. Eq. 385; 3 Salk. 174.

The term fraudulent, used in several statutes respecting conveyances to the injury of creditors, &c. and in the cases decided on the construction of those acts, is in general intended to denote merely an invalidity in certain conveyances or dispositions of estates, arising from the insufficiency of consideration for such conveyances, &c. or from other incidental circumstances, in consequence of which they are not allowed to operate in prejudice of other interests, which the statutes were particularly intended to protect: and not to express the immorality of intention which is understood in the more general and popular signification of the expression fraudulent. The kind of fraud which is the object of the statutes may therefore, in respect to the original disposition, be better expressed by the word voluntary, which, although not used in the statutes, is of general occurrence in the cases decided respecting their operation.

Of these acts the 13 Eliz. c. 5. is chiefly for the protection of creditors whose claims do not immediately regard the particular property, which is the subject of the disposition impeached as invalid, but who have a general right to obtain a satisfaction by means of such property, in respect of the personal obligations of the party making the disposition.

The 27 Eliz. c. 4. is for the protection of purchasers, whose rights have a direct and immediate relation to the specific subject, disposed of or affected by the previous disposition, impeached as deficient in legal validity: and the relief afforded by this statute is in some cases more extensive than that of the act in favour of creditors. See further, Fraud II.

An escape may be voluntary. See Escape. And as to voluntary oaths and voluntary waste, see those titles.

VOLUNTARY JURISDICTION. That jurisdiction which may be exercised in matters admitting of no opposition, and which may be exercised by any judge at any time and in any place. Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

VOLUNTARY REDEMPTION. Is when the Wadsetter (Mortgagee) receives his money, and renounces voluntary. Scotch Dict.

VOLUNTEERS. In the last war great numbers of persons were desirous, under the king's commission, voluntarily to unite themselves in armed companies and regiments for the defence of the kingdom; and various acts of parliament accordingly, from time to time, passed for enabling the king to accept their services, and giving to such volunteers certain exemptions from being called upon to serve in the regular militia of the kingdom. See 42 Geo. 3. c. 66; 44 Geo. 3. c. 54. In Ireland volunteers were generally called yeomanry. See 42 Geo. 2. c. 68.

Members of such volunteer corps are entitled to resign on due notifications of their intention so to do: unless they are expressly restrained from such liberty of resignation by the rules of the corps to which they belong, or by its condition of service. 4 East, 512.

VOTUM. A vow or promise, used by Fleta for nuptiæ; so des tatorum is the wedding-day. Fleta, l. 4.

VOUCHE, Fr. in Latin Voco. To call one to warrant lands, &c. See Recovery.

VOUCHEE. The person vouched in a writ of right. See Recovery.

VOUCHER. A word of art, when the tenant in a writ of right called another into the court, who was bound to him to warranty; and was either to defend the right against the demandant, or yield him other lands to the value, &c. And it extended to lands or tenements of freehold or inheritance, and not to any chattel real, personal, or mixed: he that vouched was called the voucher, and he that was vouched is the vouchee; and the process whereby the vouchee was called was a summones ad warrantandum; on which writ if the sheriff returned that the party had nothing whereby he might be summoned, then went out another writ called sequatur sub suo periculo, &c. Co. Lit. 101. See Recovery.

There was also a foreign voucher, when the tenant being impleaded within a particular jurisdiction, as in London, vouched one to warranty in some other county out of the jurisdiction of that court, and prayed that he might be summoned, &c. 2 Rep. 50. On a suit in England, a voucher did not lie in Ireland: but it did in Wales, and the tenant was summoned in the next county to it.

A vouchee, by entering into warranty, became tenant in law of the lands; and when the demandant counted against him, he might plead a release, &c. Jenk. Cent. 41, 100.

In a writ of entry in the degrees, none should vouch out of the line: and in writs of right and possession, it was a good counterplea, that neither the vouchee nor his ancestors had ever seisin of the land. 3 Edw. 1. c. 40. The demandant might aver a vouchee to be dead, and that there was no such person where the tenant vouched a person deceased, to warranty. 14 Edw. 3. st. 1. c. 18. See further, Recovery, Warranty.

VOUCHER. Is also used for a ledger book, or book of accounts, wherein are entered the acquittances or warrants for the accountant's discharge. 19 Car. 2. c. 1. Voucher signifies also any acquittance or receipt, discharging a person, or being evidence of payment.

VOX, vocem non habere.] A phrase made use of by Bracton, signifying an infamous person, one who is not to be admitted to be a witness. Bract. lib. 3.

VULGARIS PURGATIO, vulgar purgation.] The most ancient species of trial by ordeal, which was peculiarly distinguished by the appellation of judicium Dei, and sometimes vulgaris purgatio, to distinguish it from the canonical purgation, which was by the oath of the party. See further, Ordeal.

VULTUS DE LUCA. The image or portrait of our crucified Saviour kept at Lucca, in the church of the Holy Cross.

William I. called the Conqueror, often swore per sanctum vultum de Lucā. Eadmer. lib. 1; Malmsb. lib. 4.

W.

WAGER OF LAW.

WAGER OF LAW.

WADSET. Is a right whereby lands are impignorated or pledged for security of a certain sum. Scotch Dict. Similar to the English mortgage; see that title.

WADSET PROPER, is when the wadsetter (mortgagee) takes his hazard of the rents of the land for satisfaction of his annual rent, and pays himself all public burdens. Scotch Dict.

WADSET IMPROPER, is when the grantor of the wadset (the mortgagor) pays the public burdens, the wadsetter having his annual rents secured. Scotch Dict.

WADSETTER, is he to whom a wadset is granted (the mortgagee). Scotch Dict.

WAFORS, waftores.] Conductors of vessels at sea.

King Edward IV. constituted certain officers with naval power, whom he styled custodes, conductores, waftores, to guard our fishing vessels on the coasts of Norfolk and Suffolk. Pat. 22 Edm. 4.

WAGE, vadiare, from Fr. gaga.] The giving of security for performance of any thing; as to wage or gage deliverance, to wage law, &c. Co. Litt. 294. See Wager of Law.

WAGER OF BATTLE. See Battel.

By the 59 Geo. 3. c. 46, this mode of trial was abolished in writs of right: the same act abolished all appeals of murder, treason, felony, or other offences, and, consequently, the trial by battel in those cases; which was therefore thus completely put an end to, after much ingenious research and controversy on the subject. See Wager of Law.

WAGER OF LAW, vadiatio legis.] So called because the defendant put in sureties, vadios, that at such a day he would make his law, that is, take the benefit which the law allowed him. 3 Comm. c. 22; 1 Inst. 295.

This formerly took place where an action of debt was brought against a man upon a simple contract between the parties, without deed or record; and the defendant swore in court, in the presence of eleven compurgators, that he owed the plaintiff nothing, in manner and form as he had declared. The reason of this waging of law was, because the defendant might have paid the plaintiff his debt in private, or before witnesses who might be all dead, and therefore the law allowed him to wage his law in his discharge; and his oath should rather be accepted to discharge himself, than the law would suffer him to be charged upon the bare allegation of the plaintiff. 2 Inst. 45.

Wager of law was used in actions of debt without specialty; and also in action of detinue, for goods or chattels lent or left with the defendant, who might swear on a book, that he detained not the goods in manner as the plaintiff had declared; and his compurgators (who must in all cases, as it seems now, be eleven in number) swear that they believe his oath to be true. 3 Comm. c. 22.

The defendant could not wage his law in any action but personal actions, where the cause was secret; and wager of law has been denied on hearing the case, and the defendant been advised to plead to issue, &c. 2 Lil. 675, 676.

Executors and administrators, when charged for the debt of the deceased, were not admitted to wage their law; for no man could with a safe conscience wage law of another's man's contract; that is, swear that he never entered into it, or at least he privately discharged it. Finch, L. 424. The king also had his prerogative; for as all wager of law imported a reflection on the plaintiff for dishonesty, therefore there was no such wager on actions brought by him. Finch, L. 425. And this prerogative extended and was communicated to debtor and accomptant, for on a writ of quo minus in the exchequer for a debt on simple contract the defendant was not allowed to wage his law. 1 Inst. 295.

In an action of debt on a by-law, the defendant waged his law; a day being given on the roll for him to come and make his law, he was set at the right corner of the bar, and the secondary asked him if he was ready to wage his law, who answering that he was, he laid his hand on the book, and then the plaintiff was called; then the judges admonished him and his compurgators not to swear rashly; and thereupon he made oath that he did not owe the money modo et forma as the plaintiff had declared; and then his compurgators, who were standing behind him, were called, and each of them laying his right hand upon the book, made oath that they believed what the defendant had sworn was true. 2 Fent. 171; 2 Salk. 682.

The manner of waging law was thus:—he that was to do it brought his compurgators with him into court, and stood at the end of the bar towards the right hand of the chief justice; and the secondary asked him Whether he would wage his law? If he answered that he would, the judge admonished him to be well advised, and told him the danger of taking a false oath; and if he still persisted, the secondary said, and he that waged his law repeated after him: "Hear this, ye justices, that I, A. B., do not owe to C. D. the sum of, &c. nor any penny thereof, in manner and form as the said C. D. hath declared against me: so help me God." Though before he took the oath the plaintiff was called by the crier thrice; and if he did not appear he became nonsuited, and then the defendant went quit without taking his oath; and if he appeared, and the defendant swore that he owed the plaintiff nothing, and the compurgators gave it upon oath that they believed he swore true, the plaintiff was barred for ever; for when a person waged his law, it was as much as if a verdict passed against the plaintiff if the plaintiff did not appear to hear the defendant perform his law, so that he was nonsuit, he was not barred, but might have brought a new action. 1 Inst. 155; 2 Lil. Abr. 674.

The following ingenious deduction of the origin and explanation of the nature of wager of law is extracted from Kendal's Argument on Trial by Battle, and for Abolishing Appeals, a work in which so much research and acuteness are manifested, that it is to be lamented that the author did not bestow a little more pains upon it to avoid errors and omissions which seem the result of almost wilful carelessness.

To understand the matter thoroughly (says that writer) we must carry back our imagination to the time when European society consisted but of two great classes, that is, of freemen and slaves; when a third class was created by the subdivision of freemen into knights and simple freemen; when national and personal defence was the noblest, because it was the most important civil employment; when trade was limited and insignificant, and when the arts (including the art of husbandry, and excepting only the art of war,) were abandoned to the pursuit of slaves. All freemen under these circumstances were warriors; and freemen at this time, and indeed at all others, had a law of their own, their liberam legem. In matters of controversy they were to be believed on their oath; and this high privilege was supported by the magnanimous and concomitant provision, that they might always be called upon to prove or defend their honour by their lives by trial by battle.

It was under the same circumstances of society that the other ancient mode of trial called ordeals sprung up; modes of trial in which the accused was neither permitted to defend himself by his body, nor to discharge himself by his oath. In the rudest times there was a numerous portion of society, including women, priests, the young, the aged, the blind, the lame, and the whole population of slaves, who could not defend themselves by battle; who, therefore, had no claim to be believed on their oaths, and the greater part of whom were not allowed to offer them. Priests were excepted, because that was accorded to their sanctity which was yielded to freemen as due to their honour; and hence what the law calls canonical purgation, in contradistinction to the vulgar purgation, or trial of the common people by ordeal. See Purgation.

Serfs or slaves on either hand could have no trial by arms, nor by oath, because they had neither military, civil, nor religious character to justify such an indulgence.

Thus then there were three classes of trials: battle for freemen, oaths for priests, and ordeals for women, infirm persons, and slaves.

But by degrees, as the arts of peace increased in estimation, their professors rose in the scale of society, and were privileged for their encouragement; and on this occasion a new class of freemen was created; freemen, not by birth or landed tenure, but by charter,—freemen, not warlike, but composed of artisans and traders. Now these freemen had their free law; they were raised above the mode of trial belonging to slaves, because they were freemen; but they did not aspire to the honours of trial by battle, because they were not warriors. The privileges therefore granted to them were assimilated to those of the clergy, though they were still kept at a further distance even from these; they were men of peace, but not of sanctity; and therefore, while the priest was permitted to discharge himself by his single oath, the lay citizen was obliged to produce his neighbours, who were to swear that he was worthy of being believed on his oath.

This was wager of law; this is its foundation as a privilege of freemen of cities; and this privilege stood opposed to trial by battle on appeal at the suit of a subject, and trial by jury on indictment at the suit of the crown.

Blackstone seems to suppose that wager of law stood in opposition to wager of battle in all cases, as if battle were not law. But it is shown by the author from whom the foregoing quotation is made that the laws or modes of trial were many; that battle legem manifestam was one of them, and, as such, protected by Magna Charta as the legem terræ, distinguished from the trial per pares. Wager of law, says the same writer, was merely a popular name. Oath-law, legem sacramentum, was the true one, and this stood opposed to assise law or trial by jury, as much as to trial by battle.

The wager of law (says Blackstone) was never permitted but where the defendant bore a fair and irreproachable character; and it also was confined to such cases where a debt might be supposed to be discharged, or satisfaction made in private, without any witness to attest it; and many other prudential restrictions accompanied this indulgence. But at length it was considered that (even under all its restrictions) it threw too great a temptation in the way of indigent or profligate men, and therefore by degrees new remedies were devised, and new forms of actions were introduced, wherein no defendant is at liberty to wage his law. So that now (he adds) no plaintiff need at all apprehend any danger from the hardness of his debtor's conscience, unless he voluntarily chose to rely on his adversary's veracity by bringing an obsolete instead of a modern action. Therefore one shall hardly hear at present of an action of debt brought upon a simple contract, that being supplied by an action of trespass on the case for the breach of a promise or assumpsit, wherein, though the specific debt cannot be recovered, yet damages may, equivalent to the specific debt; and this being an action of trespass, no law can be waged therein. So, instead of an action of detinue to recover the very thing detained, an action of trespass on the case in trover and conversion is usually brought, wherein, though the horse or other specific chattel cannot be had, yet the defendant shall pay damages for the conversion equal to the value of the chattel; and for this trespass also no wager of law is allowed. In the room of actions of account a bill in equity is usually filed, wherein, though the defendant answers upon his oath, yet such oath is not conclusive to the plaintiff; but he may prove every article by other evidence, in contradiction to what the defendant has sworn. So that wager of law is quite out of use, being avoided by the mode of bringing the action; but still it is not out of force. And therefore, when a new statute inflicts a penalty, and gives an action of debt for recovering it, it is usual to add, "in which no wager of law shall be allowed;" otherwise an hardy delinquent might escape any penalty of the law, by swearing he had never incurred, or else had discharged it. See 3 Comm. c. 22, where many particulars as to this species of trial are detailed.

Wager of law, though obsolete in the time of Blackstone, was resorted to in a modern case. The court, on being applied to, refused to give any assistance to the defendant by assigning the number of compurgators with whom he should come to perfect his law. The defendant proposed to bring eleven, but the plaintiff abandoned his action. 2 B. & C. 538.

It was at length altogether abolished by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 13.

WAGERING POLICIES. See Insurance.

WAGERS. Although the law does not prohibit wagers in general, and if made on indifferent subjects they are valid, however trivial they may be, yet the courts have of late years discountenanced them, and expressed regret that they were ever sanctioned; and some judges have refused to try actions on wagers which, though not illegal, raised questions in which the parties have no interest, and are of a trifling or ridiculous nature. A judge may, undoubtedly, by virtue of his general superintending power, defer the trial of an action on a wager, which, being legal, is yet of an unimportant or contemptible character; but it would seem he cannot absolutely reject such a cause. See 7 Price, 540.

I. What Wagers are illegal.

II. In what cases money paid or deposited on account of Wagers may be recovered.

I. WAGERS are void if they are of such a nature that they might have an illegal tendency, although they are not accompanied by an illegal intention in the particular instance; as a wager between two voters respecting the event of an election. 1 T. R. 56.

By the 7 Ann. c. 16, all wagers laid upon a contingency relating to the then war with France, and all securities, &c. thereon, were declared to be void, and persons concerned were to forfeit double the sums laid.

A wager on the length of life of Buonaparte (then First Consul of France), arising out of the conversation as to the probability of his coming to a violent end, was held void on the grounds of immorality and impolicy. 16 East, 150.

Where two boxers fought for a wager of five guineas; on assumption for that sum brought by the winner, it was held that the action would not lie, the act being a breach of the peace. Webb v. Bishop, Glouces. Ass. 1731, Bul. Ni. Pri. 16. And an action will not lie on a wager whether an unmarried woman would have a child by a certain day, 4 Camp. 152; nor on a wager as to the sex of a third person, Comp. 729; nor on a wager on an abstract question of law, or judicial practice, not arising out of circumstances really existing, and in which the parties have an interest, 12 East, 247; 2 Camp. 408; nor on a wager as to the amount of any branch of the public revenue, 2 T. R. 610; 2 Bos. & Pull. 130; nor on a wager that plaintiff would not marry within six years, since this is in restraint of marriage, and void, 10 East, 22; nor on a wager on a cock-fight, 3 Camp. 140; or a dog-fight, 1 Ry. & Moo. 213.

No action will lie on a wager respecting the mode of playing an illegal game; and if such a cause be set down for trial, the judge at Nisi Prius is justified in ordering it to be struck out of the paper. 2 H. Bl. 43.

Neither will an action lie on a wager on a horse-race, if the sum betted by either party be above 10*l.*, 2 Str. 1159; 2 Wils. 309; 2 Black. 706; or if the horse-race is run for less than 50*l.*, though the sums betted be under 10*l.*, Johnson v. Bann, 4 T. R. 1; nor although the sum run for is above 50*l.* unless the race is a bond fide horse-race on the turf, Ximenes v. Jacques, 6 T. R. 499; Whaley v. Pajot, 2 Bos. & Pull. 51. But if neither of the sums betted on a horse-race amounts to 10*l.* and the race is run for 50*l.* or upwards, an action lies on the wager, 2 Camp. 438.

So an action will not lie for a wager, though for more than 50*l.* that the plaintiff could perform a certain journey with a post-chaise and pair of horses in a given time, 6 T. R. 499; nor a wager that a single horse should go from A. to B. on the high road, sooner than one of two other horses; these being transactions prohibited by the 16 Car. 1. c. 7. § 2. and 9 Ann. c. 14; and not legalized by the 13 Geo. 2. c. 19. or the 18 Geo. 2. c. 34, which statutes relate to bond fide horse-racing only. 2 B. & P. 51. See Horse-races.

It seems also that a wager between two proprietors of carriages for conveying passengers, that a given person shall go by one particular carriage, and no other, is illegal, as exposing the individual to inconvenience and importunity. 1 B. & Ald. 683.

In general a wager may be considered as legal if it be not an incitement to a breach of the peace, or to immorality; or if it do not affect the feelings or interest of a third person, or expose him to ridicule; or if it be not against sound policy. Comp. 729; 2 T. R. 610, 616; 3 T. R. 697; where the principal cases on this point are very fully considered. See also 5 T. R. 405; 7 T. R. 535; 8 T. R. 575; 2 Bos. & Pull. 130, 467.

An action will lie on a wager whether the defendant be older than the plaintiff, Hussey v. Crickett, 3 Camp. 168; and a wager as to the identity of a third person is not illegal, Bland v. Collett, 4 Camp. 157.

It is not material that the plaintiff knows at the time that he is right with respect to the matter in which the wager is laid. 4 Camp. 157.

II. In 7 T. R. 535, the Court of K. B. (on the ground that whenever money has been paid upon an illegal consideration, it may be recovered back by the party who has improperly paid it,) held that where the plaintiff had given the defendant 100*l.* to receive 300*l.* in case of a peace within a certain time, he might recover back his 100*l.* though after the event of the wager was decided, by which, if the wager had been legal, he would have won his 300*l.* And see 1 B. & A. 683.

With respect to stakeholders, if two persons deposit money with a third, subject to the event of a legal wager, no part of the amount deposited can be recovered from him except by the winner. 4 Camp. 37; Id. 157. Neither is it competent to either to rescind the agreement or wager.

But where the wager is on an illegal battle or race, after the parties have fought or run they may still recover back their deposits from a stakeholder, if they give notice to him before he has paid them over. 5 T. R. 405; 4 Taunt. 474; 7 Price, 549; 8 B. & C. 221. In strictness, the parties perhaps should not be allowed to rescind the contract and recover the deposits, unless they do so before the risk is altered by the lapse of time. See observation of Mansfield, C. J., 3 Taunt. 282; and note (a), 4 Taunt. 292.

But where money deposited on an illegal wager had been paid over to the winner by the consent of the loser, the court held that the latter could not afterwards maintain an action against the former to recover back his deposit. 8 T. R. 575. And although the wager be illegal, the stakeholder ceases to be liable if he pay the stakes to the winner without notice or dispute. But a stakeholder receiving country bank-notes as money, and paying them over wrongfully to the original depositor, after he had lost the wager, was held answerable to the winner as for money had and received. 13 East, 120.

A. and B. laid a wager on the event of a boxing-match, and deposited their stakes. The battle was fought, and a dispute arising, the matter was referred to an umpire, who decided against A. He however refused to abide by the decision, claimed the whole money deposited, and threatened the stakeholder (the defendant) with an action in case of refusal. The stakeholder paid the money to B. in accordance with the umpire's decision. The claim of A. was held valid as to the moiety deposited by himself, on the ground that he had a right to rescind the contract at any time before its actual completion by payment over, even after the event was decided; and that the stakeholder, having paid the money after notice, was liable to A. for his deposit. 2 B. & C. 221.

By the Scotch Act 1621. c. 14. (determined in 1774 not to be in desuetude) when a person wins more than 100 marks within twenty-four hours on cards, dice, or horse-racing, the surplus shall be given to the poor. A very excellent regulation, and fit to be applied throughout the kingdom.

WAGES. The reward agreed upon by a master to be paid to a servant, or any other person which he hires to do business for him. 2 Litt. Abr. 677. See Labourer, Servants.

WAIFS, from the Sax. wafian, Fr. chose gaaivée. Lat. bona waviata.] Goods which were stolen and waived (i. e. abandoned) by the felon, on his being pursued, for fear of being apprehended, which were formerly forfeited to the king, or lord of the manor, if he had the franchise of waif. Kitch. 81.

If a felon in pursuit waived the goods; or, having them in his custody, and thinking that pursuit was made, for his own ease and more speedy flight fled away and left the goods behind him; then the king's officer, or the bailiff of the lord of the manor within whose jurisdiction they were left, who had the franchise of waif, might have seized the goods to the king's or lord's use, and keep them, except the owner made fresh pursuit after the felon, and sued an appeal of robbery within a year and a day, or gave evidence against him whereby he was concluded, &c. In which cases the owner should have had restitution of his goods so stolen and waived. 21 Hen. 8. c. 11 (repealed); 5 Rep. 109; Finch. L. 212.

The law made a forfeiture of goods waived as a punishment to the owner of the goods for not bringing the felon to justice; but if the thief had not the goods in his possession when he fled, there was no forfeiture. If a felon stole goods and hid them, and afterwards fled, those goods were not forfeited; so where he left stolen goods any where with an intent to fetch them at another time, they were not waived; and in these cases the owner might have taken his goods where he found them, without fresh suit, &c. Cro. Eliz. 694; 5 Rep. 109; Moor. 785.

The goods of a foreign merchant, though stolen and thrown away in flight, were never waifs. Fitz. Abr. tit. Estray, l. 3; Bulst. 19. The reason assigned for this was not only for the encouragement of trade, but also because there was no wilful default in the foreign merchant's not pursuing the thief, he being generally a stranger to our laws, our usages, and our language. 1 Comm. c. 8. p. 297.

Waived goods also did not belong to the king till seized by somebody for his use; for if the party robbed could seize them first, though at the distance of twenty years, the king should never have had them. Finch. L. 212; 1 Comm. c. 8.

Though waif is generally spoken of goods stolen, yet if a man were pursued with hue and cry as a felon, and he fled and left his own goods, these would be forfeited as goods stolen; but they were properly fugitive's goods, and not forfeited till it were found before the coroner, or otherwise of record, that he fled for the felony. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 49. § 17.

Now by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 28. § 3. the jury are not to be charged concerning the goods of the person indicted, or whether he fled for treason or felony. See further, Forfeiture, II. 1.

Waifs and strays are said to be nullius in bonis, and therefore they belong to the lord of the franchise where found. Britton, c. 17. We read of placita coronæ et waif in the manor of Upton, &c. in com. Salop. See 22 Vin. Abr. 408—410; and ante, tit. Estray.

WAIN, plastrum.] A cart, waggon, or plough, to till land.

WAINABLE, i. e. that may be ploughed or manured; land tillable. Chart. Antiq.

TO WAIVE, waivare.] In the general signification is to forsake; but is specially applied to a woman, who, for any crime for which a man may be outlawed, is termed waived. Reg. Orig. 132. See Outlawry.

WAIVER. The passing by of a thing, or a declining or refusal to accept it. Sometimes it is applied to an estate, or something conveyed to a man, and sometimes to a plea; and it is frequently applied to the declining to take advantage of an irregularity in legal proceedings.

A waiver or disagreement as to goods and chattels, in case of a gift, will be effectual. Lit. § 710. If a jointure of lands be made to a woman after marriage, she may waive this after her husband's death. 3 Rep. 27. An infant, or if he die, his heirs, may by waiver avoid an estate made to him during his minority. 1 Inst. 23, 348. But where a particular estate is given with a remainder over, there regularly he that hath it may not waive it to the damage of him in remainder: though it is otherwise where one hath a reversion, for that shall not be hurt by such waiver. 4 Shep. Abr. 192. After special issue joined in any action the parties cannot waive it without motion in court. 1 Keb. 225. Assignment of error by attorney on an outlawry ordered to be waived, and the party to assign in person after demurrer for this cause. 2 Keb. 16.

The receipt of rent with a knowledge of a forfeiture committed by the lessee is a waiver of such forfeiture.

In case of the seduction of an apprentice the master may waive the tort, and maintain an action against the seducer for the work and labour and service of the apprentice. 3 M. & S. 191.

And so in many other cases a party may waive the tort and bring an action of assumpsit.

So costs are sometimes waived to obtain speedy execution. See Archb. by Chitty, 380, 4th ed.

WAKE. The eve-feast of the dedication of churches, which in many country places is observed with feasting and rural diversions, &c. Puroch. Antiq. 609.

WAKEMAN, quasi watchman.] The chief magistrate of the town of Ripon in Yorkshire is so called. Camd.

WAKENING. Is a summons narrating that the complainant has raised a summons which he had let sleep for year and day, concluding that all persons cited in the first should compare, hear, and see the aforesaid action called and wakened and debated till sentence be given. Scotch Dict.

WALES, Wallia.] Part of Great Britain on the west side of England; formerly divided into three provinces, North Wales, South Wales, and West Wales, and inhabited by the offsprings of the ancient Britons, chased thither by the Saxons called in to assist them against the Picts and Scots. Lamb. ; Stat. Wallie, 12 Edw. 1.

England and Wales were originally but one nation; and so they continued till the time of the Roman conquest; but when the Romans came, those Britons who would not submit to their yoke betook themselves to the mountains of Wales; from whence they came again soon after the Romans were driven away by their dissensions here. After this came the Saxons, and gave them another disturbance; and then the kingdom was divided into an heptarchy; and then also began the Welsh to be distinguished from the English. Yet it is observable, that though Wales had princes of their own, the king of England had superiority over them, for to him they paid homage. Camden; 2 Mod. 11. See further, 1 Comm. Introd. § 4.

The fact of the Welsh being the same race with the ancient Britons has, however, been doubted. See Moore's History of Ireland, vol. i. 90.

The 28 Edw. 3. st. 1. c. 2. annexed the marches of Wales perpetually to the crown of England, so as not to be of the principality of Wales. And by 27 Hen. 8. c. 26. Wales was incorporated into and united with England. All persons born in Wales are to enjoy the like liberties as those born in England, and lands to descend there according to the English laws. The laws of England were to be executed in Wales; and the king to have a chancery and exchequer at Brecknock and Denbigh. Officers of law and ministers should keep courts in the English tongue; and the Welsh laws and customs were to be inquired into by commission, and such of them as should be thought fit continued; but the laws and customs of North Wales were saved.

By 34 & 35 Hen. 8. c. 26. Wales was divided into twelve counties, and a president and council appointed to remain in Wales and the marches thereof, with officers, &c. Two justices were to be assigned to hold a session twice every year, and determine pleas of the crown and assizes, and all other actions; and justices appointed as in England, &c. By 18 Eliz. c. 8. the crown was empowered to appoint two persons, learned in the laws, to be judges in each of the Welsh circuits, which had but one justice before; or grant commissions of association, &c.

An office for enrolments was erected, and the fees and proceedings regulated in passing fines and recoveries in Wales, by 27 Eliz. c. 9.

By 1 W. & M. st. 1. c. 27. the court anciently holden before the president and council of the marches of Wales was abolished; and by 9 & 10 Wm. 3. c. 16. the courts at Westminster were empowered to award execution on existing judgments of the courts so abolished.

And by 8 Geo. 1. c. 25. § 6. the regulations of 29 Car. 2. c. 3. § 14. as to signing judgments, were extended to Wales. See Judgment.

By 4 Ann. c. 16. § 24. all the statutes of jeofails were extended to Wales. See Amendment.

Persons living in Wales may give and dispose of their goods and chattels by will, in like manner as may be done within any part of the province of Canterbury, or elsewhere. 7 & 8 Wm. 3. c. 38. See Wills.

By the 11 & 12 Wm. 3. c. 9. § 2. jurors returned on issues in Wales were to have 6l. a year of freehold or copyhold, above reprises. But now see Jury, 1.

By 20 Geo. 2. c. 42. § 3. in all cases where the kingdom of England, or that part of Great Britain called England, hath been or shall be mentioned in any act of parliament, the same has been and shall be taken to comprehend the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick.

By the 11 & 12 Wm. 3. c. 9. § 2. none were to be held to bail in Wales, unless affidavit be made that the cause of action is 20l. or upwards, raised by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 71. to 50l.; and in personal actions, where the damages are under 40s. the plaintiff should have no more costs than damages.

But these acts are virtually repealed by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 70. (see post). And now defendants in Wales may be arrested upon process issued out of the superior courts at Westminster, where the cause of action is 20l., in like manner as defendants in other counties.

By the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 70. "for the more effectual administration of justice in England and Wales," it is enacted, that (after 12th October, 1830,) the king's writ shall be directed and obeyed, and the jurisdiction of the Courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, and the judges of these courts, shall extend and be exercised over and within the several counties in Wales, in like manner, to the same extent, and for all intents and purposes, as such jurisdiction is exercised in England; and that all original writs to be issued into the several counties of Wales shall be issued by the cursitors for London and Middlesex; and the process and proceedings thereon shall be issued by and transacted with such officers of the several Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, as shall be named by the chief justice of each court.—§ 13. (This act extends, in like manner, to the county, and county of the city of Chester.)

All powers of the judges and courts of great sessions, both in law and equity, shall cease and determine; and all suits then depending in any of the said courts shall be transferred, if in equity, to the Courts of Chancery or Exchequer, and if in law, to the latter court.—§ 14.

Attornies, &c. of the court of great sessions are allowed to practise in the courts at Westminster in suits depending, without payment of any additional duty; and afterwards, on payment of such duty as, with the duty before paid by them, shall be equal to the duty paid in the superior courts.—§ 16, 7, 18.

Assizes shall be held for the trial and disposition of all matters, criminal and civil, within the several counties and towns in Wales, under commissions of assize and gaol delivery, and other writs and commissions to be issued in like manner as for the counties in England; and all laws relating to such commissions shall be extended to Wales. One judge of the two appointed to hold assizes for Wales and Chester, shall hold such assizes for South Wales, and the other for North Wales.—§ 19, 20.

§ 21, 22, contain regulations as to rendering defendants in custody (or not) in discharge of their bail.

Compensations are given by the act to those judges and officers whose offices determined; and the records of the courts abolished are to be kept as theretofore until otherwise provided by law.

The lord chancellor is empowered to appoint trustees for certain matters formerly appointed by the Welsh judges. — 31.

Provision is made for the oath of officers, § 32; and for passing the accounts of sheriffs for Welsh counties, § 3.

The attorney-general for Wales is to continue to exercise his office (in person and not by deputy) during the king's pleasure.—§ 34.

By § 56. the courts of quarter sessions are to be holden at the same periods as the sessions in England. See Sessions of the Peace.

WAPENTAKE, from the Sax. weapon, i. e. armatura, and tac, tactus.] Is all one with what we call a hundred; specially used in the north countries beyond the river Trent. Bract. l. 3; Lamb.

The words seem to be of Danish original, and to be so called for this reason; when first this kingdom, or part thereof, was divided into wapentakes, he who was the chief of the wapentake or hundred, and whom we now call a high constable, as soon as he entered upon his office, appeared in the field on a certain day, on horseback, with a pike in his hand; and all the chief men of the hundred met him there with their lances, and touched his pike; which was a sign that they were firmly united to each other by the touching their weapons. Hoveden; Fleta, lib. 2. But Sir Thomas Smith says, that anciently musters were made of the armour and weapons of the several inhabitants of every wapentake; and from those that could not find sufficient pledges for their good abearing, their weapons were taken away, and given to others; from whence he derives this word. Rep. Angl. l. 1. c. 16; Camd. Brit. 159; 2 Inst. 99.

Dr. Wilkins, in his Glossary upon the Anglo-Saxon Laws, derives wapentake from weapon, arma, and teacan, doceere; as the district where a given number of persons in each county were accustomed to meet and train themselves in the use of arms. Wilks. LL. Anglo-Sax. 117.

That the wapentake was one of the earliest terms used by the Saxons in this country for a district of territory, seems more than probable. It may be traced among the more ancient tribes of the north. Professor Ihre tells us, that among the Goths wapntak implied the manner in which decrees were made by the people at large, by the clashing of their arms. Tacitus, he adds, has described the usage in his time. He further informs us, that wapntak also denoted the confirmation of a judicial edict by the touch of arms. The votes being collected, the judge reached forth a spear, by touching which all his assessors confirmed the sentence. See 1 Laws Domesday, 18.

WAR, bellum.] A fighting between two kings, princes, or parties, in vindication of their just rights; also the state of war, or all the time it lasts.

By our law, when the courts of justice are open, so that the king's judges distribute justice to all, and protect men from wrong and violence, it is said to be a time of peace. But when, by invasion, rebellion, &c. the peaceable course of justice is stopped, then it is adjudged to be a time of war; and this shall be tried by the records and judges, whether justice at such a time had her equal course of proceeding or not. For time of war gives privilege to them that are in war, and all others within the kingdom. 1 Inst. 249.

In the civil wars of King Charles I. it was computed that there were not fewer than 200,000 foot and 50,000 horse in arms on both sides; which was an extraordinary host, considering it composed of Britons, sufficient to have shaken Europe, though it was otherwise fatally employed. In ancient times, when the kings of England were to be served with soldiers in their wars, a knight or squire that had revenues, farmers, and tenants, would covenant with the king, by indenture, inrolled in the exchequer, to furnish him with such a number of military men; and those men were to serve under him, whom they knew and honoured, and with whom they must live at their return. 1 Inst. 71. WARA. A certain quantity or measure of ground. Mon. Ang. i. 172.

WARD, custodia.] Is variously used in our old books.

A ward in London is a district or division of the city, committed to the special charge of one of the aldermen; of these there are 26, according to the number of the mayor and aldermen, of which every one has his ward for his proper guard and jurisdiction. Stow's Survey. See London.

A forest is divided into wards. Manwood, par. 1. p. 97. A prison is also called a ward.

Lastly, the heir of the king's tenant, that held in capite, was termed a ward during his nonage; and it is now usual to call all infants, under the power of guardians, wards. See Tenure, II. 3; Guardian.

WAREHOUSING SYSTEM. By this system is meant the allowing of goods imported to be deposited in public warehouses, at a reasonable rent, without payment of the duties on importation if they are re-exported; or if they are ultimately withdrawn for home consumption, without payment of such duties until they are so removed.

The first foundations of this system were laid by the 43 Geo. 3. c. 132. and it was greatly improved and extended by subsequent statutes, the provisions of which are embodied and consolidated by the 3 & 4 H. M. 4. c. 57.

The following is an outline of its principal clauses:

§ 2. The commissioners of the treasury, by their warrant, may appoint the ports in the United Kingdom which shall be warehousing ports for the purposes of the act; and the commissioners of the customs, subject to the directions of the commissioners of the treasury, by their order may appoint in what warehouses or places of special security, or of ordinary security, in such ports, and in what different parts or divisions of such warehouses or places, and in what manner any goods, and what sorts of goods, may and may only be warehoused and kept and secured without payment of any duty upon the first entry thereof, or for exportation only, in cases wherein the same may be prohibited to be imported for home use; and also in such order may direct in what cases (if any) security by bond, in manner thereafter provided, shall be required in respect of any warehouse so appointed.

By § 3. warehouses connected with wharfs, and within walls, &c., are to be warehouses of special security without appointment.

§ 5. Commissioners of the customs are to provide warehouses for tobacco, and treasury to fix rent.

By § 8. the warehouse-keeper may give general bond, if he be willing, for the payment of the duties on all goods warehoused with him, or otherwise the different importers shall give particular bonds for their separate goods.

§ 9. Sale of goods in warehouses by proprietor, if in writing, &c. shall be valid, although they remain in such warehouse; but the transfer of such goods shall be entered in a book by the officer of the customs having charge of the warehouse.

§ 11. Goods fraudulently concealed or removed, are forfeited. Penalty on opening warehouse, except in the presence of the custom-house officer, 500*l.*

By § 13. goods are to be carried to warehouse under authority of officers of customs, and as he shall direct, or otherwise are to be forfeited.

§ 14. Goods are to be cleared in three years; ship stores in one year (unless further time be given by the treasury); if not cleared, they may be sold or destroyed by the commissioners of the customs, and the produce applied to the payment of warehouse rent and other charges, and the overplus, if any, paid to the proprietor; and such goods, when sold, shall be held subject to all the conditions to which they were subject previous to such sale, except that a further time of three months from the sale shall be allowed to the purchaser for the clearing of such goods from the warehouse; and if not duly cleared within such three months, the same shall be forfeited.

§ 15. In case of accident in landing or shipping goods, the duty shall be remitted.

By § 16. goods permitted to be shipped from the warehouse, duty-free, as ship's stores, § 18. The duties are to be paid on original quantities, except in certain cases.

§ 19. The duties on tobacco, sugar, and spirits to be charged on quantities delivered, except in certain cases; and no allowance to be made for leakage, except as provided by the act.

§ 21. Goods may be removed to other ports to be re-warehoused; and on notice given, the officers are to prepare for their removal, under the seals of office.

§ 23. Bond is to be given to re-warehouse, which may be given at either port.

§ 25. Goods re-warehoused shall be held on the terms of the first warehousing.

§ 27. Goods in one warehouse may be removed to another warehouse in the same port.

§ 28. Such goods and the parties shall be subject to the original conditions on which the goods were held.

§ 29. If goods are sold, the new owner may give a bond, and release the original bond.

§ 31. Goods may be sorted, separated, and repacked in the same or in equal packages; and wine or rum may be bottled off for exportation, and rum drawn off for stores; brandy may be mixed with wine for exportation, in certain proportions; and casks of wine may be filled up or racked off; also samples may be taken, without entry or payment of duty.

§ 32. No alteration is to be made in goods or package but according to such regulations as the commissioners shall direct.

§ 34. No foreign casks, &c. to be used for repacking, unless duties have been paid, &c.

§ 36. Copper ore may be taken out of warehouse to be smelted.

§ 37. No goods warehoused, which were imported in bulk, shall be delivered, except in the whole quantity of each parcel, or in a quantity not less than one ton weight, unless by special leave.

§ 38. Packages to be marked before delivery.

§ 39. The treasury may make regulations for ascertaining the amount of decrease or increase of the quantity of any particular sorts of goods, and direct in what proportion any abatement of duty payable under the act, for deficiencies, shall upon exportation be made on account of any such decrease: provided that if such goods be lodged in warehouses of special security, no duty shall be charged for deficiency on exportation, except where suspicion shall arise that part of such goods has been clandestinely conveyed away, nor shall any such goods (unless they be wine or spirits) be measured, counted, weighed, or gauged for exportation, except in cases of suspicion.

§ 40. specifies the allowances for natural waste of wine, spirits, &c. in warehouses not of special security.

§ 41. In cases of embezzlement and waste through misconduct of officers, the damages are to be made good to the proprietor.

§ 45. Goods removed from warehouse for shipment are to be under the care of the officers of customs.

§ 46. Ships are to be not less than seventy tons for exporting warehoused goods.

§ 47. Goods landed in docks shall be liable to claims for freight as before landing.

WARNING. By the 2 Wm. 4. c. 39. § 4. a warning is to be subscribed to the writ of capias given by that act (see Process), stating that if the defendant, being in custody, shall be detained on the writ, or being arrested shall go to prison for want of bail, the plaintiff may declare against him before the end of the term next after such detainer or arrest, and proceed to judgment and execution.

WARNISTURA. Garniture, furniture, provision, &c. Pat. 9 Hen. 3.

WARNOTH. There is an ancient custom, that if any tenant holding of the castle of Dover, failed in paying his rent at the day, that he should forfeit double, and for the second failure treble: and the lands so held are called terræ cultæ & terræ de warnoth. Mon. Angl. ii. 589.

WARRANTICE. The Scotch term for warranty. See that title.

WARRANT. A precept under hand and seal to some officer to take up any offender, to be dealt with according to due course of law. See Commitment, Constable, Justices of Peace.

WARRANT OF ATTORNEY. An authority and power given by a client to his attorney to appear and plead for him, or to suffer judgment to pass against him by confessing the action, by nil dicit, non sum informatus, &c.

At common law, the warrant authorizing the attorney to act in a suit, might be filed even after judgment, for its not being filed in time was not assignable as error. 1 Wils. 39. Many statutes and rules of court, however, required the warrant to be filed at certain specified times; and previous to the recent rule of court, the warrant of the attorney for the plaintiff must have been filed the same term he declared (4 & 5 Ann. c. 16. § 5.) and the warrant of the defendant's attorney must have been given to and filed by him at the same time with his own (R. M. 5 Ann. r. 2.) These statutes and rules are now virtually repealed by a rule of H. T. 4 Wm. 4. r. 4. which declares that no entry shall be made on record of any warrant of attorney to sue or defend.

Before the 5 Geo. 4. c. 41. the warrant must have been stamped, and a memorandum of it filed with the proper officer; but now, as the stamp duty is repealed by the above statute, the filing of the memorandum, which was required to protect the revenue, is unnecessary, and at all events is discontinued. See Arch. Pr. by Chitty, 4th ed. 39.

As to warrants of attorney to confess judgment, see Judgments acknowledged for Debts.

WARRANTIA CHARTÆ. A writ where a man was enfeoffed of lands with warranty, and then he was sued or impleaded in assize or other actions, in which he could not vouch or call to warranty. By this writ he might have compelled the feoffor or his heirs to warrant the land unto him; and if the land were recovered from him, he should recover as much lands in value against the warrantor, &c. But the writ ought to have been brought by the feoffee depending the first writ against him, or he lost his advantage. F. N. B. 134; Terms de la Ley, 372, 588. See Pleadings, l. 1.

If a person enfeoffed another of lands by deed with warranty, and the feoffee made a feoffment over, and took back an estate in fee, the warranty was determined, and he should not have the writ warrantia chartæ, because he was in of another estate. Also where one made a feoffment in fee with warranty against him and his heirs, the feoffee should not have a warrantia chartæ upon this warranty against the feoffor or his heirs, if he were impleaded by them; but the nature of it was to rebut against the feoffor and his heirs Dalt. 48; 2 Lit. Abr. 684.

This writ might have been sued forth before a man was impleaded in any action, but the writ supposed that he was impleaded; and if the defendant appeared and said that he was not impleaded, by that plea he confessed the warranty, and the plaintiff should have judgment, &c.; and the party should recover in value of the lands against the vouchee, which he had at the time of the purchase of his warrantia chartæ; and therefore it might have been good policy to bring it against him before he was sued, to bind the lands he had at that time; for if he had aliened his lands before the voucher, he should render nothing in value. New Nat. Br. 298, 299.

If a man recovered his warranty in warrantia chartæ, and after he was impleaded, he ought to have given notice to him against whom he recovered, of the action, and prayed him to show what plea he would plead to defend the land, &c. where one upon a warranty vouched and recovered in value, if he was then impleaded of the land recovered, he might not vouch again, for the warranty was once executed. 23 Edw. 3. 12.

In a warranty to the feoffee in land made by the feoffor, upon voucher, if special matter were shown by the vouchee, when he entered into the warranty, viz. that the land at the time of the feoffment was worth only 100*l.* and at the time of the voucher it was worth 200*l.* by the industry of the feoffee, the plaintiff in a warrantia chartæ, &c. should recover only the value as it was at the time of the sale. Jenk. Cent. 35.

If the vouchee could show cause why he should not warrant, that must have been tried, &c. See Recovery.

This writ has long been obsolete, and was abolished by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27. § 36.

WARRANTIA DIEL. An ancient writ, where one having a day assigned personally to appear in court to any action, is in the mean time employed in the king's service, so that he cannot come at the day appointed: it was directed to the justices, to this end, that they neither take nor record him in default for that time. Reg. Orig. 18; F. N. B. 17. See Essoign, Protection.

WARRANTY,

WARRANTIA.] A promise or covenant by deed by the bargainor, for himself and his heirs, to warrant or secure the bargainee and his heirs against all men for the enjoying of the thing granted. Bract. lib. 2, § 5; West. Symb. par. 1.

As applied to lands, it is defined to be a covenant real annexed to lands or tenements, whereby a man and his heirs are bound to warrant the same; and, either upon voucher or by judgment in a writ of warrantia chartæ, to yield other lands and tenements to the value of those that shall be evicted by a former title, or else may be used by way of rebutter. 1 Inst. 365 a. See Litt. § 697; and Mr. Butler's note there on the subject of warranty. See Deed, Recovery, Tenures, I. 7. &c.

The following account of the doctrine of warranty, which has long been obsolete, and by the recent changes in the law relating to real property has been deprived of all practical use and application, is from the 2 Comm. c. 20.

By the clause of warranty in a deed, the grantor doth for him himself and his heirs warrant and secure to the grantee the estate so granted. By the feudal constitution, if the vassal's title to enjoy the feud was disputed, he might vouch or call the lord or donor to warrant or insure his gift, which if he failed to do, and the vassal was evicted, the lord was bound to give him another feud of equal value in recompense. And so by our ancient law, if before the statute of quia emptores a man enfeoffed another in fee, by the feudal verb dedi, to hold of himself and his heirs by certain services, the law annexed a warranty to this grant, which bound the feoffor and his heirs, to whom the services (which were the consideration and equivalent for the gift) were originally stipulated to be rendered. Co. Lit. 384. Or if a man and his ancestors had immemorably holden land of another and his ancestors by the service of homage (which was called homage ancestral), this also bound the lord to warranty, the homage being an evidence of such a feudal grant. Litt. § 143.

And upon a similar principle, in case after a partition or exchange of lands of inheritance, either party or his heirs be evicted of his share, the other and his heirs are bound to warranty, because they enjoy the equivalent. Co. Lit. 174. And so even at this day, upon a gift in tail, or lease for life, rendering rent, the donor or lessor, and his heirs (to whom the rent is payable,) are bound to warrant the title. 1 Inst. 384. But in a feoffment in fee by the verb dedi, since the statute of quia emptores, the feoffor only is bound to the implied warranty, and not his heirs, because it is a mere personal contract on the part of the feoffor, the tenure, (and of course the ancient services,) resulting back to the superior lord of the fee. 1 Inst. 384. And in other forms of alienation gradually introduced since that statute, no warranty whatsoever is implied, they bearing no sort of analogy to the original feudal donation. 1 Inst. 102. And therefore in such cases it became necessary to add an express clause of warranty to bind the grantor and his heirs, which is a kind of covenant real, and can only be created by the verb warrantizo or warrant. Litt. § 773.

These express warranties were introduced even prior to the statute of quia emptores, in order to evade the strictness of the feudal doctrine of non-alienation without the consent of the heir. For though he, at the death of his ancestor, might have entered on any tenements that were aliened without his concurrence, yet if a clause of warranty was added to the ancestor's grant, this covenant descending upon the heir, insured the grantee, not so much by confirming his title as by obliging such heir to yield him a recompense in lands of equal value; the law in favour of alienations, supposing that no ancestor would wantonly disinherit his next of blood; and therefore presuming that he had received a valuable consideration, either in land or in money, which had purchased land, and that this equivalent descended to the heir, together with the ancestor's warranty. Co. Lit. 373. So that when either an ancestor, being the rightful tenant of the freehold, conveyed the land to a stranger and his heirs, or released the right in fee simple to one who was already in possession, and superadded a warranty to his deed, it was held that such warranty not only bound the warrantor himself to protect and assure the title of the warrantee, but it also bound his heir; and this, whether that warranty was lineal or collateral to the title of the land. Lineal warranty was, where the heir derived, or might by possibility have derived, his title to the land warranted, either from or through the ancestor who made the warranty; as where a father, or an elder son in the life of the father, released to the disseisor of either themselves or the grandfather, with warranty, this was lineal to the younger son. Litt. § 703, 706, 707. Collateral warranty was where the heir's title to the land neither was nor could have been derived from the warranting ancestor; as where a younger brother released to his father's disseisor, with warranty, this was collateral to the elder brother. Litt. § 705, 707. But where the very conveyance to which the warranty was annexed, immediately followed a disseisin, or operated itself as such (as where a father, tenant for years, with remainder to his son in fee, aliened in fee-simple with warranty,) this being, in its original, manifestly founded on the tort or wrong of the warrantor himself, was called a warranty commencing by disseisin, and being too palpably injurious to be supported, was not binding upon any heir of such tortious warrantor. Litt. § 698, 702.

In both lineal and collateral warranty, the obligation of the heir (in case the warrantee was evicted, to yield him other lands in their stead) was only on condition that he had other sufficient lands by descent from the warranting ancestor. Co. Lit. 102. But though, without assets, he was not bound to insure the title of another, yet in case of lineal warranty, whether assets descended or not, the heir was perpetually barred from claiming the land himself; for if he could succeed in such claim, he would then gain assets by descent (if he had them not before,) and must fulfil the warranty of his ancestor. And the same rule was, with less justice, adopted also in respect of collateral warranties, which likewise (though no assets descended) barred the heir of the warrantor from claiming the land by any collateral title, upon the presumption of law that he might hereafter have assets by descent either from or through the same ancestor. Lit. § 711, 712.

The inconvenience of this latter branch of the rule was felt very early, when tenants by the curtesy took upon them to alien their lands with warranty, which collateral warranty of the father descending upon his son (who was the heir of both his parents,) barred him from claiming his maternal inheritance; to remedy which, the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edm. 1. c. 3. declared that such warranty should be no bar to the son, unless assets descended from the father. It was afterwards attempted in 50 Edm. 3. to make the same provision universal, by enacting that no collateral warranty should be a bar, unless whose assets descended from the same ancestor; but it then proceeded not to effect. Co. Lit. 373. However, by the 11 Hen. 7. c. 20. notwithstanding any alienation with warranty by tenant in dower, the heir of the husband was not barred, though he were also heir to the wife. And by 4 & 5 Ann. c. 16. all warranties by any tenant for life were void against those in remainder or reversion; and all collateral warranties by any ancestor who had no estate of inheritance in possession, were void against the heir. By the wording of which last statute, it should seem that the legislature meant to allow that the collateral warranty of tenant in tail in possession descending (though without assets) upon a remainder-man or reversioner, should still bar the remainder or reversion: for though the judges, in expounding the statute d. dous, held that, by analogy to the statute of Gloucester, a lineal warranty by tenant in tail without assets should not bar the issue in tail, yet they held such warranty with assets to be a sufficient bar. Litt. 712; 2 Inst. 293. This was therefore formerly one of the ways whereby an estate-tail might be destroyed, it being indeed nothing more in effect than exchanging the lands entailed for others of equal value. See Fee-tail, Tail.

They also held that collateral warranty was not within the statute d. dous, as that act was principally intended to prevent the tenant in tail from disinherit his own issue; and therefore collateral warranty (though without assets) was allowed to be, as at common law, a sufficient bar of the estate-tail and all remainders and reversions expectant thereon. Co. Lit. 374; 2 Inst. 335. And so it continued to be notwithstanding the statute of Queen Anne, if made by tenant in tail in possession, who therefore might, until recently, without the forms of a fine or recovery, in some cases have made a good conveyance in fee-simple, by superadding a warranty to his grant, which, if accompanied with assets, barred his own issue; and without them, barred such of his heirs as might be in remainder or reversion. 2 Comm. c. 20. p. 303.

A., B., and C., being tenants in common in tail, B. released to A. and C. and their heirs all his undivided part, and all his estate and interest therein, to hold "to them, their heirs, and assigns, as tenants in common, and not as joint-tenants, to the use of them and their assigns." And B. covenanted with A. and C., their heirs and assigns, that he, his heirs, &c. would warrant and for ever defend the premises to A. and C., (not using the word heirs,) against all persons; that A. and C., their heirs and assigns, should quietly enjoy, &c. The Court of King's Bench held, that the release passed the interest of B. to A. and C. as tenants in common, and not as joint-tenants: and that the warranty annexed to the release created a discontinuance of B.'s estate-tail, and barred B., and those claiming under him, (as against those claiming under the release,) of a subsequently-acquired right in fee. 4 M. & S. 178. And see 1 N. & M. 130.

Now by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27. § 39. no warranty shall toll or defeat any right of entry or action for the recovery of land.

And by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 74. § 14. estates-tail, and estates-expectant thereon, are no longer barrable by warranty.

WARRANTY OF THINGS PERSONAL. By the civil law, an implied warranty was annexed to every sale, in respect to the title of the vendor: and so too, in our law, a purchaser of goods and chattels may have a satisfaction from the seller, if he sells them as his own, and the title proves deficient, without any express warranty for that purpose. 2 Comm. 451.

In support of this position Blackstone quotes Cro. Jac. 474; 1 Roll. Abr. 90; but in these cases there were affirmations by the vendor, that he was owner: and it is doubtful whether the Commentator intended to advance the doctrine, that there was a liability, although no express warranty could be proved. For it would seem that there is no implied warranty, as such, annexed to a sale of goods that the vendor has a title. The authorities in the books are not, however, very satisfactory on the subject, but they lead to the conclusion, that the seller of goods is not responsible to the purchaser, if the latter be afterwards disturbed in the possession by a third person, the true owner, except, 1st, there be an express warranty, or 2dly, a fraudulent misrepresentation or concealment by the vendor. See 4 Taunt. 347; 5 Taunt. 657; but see Peake, 94. See further, Chitty on Contracts, 353; Law Mag. vol. iii. 180.

With regard to the goodness of the wares purchased, the vendor is not bound to answer; unless he expressly warrants them to be sound and good; or unless he knew them to be otherwise, and hath used any art to disguise them; or unless they turn out to be different from what he represented to the buyer. F. N. B. 94; 2 Roll. Rep. 5; 2 Comm. c. 30. See further, Deut.

The general rule is that, although a liberal price be given for goods, the law does not imply a warranty as to their goodness or quality. The maxim is caveat emptor, and no liability in general exists in regard to bad quality or defects, unless there be a special warranty or fraud. Doug. 20; 2 East, 314; and see 5 Bing. 533.

But it seems that in contracts for provisions, there is always an implied warranty that they are wholesome. 3 Comm. 166.

No particular form of words is necessary to constitute a warranty: the word warrant need not be used. 3 M. & P. 173; 5 Bing. 533, S. C. And a bare representation or assertion as to the quality of the goods may amount to a warranty, if there be nothing to negative that it was understood as such. See M. & R. 2; 4 C. & P. 15; Id. 145.

So the description of goods, in an advertisement or particular of sale, may amount to a warranty that the goods answer such description. 5 B. & A. 240. And the description of an intended publication, in a book of subscriptions, or prospectus, amounts to an undertaking that the work shall be conformable to the account so given of it. 3 C. & P. 333; 4 C. & P. 198.

The custom of any particular trade may establish an implied warranty between parties transacting business therein; it being presumed, that the dealings of the parties were regulated by the custom, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. See per Heath, J. 4 Taunt. 853; 4 B. & C. 110, 114. But where there is an express warranty it cannot be restrained or varied by the custom of the trade. 1 Holt, 95; 6 Taunt. 446, S. C.

A sale of goods by sample is in effect a sale thereof by warranty. 2 East, 314; 4 B. & A. 387.

Where there is an express written (or it seems verbal) warranty, the vendee is not at liberty to avail himself in addition thereto of any representations not embodied in the contract, and made by the vendor without fraud. 4 Taunt. 779, 786; 2 B. & C. 634.

A general warranty will not extend to guard against de-facts that are plain and obvious to the sense, and require no skill to detect them; as, if a horse be warranted perfect, and want an ear, or a tail, &c. 2 Comm. 165, 166; 1 Salk. 211.

In general a warranty must be made during the treaty, or before, or at the time of the sale, or, at least, before the performance of the substantial terms thereof. A warranty after the sale was complete, or the contract was performed, would seem not to be binding for want of consideration.

It is not necessary to offer to return the goods previously to an action for the breach of an express warranty, or at any other time. 1 H. Bl. 17; 2 T. R. 745; 9 B. & C. 259. The purchaser may resell and declare specially for the loss or difference, 1 M. & P. 761; 4 Bing. 722, S. C.; nor is there any occasion even to give notice of the breach of warranty to the seller; but the not giving such notice will be a strong presumption against the buyer that the goods, at the time of the sale, had not the defect complained of, and will make the proof on his part much more difficult. 1 H. Bl. 19; 9 B. & C. 559. If there has been no offer to return the goods, the measure of damages is merely the difference between the sum given and the real value, although there has been no re-sale by the vendee. 1 Taunt. 766; 3 Stark. 32. And if the warranty be coupled with an express undertaking to take back the goods, and return the money, if on trial, the goods should be found defective, the buyer must, in such case, return the article as soon as he discovers its faults, or within a reasonable time afterwards, in order to maintain an action on the warranty; unless he has been induced to prolong the trial by any subsequent misrepresentation of the seller. 2 H. Bl. 573.

Where an offer to return is made within a reasonable time by the vendee, and the seller is legally bound to take the goods back, but refuses to do so, they remain at his risk. 1 Stark. 107.

See further, on this subject, Chitty on Contracts, 358—370. The following distinctions are peculiarly referable to the sale of horses:—

The doctrine that sound price implies a warranty of soundness is now quite exploded, and it is necessary to have an express warranty. 2 East, 322.

In an action on warranty of a horse, the plaintiff must positively prove that the horse was unsound. 3 Taunt. 334.

A temporary lameness, which renders a horse less fit for service, is a breach of warranty of soundness. 4 Campb. 281; sed vide 2 Exp. 573.

Roaring is unsoundness, if it is shown to proceed from some disease or organic defect. 2 Campb. 532; 2 Stark. 81.

So a cough, unless proved to be of a temporary nature, is unsoundness. 2 Chitt. R. 425; and see id. 416.

A nerved horse is unsound. 1 Ry. & Moo. 290.

Crib-biting is not a breach of a general warranty of soundness. Holt. Ca. 680.

Mere badness of shape, though it render the horse incapable of work, is not unsoundness. 1 M. & Rob. 209.

If a horse is sold with a warranty that he is a good drawer and pulls quiet in harness, both parts of the warranty must be shown by the seller to be true. 2 Dowl. & Ry. 10.

A warranty as follows: "to be sold a black gelding, five years old, has been continually driven in the plough, warranted," applies to nothing more than soundness, and not to having been driven continually in the plough. 1 Bingh. 344.

Where two persons severally employed a dealer to sell their horses, and he sold them for an entire price, and warranted them sound; it was held that the purchaser could not sever the contract, and bring an action on the warranty against one of the sellers, in respect of the unsoundness of his horse. 1 Campb. 361.

Where the seller warranted a horse sound, and in a conversation subsequently said, that if the horse were unsound (which he denied,) he would take it again and return the money; it was held that this was no abandonment of the original contract, and the vendee's remedy was upon the warranty. 7 East, 274.

A warranty given by a person entrusted to sell, prima facie binds the principal; but the warranty of a person commissioned merely to deliver the thing sold, does not, unless an express authority to warrant be shown. Where, therefore, a horse having been sold by A. to B. A's servant, on delivering the horse to B., made certain statements, and signed a receipt for the price, containing a warranty: it was held, that A. was not bound by such statements and receipt, no express authority to the servant to give a warranty being shown. 2 C. & M. 391.

Where a horse is sold with a warranty of soundness, but there is a misrepresentation at the sale as to the place from whence the horse came, if the warranty be complied with, the misrepresentation will not vitiate the sale. 5 Dow. & R. 164.

In an action on a warranty, it is not necessary that the seller knew of the horse's imperfections at the time of the sale. 2 Comm. c. 30, in n.

On a sale with a warranty for twenty-four hours, the seller's knowledge of the unsoundness of the horse does not vitiate the contract. It is a sale with all faults that shall not be discovered within the time limited. 3 Campb. 154; 3 N. & M. 745.

Where rules were posted up at a repository for horses, regulating sales by private contract there, and were known to the plaintiff and the defendant, it was held that they impliedly adopted the terms of such rules into their bargain, without making any express reference to them. 3 N. & M. 748.

If an horse is sold with an express warranty by the seller that it is sound and free from vice, the buyer may maintain an action upon this warranty or special contract, without returning the horse to the seller, or without even giving him notice of the unsoundness or viciousness of the horse: yet it will raise a prejudice against the buyer's evidence, if he does not give notice within a reasonable time, that he has cause to be dissatisfied with his bargain. 1 H. Black. 17.

Upon the breach of a warranty of a horse the measure of damages, if the horse is returned, is the price paid for him; if the horse is not returned, the measure of damages is the difference between the real value and the price paid. If the horse is not tendered to the defendant, the plaintiff can recover nothing for the expense of his keep. 1 Taunt. 566; 2 Campb. 82.

Where a horse warranted sound, proves unsound, and is, after notice to the seller, resold by the buyer, the latter may recover not only the difference in price between the two rates, but also the keep of the horse for a reasonable time. Whether he was kept an unreasonable time is a question for the jury. 4 N. & M. 195.

The vendee is entitled to recover for the keeping the horse only for such time as would suffice to re-sell it to the best advantage. 1 R. & M. 436.

If the buyer of a horse with warranty, relying thereon, re-sells him with warranty, and being sued thereon by his vendee, offers the defence to his vendor, who gives no direction as to the action, the plaintiff defending that action is entitled to recover the costs thereof by his vendor, as part of the damage occasioned by his breach of warranty. 7 Taunt. 153.

The warranty cannot be tried in a general action of assumpsit to recover back the price of the horse. Comp. 819.

As to warranties on policies of insurance, see Insurance.

WARREN, warrenna, from Germ. wahren, i. e. custodire; or the Fr. garrener.] A franchise, or place privileged by prescription or grant from the king, for the keeping of beasts and fowls of the warren; which seem to be only hares and conies, partridges, and pheasants; though some add quails, wood-cocks, and water-fowl, &c. Terms de Ley, 589; 1 Inst. 233; 2 Comm. c. 3, in n.

Grouse are not birds of warren. 7 B. & C. 36.

A person may have a warren in another's land, for one may alien the land, and reserve the franchise: but none can make a warren, and appropriate those creatures that are feræ naturæ, without licence from the king, or where a warren is claimed by prescription. 8 Rep. 108; 11 Rep. 87.

Free-warren cannot be parcel of a manor, therefore it will not pass by a grant of the manor (without the appurtenances,) though it be held with the manor. Nor can a warren appertain to a manor but by prescription.

Free-warren in gross, whereof a grantor is seised, will not pass by a grant of a manor and the appurtenances; nor by a grant of a manor, and all right of fishing, fowling, hawking, hunting, and shooting, royalties, franchises, hereditaments, and appurtenances, belonging or in any wise appertaining to the manor, or such as were in and by the deed of grant or letters-patent granted and assured by the crown as appurtenant to the manor, or any part thereof. 3 N. & M. 671.

A warren may lie open; and there is no necessity of inclosing it, as there is of a park. 4 Inst. 318.

If any person offend in a free warren, he is punishable by the common law.

When conies are on the soil of the party, he hath a property in them by reason of the possession, and action lies for killing them; but if they run out of the warren, and eat up a neighbour's corn, the owner of the land may kill them, and no action will lie. 5 Rep. 104; 1 Cro. 548.

In waste, &c. against a lessee of a warren, the waste assigned was for stopping coney burrows; and it was held that this action did not lie, because a man cannot have the inheritance of conies; and action may be brought against him who makes holes in the land, but not against him who stops them, by reason the land is made better by it. Owen, 66.

Blackstone says a man that has a franchise of warren is in reality no more than a royal game-keeper: and asserts, that no man, not even a lord of a manor, could by common law justify sporting on another's soil, or even on his own, unless he had the liberty of free warren. 2 Comm. c. 3. This latter position is very earnestly combated by Mr. Christian.

This franchise is almost fallen into disregard, since the new statutes for preserving the game; the name being now chiefly preserved in grounds set apart for breeding hares and rabbits.

WARTH. A customary payment for castle-guard. Blount. Ten. c. 5.

WASH. A shallow part of a river, or arm of the sea; as the washes in Lincolnshire, &c. Knight, 1346.

WASSAIL. Sax. A festival song, but of late sung from door to door about the time of the Epiphany. See Wassail-Bowl.

WASTE,

VASTUM.] Hath divers significations: first, it is a spoil made either in houses, woods, lands, &c. by the tenant for life or years, to the prejudice of the heir, or of him in the reversion or remainder. Kitchen, fol. 168. Whereupon the writ of waste might formerly be brought, for the recovery of the thing wasted, and treble damages. As to which, see at large post.

Waste of the forest is most properly where a man cuts down his own woods within the forest, without licence of the king, or lord chief justice in eyre. See Mannwood, part 2. cap. 8. numb. 4 & 5. See tit. Forest.

Waste is also taken for those lands which are not in any man's occupation, but lie common; which seem to be so called because the lord cannot make such profit of them as of his other lands, by reason of that use which others have of it in passing to and fro; upon this none may build, cut down trees, dig, &c. without the lord's licence.

Prima facie the presumption is, that a strip of land lying between the highway and the adjoining inclosure is, as well as the soil of the highway, ad filum viae, the property of the owner of the inclosure, whether he be a freeholder, copyholder, or leaseholder. 7 B. & C. 304. But if such strip of land communicate with open commons, or other large portions of land, the presumption is either done away, or considerably narrowed: for the evidence of ownership, which applies to the large portions, applies also to the narrow strip which communicates with them. 7 Taunt. 39. See Common, Copyhold, Manor.

Year, day, and waste, annus, dies, et vastum, was a punishment or forfeiture formerly belonging to petit treason or felony; whereof see Staundf. Pl. Cor. lib. 3. c. 30; and tits. Day, Year, Waste.

But forfeiture is now restricted to attainders for high treason and murder, and does not extend to the disheriting of any heir, or to the prejudice of the title of any other person than that of the offender for his life. See Forfeiture, II. 2.

WASTE, in its most usual acceptation, is a spoil or destruction in houses, gardens, trees, or other corporeal hereditaments; to the destruction and alienance of him that has the remainder or reversion in fee-simple or fee-tail. 1 Inst. 53.

I. What shall be considered as Waste; generally, and in many particular specified Instances.

II. 1. Who may have a Remedy for Waste done.

2. Against whom such Remedy may be had, and who are punishable for Waste.

III. Of the Punishment of Waste; and the Proceedings at Law against Persons guilty thereof.

IV. Of Injunctions, and other Proceedings in Equity, to prevent, or relieve, against Waste.

I. WASTE is either voluntary, or actual, which is a crime of commission, as by pulling down a house; or it is permissive or negligent, which is a matter of omission only, as by suffering it to fall for want of necessary reparations. Generally speaking, whatever does a lasting damage to the freehold or inheritance is waste. Hill. 35. Therefore removing wainscots, floors, or other things once fixed to the freehold of a house, comes under the general notion of waste. 4 Rep. 64. If a house be destroyed by tempest, lightning, or the like, which is the act of Providence, it is no waste: but otherwise, if the house be burnt by the carelessness or negligence of the lessee; though now by the 6 Ann. c. 31. no action will lie against a tenant for an accident of this kind. See post.

Waste may also be committed in ponds, dove-houses, warrens, and the like; by so reducing the number of the creatures therein, that there will not be sufficient for the reversioner when he comes to the inheritance. Co. Litt. 53.

Timber also is part of the inheritance. 4 Rep. 62. Such are oak, ash, and elm, in all places; and in some particular countries, by local custom, where other trees are generally used for building, they are for that reason considered as timber; and to cut down such trees, or top them, or do any other act whereby the timber may decay, is waste. Co. Litt. 53. But underwood the tenant may cut down at any seasonable time that he pleases, and may take sufficient estovers of common right for house-bote and cart-bote; unless restrained (which is usual) by particular covenants or exceptions. 2 Roll. Abr. 817; Co. Litt. 41.

The conversion of land from one species to another, is waste. To convert wood, meadow, or pasture, into arable; to turn arable, meadow, or pasture, into woodland; or to turn arable or woodland into meadow or pasture; are all of them waste. Hob. 296. For, as Coke observes, it not only changes the course of husbandry, but the evidence of the estate; when such a close, which is conveyed and described as pasture, is found to be arable, and à converso. 1 Inst. 53. And the same rule is observed, for the same reason, with regard to converting one species of edifice into another, even though it is improved in its value. 1 Lev. 309. To open the land to search for mines of metal, coal, &c. is waste; for that is a detriment to the inheritance: but if the pits or mines were open before, it is no waste for the tenant to continue digging them for his own use; for it is now become the mere annual profit of the land. 5 Rep. 12; Hob. 295.

These three are the general heads of waste, viz. in houses, in timber, and in land. Though, whatever else tends to the destruction, or depreciating the value of the inheritance, is considered by the law as waste. 2 Comm. c. 18. Which we therefore proceed to state more at large.

It has been laid down as a general principle, that the law will not allow that to be waste, which is not in any way prejudicial to the inheritance. Hell. 35. Thus in a recent case where in ejectment against a copyholder for a forfeiture by waste, the jury found there had been no damage, it was held there was no waste, and no forfeiture. 2 N. & M. 534.

Nevertheless it has been held, that a lessee or tenant cannot change the nature of the thing demised; though, in some cases, the alteration may be for the greater profit of the lessor. Thus if a lessee converts a corn-mill into a fulling-mill, it is waste; although the conversion be for the lessor's advantage. Cro. Jac. 182. So the converting a brewhouse of 120*l.* per annum into other houses let for 200*l.* a year, is waste; because of the alteration of the nature of the thing, and of the evidence. 1 Lev. 309.

WASTE IN LANDS. It hath been already stated, that if a tenant converts arable into wood, or à converso, it is waste; for it not only changes the course of husbandry, but also the proof of evidence. Hob. 296. pl. 234. But if a lessee suffers arable land to lie fresh, and not manured, so that the land grows full of thorns, &c. this is not waste, but ill husbandry. 2 Roll. Abr. 814. Likewise the conversion of meadow into arable is waste. 1 Inst. 53, b. But if meadow be sometimes arable, and sometimes meadow, and sometimes pasture, there the ploughing of it is not waste. 2 Roll. Abr. 815. Neither is the division of a great meadow into many parcels, by making of ditches, waste; for the meadows may be better for it, and it is for the profit and ease of the occupiers of it. 2 Lev. 174. pl. 210.

Likewise converting a meadow into a hop-garden, is not waste; for it is employed to a greater profit, and it may be meadow again; per Windham and Rhodes, J. But Periam said, though it be a greater profit, yet it is also with greater labour and charges. 2 Lev. 174. pl. 210. But converting a meadow into an orchard is waste, though it be to the greater profit of the occupier. Per Periam, Id. ibid. If a lessee ploughs the land stored with conies, this is no waste; unless it be a warren by charter or prescription. 2 Roll. Abr. 815. So if a lessee of land destroys the coney burrows in the land, it not being a free warren by charter or prescription, it seems is not waste; for a man can have no property in them, but only a possession. Id. Ibid.; Om. 66.

It is waste to suffer a wall of the sea to be in decay, so as by the flowing and reflowing of the sea the meadow or marsh is surrounded, whereby the same becomes unprofitable. But if it be surrounded suddenly by the rage and violence of the sea, occasioned by wind, tempest, or the like, without any default in the tenant, this is not waste. Yet if the tenant repair not the banks or walls against rivers or other waters, whereby the meadows or marshes be surrounded and become rashly and unprofitable, this is waste. 1 Inst. 53, b. So, a fortiori, if arable land be surrounded by such default; for the surrounding washes away the marle and other manurance from the land. 2 Roll. Abr. 816.

WASTE IN TREES AND WOODS. Trees are parcel of the inheritance; and therefore, if a lessee assigneth his term, and excepts the timber-trees, it is void; for he cannot except that which doth not belong to him by law. 5 Rep. 12. The lessor, after he has made a lease for life or years, may by deed grant the trees, or reasonable estovers out of them, to another and his heirs; and the same shall take effect after the death of the lessee. But such a gift to a stranger is void during the estate for life, because of the particular prejudice which might be done to the lessee. 11 Rep. 48. The lessee hath but a particular interest in the trees, but the general interest of the trees doth remain in the lessor; for the lessee shall have the waste and fruit of the trees, and the shadow for his cattle, &c. But the interest of the body of trees is in the lessor, as parcel of his inheritance. Therefore, if trees are overthrown, by the lessee or any other, or by wind or tempest, or by any other means disjoined from the inheritance, the lessor shall have them in respect of his general ownership. 11 Rep. 81.

The lessor cannot give trees during the tenant's lease. But if he grants them to a stranger, and commands the tenant to cut and deliver them, who does it, this shall excuse him in an action of waste. And yet the tenant was not bound by law to obey and execute this command. Bro. Done, &c. 13.

In 8 East, 190, the Court of K. B. held, that if trees be excepted out of a demise, waste cannot be committed by cutting them down; and therefore that ejectment cannot be brought, as for waste committed in or upon the demised premises.

Where a man leases a wood which consists only of great trees, the lessee cannot cut them. Hobart's Rep. Cas. 296.

With respect to timber-trees, such as oak, ash, elm, (which are timber-trees in all places,) waste may be committed in them, either by cutting them down, or lopping of them, or doing any act whereby the timber may decay. Also in countries where timber is scarce, and beeches or the like are converted to building for the habitation of man, they also are accounted timber. 1 Inst. 53, a; 54, b. Thus waste may be committed in cutting of beeches in Buckinghamshire, because there, by the custom of the country, it is the best timber. 2 Roll. Abr. 814.

So waste may be committed in cutting of birches in Berkshire, because they are the principal trees there for the most part. 2 Roll. Abr. 814.

If the tenant cut down timber-trees, or such as are accounted timber, as mentioned above, this is waste; and if he suffers the young germens to be destroyed, this is destruction. So it is if the tenant cuts down underwood (as he may by law), yet if he suffer the young germens to be destroyed, or if he stub up the same, this is destruction. 1 Inst. 53, a. If lessee, or his servants, suffer a wood to be open, by which beasts enter and eat the germens, though they grow again, yet it is waste; for after such eating they never will be great trees but shrubs. 2 Roll. Abr. 815. If a termor cuts down underwood of hazel, willows, maple, or oak, which is seasonable, it is not waste. If ashes are seasonable wood to cut from ten years, it is not waste to cut them down for house-bote. But if the ashes are gross of the age of nine years, and able for great timber, it is waste to cut them down. 2 Roll. Abr. 817.

If oaks are seasonable, and have been used to be cut always at the age of twenty years, it is not waste to cut them at such age, or under; for in some countries, where there is a great plenty, oaks of such age are but seasonable wood. But, after the age of twenty-one years, oaks cannot be said to be wood seasonable, and therefore it shall be waste to cut them down. 2 Roll. Abr. 817. Cutting down of willows, beech, birch, asp, maple, or the like, standing in the defence and safeguard of the house, is destruction. If there be a quickset fence of white thorn, if the tenant stub it up, or suffer it to be destroyed, this is also destruction; and for all these and the like destructions an action of waste lieth. 1 Inst. 53, a. The cutting of horn-beams, hazels, willows, sallows, though of forty years' growth, is no waste, because these trees would never be timber. Godb. 4, pl. 6.

The cutting down of trees is justifiable for house-bote, hay-bote, plough-bote, and fire-bote. 1 Inst. 53, b; Hob. Rep. c. 296; Bro. Waste, 130. By the common law, lessee shall have them, though the deed does not express it; but if he takes more than is necessary, he shall be punished in waste. Bro. Waste, pl. 30. The tenant may take sufficient wood to repair the walls, pales, fences, hedges, and ditches, as he found them; but he cannot make new.

Cutting of dead wood is no waste. But converting trees into fuel, when there is sufficient dead wood, is waste. 1 Inst. 53, b. So cutting wood to burn, where the tenant has sufficient hedgewood, is waste. F. N. B. 59, (M).

Where lessee for years has power to take hedge-bote by assignment, yet he may take it without assignment; for the affirmative does not take away the power which the law gives him. Dyer, 19, pl. 115.

If lessor excepts his trees in his lease, the lessee shall not have fire-bote, hay-bote, &c. which he should have otherwise; and the property of the trees is in the lessor himself. 4 Lev. 162, pl. 209. Sir Richard Lewknor's case. Yet it has been said, that lessee for years, the trees being excepted, has liberty to take the shrouds and loppings for fire-bote; but if he cuts any tree, it shall be waste, as well for the loppings as for the body of the tree. Noy, 29.

If a tenant that has fire-bote to his house in another man's land, cuts wood for that intent to make his bote-wood, and the owner of the land takes it away, an action of trover and conversion lies against him by the tenant of the land who hath such fire-bote. Clayt. 40, pl. 69. See Dyer, 36, pl. 38; Clayt. 47, pl. 81; 1 Lev. 171.

It is also a rule which appears to have been rigidly adhered to, that the trees shall be applied to the specific purpose for which they are allowed to be cut. Thus, if the lessee cuts trees for reparation, and sells them, and after buys them again, and employs them in reparation, yet it is waste by the sale. So, if lessee cuts trees, and sells them for money, though with the money he repairs the house, yet it is waste. 1 Inst. 53 b.

As to the cutting of timber-trees for repairs by lessee, there is no difference whether the lessor or lessee covenants to repair the houses; for in either case it is not waste if lessee cuts them. Mo. 23, pl. 80. Anon.

But the lessee shall not cut trees to make a new house where there was not any at the time of the lease. Hob. 296. So if a lessee suffers a house to fall for default of covering, which is waste, he cannot cut trees to repair the house. Bro. Waste, pl. 39. And in general, if the tenant suffer the house to be wasted, he cannot justify the felling of timber to repair it. 1 Inst. 53, b. If a house be ruinous at the time of the lease, though the lessee is not bound to repair it, yet he may cut trees to repair it. 1 Inst. 54, b. The tenant may likewise dig for gravel or clay for the reparation of the house, though the soil was not open when the tenant came in; and it is justifiable as well as cutting of trees. 1 Inst. 53, b. So, with regard to a stable, if it fall without default of the lessee, in time of the lessor, the lessee may take trees of the heir to make a new stable, if it be of necessity. Bro. Waste, pl. 67. But if the stable falls in default of the lessee in time of the lessor, he cannot, in time of the heir, cut trees to make a new stable. Bro. Waste, pl. 67.

It has been agreed, that tenant for years may cut wood; but it has been doubted if tenant at will may; but it seems that as long as tenant at will is not countermanded he may cut seasonable wood, &c. Bro. Waste, pl. 114.

If the lessee covenant that he will leave the wood at the end of the term as he found it; if the lessee cut down the trees, the lessor shall presently have an action of covenant; for it is not possible for him to leave the trees at the end of the term. So that the impossibility of performing the covenant shall give a present action on a future covenant. But it is otherwise in the case of a house; for there, though the lessee commit waste, yet he may repair the waste done before the term expires. 5 Rep. 21.

If, during the estate of a mere tenant for life, timber is severed either by accident or wrong, it belongs to the first person who has a vested estate of inheritance; but where there are intermediate contingent estates of inheritance, and the timber is cut down by a combination between the tenant for life and the person who has the next vested estate of inheritance; or if the tenant for life has himself such estate, and sells timber, in these cases the chancellor will order it to be preserved for him who has the first contingent estate of inheritance under the settlement. 3 Cox's P. Wms. 267; 3 Woodd. 400. See further, post, II. IV.

WASTE IN DIGGING for gravel, mines, &c.—If the tenant digs for gravel, lime, clay, brick, earth, or stone, hid in the ground; or for mines of metal or coal, or the like, not being open at the time of the lease, it is waste. 1 Inst. 53, b. If a man hath land in which there is a mine of coals, or the like, and maketh a lease of the land (without mentioning any mines) for life or for years, the lessee, as to such mines as were open at the time of the lease made, may dig and take the profits thereof. But he cannot dig for any new mine that was not open at the time of the lease made, for that would be adjudged waste. Likewise, if there be open mines in the land, and the owner leases it to another, with the mines in it, he may dig in the open mines, but not in the close mines; but otherwise it would be if there was not any open mine there; for then the lessee might dig for mines, otherwise the grant would take no effect. 1 Inst. 54, b. If lessee dig slate-stone out of the land, it is waste; so digging for stones, unless in a quarry, is waste, though the lessee fill it up again. 2 Roll. Abr. 816; On. 66. Likewise, if he have a lease of land, in which there was a coal mine, but not open at the time of the lease; if the lessee open it, and assigns his interest, it is still waste in the assignee; but where the lease is of lands, and all mines in it, there he may dig in it. 5 Rep. 12, a, b.

But if lessee of land, with mines of coals, iron, and stone, digs the coals, iron, and stones, so much as is necessary for him to use without selling, it is not waste. If a lessee digs earth, and carries it out of the land, action of waste lies. 2 Roll. Abr. 806. If a lessee digs for gravel or clay for reparation of the house, not being open at the time of the lease, it is not waste, any more than the cutting of trees for reparation. 1 Inst. 53, b.

If a man leases lands with general words of "all mines of coals," where there is not any mine of coals open at the time of the demise, and after the lessee opens a mine, he cannot justify the cutting of timber-trees for making punchcoons, corses, rollescops, and other utensils in and about the mine, though without them he could not dig and get the coals out of the mine; and this is like a new house built after the demise, for the reparation of which he cannot take timber upon the land; and it had been waste to open it, if it had not been granted by express words. And it was said by Hobart, that the law had been the same if the mine was open at the time of the demise. Hobart, 296; Hut. 19. See further, Mines.

WASTE IN GARDENS, orchards, fish-ponds, dove-houses, parks, &c.—If the tenant cut down or destroy any fruit-trees growing in the garden or orchard, it is waste; but if such trees grow upon any of the ground which the tenant holdeth out of the garden or orchard, it is no waste. 1 Inst. 53, a. Breking a hedge also is no waste. 1 Inst. 53 a. Destruction of saffron-heads in a garden is not waste. Bro. Waste, pl. 143. cites 10 Hen. 7. c. 2. But ploughing up strawberry beds by an outgoing tenant has been held to be waste. 1 Camp. 227.

If the tenant of a dove-house, warren, park, vivary, estanges, or such like, takes so many that so much stone is not left as he found at the time of the demise, it is waste. 1 Inst. 53, a; Hob. Rep. c. 296. Likewise, if the lessee of a pigeon-house stops the holes, that the pigeons cannot build, it is waste. So suffering the pales of a park to decay, whereby the deer are dispersed, is waste. 1 Inst. 53, a. Also, if the lessee of a hop ground plough it up and sow grain there, it is waste. Om. 66. Moyle v. Moyle. The breaking a weare, or the banks of a fishpond, is waste. Om. 66.

WASTE with respect to Houses. Waste may be done in houses, by pulling them down or prostrating them, or by suffering the same to be uncovered, whereby the spars or rafters, planchers or other timber of the house, are rotten. 1 Inst. 53, a. Default of coverture of an house is waste, though the timber be standing. 2 Roll. Abr. 815. But, if the house be uncovered when the tenant cometh in, it is no waste in the tenant to suffer the same to fall down. Though there be no timber growing upon the ground, yet the tenant, at his peril, must keep the houses from wasting. 1 Inst. 53, a.

If a lessee raises the house, and builds a new house, if it be not so long and wide as the other, it is waste. 2 Roll. Abr. 815. So if he rebuild it larger it is waste, for it will be more charge for the lessor to repair. 1 Inst. 53, a.

But, if a lessee of land makes a new house upon the land where there was not any before, this is not waste; for it is for the benefit of the lessor. 2 Roll. Abr. 815. Though, according to Coke, if the tenant build a new house, it is waste; and if he suffer it to be wasted, it is a new waste. Yet, if the house be prostrated by enemies or the like, without default of the tenant, or was ruinous at his coming in, and fall down, the tenant may build the same again with such materials as remain, and with the other timber, which he may take growing on the ground, for his habitation; but he must not make the house larger than it was. 2 Roll. Abr. 815; 1 Inst. 53, a.

If the house be uncovered by tempest, the tenant must in convenient time repair it. 1 Inst. 53, a. If a lessee flings down a wall between a parlour and a chamber, by which he makes a parlour more large, it is waste; it cannot be intended for the benefit of the lessor, nor is it in the power of the lessee to transpose the house. 2 Roll. Abr. 815. So, if he pulls down a partition between chamber and chamber, it is waste. Bro. Waste, 143. Or if a lessee pulls down a hall or parlour, and makes a stable of it, it is waste. If a lessee pulls down a garret over head, and makes it all one and the same thing, it is waste. If a lessee permits a chamber fore in decasu pro defectu plaustrationis, per quod grossum maheremium devenit putridum, et camera illa turpissima et foetissima devenit, action of waste lies for it. So, if a lessee permits the wall to be in decay for default of daubing, per quod maheremium devenit putridum, action of waste lies. 2 Roll. Abr. 815. Breaking of a pale or of a wall uncovered, is not waste. But breaking of a wall covered with thatch, and of a pale of timber covered, is waste. Bro. Waste, pl. 94.

If the tenant do, or suffer, waste to be done in his houses, yet if he repair them before any action brought, there lieth no action of waste against him; but he cannot plead quod non facit vastum, but the special matter. 1 Inst. 53, a.

It may be of use here to add something on the progress of the law as to the accidental burning of houses, so far as regards landlord and tenant. At the common law, lessees were not answerable to landlords for accidental or negligent burning; for as to fires by accident, it is so expressed in Fleta, lib. 1. c. 12; and Lady Shrewsbury's case, 5 Rep. 13 b., is a direct authority to prove that tenants are equally excusable for fires by negligence. Then came the statute of Gloucester, (6 E. 1.) which by making tenants for life and years liable to waste without any exception, consequently rendered them answerable for destruction by fire. Thus stood the law in Lord Coke's time. But now, by 6 Ann. c. 31. [the provisions of which are contained in the last building act, see tit. Fire,] the ancient law is restored, and the distinction introduced by the statute of Gloucester, between tenants at will and other lessees, is taken away; for the statute exempts all persons from actions for accidental fire in any house, except in the case of special agreements between landlord and tenant. So much relates to tenants coming in by act or agreement of parties.—As to tenants of particular estates coming in by act of law, as tenant by the curtesy, tenant in dower, and (before the statute taking away military tenures) guardian in chivalry; these, or at least the two latter, being, at common law, punishable for waste, were therefore responsible for losses by fire; unless, indeed, they were answerable for waste voluntarily only, and not for waste permissive; a distinction not found in the books. If these tenants in curtesy or dower were, at common law, responsible for accidental fire, it may, some time or other, become necessary to determine whether they are within the statute of Anne. The statute in expression is very general, and seems calculated to take away all actions in cases of accidental fire, as well from other persons as from landlords.

It was doubted on the statute of Anne, whether a covenant to repair generally extended to the case of fire, and so became an agreement within the statute. 1 Inst. 57, in n.

But where, since the statute, a lessee covenanted for himself and his assignees to repair the premises demised, the assignee of the lease was held bound to repair notwithstanding the premises had been destroyed by fire. 2 Chitty's Rep. 602.

And if a lessee covenants to pay rent, and to repair, with an express exception of casualties by fire, he may be obliged to pay rent during the whole term, though the premises are burned down by accident, and never rebuilt by the lessor. 1 T. R. 310. See ante, tit. Covenant, Lease, Rent.

WASTE in things annexed to the FREEHOLD.—The removing a post in a house is waste. 42 Edw. 3. 6. So the removing of a door. 1 Inst. 53. Or of a window. 42 Edw. 3. 6. The digging up a furnace annexed to the frank-tenement, and selling it, is waste. Bro. Waste, pl. 143. The removing of a bench is waste, though annexed by the tenant himself. Bro. Waste, pl. 143; 1 Inst. 53 a. But these are such trifles that a landlord would now scarcely obtain a verdict in an action of waste, it being so very penal, unless very great injury was done by the act. As to the furnace he might maintain trover for the value. If wainscot, annexed to the house, be taken away, it is waste. 1 Inst. 53 a. Of tables dormant and fixed in the land, and not to the walls by the tennor, and taken off within his term, waste does not lie; for the house is not impaired by it. Bro. Waste, pl. 104.

Beating down a wooden wall, or suffering a brick wall to fall, is no waste, unless it be expressly alleged that the walls were coped or covered. If waste be assigned in pulling up a plank floor, and mangers of a stable, the plaintiff must show that the same were fixed. Dyer, 108 b. pl. 31. If lessee erects a partition, he cannot break it down without being liable to an action of waste, for he has joined it to the frank-tenement. Mo. 178. Shelves are parcel of the house, and not to be taken away; and though it is not shown that the shelves were fixed, it ought to be intended that they were fixed. 2 Bulst. 113. Pavement is a structure, for they use lime to finish. Id. ib. If the tenant suffers the groomsels to waste, in his default of defence or removing the water from off them, or through dirt or dung, or other nuisance, which lies or hangs upon it, the tenant shall be charged, for he is bound to keep it in as good case as he took it. Owen, 43.

The law, upon this part of the subject, has been relaxed, for during the term the tenant may take away chimney-pieces or wainscot which he has put up; but not after the term, for he would then be a trespasser. 1 Atk. 477. A fire-engine erected by tenant for life shall go to his executor. 3 Atk. 13. But the rule is different between the heir and executor, with regard to fixtures upon the inheritance, that descend to the heir. 1 H. Blk. 258. See further, Fixtures, Heir, III. 3.

It may be observable in general, that waste which ensues from the act of God is excusable, or rather it is no waste. Thus if a house falls by tempest, the tenant shall be excused in action of waste; but if it be uncovered by tempest, and stands there, if the tenant has sufficient timber to repair it, and does not, the lessor, if the lease be made on condition of re-entry for waste, may re-enter, but not immediately upon the tempest, for it is no waste until the tenant suffers it to be so long unrepaired that the timber be rotted, and then it is waste. Bro. Cond. pl. 40.

Likewise if a house be abated by lightning, or thrown down by a great wind, it is not waste. 1 Inst. 53 a. So if apple-trees are torn up by a great wind, if lessee afterwards cuts them, it is not waste. Bro. Waste, pl. 39. If the banks are well repaired by the lessee, and the water notwithstanding subverts them, and surrounds his meadow, by which it is become rushy, it is not waste. 2 Rol. Abr. 280; contra, 20 Hen. 6. c. 1 b.

II. 1. The persons who are injured by waste are such as have some interest in the estate wasted; for if a man be the absolute tenant in fee-simple, without any incumbrance or charge on the premises, he may commit whatever waste his own indiscretion may prompt him to, without being impeachable and accountable for it to any one. And though his heir is sure to be the sufferer, yet nemo est hæres viventis; no man is certain of succeeding him, as well on account of the uncertainty which shall die first, as also because he has it in his own power to constitute what heir he pleases, according to the civil law notion of an hæres natus and an hæres factus; or in the more accurate phraseology of our English law, he may alien or devise his estate to whomever he thinks proper, and by such alienation or devise may disinherit his heir at law. Into whose hands soever therefore the estate wasted comes, after a tenant in fee-simple, though the waste is undoubtedly damnum, it is damnum absque injuriâ. 3 Comm. c. 14.

One species of interest, which is injured by waste, is that of a person who has a right of common in the place wasted, especially if it be common of estovers, or a right of cutting and carrying away wood for house-bote, plough-bote, &c.: here, if the owner of the wood demolishes the whole wood, and thereby destroys all possibility of taking estovers, this is an injury to the commoner, amounting to no less than a disseisin of his common of estovers, if he chooses so to consider it, for which he formerly had his remedy to recover possession and damages by assize if entitled to a free-hold in such common; but if he has only a chattel-interest, then he can only recover damages by an action on the case for this waste and destruction of the woods out of which his estovers were to issue. F. N. B. 59; 9 Rep. 112.

But the most usual and important interest that is hurt by this commission of waste, is that of him who hath the remainder or reversion of the inheritance after a particular estate for life or years in being. Here, if the particular tenant (be it the tenant in dower or by curtesy, who was answerable for waste at the common law, 2 Inst. 299; or the lessee for life or years, who was first made liable by the statutes of Marlebridge, 52 Hen. 3. c. 23, and of Gloucester, 6 Edw. 1. c. 5.) if such particular tenant commits or suffers any waste, it is a manifest injury to him that has the inheritance, as it tends to mangle and dismember it of its most desirable incidents and ornaments, among which timber and houses may justly be reckoned the principal. To him therefore in remainder or reversion, to whom the inheritance appertains in expectancy, the law hath given an adequate remedy. Co. Litt. 63. For he who hath the remainder for life only is not entitled to sue for waste, since his interest may never perhaps come into possession, and then he hath suffered no injury.

Yet a parson, vicar, archdeacon, prebendary, and the like, who are seised in right of their churches of any remainder or reversion, might have had an action of waste; for they, in many cases, have for the benefit of the church and of the successor, a fee-simple qualified: but as they are not seised in their own right, the writ of waste did not lay ad exhæredationem ipsius, as for other tenants in fee-simple; but ad exhæredationem ecclesiæ, in whose right the fee-simple is holden. 1 Inst. 341; 3 Comm. c. 14.

The writ of waste is now abolished, but the persons by whom it might have been maintained may still have a remedy at law by an action on the case in the nature of a writ of waste, which has long been the ordinary course of proceeding (see post, III.) The instances given in former editions of this work, of cases in which the writ of waste might be supported, are in a great measure retained, as although no longer applicable to that action, they contain and illustrate the general doctrine upon the subject of waste.

By 18 Edw. 1. c. 22. the action of waste was given to one tenant in common against another. Where there are tenants in common for life, the one should not have trespass of trees cut against the other, but should have waste pro indiviso, though they were only tenants for term of life, &c. Bro. Waste, pl. 79. If one coparcener, before partition, made feoffment to another, and one of them did waste in the trees, waste lay. 11 Rep. 49 a, Lifford's case. See post, III.

By 20 Edw. 1. st. 2. an action of waste was maintainable by the heir for waste done in the time of his ancestor, as well as for waste done in his own time.

This action must have been brought by him that had the immediate estate and inheritance in fee-simple or fee-tail, but sometimes another might join with him. 1 Inst. 53 a, 285 a. It is said that the reversion must have continued in the same state that it was at the time of the waste done, and not been granted over; for though the reversion took the estate back again, the action was gone, because the estate did not continue. But in some special cases an action of waste lay, though the lessor had nothing in the reversion at the time of the waste done; as if a bishop made a lease for life or years, and died, and the lessee, the see being void, did waste, the successor should have an action of waste: this was allowed, though the 20 Edw. 1. spoke only of those that were inheritors. 1 Inst. 53 b, 356 a; 2 Rol. Abr. 825.

If a tenant did waste, and he in reversion died, the heir should not have an action of waste, for waste done in the life of the ancestor; for he could not say that the waste was done to his disinherison, &c. 1 Inst. 341 a, 53 b, 356 a. If a lease was made to A. for life, the remainder to B. for life, remainder to C. in fee, no action of waste lay against the first lessee during the estate in the mean remainder, for then his estate would have been destroyed. Otherwise if B. had had a mean remainder for years, for that would have been no impediment, the recovery not destroying the term of years. 5 Rep. 76, 77; 1 Inst. 54 a.

No person was entitled to an action of waste against a tenant for life but he who had the immediate estate of inheritance in remainder or reversion expectant upon the estate for life. If, therefore, between the estate of the tenant for life, who committed waste, and the subsequent estate of inheritance, there was interposed an estate of freehold to any person in esse, then during the continuance of such interposed estate the action of waste was suspended; and if the first tenant for life died during the continuance of such interposed estate, the action was gone for ever. But though while there was an estate for life interposed between the estate of the person committing waste, and that of the reversioner or remainder-man in fee, the remainder-man could not bring his action of waste; yet if the waste were done by cutting down trees, &c. such remainder-man in fee might and may still seize them; and if they are taken away or made use of before he seizes them, he may bring an action of trover. For in the eye of the law a remainder-man for life has not the property of the thing wasted; and even a tenant for life in possession has not the absolute property of it, but merely a right to the enjoyment or benefit of it, as long as it is annexed to the inheritance of which it is considered a part, and therefore belongs to the owner of the fee. 1 Inst. 218 b, in note, refers to 1 Inst. 53; 5 Rep. 77, Paget's case, All. 81; 3 P. Wms. 267; 22 Vin. Abr. 523; 2 Eq. Abr. 727; 3 Atk. 757.

If lessee for years committed waste, and the years expired, yet the lessor should have an action of waste for treble damages, though he could not recover the place wasted; but if the lessor accepted of a surrender of a lease after the waste done, he should not have his action of waste. It is said, that if a tenant repaired before action brought, he in reversion could not have had an action of waste; but he could not plead that he did no waste, therefore he must have pleaded the special matter. 1 Inst. 283 a, 285 a, 306; 5 Rep. 119; 2 Cro. 658.

By the 11 Hen. 6. c. 5. where tenants for life, or for another's life, or for years, granted over their estates, and took their profits to their own use, and committed waste, they in reversion might have had an action of waste against them. 2 Inst. 302. He in the remainder, as well as the reversioner, might have brought this action; and every assignee of the first lessee, mediate or immediate, was within this act. 5 Rep. 77; 2 Inst. 302.

2. By the feudal law, feuds being originally granted for life only, the rule was general for all vassals and feudatories; "si vassallus feudum dissipaverit, aut insigni detrimento deterius fecerit, privabitur." Wright. 44. See Tenures. But in our ancient common law the rule was by no means so large, for not only he that was seized of an estate of inheritance might do as he pleased with it, but also waste was not punishable in any tenant, save only in three persons,—guardian in chivalry, tenant in dower, and tenant by the curtesy; and not in tenant for life or years. And it was even a doubt whether waste was punishable at the common law in tenant by the curtesy. Regist. 72; Bro. Abr. tit. Waste; 2 Inst. 301. The reason of this diversity was, that the estate of the three former was created by the act of the law itself, which therefore gave a remedy against them; but tenant for life, or for years, came in by the demise and lease of the owner of the fee, and therefore he might have provided against the committing of waste by his lessee; and if he did not, it was his own default. 2 Inst. 299. But in favour of the owners of the inheritance the statutes of Marlebridge, 52 Hen. 3. c. 23. and of Gloucester, 6 Edw. 1. c. 5. provided that the writ of waste should not only lie against tenants by the law of England, (or curtesy,) and those in dower, but against any farmer or other that held in any manner, for life or years. So that for above five hundred years past all tenants merely for life, or for any less estate, have been punishable or liable to be impeached for waste, both voluntary and permissive, unless their leases be made, as sometimes they are, without impeachment of waste, absque impeditioe vasti; that is, with a provision or protection that no man shall impetere or sue him for waste committed. But tenant in tail, after possibility of issue extinct, is not impeachable for waste, because his estate was at its creation an estate of inheritance, and so not within the statutes. Co. Litt. 27; 2 Roll. Abr. 826, 828. Neither did an action of waste lie for the debtor against tenant by statute, recognition, or elegit; because against them the debtor may set off the damages in account. Co. Litt. 54. But it seems reasonable that it should have laid for the reversioner expectant on the determination of the debtor's own estate, or of those estates derived from the debtor's own estate, or of those estates derived from the debtor, F. N. B. 58; 2 Comm. c. 18.

Though it has been said that an action of waste did not lie against tenant by statute-merchant, elegit, or staple, because it was not an estate for life or years, and the statute mentioned those who held in any manner for life or years; yet see contrâ, Fitz. Nat. 58 H. and there said, that in the register was a writ against him. 6 Rep. 37. Some books give the reason of it to be, because the conusor, if he committed waste, might have had a venire facias ad computandum, and the waste should be recovered in the debt. Fitzh. N. B. 58 b. See 1 Inst. 57 b, in notis.

The statute of Marlebridge, 52 Hen. 3. c. 23. § 2. enacted, that "farmers, during their terms, shall not make waste, sale, nor exile of houses, woods, and men, nor of any thing belonging to the tenements that they have to farm, without special licence had by writing of covenant, making mention that they may do it; which thing if they do, and thereof be convict, they shall yield full damage, and shall be punished by amerciamment grievously."

This act provided remedy for waste done by lessee for life or lessee for years; and it was the first statute that gave remedy in those cases. 2 Inst. 145. This statute is a penal law; and yet, because it is a remedial law, it has been interpreted by equity. 10 Mod. 281.

Farmers.] Here farmers comprehend all such as hold by lease for life or lives, or for years by deed or without deed. 2 Inst. 145. It was resolved, likewise, that it extended to strangers. 10 Mod. 281. Although the Register says, sciand. that per statutum de Marlebridge, c. 23. data fuit quædam prohibitio vasti versus tenementum annorum, which was true; yet the statute extended to farmers for life also; but this act extends not to tenant by the curtesy, for he is not a farmer; but if a lease be made for life or years, he is a farmer, though no rent be reserved. 2 Inst. 145.

Shall not make waste.] By these words they are prohibited to suffer waste; for it was resolved that this act extends to waste omittendo, though the word is faciant, which literally imports active waste. 10 Mod. 281.

Nor of any thing.] Houses, woods, and men, were before particularly named; and these words comprehend lands and meadows belonging to the farm. 2 Inst. 146. Also these general words have a further signification; and therefore if there had been a farmer for life or years of a manor, and a tenancy had escheated, this tenancy so escheated did belong to the tenement that he held in farm, and therefore this extended to it; and the lessor should have had a writ generally, and suppose a lease made of the lands escheated by the lessor, and maintain it by the special matter. 2 Inst. 146.

Special Licence by Writing.] This grant ought to be by deed, for all waste tends to the disinheritation of the lessor, and therefore no man can claim to be dispensable of waste without deed. 2 Inst. 146. Likewise this special grant is intended to be absque impeditioe vasti, without impeachment of waste. 2 Inst. 146.

Writ full Damage.] And this must be understood such a prohibition of waste upon this statute as lay against a tenant in dower at the common law; and single damages were given by this statute against lessee for life and lessee for years. 2 Inst. 146.

It has been said that there were five writs of waste; two at the common law, as for waste done by tenant in dower, or by guardian; three by statute, as against tenant for life, tenant for years, and tenant by the curtesy. Tenant by the curtesy, it is said, was punishable for waste by the common law, for that the law created his estate as well as that of the tenant in dower, and therefore the law gave the like remedy against them. 1 Inst. 54 a; 2 Inst. 145, 299, 301, 305. But on this subject the authorities in the books are very contradictory, as the reader will perceive by attending to the note subjoined to the following clause of the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. 1. c. 5. which enacted, that a man from henceforth should have a writ of waste in the Chancery against him that held by the law of England, or otherwise for term of life or for term of years, or a woman in dower.

No action of waste lay before the statute of Gloucester, but against tenant in dower and guardian; and by the statute action of waste was given against the tenant by the curtesy, tenant for term of life, and tenant for term of years. Bro. Waste, pl. 88. Lord Coke says a reason is required (that seeing as well the estate of the tenant by the curtesy as the tenant in dower are created by act in law) wherefore the prohibition of waste did not lie as well against tenant by the curtesy as the tenant in dower at the common law; and the reason he assigns is this, for that by having issue the estate of the tenant by the curtesy is originally created, and yet after that he shall do homage alone in the life of the wife, which proves a larger estate; and seeing that at the creation of his estate he might do waste, the prohibition of waste lay not against him after his wife's decease; but in the case of tenant in dower she is punishable of waste at the first creation of her estate. 2 Inst. 145. But see 2 Inst. 299. and the reasons there, as quoted above.

Neither this act nor the statute of Marlebridge created new kind of wastes, but gave new remedies for old wastes; and what is waste, and what is not, must be determined by the common law. 2 Inst. 300, 301.

Against him.] If two are joint tenants for years or for life, and one of them does waste, this is the waste of them both as to the place wasted, notwithstanding the words of the act are him that holds. 2 Inst. 302.

Holds by the Law of England.] Here tenant by the curtesy was named for two causes: 1st, For that albeit the common opinion was, that an action of waste did lie against him, yet some doubted of the same in respect to this word (tenet) in the writ, for that the tenant by the curtesy did not hold of the heir, but of the lord paramount; and after this act the writ of waste grounded thereupon recited this statute. 2dly, For that greater penalties were inflicted by this act than were at the common law. 2 Inst. 301.

Or otherwise for Term of Life or Term of Years.] A lessee for his own life, or for another man's life, is within the words and meaning of this law, and in this point this act introduces that which was not at the common law. 2 Inst. 301.

He that has an estate for life by conveyance at common law, or by limitation of use, is a tenant within the statute. 2 Inst. 302. Tenant for years of a moiety, third or fourth part pro indiviso, is within this act; and so it is of a tenant by the curtesy, or other tenant for life of a moiety, &c. 2 Inst. 302.

Of a Woman in Dower.] If tenant in dower were of a manor, and a copyholder thereof committed waste, an action of waste lay against tenant in dower. 2 Inst. 303. Action of waste lay against an occupant life because he had the estate of the lessee for life, and held for life, as the statute mentioned. 6 Rep. 37 b. If a lessee for life were attainted of treason, by which the lease was forfeited to the king, who granted it over to I. S. and he afterwards did waste, though he came en le post, yet action of waste lay against him. 2 Roll. Abr. 826. So if a man disseised the tenant for life, and did waste, yet action of waste lay against the tenant for term of life; for he might have had his remedy over against the disseisor. Bro. Waste, pl. 138. Likewise if an estate were made to A. and his heirs during the life of B., A. died, the heir of A. should be punished in an action of waste. 1 Inst. 54 a.

If a man make a lease for years, and put out the lessee, and make a lease for life, and the lessee for years enters upon the lessee for life, and does waste, the lessee for life shall not be punished for it. 2 Inst. 303. If lessee for years make a lease of one moiety to A. and of the other moiety to B., and A. does waste, the action shall be against both, for the waste of the one is the waste of the other. Brownl. 38.

An action of waste lay against a devisee, and the writ might suppose it ex legatione, for it was within the equity of the statute. Bro. Waste, pl. 132. If an estate of land were made to baron and feme, to hold to them during the coverture, &c., if they wasted, the feoffor should have had a writ of waste against them. Lut. § 381. If feme lessee for life married, and the husband did waste, action lay against both. And if, in the above case, the husband died, action of waste lay against the feme for the waste he committed. But if tenant in dower married, and the husband did waste, and died, the feme should not be punished for this. Likewise if baron and feme were lessees for life, and baron did waste, and died, the feme should be punished in waste, if she agreed to the estate. 2 Roll. Abr. 827; 1 Inst. 54; Kel. 113. But if she waived the estate, she should not be charged. So upon lease for years made to the baron and feme, waste lay against both. And if baron and feme were joint lessees for years, and baron did waste, and died, action of waste lay for this against the feme. Upon lease for life to baron and feme, waste lay against both. Likewise if feme committed waste, and then married, the action should be brought against both. 2 Roll. Abr. 827. And the writ might be quod fecerunt vastum, or quod uxor, dum sola fuit, fecit vastum. Bro. Waste, pl. 55.

If baron seised for life in right of his wife did waste, and after the feme died, no action of waste lay against the baron in the tenuit, because he was seised only in right of his wife, and the frank-tenement was in the feme. 1 Inst. 54; 5 Rep. 75 b. But if the baron, possessed for years in right of the feme, did waste, and after the feme died, action of waste lay against the baron, because the law gave the term to him. 1 Inst. 54. See Godb. 4, 5, pl. 6; Om. 49.

Few cases, if any, can now happen of waste or injury done to premises, but the landlord, or person who has the inheritance, or even he who has a longer term in the premises, or who is himself liable to answer over, may maintain an action on the case, in nature of an action of waste, against the person committing the injury, for damages. See post, III. IV.

All tenants merely for life, or for any less estate, are punishable or liable to be impeached for waste both voluntary and permissive, unless their leases be made without impeachment of waste, that is, with a provision or protection that no man shall sue them for waste committed; but the words "without impeachment of waste," will not permit a tenant for life to unlead a house and pull down the tiles. 1 T. R. 55, n.

But a tenant for life, without impeachment of waste, has as full power of cutting down timber, and of opening new mines for his own use, as if he had an estate of inheritance; and is in the same manner entitled to the timber, if severed by others. 1 T. R. 56; 1 Inst. 220, n. And a tenant in tail after possibility, &c. has equally with such tenant for life an interest and property in the timber. 15 Ves. 419. But although such tenant for life may commit waste for his own benefit, yet he (and also a tenant in tail after possibility, &c.) may be restrained by an injunction out of the Court of Chancery, from making spoil and destruction on the estate. This distinction was first introduced in the case of Lord Barnard as to Raby Castle. See post, IV.

III. THE Punishment for waste committed was, by common law and the statute of Marlebridge, only single damages, except in the case of a guardian, who also forfeited his wardship by the provisions of the great charter. 2 Inst. 146, 300; Mag. Charta, c. 4. But the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edm. 1. c. 5. directed that the other four species of tenants (for life, for years, by curtesy, or in dower) should lose and forfeit the place wherein the waste is committed, and also treble damages, to him that had the inheritance. The expression of the statute was, "he shall forfeit the thing which he hath wasted;" and it was determined, that under these words the place was also included. 2 Inst. 303. And if waste were done sparsim, or here and there, all over a wood, the whole wood should be recovered; or if in several rooms of a house, the whole house should be forfeited; because it was impracticable for the reversioner to enjoy only the identical places wasted, when lying interspersed with the other. Co. Litt. 54. But if waste were done only in one end of a wood (or perhaps in one room of a house, if that could be conveniently separated from the rest,) that part only was the locus vastatus, or thing wasted, and that only should be forfeited to the reversioner. 2 Inst. 304; 2 Comm. c. 18.

The redress for this injury of waste was of two kinds; preventive and corrective; the former of which was by writ of estrepement, the latter by that of waste.

Estrepement is an old French word, signifying the same as waste or extirpation: and the writ of estrepement lay at the common law, after judgment obtained in an action real, and before the possession was delivered by the sheriff, to stop any waste which the vanquished party might be tempted to commit in lands, which were determined to be no longer his. 2 Inst. 328. But as in some cases the demandant might be justly apprehensive, that the tenant might make waste or estrepement pending the suit, well knowing the weakness of his title, therefore the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. 1. c. 13. gave another writ of estrepement, pendente placito, commanding the sheriff firmly to inhibit the tenant "ne faciat vastum vel estrepamentum pendente placito dicto indissoluto." Regist. 77. And, by virtue of either of these writs, the sheriff might resist them that did, or offer to do, waste; and, if otherwise he could not prevent them, he might lawfully imprison the wasters, or make a warrant to others to imprison them. Or, if necessity required, he might take the posse comitatús to his assistance. So odious in the sight of the law was waste and destruction. 2 Inst. 329; 3 Comm. c. 14. See further, Estrepement.

A writ of waste was also an action, partly founded upon the common law, and partly upon the statute of Gloucester, c. 5; and might be brought by him who had the immediate estate of inheritance in reversion or remainder, against the tenant for life, tenant in dower, tenant by the curtesy, or tenant for years. This action was also maintainable in pursuance of stat. Westm. 2. (13 Edw. 1. c. 22.) by one tenant in common of the inheritance against another, who made waste in the estate holden in common. The equity of which statute extended to joint-tenants, but not to co-parceners; because by the old law co-parceners might make partition, whenever either of them thought proper, and thereby prevent future waste: but tenants in common and joint-tenants could not; and therefore the statute gave them this remedy, compelling the defendant either to make partition, and take the place wasted to his own share, or to give security not to commit any farther waste. 2 Inst. 403, 404. But these tenants in common and joint-tenants were not liable to the penalties of the statute of Gloucester, which extended only to such as had life-estates, and did waste to the prejudice of the inheritance. The waste however must have been something considerable; for if it amounted only to twelve pence, or some such petty sum, the plaintiff should not recover in an action of waste; nam de minimis non curat lex. Finch. L. 29; 3 Comm. c. 14.

This action of waste was a mixed action; partly real, so far as it recovered land, and partly personal, so far as it recovered damages: for it was brought for both those purposes; and, if the waste were proved, the plaintiff should recover the thing or place wasted, and also treble damages, by the statute of Gloucester. The writ of waste called upon the tenant to appear and show cause, why he had committed waste and destruction in the place named, ad exheredationem, to the disinherison, of the plaintiff. F. N. B. 55. And if the defendant made default, or did not appear at the day assigned him, then the sheriff was to take with him a jury of twelve men, and go in person to the place alleged to be wasted, and there inquire of the waste done, and the damages: and make a return or report of the same to the court, upon which report the judgment was founded. Poph. 24. For the law would not suffer so heavy a judgment, as the forfeiture and treble damages, to be passed upon a mere default, without full assurance that the fact was according as it was stated in the writ. But if the defendant appeared to the writ, and afterwards suffers judgment to go against him by default, or upon a nilhil dicit (when he made no answer, put in no plea, in defence,) this amounted to a confession of the waste; since, having once appeared, he could not now pretend ignorance of the charge. Then therefore the sheriff should not go to the place to inquire of the fact, whether any waste had, or had not, been committed; for this was already ascertained by the silent confession of the defendant: but he should only, as in defaults upon other actions, make inquiry of the quantum of damages. Cro. Eliz. 18, 290. The defendant, on the trial, might give in evidence any thing that proves there was no waste committed, as that the destruction happened by lightning, tempest, the king's enemies, or other inevitable accident, Co. Litt. 58. But it was no defence to say, that a stranger did the waste, for against him the plaintiff had no remedy: though the defendant was entitled to sue such stranger in an action of trespass vi et armis, and shall recover the damages he has suffered in consequence of such unlawful act. Bull. N. P. 112.

When the waste and damages were thus ascertained, either by confession, verdict, or inquiry of the sheriff, judgment was given, in pursuance of the statute of Gloucester, c. 5. that the plaintiff should recover the place wasted; for which he had immediately a writ of seisin, provided the particular estate were still subsisting: (for, if it were expired, there could be no forfeiture of the land,) and also that the plaintiff should recover treble the damages assessed by the jury; which he must have obtained in the same manner as all other damages, in actions personal and mixed, were obtained, whether the particular estate were expired, or still in being. 3 Comm. c. 14.

The process incident to actions of waste was, first, a writ of summons made by the cursor of the county where the land lay, and on their return of this writ the defendant might esoin, and the plaintiff adjourn, &c. Then a pone was made out by the filazer of the county, on the return of which a distringas issued for the defendant to appear, and upon his appearing the plaintiff declared, and the defendant pleaded, &c. By the 8 & 9 Wm. 3. c. 11. § 2. a plaintiff should have costs in all actions of waste, where the damages found did not exceed twenty nobles, which he could not by the common law.

In an action of waste on the statute of Gloucester, against tenant for years, for converting three closes of meadow into garden ground, where the jury gave only one farthing damages for each close, the Court of Common Pleas permitted the defendant to enter up judgment for himself. 2 Bos. & Pul. 96. And see 1 Bing. 482; 1 Jac. & Walk. 851.

The action of waste had so entirely fallen into disuse, that the last two cited common law cases were probably the only modern instances in which it was brought, and it is now abolished by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27. § 36.

An action on the case, in the nature of an action for waste, has long been substituted for the ancient remedy, and it will lie between persons between whom the proper action of waste was not maintainable: but in Gibson v. Wells, 1 New Rep. 290. it was ruled by the Court of Common Pleas that this action does not lie in the case of permissive waste. See 4 Taunt. 764; 7 Taunt. 392. But see 2 Saund. 252, (n. 7); and 3 Coke R. 25, note A. (ed. by Fraser.)

By this action on the case the reversioner or remainderman for life or years may recover damages, 2 Wm's. Saund. 252, n. (7); and it has been considered maintainable against tenants at will or by sufferance, to which persons the action of waste did not as we have seen apply. Cro. Car. 187, S. C.; Sir W. Jones, 224. But against tenants at will it seems trespass and not case is the proper remedy. Ibid.; Co. Litt. 57 a; and see Mr. Hargrave's, note (1); Amos & Ferard on Fixtures, 226.

The action on the case lies also against a tenant for years after the expiration of his term. Bl. 1111. Though the lease contain an express covenant against waste, so as to give the lessor his remedy by action of covenant, he may still, if he choose, bring an action on the case against the lessee for waste done during the term. Ibid.

One of two tenants in common cannot maintain an action on the case in nature of waste against his co-tenant (in possession of the whole, having a demise of the moiety) for cutting down trees of a proper age and growth for being cut; but he will be entitled to recover a moiety of the value in another form of action: aliter, if the trees be not fit to cut. 8 T. R. 145.

A more effectual remedy against voluntary waste is in many cases attainable by injunction in equity. See post, IV.

IV. THE Courts of Equity, upon bill exhibited, therein complaining of waste and destruction, will grant an injunction, in order to stay waste, until the defendant shall have put in his answer, and the court shall thereupon make further order; which is now become the most usual way of preventing waste. 3 Comm. c. 14.

If a tenant for life plant wood on the land, which is of so poisonous a quality that it destroys the principles of vegetation, without an express power in his lease, where it is usual to have such powers, it may be considered as waste, and the Court of Chancery may grant an injunction. Bac. Abr.; MSS. Rep. Marquis of Powis v. Dorall, Canc.

If there be lessee for life, remainder for life, the reversion or remainder in fee, and the lessee in possession waste the lands, though he is not punishable for waste by the common law, by reason of the mean remainder for life; yet he shall be restrained in Chancery, for this is a particular mischief. Moor, 554; 1 Vern. 23. But if such lessee has in his lease an express clause of without impeachment of waste, he shall not be enjoined in equity. 1 Vern. 23.

If A. is tenant for life, remainder to B. for life, remainder to first and other sons of B. in tail male, remainder to B. in tail, &c.; and B. (before the birth of any son,) brings a bill against A. to stay waste; and A. demurs to this bill, because the plaintiff had no right to the trees, and no one that had the inheritance was party: yet the demurrer will be overruled, because waste is to the damage of the public, and B. is to take care of the inheritance for his children, if he has any, and has a particular interest himself, in case he comes to the estate. 1 Eq. Abr. 400.

It seems to be a general principle, that tenant in tail after possibility shall be restrained in equity from doing waste, by injunction, &c. because the court will never see a man disinherited; per Chan. Finch. And he took a diversity, where a man is not punishable for waste, and where he hath a right to do waste; and cited Uvedale's case, (24 Car. 1.) ruled by Lord Rolfe to warrant that distinction. 2 Show. 69, pl. 53.

The right to restrain tenant in tail after possibility from committing equitable waste, is as fully settled as it is in the case of tenant for life without impeachment of waste. 2 Freem. 53; 2 Eq. Ab. 757; 3 Mad. 528.

A lease without impeachment of waste takes off all restraint from the tenant of doing it; and he may, in such case, pull up or cut down wood or timber, or dig mines, &c. at his pleasure, and not be liable to any action. Plowd. 135. But though the tenant may let the houses be out of repair, and cut down trees, and convert them to his own use; yet where a tenant in fee-simple made a lease for years without impeachment of waste, it was adjudged that the lessor had still such property, that if he cut and carried away the trees, the lessee could only recover damages in action for the trespass, and not for the trees: also it hath been held, that the tenant for life without impeachment of waste, if he cuts down trees, is only exempt from an action of waste, &c. 11 Rep. 82; 1 Inst. 220; 2 Inst. 146; 6 Rep. 63; Dyer, 184. And if the words are, "to hold without impeachment of waste, or any writ or action of waste," the lessor may seize the trees if the lessee cuts them down, or bring trover for them. Wood's Inst. 574. See ante, II.

In many cases, likewise, the Court of Chancery will restrain waste, though the lease, &c. be made without impeachment of waste: for the clause of "without impeachment of waste" never was extended to allow the destruction of the estate itself, but only to excuse for permissive waste; and therefore such a clause would not give leave to fell or cut down trees ornamental or sheltering of a house, much less to destroy or demolish a house itself. And if such waste be committed, an injunction will be granted to stay the waste; and the Court of Chancery will enforce the repair by the offender. 2 Vern. 738, 739; 1 Salk. 161, Vane v. Lord Barnard. See 1 P. Wms. 527; Bac. Ab. Waste, N. (7th ed.)

There has been much uncertainty as to what is and what is not to be considered ornamental timber. The principle on which the court has gone is, that if the testator or author of the interest by deed, had gratified his own taste by planting for ornament, though he had adopted the species the most disgusting to the tenant for life, and the most agreeable to the tenant in tail, and upon the competition between those parties the court should see that the tenant for life was right and the other wrong, in point of taste, yet the taste of the testator, like his will, binds them; and it is not competent to them to substitute another species of ornament for that which the testator designed. The question which is the most fit method of clothing an estate with timber for the purpose of ornament, cannot be safely trusted to the court. Per Lord Eldon, 6 Ves. 149; and see acc. 6 Mad. 149.

And therefore it is not enough for the affidavits to ground an injunction to show that the trees are ornamental. It must be shown that they were planted or left standing for the purpose of ornament. 1 Jacob, 70.

The principle has been extended from the ornament of the house to outhouses and grounds, then to plantations, vistas, avenues, and all the rides about the estate for ten miles round; and in the case of the Marquis of Downshire v. Sandys it was held to extend to clumps of firs on a common two miles distant from the house, they having been planted for ornament. 6 Ves. 107, 419, 787.

And the court granted the injunction where the trees were planted to exclude objects from view, holding this within the principle. 16 Ves. 174, 375.

But the injunction will not be extended to trees which protect the premises from the effects of the sea. And the court refused in one case to insert in the order the words, "contributing to ornament," and the injunction was accordingly taken according to a prior case in the terms "standing for ornament or shelter." 1 Jacob, 70; 8 Ves. 375; and see 1 Jacob, 71, notd.

The subject of interposition by prohibition in the case of waste committed by ecclesiastical persons, was discussed with a degree of learning and research, in the case of Jefferson v. Bishop of Durham, 1 B. & P. 105, that makes it impossible to add any thing to what is there collected. It appears from thence, that not one of the early text writers were aware of any common law remedy against churchmen committing waste, and that the Year Book, 2 Hen. 4. contained an extrajudicial opinion of Thirning, C. J., that if a bishop or archdeacon cut down all his wood, he shall not be punished at common law. In the reign of James I., however, Lord Coke unassisted by, and indeed, contrary to all practice, sagaciously inferred from two ancient records, 1 B. & P. 109, n., that a writ of prohibition lay at common law against a churchman who committed waste; and upon these authorities in the reign of Charles I. Lord Keeper Coventry, 2 Ro. Ab. 813. issued a prohibition of waste to a churchman under the great seal, on the application of the patron. Lord Coke in one case, 1 Rol. 86, 335; 3 Bulst. 91. went so far as to say that any one might have a prohibition as well as the patron, for it was the king's writ, and any one might have a prohibition for the king. It appears, however, most satisfactorily, from a review of the doctrine collected in Jefferson v. Bishop of Durham, that Lord Coke was not justified in the extent to which he carried this doctrine; and though that case, in point of actual decision, merely establishes that the Court of Common Pleas has no power to issue an original writ of prohibition to restrain a bishop from committing waste in the possession of his see, at the suit of an uninterested person; yet it may be gathered, as the opinion of the learned person who determined it, and appears to be fairly deduced in argument, that no court of common law has the power of issuing this writ against any ecclesiastical person, but that it can only issue out of Chancery.

The parson has a fee simple, qualified and under restrictions, in right of his church: but he cannot do every thing that a private owner of the inheritance can. He may cut down timber for the repairs of the parsonage house or chan- cel: if it is the custom of the country, he may cut down underwood for any purpose, but if he grubbs it up it is waste. He may cut timber for repairing old pews that belong to the rectory, and he is entitled to votes for repairing barns and outhouses belonging to the parsonage. 2 Atk. 216. But he cannot cut down timber for any other purpose, nor can he open mines, though he may work mines already open. A bishop cannot even open mines in the possession of his see. Lord Hardwicke mentioned an application made to parliament by Talbot, bishop of Durham, to be enabled to open mines, which was refused. Amb. 176.

However, the bishops of Durham have, for a long period of years, worked by their lessees the coal and lead lying as well under the leasehold as also the copyhold lands belonging to that see; and instances have occurred in the county of Durham, of rectors likewise demising or selling the coal under the glebe lands belonging to their livings with a view to its being wrought.

Before the disabling statutes, bishops had a very extensive right of cutting timber, and consequently of granting leases without impeachment of waste. There are two instances of injunctions granted against such tenants, not on the ground of want of right in the bishops to grant such leases, but in consequence of the unconscientious use which the tenants were making of their power to commit waste. 1 P. W. 527; 2 Freem. 55; Eden on Injunctions, 201—205.

The point has been much discussed, how far ecclesiastical persons are bound specifically to apply the timber cut for the purpose of repairs, towards the actual repairs for which it was wanted: Lord Hardwicke was of opinion that they were not so restricted, Amb. 176; and Lord Eldon has observed, that it would defeat the general intention of the law, that the possessions of the church should tend to the maintenance of the church; if ecclesiastical bodies were compellable in every instance to apply the identical timber, by removing it from the most distant parts of the country in which it might happen that their property lay. 3 Meriv. 428, 522. And in a very recent case, the same doctrine was distinctly laid down by Sir T. Plumer. 2 Wils. Ch. Rep. 1.

A court of equity frequently interposes by injunction against the rector, at the suit of the patron, to stay waste. Barnard. 399; 2 Atk. 217; 1 B. & P. 115, n.; Amb. 176. Lord Hardwicke also observed, that injunctions have been granted to stay waste at the instance of the attorney-general, on behalf of the crown, the patron of bishops. Amb. 176. And though it has been said, that no precedent could be found for this, 1 B. & P. 116; yet the doctrine has been recognized both by Lord Eldon, 3 Meriv. 427, and Mr. Justice Heath. 1 B. & P. 131. So deans and chapters, it should seem, may be restrained by injunction at the suit of the crown, but not at the application of a person having no interest; and therefore where a lessee filed a bill to restrain the dean and chapter of Winchester from cutting timber, Lord Eldon was of opinion, that except so far as he might derive any right or interest under an agreement, he was clearly an uninterested stranger, and dissolved an injunction which had been obtained by him. 3 Meriv. 421.

In all those cases in which a bill for an injunction will lie, the courts of equity, upon the principle of preventing multiplicity of suits, will give an account of, and satisfaction for, waste already committed.

Lord Hardwicke, in one case, alluding to this jurisdiction, observed, that as in bills for account of assets, &c. which originally were bills for discovery, without which an account could not be had, the court, in order to make a complete decree, gave the party his debt likewise: in like manner upon bills for injunctions, a court of equity, in order to give complete relief, gave the party an account and satisfaction for the waste committed, without obliging him to bring an action at law as well as a bill in equity. 3 Atk. 263; Mitf. Tr. 96, n. This doctrine is clearly established where the account prayed is consequential to the injunction; but how far a court of equity will give an account of waste committed, and decree satisfaction, where that relief is not consequential to an injunction, is a point upon which the authorities are much at variance.

In the case of mines and collieries, which are looked upon in equity as a species of trade, a decree for an account of profits has been frequently made, although no injunction has been prayed by the bill. 1 P. W. 406; 2 Atk. 630; 3 Atk. 264; Amb. 54; 6 Ves. 89. This relief, however, is the same as the account given by a court of equity of rents and profits, and cannot be maintained upon a mere legal title. 1 Ves. 232.

A lord of a manor may bring a bill for an account of ore dug, or timber cut, by the defendant's testator. Thus, a customary tenant of lands, in which was a copper mine that never had been opened, opened the same, and dug out and sold great quantities of ore, and died; and his heir continued digging and disposing of great quantities out of the same mine. The lord of the manor brought a bill in equity against the executor and heir, praying an account of the said ore; and alleged that these customary tenants were as copyhold tenants, and that the freehold was in the plaintiff as lord of the manor and owner of the soil; and that the manner of passing the premises was by surrender into the hands of the lord, to the use of the surrenderee. It was insisted for the defendants, that it did not appear that the admittance in this case was to hold ad voluntatem domini secundum consuetudinem, &c. without which words, it was insisted, that there could be no copyhold, as had been adjudged in Lord Ch. J. Holt's time. And Lord Chan. Cowper said, it would be a reproach to equity to say, that where a man has taken another's property, as ore or timber, and disposed of it in his lifetime, and dies, there should be no remedy. 1 P. Wms. 406, pl. 112, Bishop of Winchester v. Knight. See Finch Rep. 185; 2 Vern. 263, pl. 247.

Where tenants of a manor, claiming a right of estovers, cut down a great quantity of growing timber of great value, their title being doubtful, the Court of Chancery entertained a bill, at the suit of the lord of the manor, to restrain this assertion of it. Mitf. Treat. 123, 124.

It has been said in equity, that remainder-man for life shall, in waste, recover damages in proportion to the wrong done to the inheritance, and not in proportion only to his own estate for life. 1 Vern. 158.

WASTER-BOWL, from the Sax. was-heal, i. e. health be to you.] A large silver cup or bowl, wherein the Saxons, at their entertainments, drank a health to one another, in the phrase of wass-heal. The wastel or wass-heal bowl was set at the upper end of the table of religious houses for the use of the abbot, who began the health, or poculum charitatis, to strangers, or to his fraternity. Hence cakes and fine white bread, which were usually sopped in the wastel-bowl, were called wastel-bread. Mat. Paris, 141.

WASTORS. Thieves so called; mentioned among robbers, draw-latches, &c. in 4 Hen. 4. c. 27.

WATCH. To watch is to stand sentry, or attend as a guard, &c. Watching is properly for the apprehending of rogues in the night, as warding is for the day; and for default of watch and ward the township may be punished.

Our ancient statutes direct, that in all towns, &c. between the day of Ascension and Michaelmas-day, night-watches are to be kept in every city, with six men at every gate; and six or four in towns; and every borough shall have twelve men to watch, or according to the number of the inhabitants of the place, from sun-setting to sun-rising; who are to arrest strangers suspected, and may make hue and cry after them, and justify the detaining them until the morning; and watches shall be kept on the sea-coasts, as they have been wont to be. 13 Edw. 1. st. 2. c. 4; 5 Hen. 4. c. 3.

Every justice of the peace may cause these night-watches to be duly kept; which is to be composed of men of able bodies, and sufficiently weaponed: and none but inhabitants in the same town are compellable to watch, who are bound to keep it in turn; or to find other sufficient bodies for them; or, on refusal, are indictable, &c. Co. Lit. 70; Cro. Eliz. 204.

In consequence of the outrages committed by the Luddites in Nottinghamshire and the adjoining counties, the 52 Geo. 3. c. 17. (a temporary act continued by 58 Geo. 3. c. 52, but now expired,) was passed for giving more prompt and effectual powers for enforcing the duties of watching in the night-time, and warding in the day-time, for the preservation of the peace and the protection of persons and property wherever similar outrages might be committed.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 90. for the lighting and watching of parishes in England and Wales, (but which statute is not compulsory, but may be adopted in the manner therein mentioned,) a variety of provisions is made for the watching and warding of parishes in which the act is put in force, by the appointment of watchmen, patrols, street-keepers, &c. and which watchmen and patrols are to be sworn in, and to have the same powers as constables. See further, Polac.

WATCHES. By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 52. § 58. watches impressed with any mark or stamp representing any British assay mark or stamp, or purporting to be of the manufacture of the United Kingdom, or not having the name and place of abode of some foreign maker abroad visible on the frame and also on the face, or not being in a complete state, with all the parts properly fixed in the case, may not be imported into the United Kingdom, even for the purpose of being warehoused.

WATER-BAILIFF. An officer in port towns, for the searching of ships.

In the city of London there is a water-bailiff, who has the supervising and search of fish brought thither, and the gathering of the toll arising from the Thames. He attends on the lord mayor, having the principal care of marshalling the guests at his table; and arrests men for debt, or other personal or criminal matters upon the river Thames. See 28 Hen. 6. c. 5; see also 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. lxxvi. (local act.)

WATER COMPANIES. The metropolis is at present supplied with water by eight companies, namely, the New River, Chelsea, East London, West Middlesex, and Grand Junction, on the north side of the Thames; and Lambeth, Vauxhall or South London, and Southwark water-works, on the Surrey side.

WATER, AND WATER-COURSES. The right of conducting water through one estate for the use and convenience of an adjoining estate is an incorporeal hereditament of the class of easements, or a prædial service, which was known to the civilians under the name of service aquæ ductus, (Domat's Civil Law, L. 1. T. 12.) and is of use when Seins has a scarcity of water, and requires it for watering his cattle, or his lands, or for making his mill go, or for any other such advantage to his grounds. 2 Frederican Code, 144.

The right of taking the water out of another's well or pond is an incorporeal hereditament of the class of profits, or a personal service, which was called by the civilians service aquæ haustus, which takes place when Seins has right to draw water for the use of his ground out of Caius's well or current. This service includes a right of way, in order to go to and return from the well or pond. 2 Frederican Code, 146; Domat's Civil Law, L. 1. T. 12.

I. Of the Right to Water and Water-Courses, and how acquired.

II. Of the Remedies for obstructing Water and Water-Courses.

I. It is well settled by the law of England, that water flowing in a stream is originally publici juris. By the Roman law, running water, light, and air, were considered as some of those things which had the name of res communes, and which were defined, "things the property of which belong to no person, but the use to all." 7 Bing. 692, 693.

The right to the use of water was thus defined by the late master of the rolls when vice-chancellor:—

"Prima facie, the proprietor of each bank of a stream is the proprietor of half the land covered by the stream, but there is no property in the water.

"Every proprietor has an equal right to use the water which flows in the stream, and consequently no proprietor can have the right to use the water to the prejudice of any other proprietor without the consent of the other proprietors, who may be affected by his operations. No proprietor can either diminish the quantity of water which would otherwise descend to the proprietors below, nor throw the water back upon the proprietors above. Every proprietor who claims a right either to throw the water back above, or diminish the quantity of water which is to descend below, must, in order to maintain his claim, either prove an actual grant or license from the proprietors affected by his operations, or must prove an uninterrupted enjoyment of twenty years; which term of twenty years is now adopted upon a principle of general convenience, as affording conclusive presumption of a grant." 1 Sim. & Stu. 203; and see 3 B. & Ad. 304.

The owner of the banks of a stream has a right to the advantages of that stream, flowing in its natural course, and is entitled to use it for any purpose not inconsistent with similar enjoyment in the owners above and below: and no proprietor of the banks of a stream has a right to diminish the quantity or injure the quality of the water to the detriment of the proprietors of the other parts of the banks: and the right to appropriate a stream of water, in exclusion of any owners of the banks of the stream cannot be acquired in less than twenty years. 2 N. & M. 747; 5 B. & Ad. 1.

Quære, whether such possessor of land can maintain an action for the mere violation of such general right by diversion of water, &c. without having sustained any special injury? Id.

The ordinary course of water cannot be lawfully obstructed for the benefit of one class of persons, to the injury of another: and where the occupiers of lands adjoining a canal erected artificial banks called fenders, to prevent the flood water escaping upon their lands, in consequence of which the canal banks were enlarged and the navigation obstructed, it was held that such erections could not be justified. 1 B. & Ad. 871.

So the proprietor of lands along which there is a flood stream, cannot obstruct its old course by a new water way, to the prejudice of the proprietor of lands on the opposite side. Thus, a proprietor of land on the bank of a river, who had commenced the building of a mound, which if completed would, in times of ordinary flood, have thrown the waters of the river on the grounds of a proprietor on the opposite bank, so as to overflow and injure them, was restrained by a perpetual interdict, in Scotland, from the further erection of any bulwark, or other work, which might have the effect of diverting the stream of the river, in time of flood, from its accustomed course, and throwing the same on the lands of the other proprietors; Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst observing, that it was clear beyond the possibility of a doubt, that by the law of England such an operation could not be carried on. Menzies v. Breadalbane, 3 Bligh, N. S. 414, 418.

Independently of any particular enjoyment which another has been accustomed to have, every person is entitled to the benefit of a flow in his own land, without diminution or alteration; but an adverse right may exist, founded on the occupation of another; and although the stream be either diminished in quantity, or even corrupted in quality, as by means of the exercise of certain trades, yet if the occupation of the party so taking or using it hath existed for so long a time as may raise the presumption of a grant, the other party, whose lands are below, must take the stream subject to such adverse right. Twenty years' exclusive enjoyment of water in any particular manner, affords a conclusive presumption of right in the party so enjoying it, derived from grant or act of parliament. 6 East, 208; see 1 Camp. N. P. C. 463; 1 Vent. 237; 2 Wms. Saund. 113, b.

But where the use of water left unappropriated is possessed by another, it seems that an action for an injury to the newly-acquired right may be sustained on an enjoyment for less than twenty years. The rule is, that after the erection of works, and the appropriation by the owner of the land of a certain quantity of the water flowing over it, if a proprietor of other land afterwards take what remains of the water before unappropriated, the first-mentioned owner, however he might before such second appropriation have taken to himself so much more, cannot do so afterwards. 6 East, 219; see also 1 Sim. & Stu. 203.

When a mill has been erected upon a stream for a long period of time, it gives to the owner a right that the water continue to flow to and from the mill in the manner in which it has been accustomed to flow during that time. The owner is not bound to use the water in the same precise manner, or to apply it to the same mill, unless the alterations prejudice the right of others. 1 B. & A. 258. As soon as water is appropriated by an individual, his right is co-extensive with the beneficial use to which he appropriates it. The party who obtains a right to the exclusive enjoyment of water does so in derogation of the primitive right of the public. Such being the nature of the right to water, the party complaining of the breach of such a right ought to show that he is prevented from having water which he has acquired a right to use for some beneficial purpose. 2 B. & Cr. 913.

A water-course does not begin by prescription, nor yet by assent, but begins ex jure naturæ, having taken this course naturally, and cannot be diverted. 3 Bulst. 340.

The long enjoyment of a watercourse is the best evidence of right, and raises a presumption of an agreement; and proof of a special license, or that it was limited in point of time, must come from the party who opposes the right. 2 Vern. 390.

If land, with a run of water upon it, be sold, the water, primâ facie, passes with the land, and the vendee having used the water, though for less than twenty years, gains a title to it by appropriation, and may maintain an action for obstructing it. 2 Cr. & Jerv. 126; S. C. 2 Tyr. 155.

The privilege of watercourse is not confined to private individuals. It may be vested in a corporation, as where there was a grant to the corporation of Carlisle of water for the purpose of turning the city mills. 8 East, 187. So also, inhabitants may prescribe for such an easement, as where the inhabitants of a vill, or the parishoners of a parish alleged a custom or usage of keeping an ancient ferry-boat. 3 Mod. 294.

All the above decisions are prior to the prescription act, (2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 71.) which (§ 2.) has adopted the term of twenty years as the leading period for the establishment of a right to a water-course, or to the use of water. See Prescription, III.

It requires a deed to create a right and title to have a passage for water. 4 East, 407; 5 B. & Cr. 232. But although the right to a flow of water formerly belonging to the owner of a mill can only pass by grant, as an incorporeal hereditament, yet after a parol license to perform works upon a river had been executed, it is sufficient to relieve the party from restoring it to its former state, although the license has been countermanded. Thus, where plaintiff's father, by oral license, had permitted the defendants to lower the bank of a river, and make a weir above the plaintiff's mill, whereby less water than before flowed to the plaintiff's mill, it was held that the plaintiff could not maintain an action against the defendants for continuing the weir, as it was a license to construct a work in its nature permanent and continuing, and attended with expense to the party using the license, who might sustain a heavy loss by its being countermanded; and it was the fault of the party himself, if he meant to reserve the power of revoking such license, after it was carried into effect, that he did not expressly reserve that right when he granted the license, or to limit as to duration. 1 Bing. 682.

A license to take water at a particular place will not authorize the taking away the same quantity of water at another place. 2 N. & M. 747; 5 B. & Ad. 1; and see 3 B. & Ad. 304.

A general license to take water at any place, is revocable, except as to the places where it has been acted upon and expenses have been incurred. Id.

II. Where the owners of property have by long enjoyment acquired special rights to the use of water in its natural state, as it was accustomed to flow, by way of particular easement to their own properties, and not merely a use, which is common to all the king's subjects; an action on the case may be maintained for a disturbance of the enjoyment, 4 East, 107; but where the injury, if any, is to all the king's subjects, the only remedy is by indictment. 12 East, 429.

For where an action on the case would lie at the suit of an individual for the diversion of a water-course an indictment will lie where the act affects the public. 1 B. & Ad. 874.

The mere obstruction of the water which has been accustomed to flow through the plaintiff's lands, does not per se afford any ground of action: some benefit must be shown to have arisen from the water going to his lands; or at least it is necessary to show that some deterioration was occasioned to the premises by the subtraction of the water. 2 B. & Cr. 915; S. C. 4 Dowl. & Ry. 583.

The proprietor of lands contiguous to a stream may, as soon as he is injured by the diversion of the water from its natural course, maintain an action against the party so diverting it; and it is no answer to the action, that the defendant first appropriated the water to his own use, unless he has had twenty years' undisturbed enjoyment of it in the altered course. 3 B. & Ad. 304. And such action will lie at any time within the twenty years after the injury has arisen. 1 Sim. & Stu. 203.

The occupier of a mill may maintain an action for forcing back water and injuring his mill, although he has not enjoyed it precisely in the same state for twenty years; and therefore it was holden no defence to such action that the occupier had within a few years erected in his mill a wheel of different dimensions, but requiring less water than the old one, although the declaration stated the plaintiff to be possessed of a mill, without alleging it to be an ancient mill. 1 B. & Ad. 258.

If the nuisance be of a permanent nature, and injurious to the reversion, an action may be brought by the reversioner, as well as by the tenant in possession, each of them being entitled to recover his respective loss. 3 Lev. 207; 14 East 489; 1 Wms. Saund. 322, b, notes; 4 Burr. 2141; Com. Dig. Action on the Case for Nuisance, (B.)

Where the defendants erected in their own lands a permanent obstruction to a navigable drain, leading from a river through such land to the plaintiff's close, it was held that an action lay for the plaintiff, although for sixteen years the part of the drain passing through his close had been completely clogged up with mud. 1 Bing. N. C. 549.

It is no defence to an action by a reversioner for an injury to the reversion, in not repairing a gutter for the conveyance of water through the plaintiff's land to the defendant's mill, whereby the water oozed through the gutter, and carried away the soil of the close, that the defect in the gutter was occasioned by the plaintiff's tenant. 1 Mod. & Malk, 204.

As to the damages, see Holt's N. P. C. 543.

A bill in equity will lie for the establishment of the enjoyment of a water-course, and for the performance of a covenant to cleanse it. 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 27, pl. 4. And it was held that a man who had been in possession of a water-course sixty years might bring a bill against a mortgagee who foreclosed the equity of redemption, to be quieted in the possession, although he had not established his right at law. Prece. Ch. 530; see Id. 531.

The diversion of water-courses, or the pulling down their banks, and causing inundation, are nuisances, against which a court of equity will protect parties by injunction, without first bringing an action of trespass, Mos. 144; 1 Br. C. C. 588; S. C. 2 Cox, 4; 3 Mer. 688; and if, on motion to dissolve the injunction, there be a question as to the right to the flow of water, an issue will be directed to try it. 2 Cox, 4. And the effect of an order specifically to repair the banks of a canal and other works has been obtained by an order to restrain a party using and enjoying a canal, from impeding the navigation, by continuing to keep the canals, banks, or works out of repair, by diverting the water, or preventing it by the use of locks from remaining in the canals, or by continuing the removal of a stop-gate. 10 Ven. 192; see 3 Swanst. 437, n.; and see also Shelford's Real Prop. Acts, 71.

WATER-GAGE. A sea wall or bank to restrain the current and overflowing of the water. It signifies also an instrument to gauge or measure the quantity or deepness of any waters.

WATER-GANG, Watergangium. A Saxon word for a trench or course to carry a stream of water; such as are commonly made to drain water out of marshes. Ordin. Marisc. de Romn. Chart. H. 3.

WATER-GAVEL. A rent paid for fishing in, or other benefit received from, some river. Chart. H. 3.

WATER-MEASURE. Was greater than Winchester measure, and was formerly used for selling of coals in the Pool, &c. it is mentioned in the 22 Car. 2. c. 11.

§ 104. Owners of laystals, market gardeners, &c. may use boats as heretofore.

But (§ 105.) to be subject to a penalty if they carry passengers or goods for hire.

By § 106. the bye laws of the court of aldermen are extended to all boats and vessels. See further, Police.

WATER-ORDEAL. See Ordeal.

WATERSCAPE, from the Sax. waeter, aqua, & schap, ductus.] An aqueduct, or passage for water.

WATLING-STREET. Is one of those four ways which the Romans are said to have made in this kingdom, and called them Consulares, Prætorios, Militares, & Publicas. This street is otherwise called Werlam Street. See R. Hov. f. 248, a. n. 10.

This street leads from Dover to London, St. Alban's, Dunstable, Towcester, Atherston, and the Severn, near the Wrekin, in Shropshire, extending itself to Anglesea in Wales. Anno 39 El. c. 2.

The second is called Ikenild Street, so called ab Icenis, stretching from Southampton, over the river Isis, at Newbridge; thence by Camden and Litchfield; then it passeth the river Derwent by Derby, so to Bolsover Castle, and ends at Tinmouth.

The third was called The Fossa, because in some places it was never perfected, but lies as a large ditch; or, as Cowell says, from having a ditch on one side of it: this way led from Cornwall through Devonshire, by Tetbury, near Stow-in-the-Wolds, and besides Coventry to Leicester, Newark, and so to Lincoln.

The fourth was called Ermine or Erminage Street, beginning at St. David's in West Wales, and going to Southampton. See the laws of Edward the Confessor, whereby these four public ways had the privilege of Pax Regis. See Hollingshed's Chron. vol. 1. c. 19; and Henry of Huntingdon, lib. 1. in principio. And in Leg. Will. 1. c. 30. there are three ways mentioned; but Ikenild Street is omitted. See also an old description of these ways made by Robert of Gloucester, Doug. Antiq. of Warr. p. 6; Cowell.

WAVESON. Such goods as after shipwreck do appear swimming upon the waves. Chart. 18 Hen. 8. See Flotsam, Wrack.

WAXSCOT, ceragium.] Duty anciently paid, twice a year, towards the charge of wax candles in churches. Spelman.

WAYS. There are (says Lord Coke) three kinds of ways: 1. A foot-way, called in Latin iter; 2. A pack and prime way, which is both a horse and foot-way, called in Latin actus; 3. A cart-way, called in Latin via or aditus, which contains the other two, and also a cart-way; and is called via regia, if it be common to all men; and communis strata, if it belong only to some town, or private person. Co. Lit. 56, a.

There is however another kind of way, namely a drift-way, or a way for driving cattle, which is not included in the above division; for according to a modern case, although a carriage-way comprehends a horse-way, yet it does not necessarily include a drift-way. 1 Taunt. 279. However, evidence of a carriage-way is strong presumptive evidence of a grant of a drift-way. Ibid.

Ways are also either public or private; and notwithstanding the above distinctions, it seems that any of the said ways which is common to all the king's subjects, whether it lead directly to a market town, or only from town to town, may properly be called a highway; that any such cart-way may be called the king's highway; that a river common to all men may also be called a highway; and that nuisances in any of the said ways are punishable by indictment; otherwise they would not be punished at all; for they are not actionable unless they cause a special damage to some particular person; because, if such action would lie, a multiplicity of suits would ensue. But it seems, that a way to a parish church, or to the common fields of a town, or to a village, which terminate there, may be called a private way, because it belongs, not to all the king's subjects, but only to the particular inhabitants of such parish, house, or village, each of which, as it seems, may have an action for a nuisance therein. Palm. 389; Cro. Eliz. 63, 664; 1 Vent. 189, 208; 3 Keb. 28; Co. Lit. 56; 6 Mod. 255; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76, § 1.

VIII. Of the Remedies for the Disturbance of Private Ways.

I. It seems that anciently there were but four highways in England, which were free and common to all the king's subjects, and through which they might pass without any toll, unless there was a particular consideration for it; all others, which we have at this day, are supposed to have been made through the grounds of private persons, on writs of ad quod damnum, &c. which being an injury to the owner of the soil, it is said that they may prescribe for toll without any special consideration. Bac. Abr.; 1 Mod. 231; 2 Mod. 143.

Though every highway is said to be the king's, yet this must be understood so as that in every highway the king and his subjects may pass and repass at their pleasure. For it is laid down in the old books, that in a highway the king has nothing except the passage for himself and his people; but that the freehold, and all the profits, as trees, &c. appertain to the lord of the soil. 2 E. 4, 9; 8 E. 4, 9; 8 H. 7, 5; 2 Inst. 705; who in this case is the owner of the adjoining land. 8 H. 7, 5. But the lord of a rape, within which there are ten hundreds, may prescribe to have all the trees growing within an highway within this rape, though the manor or soil adjoining belongs to another; for usage to take the trees is a good mark of ownership. 1 Rol. Abr. 392; 1 Brownl. 42; Keilm. 141.

For it is presumed by the law, that the proprietor of such land adjoining gave up to the public for passage, at some former period, all the land between his inclosure and the middle of the road. 7 B. & C. 306, per Bailey, J. Hence it is that trespass may be maintained by such a proprietor for digging the ground of the highway. 8 E. 4, 9; 1 Burr. 143. And he may also maintain ejectment; for the sheriff may give possession of the way, subject nevertheless to the easement. 1 Burr. 143. And where on trespass being brought by a plaintiff who had built a street, and permitted it to be used as a highway, it was objected that he could not sue as for a trespass on his private property, it was held that a street built upon a person's own ground is a dedication of the highway, so far only as the public has occasion for it, viz. for a right of passage, not as to the absolute possession of the soil. 2 Stra. 1004. See further, Waste.

If passengers have used time out of mind, when the roads are bad, to go by outlets on the land adjoining to a highway in an open field, such outlets are parcel of the highway; and, therefore, if they are sown with corn, and the tract fonderous, the king's subjects may go upon the corn. 1 Rol. Abr. 390; Cro. Car. 366; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76, § 2. But it is not a good justification in trespass that the defendant has a specific right of way over the plaintiff's land, and that he had gone upon the adjoining land, because the way was impassable by being overflowed by a river. Doug. 745, 9. See also 4 M. & S. 387.

The public may have a right to a road as a common street, although there may be no thoroughfare, 11 East, 375; (but see 5 Taunt. 125), or to a road terminating in a common, 1 B. & A. 63. So it may be a highway, although it is circuitous, 1 Camp. 261; 3 T. R. 265; and although it is only occasionally used by the public, and does not terminate in any town, or any other public road. 1 B. & A. 63. And on the contrary it is not necessarily a public highway, although it does lead from one market town to another, or connect any two points by a line, which might be advantageously used by the public, or is used by them under certain restrictions. 11 East, 376, n. (u.)

It seems that a highway may be claimed, first, from time immemorial, and next, by reason of such a sufferance, as will lead to the conclusion that the original proprietor had designed a common benefit for all the king's subjects.

If a man open his land, so that the public pass over it continually, the public, after a user of a very few years, will acquire a right of way; and a party not meaning to dedicate a way, but only to give a license, should do some act to show that a license only is intended. The common course is to shut up the way one day in every year. 5 Car. & Payne, 400. The presumption of a dedication may be rebutted by proof of a bar having been placed across the street soon after the houses forming the street were finished; though the bar was soon afterwards knocked down, and the way had been since used as a thoroughfare. 1 Camp. 262, n.; Id. 263, n.

A dedication to the public may be presumed from a shorter time than is necessary to establish a right of possession to land; and it has been presumed from a user by the public during a period of eight years, 11 East, 376; and even six years, 11 East, 376. So where a court on one side of a public street in London was left open to the public, and occasionally used as a communication from one part of the street to another, a dedication to the public was presumed. 1 Camp. 258; 3 T. R. 265. It seems that the setting out a road under a local act, by commissioners, for the use of particular persons, which in fact has been used by the public for many years, is not sufficient evidence of a dedication, without evidence of acquiescence on the part of the parish, 4 B. & A. 447. See 3 East, 294.

A highway may also be enjoyed under an express grant, or more usually may be created by act of parliament. 8 Price, 535. And where a way has been recognised as public in an act of parliament, it is not necessary that it should be adopted by the public to make it a public way. 5 D. & R. 497.

Where a railway was made under the authority of an act of parliament by which the proprietors were incorporated, and by which it was provided that the public should have the beneficial enjoyment of the way; the company having afterwards taken up the railway, the Court of K. B. granted a mandamus to compel the company to reinstate and again lay down the railway. 2 B. & A. 646.

An ancient highway cannot be changed at common law without an inquisition found on a writ of ad quod damnum, that such change will be no prejudice to the public; and it is said, that if one change a highway without such authority, he may stop the new whenever he pleases: neither can the king's subjects, in an action brought against them for going over such new way, justify generally as in a common highway, but ought to show specially, by way of excuse, how the old way was obstructed, and a new one set out; neither are the inhabitants bound to keep watch in such new way, or repair it, or to make amends for a robbery committed in it. Cro. Car. 286; Vaugh. 341; Yelv. 141; 1 Burr. 465; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76, § 3.

But it hath been holden, that if a water, which hath been an ancient highway, by degrees changes its course, and goes over different ground from that whereon it used to run, yet the highway continues in the new channel in the same manner as in the old. 22 Ass. 93; 1 Roll. Abr. 390.

An owner of land, over which there is an open road, may inclose it by his own authority, but he is bound to leave sufficient space and room for the road, and he is obliged to repair it till he throws up the inclosure. But if he alter or change the road by the legal course of a writ ad quod damnum, he is not obliged to repair the new road, unless the jury impose such a condition on him: for otherwise it stands just as it did before, even though it was at first open and should be directed by the jury to be inclosed. And a private act of parliament for inclosing lands, which vests power in commissioners to set out new roads by their award, is equally strong as to these consequences as a writ of ad quod damnum. See 1 Burr. 456.

II. Of common right, the general charge of repairing highways lies on the occupiers of lands in the parish wherein they lie; but it is said that the tenants of the lands adjoining are bound to scour their ditches. 1 Roll. Abr. 390; March. 26; 1 Vent. 90, 183; Hen. 7, 5; Andr. 276.

A highway lying within a parish, the whole parish is of common right bound to repair it: except it appears that it ought to be repaired by some particular person either ratione tenuræ, or by prescription. 1 Vent. 183; Style, 163.

If a parish is part in one county and part in another, and the highways in one county are out of repair, the whole parish shall contribute to the repair: but there may be an agreement between the inhabitants, that the one shall repair one part, and the other the other; and such agreement is good between themselves, and for breach, the one may have an action upon the case against the other; but in indictment they shall take no advantage of these agreements, for as to the king they are equally liable. 1 Mod. 112; 1 Vent. 256; 3 Keb. 301. But it has been more recently decided, that such an indictment is bad; and that in such case the indictment must be against the whole parish; and it appears to have been always considered that the indictment under such circumstances must be preferred in the county wherein the ruinous part of the road lies. 5 T. R. 498. If the indictment is against that part of the parish only which lies in the county in which such indictment is preferred, it must show on what account such part only is chargeable. Ibid.

If a parish lie in two distinct counties, an indictment may be brought against that part of the parish in which the ruinous road lies. 4 Burr. 2511. But it must appear upon the face of the indictment by what right the charge is laid upon the particular division of any parish, which is in one county only. 5 Burr. 2700, 2. As that they have repaired time out of mind. Andr. 276; Hardw. 259; and see 2 T. R. 513.

A parish may be bound by prescription to repair a way within another parish, 12 Mod. 409; but then some consideration for this liability must be shown. See 5 M. & S. 260, post, IV.

By 34 Geo. 3. c. 64. when the boundaries of parishes are in the middle of an highway, two justices may divide the highway by a transverse line into two equal parts, and order that the whole of such highway on both sides in one part shall be repaired respectively by the two parishes; and where no such division has been made, an indictment against one of the parishes for not repairing one side of the road ought to state that the plaintiff was bound to repair ad filum vice: and it is not sufficient in such case to aver that a certain part of the highway (setting out the length and one half of the breadth) is out of repair, and that he shall and ought to repair it. Peake Up. 219.

But though the parish be obliged of common right to repair the highways in it, yet it is certain, that particular persons may be bound to repair the highway, by reason of inclosure or prescription; as where the owner of lands not inclosed, next adjoining to the highway, incloses his lands on both sides of it; in which case he is bound to make a perfect good way, and shall not be excused by making it good as it was before the inclosure, if it were then any way defective, because by the inclosure he takes from the people the liberty of going over the lands adjoining to the common track. 1 Roll. Abr. 390; Cro. Car. 366; 1 Sid. 484.

Also it is said, that if one inclose land on one side, which hath anciently been inclosed on the other side, he ought to repair all the way; but that if there be no such ancient inclosure on the other side, he ought to repair but half the way. 1 Sid. 484.

Therefore if there be an old hedge time out of mind belonging to A. on the one side of the way, and B. having land lying on the other side, makes a new hedge, there B. shall be charged with the whole repair. 1 Sid. 484; 2 Keb. 665; 2 Saund. 157. But if A. makes a hedge on the one side of the way, and B. on the other, they shall be chargeable by moieties. 1 Sid. 484; 2 Keb. 665. But it seems clear, that wherever a person makes himself liable to repair a highway by reason of inclosure, that by throwing of it open again, he thereby frees himself from the burthen of any future reparation. 2 Saund. 160. See ante, I.

In a writ of ad quod damnum, and inquisition found thereupon, after the person hath once made the road, (and N. B. it is not necessary the whole new road should go through his own soil,) the parishioners ought to keep it in repair; because being discharged from repairing the old road, no new burthen is laid upon them; their labour is only transferred from one place to another. But if the new road lies in another parish, the person who sued out the writ, and his heirs, ought to keep it in repair, because the inhabitants of the other parish gaining no benefit from the old road being taken away, it would be imposing a new charge upon them, for which they enjoyed no compensation. 3 Atk. 772.

Particular persons may be bound to repair a highway by prescription, or in respect of inclosure of the land wherein the road lies; and it is said, that a corporation aggregate may be charged by a general prescription, that it ought and hath used to do it, without shewing any consideration in respect whereof they had used to do it, because such a corporation never dies, neither is it any plea, that they have done it out of charity; but it is said, that such a general prescription is not sufficient to charge a private person, because no man is bound to do a thing which his ancestors have done, unless it be for some special reason; as having lands descended to him holden by such service, &c.; but it seems that an indictment charging a tenant of lands in fee with having used of right to repair such a way ratione tenuræ terræ suæ, without adding that his ancestors, or those whose estates he hath, have so done, is sufficient, for it is implied, 27 Ass. 8; 27 Ed. 4, 38. Bro. Prescription, 49, 70; Kelw. 52, a; Latch. 206; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76, § 5—8.

And it seems certain in all those cases, whether a private person be bound to repair a highway by inclosure or prescription, that the parish cannot take advantage of it on the general issue, but must plead it specially; that therefore, if to an indictment against the parish, for not repairing a highway, they plead not guilty, this shall be intended only that the ways are in repair, but does not go to the right of repairation. 1 Mod. 112; 3 Keb. 301; 1 Vent. 256.

If particular persons be made chargeable by statute to the repair of roads, and they become insolvent, the justices may cause the rest of the inhabitants to sustain their original liability in respect of such repair. 1 Ld. R. 725. So where the inhabitants of a township were exempted from the repair of new roads by an act of parliament, judgment passed against the rest of the parish, for they were bound at all events to repair their own roads. 2 T. R. 106. See also 3 Camp. 222; 2 B. & A. 179.

At common law it is said, that all the county ought to make good the reparations of a highway, where no particular persons are bound to do it, by reason the whole county have their ease and passage by the said way. Co. Rep. 13. By the ancient common law, villages are to repair their highways, and may be punished for their decay; and if any do injure or straighten the highway, he is punishable in the king's bench, or before justices of the peace, in the court-leet, &c. 27 Ass. 63; Crompt. Jurisd. 76.

III. It is clearly agreed to be a nuisance to dig a ditch, or make a hedge across the highway, or to erect a new gate, or to lay logs of timber in it, or generally to do any other act which will render it less commodious. Kitchin. 34; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76, § 48. Also it is a nuisance for an heir (and for which he may be indicted) to continue an incroachment or other nuisance to a highway begun by his ancestor, because such continuance thereof amounts in the judgment of law to a new nuisance. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76, § 61. Also it is agreed, that it is no excuse for him who lays logs in the highway, that he laid them only here and there, so that the people might have a passage through them by windings and turnings. 2 Roll. Abr. 137; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76, § 49.

It is a nuisance to suffer the highway to be incommoded by reason of the foulness, &c. of the adjoining ditches, or by boughs of trees hanging over it, &c. And it is said, that the owner of land next adjoining to the highway ought of common right to scour his ditches; but that the owner of land next adjoining to such land, is not bound by the common law so to do without a special prescription; also it is said, that the owner of trees hanging over a highway to the annoyance of travellers, is bound by the common law to lop them; and it is clear that any other person may lop them so far as to avoid the nuisance. 8 Hen. 7. 5, a; Kitch. 34; Dalt. c. 26; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76, § 52.

But it is no nuisance for an inhabitant of a town to unlade billets, &c. in the street before his house, by reason of the necessity of the case, unless he suffer them to continue there an unreasonable time. 2 Roll. Abr. 137, 265; 3 Bac. Abr. Highways (E).

But where the defendant, a timber-merchant, occupied a small timber-yard close to the street, and from the narrowness of the street, and the construction of his own premises, he had in several instances deposited long sticks of timber in the street, and had them sawed into shorter pieces there before they could be carried into his yard, it was held to be a nuisance. 3 Campb. 230. And so as to the repairing of a house, the public must submit to the inconvenience for the requisite period, but if this be unnecessarily prolonged, the party may be indicted for a nuisance. Ibid. And see 1 Bos. & Pull. 407, 408.

It has been held, that if a carrier carries unreasonable weight with an unusual number of horses, it is a nuisance to the highway at the common law. 3 Com. Dig. Chemin (A. 3.) And it seems now to be well established that every unauthorized obstruction of a highway, to the annoyance of the king's subjects, is an indictable offence. 3 Campb. 227. Thus, where a waggoner occupied one side of a public street in the city of Exeter, before his warehouses, in loading and unloading his waggons, for several hours at a time, both day and night, and had one waggon at least usually standing before his warehouses, so that no carriage could pass on that side of the street, and sometimes even foot passengers were incommoded by cumbrous goods lying on the ground on the same side, ready for loading, he was held to be indictable for a public nuisance, although it appeared that sufficient space was left for two carriages to pass on the opposite side of the street. 6 East. 427. Also it is indictable for stage coaches to stand plying for passengers in the public streets, if they do more than take up and set down passengers, which must be done in a reasonable time, and private premises must be procured for the coach to stop in during the interval between the end of one journey and the commencement of another. 3 Campb. 224. And it was intimated from the bench in the same case, that there could be no doubt but that if coaches, on the occasion of a route, should wait an unreasonable time in a private street, and so obstruct the transit of people passing through it in carriages, or on foot, the persons causing and permitting such coaches so to wait would be guilty of a nuisance.

Any one may justify pulling down, or otherwise destroying a common nuisance, as a new gate or house erected in a highway; and it hath been holden that there is no need, in pleading such justification, to show that as little damage was done as might be. 2 Roll. Abr. 144; Cro. Car. 184; 1 Jon. 221; 2 Salk. 458.

Though all nuisances are punishable by indictment with fine and imprisonment, it is said that one convicted of a nuisance to the highway, may be commanded by the judgment to remove it at his own costs, &c. 2 Roll. Abr. 84; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 75, § 14. See 2 Str. 686.

A gate erected in a highway is a common nuisance, because it interrupts the people in that free and open passage which they before enjoyed and were lawfully entitled to; but where such a gate has continued time out of mind, it shall be intended that it was set up at first by consent, on a composition with the owner of the land on the laying out the road, in which case the people had never any right to a freer passage than what they still enjoy. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 75, § 9. If one has a private way without a gate, and a gate is hung up, an action on the case lies, for the party hath not his way as he had before. Litt. Rep. 267.

There are also statutory provisions for the removal and punishment of nuisances.

IV. As to the general doctrine with respect to indictments, &c. upon this subject Mr. Serjeant Hawkins has laid down the following rules:—

1st. That it is safe in every such indictment to show both the place from which, and also the place to which, the way supposed to be out of repair doth lead; yet exceptions for want of such certainty have sometimes been disallowed. (See 4 Burr. 2091; Lucas, 383.) However it seems certain that there is no necessity to show that a highway leads to a market-town, because every highway leads from town to town. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76, § 86.

An indictment against the parish of B. for not repairing a road leading from A. to B., is exclusive of B., and therefore bad; and it is not aided by a subsequent allegation that a certain part of the same highway situate in B. is in decay, &c. 5 Term Rep. 518. See 1 H. Black. Rep. 351. that in pleading a public highway it is not necessary to state any termini. So in an indictment for a nuisance in a highway, it is not necessary to mention the termini. Stra. 44.

2dly. That it is necessary in every such indictment expressly to show in what place the nuisance complained of was done, for which cause an indictment for stopping a way at D., leading from D. to C., is not good; for it is impossible that a way leading from D. should be in D., and no other place is alleged. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76. § 87.

So also in a presentment the highway must be alleged to lie in the parish, otherwise the parish is not bound to repair. Comp. 111; Stra. 181. But if there be two villis in a parish, it is not necessary, in an indictment for a nuisance, to show in which vill the nuisance lies. Say. 119.

3dly. That every such indictment ought also certainly to show to what part of the highway the nuisance did extend, as by showing how many feet in length, and how many feet in breadth it contained; or otherwise the defendant will neither know of the certainty of the charge against which he is to make his defence, neither will the court be able, from the record, to judge of the greatness of the offence, in order to assess a fine answerable thereunto; and upon this ground it hath been adjudged, that an indictment for stopping a certain part of the king's highway at K. is bad, for the uncertainty thereof. Also it hath been resolved, that the place wherein such a nuisance is alleged, is not sufficiently ascertained in such an indictment, by showing that it contained so many feet in length, and so many in breadth, by estimation. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76. § 88.

An indictment for a nuisance in laying soil in a highway is not bad for want of the length and breadth of the nuisance being set out. Say. 98. Nor for a nuisance in digging two grips or ditches in a common footway. Say. 197. Nor for a nuisance that a certain highway and bridge are in a ruinous condition. Say. 301.

Upon exceptions taken to an indictment for suffering a highway to be very muddy, and so narrow, that the people could not pass without danger of their lives; first, that it was no offence for a highway to be dirty in winter; and secondly, that the parish had no power to hinder it, as there was a particular power vested by act of parliament in justices to do so; the indictment was held bad for want of saying that the road was out of repair; and one of the judges observed, that saying that the way was so narrow that the people could not pass, was repugnant to its being "the king's highway," for that if it had been so narrow the people could never have passed there time out of mind. 2 Ld. Raym. 1169. And it is the same as to a hedge, an indictment does not lie for not widening it.

4thly. That every such indictment must show that the way wherein a nuisance is alleged, is a common highway; for which cause it hath been resolved, that an indictment for a nuisance to a horseway, without adding that it was a highway, is bad; and upon the same ground it seemeth also, that an indictment for a nuisance to a common footway to the church of D. for all the parishioners of D. is not good; yet it seems, that if those last words, viz. "for all the parishioners of D." had been omitted, such an indictment might be maintained. See 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76. § 89.

5thly. That it is not safe in an indictment against a common person for not repairing a highway, which he ought to have done in respect of the tenure of certain lands, barely to say that he was bound to repair it ratione tenuræ terræ, without adding sue. Also it is said, that in an indictment against a bishop, &c. for not repairing a highway, in respect to certain lands, it ought to be shown in what capacity he ought to repair it, because otherwise it cannot be known in what capacity the process is to be awarded against him. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76. § 90.

If a man be charged to repair ratione tenuræ, he may throw it upon the parish by the general issue. Stra. 184. And it hath been held upon consideration, that ratione tenuræ is sufficient without sue. Stra. 187. Hankins positively states that the defendant ought not to plead quod non debuit reparare, without showing who ought. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76. § 94, cites 1 Sid. 140; Carth. 213; 11 Mod. 273; 12 Mod. 13.

Where a parish is charged with the reparation of a highway lying in aliens parochia, a consideration must be stated; and where the plea stated that another parish had repaired, and been used and accustomed to repair, and of right ought to have repaired, it was held bad for not showing the consideration. 5 M. & S. 260.

6thly. That in every such indictment the fact alleged against the defendant must be expressed in such proper terms, that it may clearly appear to the court to have been a nuisance; and for this cause it hath been resolved, that a presentment for diverting a highway is not good, because a highway cannot be diverted, but must always continue in the same place where it was, howsoever it be obstructed, and a new way made in another place. See 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76. § 91.

It hath been resolved, that an indictment against a man for stopping a highway in his own land is good, without laying the offence done vi et armis. Also it is said, that a presentment that a highway in such a place is decayed by the default of the inhabitants of such a town, is good, without naming any person in certainty. But it hath been adjudged that an indictment against particular persons must specially charge them every one; for which cause it hath been resolved that an indictment against several for not repairing their streets, that they, et eorum uirgine, did not repair them, is not good. See 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 76. § 92.

Upon an indictment for not repairing a highway, if the defendant produce a certificate before trial that the way is repaired, he shall be admitted to a fine; but after verdict the certificate is too late, for then he must have a constat to the sheriff, who ought to return that the way is repaired, because the verdict, which is a record, must be answered by a record. Raym. 216. And where the defendants, indicted for not repairing a common footway, confessed the indictment, and submitted to a fine; it was held that the matter was not ended by their being fined; but that writs of distringas shall be awarded in infinitum, till the Court of B. R. is certified that the way is repaired, as it was when it was at best; but the defendants are not bound to put it in better repair than it has been time out of mind. 1 Salk. 358; 6 Mod. 163. If a defendant hath made a highway as good as it is capable of being made, it was said, in an extraordinary case, this shall not discharge him on an information against him, though it may be a mitigation of his fine. 3 Salk. 183. Also it is no excuse for the inhabitants of a parish indicted at common law, for not repairing the highways, that they have done the work required by statute; for the statutes are made in aid of the common law; and when the statute work is not sufficient, rates and assessments are to be made. Dall. c. 26.

It is said that if the right or title to repair such ways come in question, upon suggestion and affidavit made thereof, a certiorari may be had to remove the indictment into B. R.

A person may be indicted for not repairing a house standing upon a highway, which is ruinous, and like to fall down, to the danger of travellers, whatever be his tenure, which in such case is not material. 1 Salk. 357.

If there be a common footway through a close by prescription, and the owner of the close ploughs up the way, and sows it, and lays thorns at the side of it, passengers may go over another footway in the same close without being trespassers, Yelv. 142. And if a highway is not sufficient, any passenger may break down the inclosure of it, and go over the land, and justify it till a sufficient way is made. 9 Salk. 182.

Erecting a gate across a highway, though not locked, but opening and shutting at pleasure, is esteemed a nuisance; for it is not so free and easy a passage as if there had been no gate; and the usual way of redressing nuisances of this kind is by indictment; but every person may remove the nuisance by cutting or throwing it down, if there be occasion so to do; and it hath been held, that though there are many gates across highways, they must be anciently set up, and it shall be intended by license from the king upon the writ of ad quod damnum. Cro. Car. 184. See ante, III.

As to the Defence under the General Issue, and the necessity for a Special Plea.—Where an indictment or presentment is against the inhabitants of a parish at large, they may upon the general issue show that the highway is in repair, or that it is not a highway, or that it does not lie within the parish; for all these are facts which the prosecutor must allege in his indictment, and prove on the plea of not guilty. 1 Stra. 181; 2 Saund. 158, n. (3). But it is settled that they cannot, upon the general issue, throw the burden of repairing on particular persons by prescription or otherwise, but must set forth their discharge on a general plea. 1 Mod. 112; 1 Vent. 256. This rule, however, was recently held not to apply to a case where the liability to repair was transferred from the inhabitants to other persons by a public act of parliament, to which all are supposed to be privy, and of which all are supposed to have notice. 3 Campb. 222. Where a person is charged with the repairs of a highway or bridge, against common right, he may discharge himself upon not guilty to the indictment; and therefore, where a particular division of a parish is charged with the repair by prescription, or a particular person by reason of tenure or the like, which are obligations against the common law, they may thus throw the burden either on the parish, or even on an individual. But if they will, though unnecessarily, plead the special matter, it is not enough to say that they ought not to repair, but they must go further, and show who ought. 1 Sid. 140; Carth. 213; 1 Stra. 180; 9 Salk. 183, pl. 3; 2 Saund. 159, a. n. (10).

If judgment be given against a parish, whether after verdict upon not guilty, or by default, the judgment will be conclusive evidence of the liability of the parish to repair, unless fraud can be shown. Peake's Rep. 219. But the record of an acquittal is not evidence to show that the plaintiff is not liable. Peake's Rep. 219. Because the acquittal might have proceeded upon the want of proof that the road was out of repair. Mann. Ind. N. P. R. 128. Upon an acquittal of the inhabitants, a new trial is not allowed. 1 Wils. 298, cited 2 Salk. 646; 4 M. & S. 337; 1 Starkie's Rep. 516; 6 East. 315. But see 1 Barn. & Ald. 63.

V. 1. As to Highways.—A bill being at present before parliament for consolidating the statute law upon the subject, it has been thought advisable to omit the sketch of the various statutory enactments with respect to the repair, diversion, or stopping up of highways, contained in the former edition of this work. Should this bill pass into a law before the publication of the present edition, its provisions will be shortly noticed in the addenda at the end of the volume.

In Scotland, by the acts 1669, c. 16; 1670, c. 9; 1686, c. 8. justices of peace were empowered to regulate highways, bridges, and ferries; they might call out tenants, cotters, and servants, six days in the year to work on the highways, and they might assess the county, not exceeding 10s. for every 100l. of valued rent. By the last of these acts, the commissioners of supply were joined with the justices; and by 11 Geo. 3. c. 53. two general meetings should be held annually of the justices and commissioners on the business of the highways; but by the 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 43. the above and various other acts were repealed, and the law with respect to turnpike roads in that country consolidated.

2. As to Turnpike Roads.—The turnpike roads of England were formerly placed under the management and direction of trustees, appointed by the respective acts of parliament occasionally passed for the making and repairing particular roads. But the powers of these acts being confined to separate and distinct objects, it was thought expedient to pass some general laws which should apply in common to all trustees and turnpike roads in general throughout the kingdom. Leach's Hawk. P. C. i. c. 76, App.

By the conversion of highways into turnpike roads, the liability of parishes to repair such roads is suspended, except by the performance of their statute-labour, and in lieu of the parish, a body of trustees or commissioners, who are clothed with a contracting power, are enabled to levy tolls upon all passengers, and are authorised to raise money upon loan.

By the common law we have seen, that whenever a highway was out of repair, the inhabitants of the parish was bound, by actual labour thereon, to reinstate it in good order. Under the highway acts a ministerial agent is appointed to superintend the management of highways; actual labour is permitted to be compounded for in money, and a power is given to raise funds by assessment for effecting these repairs or other improvements, to which the common law provision may prove inadequate; while by the turnpike acts an additional body are appointed, who are made as it were the proprietors of the road, but nevertheless upon trust for the public. They are empowered to bargain and sell, and to enter into stipulations to raise money by mortgage, and, which is the most important of their privileges, they are authorized to levy a tax, the receipts of which are to be applied to the repair and improvement of the roads placed under their management. Wellbeloved on Highways, 180.

The present turnpike acts are the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. (whereby all former general statutes on this subject were repealed,) the 4 Geo. 4. c. 10, 35, 95; 5 Geo. 4. c. 69; 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 24; 9 Geo. 4. c. 77; and which acts are by the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 10. continued until the 1st June, 1836, or until the end of the then session of parliament.

As these statutes are about to be superseded by one general act consolidating their provisions, no attempt will be here made to give even an outline of their enactments, which are very numerous and complicated, and will be found collected and arranged in Burn's Justice.

VI. A private way, or the right of going over another man's ground, is classed by Blackstone among incorporeal hereditaments. In such private ways, a particular man may have an interest and a right, though another be the owner of the soil. 2 Comm. c. 3.

This may be claimed either by grant, prescription, custom, by express reservation, as necessarily incident to a grant of land, or by virtue of an inclosure act. Selm. N. P. 124.

A person having the right of a private way over the land of another, cannot, as has been already observed, when the way is become impassable by the overflowing of a river, justify going on the adjoining land, although such land as well as the land over which the way runs belong to the grantor of the way. Doug. 744; M. & S. 387. as the public are entitled to do where a highway be impassable.

1. By Grant. A way may be claimed by grant, as where it grants that B. should have a way through a particular close. Com. Dig. Chimin, D. 3.

So a covenant that another shall have and use a way amounts to a grant. 3 Lev. 305.

When the owner of the land grants to another a liberty of passing over his grounds, to go to church, to market, or the like; in this case the gift or grant is particular; and confined to the grantee alone; it dies with the person; and if the grantee leaves the country, he cannot assign over his right to any other; nor can he justify taking another person in his company. Finch. L. 41.

Where a lease of premises described therein as abutting on an intended way, thirty feet wide, not then set out, the soil of which was the property of the lessor, and the lessee granted an under-lease, describing the premises as abutting on an intended way, without specifying the breadth; it was held that the sub-lessee was entitled to a convenient way only. 2 B. & C. 96.

If a man seised of Whiteacre and Blackacre uses a way through the latter to the former, and afterwards grants Whiteacre, with all ways, &c. such right of way passes to the grantee. 6 Mod. 3.

Where certain houses with a piece of ground, part of an adjoining yard, were leased to a tenant, together with all ways with the said premises, or any part thereof, used or enjoyed before, and at the time of the lease granted; the whole of the yard was in the occupation of one person, who had always used and enjoyed a right of way to every part of that yard; it was held that the lessee was entitled to such right of way to the part of the yard demised to him. 5 B. & A. 890; S. C. 1 D. & R. 506.

Where the plaintiff claimed a right of way over the defendant's soil, and it appeared that in the defendant's lease, granting him all ways without exception or qualification, there was a covenant for contributing with other occupiers of the lessor's property, to the keeping up paths, &c. used in common by them, and it was proved that the plaintiff had always used the path in question, and that there was no other path to which the covenant could apply; it was held that it might be inferred that the defendant took the soil demised to him, subject to plaintiff's right of way. 8 Bing. 356; S. C. 1 M. & Sc. 510.

A way must not be claimed as appendant or appurtenant to a house, because it is only an easement, and no interest. Yelo. 159. But it may be quasi appendant thereto, and as such pass by grant thereof. Cro. Jac. 190.

If a close is conveyed, with all ways thereto belonging and appertaining, the easement will not pass, except in the case of a way of necessity, where such right of way would pass without any words of grant of ways. Bulst. 17. But a way not strictly appurtenant will not pass by those words in a conveyance, unless the parties appear to have intended to use them in a sense larger than their ordinary legal sense. 1 Cr. & M. 339. The words "belonging" and "appertaining" are synonymous. Id. 448. Where an under-lease described the ground demised and the ways granted by the words "all ways thereunto appertaining," a road over the soil of the original lessor was held not to pass by those words, although it might by the words "heretofore used." 2 B. & C. 96. Where a testator being seised in fee of the adjoining closes A. and B., over the former of which a way had immemorially been used to the latter, devised B. with the appurtenances; it was held that the devisee, under the word "appurtenances," could not claim a right of way over A. to B., as no right of way was thereby created, and the old one was extinguished by the unity of seisin in the deviser. 1 Bos. & Pull. 371. An existing way will pass by the word "appurtenances." Id.

But according to the strict legal sense of the term "appurtenances," it will not pass an easement which has become extinct, (as by unity of possession,) and which has no legal existence, although enjoyed de facto. 2 N. & M. 517.

A right of way or a right of passage for water (where it does not create an interest in the land) is an incorporeal right, and stands upon the same footing with other incorporeal rights, such as right of common, rents, advowsons, &c. It lies not in livery but in grant, and a freehold interest in it cannot be created or passed (even if a chattel interest may, which it seems cannot,) otherwise than by deed. 5 B. & Cr. 229.

Grants of rights of way are, however, presumed from long enjoyment, where their commencement cannot be accounted for, unless a grant has been made. 5 B. & A. 237. The uninterrupted enjoyment of a right of way for twenty years, and no evidence that it had been used by leave or favour, or under a mistake, was held sufficient to leave it to a jury to presume a grant, although the road in question had been extinguished about twenty-six years before, made by the award of commissioners of an inclosure act. 3 East. 224. So where there had been an absolute extinguishment of a right of way for many years by unity of possession, but the way had been used for thirty years preceding an action for its obstruction, the jury were directed to presume a grant from the defendant. Bull. N. P. 74. cited 3 T. R. 157.

Though an uninterrupted possession for twenty years and upwards be a bar to an action on the case, yet the rule must be taken with this qualification, that the possession was with the acquiescence of the person seised of an estate of inheritance. The mere knowledge of the tenant is not sufficient, otherwise he might collude to the prejudice of his landlord. But presumptions have sometimes been made against the owners of lands during their possession, and by the acquiescence of their tenants, in cases of rights of way and of common, because the tenant suffers an immediate and palpable injury to his own possession, and therefore is presumed to be upon the alert to guard the rights of his landlord as well as his own. 11 East. 372. In every case where the party claiming relies on his want of possession, the question whether he knew or not of the enjoyment, is to be determined by the circumstances of the case, and may very properly be left for the consideration of the jury. 1 Price. 247; 2 Brod. & Bing. 667.

The knowledge of the owner of the land, and his acquiescence may be presumed from circumstances. Thus where the lessees of a fishery had publicly landed their nets on the shore at A. for more than twenty years, and had at various times dressed and improved the landing-place; and both the fishery and landing-place originally belonged to one person, but no evidence was offered to show that he or those who under him owned the shore at A. knew of the landing nets by the lessees of the fishery; it was held, that it was properly left to the jury to presume a grant of the right of landing to the lessees of the fishery by some former owner of the shore at A. 2 Brod. & Bing. 667; S. C. 5 Moore. 527.

For the provisions of the recent prescription act, 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 71. with respect to ways, see Prescription, III. and for an important decision upon the construction of this statute, see Bright v. Walker, 4 Tyr. 502.

In this case it was held that user of more than twenty years without interruption by the plaintiff, who was assignee of a lease for lives under a bishop, of a way over ground held by an assignee of a similar lease, conferred no title under the above act as against the reversioner, the bishop, or even against his lessee or persons claiming under such lessee, during the continuance of the term. And see 1 C. M. & R. 614.

A plea of twenty years of a right of way under the act is not defeated by proof of an agreed alteration of the line of way or by a temporary nonuser under and agreement between the parties. 1 M. & R. 348.

2 By Prescription. A private way may also be claimed by prescription; as that a man is seised in fee of a certain messuage, and that he and all those whose estate he has in the same messuage, have from time immemorial had a way (describing it as the case may be) from A. to B.

A man may prescribe for a way from his house through a certain close, &c. to church, though he himself has lands next adjoining to his said house, through which of necessity he must first pass; for the general prescription shall be applied only to the lands of others. Palm. 387, 388; 2 Rol. Rep. 397.

A way being only an easement, and not an interest, should not be laid as appendant or appurtenant. Yelo. 159. Where a particular tenant relies on a presumptive right, he must, previous to the act above-mentioned, have set forth the seisin in fee of the owner, and then have traced his own title from the owner of the fee. 2 Salk. 562; Com. Dig. Chimin, (D. 2); see now Prescription, III.

Unity of possession of the land to which the way is claimed as appurtenant, with the land over which the way lies, extinguishes the way, for it is an answer to the prescription, and the way is against common right. 1 Roll. Abr. 935; 3 T. R. 157; 5 East, 295; 1 Boss. & Pull. 371; 5 Taunt. 311.

But where in trespass quare clausum fregit, defendant prescribed in a que estate for a right of way over the locus in quo, and it appeared that the defendant's land had, within fifty years, been part of a large common, and afterwards inclosed under the provision of an act of parliament, and sold to the defendant's ancestor; it was held, notwithstanding this evidence, the right claimed by the defendant's plea might exist; and the jury having found that in fact it did exist, the court refused to disturb the verdict. 9 B. & C. 938. If the lessor enjoy a presumptive right of way, among other easements, by virtue of the demised premises, such right will pass to the tenant for life or years. Before the recent act, the only distinction between a tenant for years and tenant for life, was, that the former could not preserve an easement in his own right; but he must have asserted the right during his life, as lord, or the owner of the freehold. Styl. 300; Carth. 432.

3. By Custom. A custom that every inhabitant of such a vill shall have a way over such land, either to church or market, is good; because it is only an easement, but not a profit. 6 Rep. 60. b.; Co. Lit. 110, b.; Cro. Eliz. 180. See 9 H. Bl. 396; and tit. Prescription.

4. By Reservation. A right of way may be claimed by express reservation; as where A. grants land to another, reserving to himself a way over such land, 1 Roll. Abr. 109, pl. 45; Com. Dig. Chimin, D. 2; and see 2 B. & C. 197; 3 D. & R. 411.

5. Through Necessity. As a right of way may be created by an express grant, so it may also arise by an implied grant, where the circumstances are such that the law will imply such grant. This right of way has been commonly termed a way of necessity, but it is in fact only a right of way by implied grant; for there seems to be no difference where a thing is granted by express words, and where it passes as incident to the grant by operation of law. 1 Wms. Saund. 323, note. See 4 M. & S. 387.

A purchaser of part of the lands of another, has a way of necessity over the vendor's other lands, if there be no convenient way adjoining; so if a man having four closes lying together, sells three, and reserves the middle close, to which he hath no way but through one of those sold, although he did not reserve any way, yet he should have it as reserved to him by the law. Co. Lit. 110. A way of necessity passes by a grant or lease of the land without being expressed; for the land cannot be used without a way. Cro. Jac. 189. So also a conveyance of land by a trustee, to which there is no access but over the trustee's land, passes a right of way. 8 T. R. 50. So if the owner of two closes, having no way to one of them but over the other, part with the latter without reserving a right of way, it will be reserved to him by operation of law. Id.

A way of necessity cannot be pleaded generally, without showing the manner in which the land over which the way is claimed is charged with it. 4 M. & S. 387. See 1 Wms. Saund. 323, n. 6. A way of necessity exists after a unity of possession, which would otherwise have extinguished the way and a subsequent severance. Buckley v. Coles, 5 Taunt. 311.

This right of way is limited by the necessity which created it, and when such necessity ceases, the right of way also ceases; therefore if at any subsequent period the party formerly entitled to such way can approach the place to which it led by passing over his own land, by as direct a course as he would have done by using the old way, the latter will cease to exist. 2 Bing. 76.

Where there is a private road through a farm, the parson may use it for carrying away his tithe, though there is another public way equally convenient. 6 East, 103.

But a rector cannot claim a permanent right of way for the purpose of carrying away his tithe, unless by prescription or grant. And the owner or occupier of the soil, provided he claim it bond fide for the convenient management of the farm, has a right to vary and stop up a way by which tithe has been carried, although he thereby puts the tithe owner to great inconvenience by compelling him to use a more circuitous rout for that purpose. 2 C. & M. 266; 4 Tyrr. 1.

VII. Where a right of way has been once established by clear evidence of enjoyment, it can only be defeated by distinct evidence of interruption acquiesced in; an unsuccessful attempt on the part of the occupiers of the land, over which the way run, from time to time to interrupt such right, will not be sufficient to get rid of it, 3 Bligh, N. S. 444—447. By the 4th section of the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 71. (See Prescription, III.) no act is to be deemed an interruption, unless the same shall have been acquiesced in for one year after the party interrupted shall have had notice thereof, and of the person making or authorizing the same to be made.

It seems that a release of a right of way previously established may be presumed from the declaration of a party that he has no such right, 3 Bligh, 241, 242; or from non-user for twenty years, 3 B. & C. 339. A prescriptive right of way to a public towing path on the banks of a navigable river, is not destroyed by that part of the river adjoining the towing-path having been converted by statute into a floating harbour, although such towing-path was thereby subject to be used at all times of the tide, whereas before it was only used at those times when the tide was sufficiently high for the purposes of navigation; and such prescription is not destroyed by a clause in the statute whereby the undertakers of the work were authorized to make a towing-path over land comprising the towing-path in question, on paying a compensation to the owner of the soil. 3 B. & A. 19.

By the general inclosure act, (41 Geo. 3. c. 102. § 10.) the commissioners are directed to set out private roads, and by § 11. all roads not so set out shall be extinguished.

VIII. If one grants a way, and afterwards digs trenches in it to my hindrance, I may fill them up again. But if a way which a man has, becomes not passable, or becomes very bad, by the owner of the land tearing it up with his carts, so that the same be filled with water, yet he who has the way cannot dig the ground to let out the water, for he has no interest in the soil. Godb. 52, 53. But in such case he may bring his action against the owner of the land for spoiling the way, or perhaps he may go out of the way, upon the land of the wrong doer, as near to the bad way as he can. But where a private way is spoiled by those who have a right to pass thereon, and not through the default of the owner of the land, it seems that they who have the use and benefit of the way ought to repair it, and not the owner of the soil, unless he is bound thereto by custom or special agreement. 2 Burr. 382.

Disturbance of ways is very similar in its nature to disturbance of common. See Common. It principally happening when a person, who hath a right to a way over another's grounds, by grant or prescription, is obstructed by inclosures, or other obstacles, or by ploughing across it; by which means he cannot enjoy his right of way, or at least not in so commodious a manner as he might have done. If this be a way annexed to his estate, and the obstruction is made by the tenant of the land, this brings it to another species of injury; for it is then a nuisance, for which an assize would formerly lie. See Nuisance. But if the right of way, thus obstructed by the tenant, be only in gross, (that is, annexed to a man's person, and unconnected with any lands and tenements,) or if the obstruction of a way belonging to an house or land is made by a stranger, it is then in either case merely a disturbance: for the obstruction of a way in gross is no detriment to any lands or tenements, and therefore does not fall under the legal notion of a nuisance, which must be laid ad nocumentum liberi tenementi; and the obstruction of it by a stranger can never tend to put the right of way in dispute: the remedy therefore for these disturbances was never by assize or any real action, but is by the universal remedy, of action on the case to recover damages. 3 Comm. c. 16; Hale on F. N. B. 183; Lutw. 111, 119.

An action on the case lies for the disturbance of a right of way, created either by reservation, grant, or prescription, (Com. Dig. Action on the Case for Disturbance, A. 2; Roll. Abr. 109.) and such disturbances may be either by absolutely stopping up the way, or by ploughing up the land through which the way passes, (2 Roll. Abr. 140); or by damaging the way with carriages so that it is of no use. Laughton v. Ward, 1 Lutw. 111. But such action will not lie for the disturbance of a highway, unless the plaintiff has sustained some special damage. Co. Litt. 56, a.; 5 Rep. 73, a.; 2 Bing. 263, 266.

In a late case it was held that a reversioner cannot maintain an action on the case against a stranger for merely entering upon his land held by a tenant on lease; though the entry be made in exercise of an alleged right of way, such an act during the tenancy not being necessarily injurious to the reversioner, for in order to entitle a reversioner to maintain an action on the case against a stranger, he must allege in his count, and prove at the trial, an actual injury to his reversionary interest. 4 B. & Ad. 72. See 1 M. & S. 234; 2 M. & S. 5.

In a declaration for a disturbance of a private way, it is necessary to state the terminus à quo and ad quem; and if it lead to a private close, to state some interest of the plaintiff therein. And it should also be shown whether the way be a cart way, horse way, or foot way. Com. Dig. Action on the Case for Disturbance, (B. 1.); 8 East, 4; Noy, 86; S. C. Latch. 166; see 1 C. & P. 579. But in both, the termini of a private way claimed by prescription should be correctly stated; it is not necessary to take notice of all the intervening land. 3 B. & Ad. 229; and see 1 H. Bl. 351; 1 East, 331.

In an action on the case for not repairing a private road leading through the defendant's close, it is sufficient to allege that the defendant as occupier of the close is bound to repair. 3 T. R. 766.

For the recent regulations made by the rules of H. T. 4 Wm. 4, as to pleading rights of way, see Trespass, V.

WEALD or WALD. In the beginning of names of places, signifies a situation near a wood, from the Sax. weald, i. e. a wood. The woody parts of the counties of Kent and Sussex are called the wealds, though misprinted wildes in the 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 6.

WEALREAF, from the Sax. weal, strages, and reaf, spoliation. The robbing of a dead man in his grave. Leg. Etheldred, cap. 21.

WEAR. A great dam made across a river, accommodated for the taking of fish, or to convey a stream to a mill.

All wears for the taking of fish are to be put down, except on the sea-coasts, by Magna Charta, c. 23, and 25 Ed. 3. st. 4. c. 4.

Commissions shall be granted to justices to keep the waters, survey wears and mills, and to inquire of and correct abuses; and where it is found by them that any new wears are made, or others altered, to the nuisance of the public, the sheriff, by scire facias, is to give the person making them notice of it; and if he do not amend the same in three months, he shall forfeit 100 marks, &c. 1 Hen. 4. c. 12; 4 Hen. 4. c. 11; 12 Edm. 4. c. 7. See further Rivers.

WEAVERS. By the 2 & 3 P. & M. c. 11, persons using the trade of a weaver should not keep a cuckoo or fullingmill, or use dyeing, &c.: or have above two looms in a house, in any corporation or market-town, on pain of forfeiting 20s. a week: and should serve an apprenticeship of seven years to a weaver or clothier, or should forfeit 20l. &c.; but this statute was repealed by the 49 Geo. 3. c. 109. See Manufacturers, Servants.

WED, Sax.] A covenant or agreement; whence to wed, a wedded husband, wedded bond-slave. Conell.

WEDBEDRIP. The customary service which inferior tenants paid to their lord in cutting down their corn, or doing other harvest duties. From the Sax. wed, a covenant, and biddan, to pray or desire, and ripan, to reap or mow. As a covenant of the tenant to reap for the lord at the time of his bidding or commanding. Paroch. Antiq. 401; Conell.

WEEK, septimana.] Seven days of time; four of which weeks make a lunar month, &c. The week was said to be originally divided into seven days, according to the number of the seven planets. Skene.

WEIGH, waga.] A weigh of cheese or wool, containing two hundred and fifty-six pounds; in Essex, the weigh of cheese is three hundred pounds. A weigh of barley or malt is six quarters or forty-eight bushels. There is also a weigh of salt. See 9 Hen. 6. c. 8 (repealed.)

WEIGHTS, [pondera] AND MEASURES. Are used between buyers and sellers of goods and merchandize, for reducing the quantity and price to a certainty, that there may be the less room for deceit and imposition.

There are two sorts of weights in use with us, viz. troy weight and avoirdupois; troy weight contains twelve ounces to the pound and no more; avoirdupois contains sixteen ounces in the pound; in this weight twelve pounds over are allowed to every hundred, so as one hundred and twelve pounds make the hundred weight. Dalt. 248.

In the composition of troy weight, twenty pennyweights make an ounce, twenty-four grains a pennyweight, twenty mites a grain, twenty-four droits a mite, twenty perits a droit, and twenty-four blanks a perit. The troy weight is said to be 20s. sterling in the pound; and the avoirdupois weight 25s. sterling. 4 Shep. Abr. 194.

Fleta mentions a weight called a trone weight, being the same with that we now call troy weight, and according to the same author, all our weights have their composition from the penny sterling, which ought to have weighed thirty-two wheat-corns of the middle sort; twenty of which pence made an ounce, and twelve such ounces a pound; but fifteen ounces made the merchants' pound. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 12.

As to what articles shall now be sold by troy weight, and what by avoirdupois weight, and for the other provisions of the recent statutes relating to weights and measures, see Measure.

WEIGHTS OF AUNCCEL. Mentioned in the (repealed) statute 14 Edw. 3. st. 1. c. 12. See Auncel Weight.

WEND, wendus, i. e. perambulatio, from the Sax. wendan.] A certain quantity or circuit of ground. Rental, Regal. Maner. de Wye, pag. 31.

WERELADA, from the Sax. were, i. e. pretium capitis hominis occisi, et ladian purgare.] Where a man was slain, and the price at which he was valued not paid to his relations, but the party denied the fact, then he was to purge himself by the oaths of several persons, according to his degree and quality; and this was called werelada. Leg. Hen. 1. c. 12. See next title.

WERGILD, WEREGILD, weregildus.] The price of homicide or other enormous offences, paid partly to the king for the loss of a subject, partly to the lord whose vassal he was, and partly to the party injured, or the next of kin of the person slain. LL. H. 1. See 4 Comm. 188.

In our Saxon laws, particularly those of King Athelstan, the several weregilds for homicide were established in progressive order, from the death of the ceorl or peasant, up to that of the king himself. And in the laws of King Henry I. we have an account of what other offences were then re-deemable by weregild, and what were not so. The weregild of a ceorl was 266 thrysmas, that of the king 30,000, each thrysmas being equal to about 1s. of our present money. The weregild of a subject was paid entirely to the relations of the party slain; but that of the king was divided, one half being paid to the public, the other to the royal family. 4 Comm. c. 23, and note. See Appeal of Death, Homicide.

WEST-SAXON-LAGE. The law of the West Saxons. See Merchenlage.

WESTMINSTER, Westmonasterium, Sax. West-myn-ster, i. e. occidentale monasterium.] The ancient seat of our kings, and is now the well-known place where the high court of parliament and courts of judicature sit.

It had great privileges granted by Pope Nicholas, among others, ut amplius in perpetuum regie constitutionis locus sit atque repositorium regalum insignium. 4 Inst. 255.

By the 57 Geo. 3. c. 19. § 29, reciting that it is highly inexpedient that public meetings or assemblies should be held near the houses of parliament, or the courts of justice in Westminster Hall at certain times, it is enacted that no public meeting of more than fifty persons shall be convened or meet in any open street or place within the distance of one mile from Westminster Hall gate (except such parts of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, as are within such distance,) for the purpose or on pretext of preferring or considering of any petition, &c. to the houses of parliament for alteration of matters in church or state, on any day on which either house of parliament shall sit, nor on which the courts of justice shall sit in Westminster Hall; and any meeting to the contrary shall be deemed an unlawful assembly; but this not to extend to meetings for elections, or to persons attending business in parliament or the courts of justice.

WHALE-FISHERY. Bounties were formerly granted by parliament to the ships engaged in the whale fishery. The first bounty allowed in 1732 was 20s. a ton to every ship of more than 200 tons burden, which was doubled in 1749. In 1777 it was reduced to 30s. but was restored to its former amount in 1781, which it preserved till 1787, when it was again diminished to 30s., and in 1792 further lessened to 25s., and in 1795 to 20s., at which sum it continued until 1824, when it was altogether withdrawn.

For the statutes regulating the whale-fishery, see Fish; and see further McCulloch's Com. Diet.

WHARF, wharfs.] A broad plain place, near some creek or haven, to lay goods and wares on, that are brought to or from the water. 12 Car. 2. c. 1.

There are two denominations of wharfs, viz. legal quays and sufferance wharfs. The former are certain wharfs in all seaports, at which all goods were required by the 1 Eliz. c. 11. (now repealed) to be landed and shipped, and they were set out for that purpose by commission from the Court of Exchequer, in the reign of Charles II. and subsequent sovereigns. Many others have been legalized by act of parliament. In some ports, as Chepstow, Gloucester, &c. certain wharfs are deemed legal quays by immemorial usage. For the lawful wharfs belonging to the port of London, see Key.

Sufferance wharfs are places where certain goods may be landed and shipped, such as hemp, flax, coal, and other bulky goods, by special sufferance granted by the crown for that purpose.

See Harbours and Havens, Port, Ships.

WHARFAGE, wharfugium.] Money paid for landing of goods at a wharf, or for shipping and taking goods into a boat or barge from thence. See 22 Car. 2. c. 11.

WHARFINGER. He that owns or keeps a wharf. See Carrier.

WHEELAGE, rotagium.] Tributum quod rotarum nomine penditur; hoc est, pro plaustris et carris transeuntibus. Spelm.

WHERLICOTES. The ancient British chariots that were used by persons of quality, before the invention of coaches. Stowe's Surv. Lond. p. 70.

WHINIARD. A sword, from the Sax. winn, i. e. to get, and are, honour; because honour is gained by the sword. A cant word used by Butler in Hudibras.

WHIPPING. A punishment inflicted for many of the smaller offences.

The punishment of whipping has been long recognized by the English law, the 22 Hen. 8. c. 12, directing all vagabonds taken begging to be whipped.

By the 1 Geo. 4. c. 51, this punishment is very properly abolished with respect to females, and imprisonment to hard labour or solitary confinement is substituted in its stead.

By the new Larceny Act, 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29, and the Malicious Trespass Act, 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 30, wherever the punishment of whipping is left at the discretion of the court, three times is the very extent to which it is allowed to be inflicted; and it is never imposed but in addition to imprisonment.

Where a statute directs an offender, on conviction, to be committed to prison, there to remain and be corrected, this implies whipping; and, indeed, renders that punishment a necessary part of the judgment, leaving no alternative in the discretion of magistrates. 14 East, 606. But most of the new penal statutes which impose this punishment, now give the magistrate a discretionary power.

WHITEHART-SILVER. A mullet on certain lands in or near the forest of Whitehart, paid early into the Exchequer, imposed by King Henry III. upon Thomas de la Linde, for killing a beautiful white hart, which that king before had spared in hunting. Cambd. Brit. 150.

WHITE-MEATS. Milk, butter, cheese, eggs, and any composition of them, which before the Reformation were forbid in Lent as well as flesh, till King Henry VIII. published a proclamation allowing the eating of white-meats in Lent. Anno 1543.

WHITE-RENT. A duty or rent payable by the tinnors in Devonshire to the Duke of Cornwall. See Quit Rent.

WHITE-SPURS. A kind of esquires called by this name.

WHITSUNTIDE. The feast of Pentecost, being the fiftieth day after East r

It is so called, saith Blount, because those who were newly baptized came to the church, between Easter and Pentecost, in white garments. Blount's Diet.

WHITSUN-FARTHINGS. Mentioned in letters-patent of King Henry VIII. to the dean of Worcester. See Pentecostals.

WHITE STRAITS. A kind of coarse cloth in Devonshire, about a yard and half-a-quarter broad, raw; mentioned in the (repealed) 5 Hen. 8. c. 2.

WIC. A place on the sea-shore, on the bank of a river. 1 Inst. 4. It more properly signifies a town, village, or dwelling-place; and is often in the Saxon language made a termination to the name of the town, which had a complete name without it, as Lunden-wic, i. e. London town; so Ipswich is written in some old charters Villo de Gippo wico, which is the same thing, for Gippe is the name, and Gipps wic is Gipps town.

WICA. A country-house or farm. There are many such houses, now called the wick and the wike. Cartular. Albat. Glaston. 29.

WICHENCRIF, Sax. mitchcraft.] The word occurs in the laws of King Canute, c. 27.

WIDOW, vidua, relicta.] A married woman bereft of her husband, left all alone. Litt.

WIDOW'S CHAMBER. In London, the widow of a freeman is, by the custom of the city, entitled to her apparel, and the furniture of her bed-chamber, called the widow's chamber. See Executor, V. 9.

WIDOW OF THE KING, vidua regis.] Was she that after her husband's death, being the king's tenant in capite, could not, during the continuance of the feudal law of tenures, marry again without the king's consent. Stamdf. Prærog. c. 4. See Tenures.

WIGHT ISLAND, was anciently called Guith, by the Britons; whence it had many other names, as Ictu, Wotha, &c. Law Lat. Dict.

WILD FOWL. By the 25 Hen. 8. c. 11. and 9 Ann. c. 25. various provisions were made prohibiting the taking of wild ducks, teals, widgeons, or other water fowl, out of season, or the taking of their eggs; and by the 2 Jac. 1. c. 27. persons shooting at any mallard, duck, teal, or widgeon, might be imprisoned for three months, unless they paid the fine, or gave the security not to offend again therein-mentioned.

All of these acts, however, were repealed by the recent statute amending the Game Laws, which contains a clause whereby persons having in their possession the eggs of any wild duck, teal, or widgeon, are made subject to a penalty. See Game, I.

WILL, ESTATES AT. A species of estates not freehold. An estate at will is where lands and tenements are let by one man to another, to have and to hold at the will of the lessor, and the tenant by force of this lease obtains possession. Litt. § 68.

Such tenant hath no certain indefeasible estate, nothing that can be assigned to him by any other; because the lessor may determine his will, and put him out whenever he pleases. But every estate at will is at the will of both parties, landlord and tenant; so that either of them may determine his will, and quit his connexions with the other, at his pleasure. 1 Inst. 55. Yet this must be understood with some restriction; for if the tenant at will sows his land, and the landlord, before the corn is ripe, or before it is reaped, puts him out, yet the tenant shall have the emblements, and free ingress, egress, and regress, to cut and carry away the profits. 1 Inst. 56. And this for the same reason upon which all the cases of emblements turn, viz. the point of uncertainty; since the tenant could not possibly know when his landlord would determine his will, and therefore could make no provision against it: and having sown the land, which is for the good of the public, upon a reasonable presumption, the law will not suffer him to be a loser by it. But it is otherwise, and upon reason equally good, where the tenant himself determines the will; for in this case the landlord shall have the profits of the land. 1 Inst. 55. See Emblements.

What act does or does not amount to a determination of the will on either side, has formerly been matter of great debate in our courts. But it now seems settled, that, (besides the express determination of the lessor's will, by declaring that the lessee shall hold no longer, which must either be made upon the land, or notice must be given to the lessee,) the exertion of any act of ownership by the lessor, as entering upon the premises and cutting timber, taking a distress for rent and impounding it thereon, or making a feoffment, or lease for years of the land, to commence immediately; any act of desertion by the lessee, as assigning his estate to another, or committing waste, which is an act inconsistent with such a tenure; or, which is instar omnium, the death or outlawry of either lessor or lessee, puts an end to or determines the estate at will. 2 Comm. c. 9.

The law is however careful, that no sudden determination of the will by one party shall tend to the manifest and unforeseen prejudice of the other. This appears in the case of emblements before-mentioned: and, by a parity of reason, the lessee, after the determination of the lessor's will, shall have reasonable ingress and egress to fetch away his goods and utensils. Litt. § 69. And if rent be payable quarterly or half-yearly, and the lessee determines the will, the rent shall be paid to the end of the current quarter or half-year. Salk. 414; 1 Sid. 389. And, upon the same principle, courts of law have of late years leaned as much as possible against construing demises, where no certain term is mentioned, to be tenancies at will; but have rather held them to be tenancies from year to year so long as both parties please, especially where an annual rent is reserved; in which case they will not suffer either party to determine the tenancy even at the end of the year without reasonable notice to the other, which is generally understood to be half a year. 2 Comm. c. 9.

This head of law is now of the less importance, because in pursuance of the leaning above-mentioned, it seems settled that what was formerly a tenancy at will by implication, shall now be considered a tenancy from year to year, determinable by half a year's notice expiring at the end of a current year. And it has been held even in construing the statute of frauds, where the words are that any lease, &c. for more than three years not in writing, shall operate only as a tenancy at will, that such a lease makes a tenancy from year to year. 8 T. R. 3. The term tenancy at will by implication is here used, because the general expressions that tenancies at will exist only notionally, and are, in fact, become tenancies from year to year, must be confined to those cases in which no determinate term being expressed, the law formerly implied a holding at will, and in which it would now, from an annual reservation of rent, or any other circumstances showing that the parties contemplated a holding for a year at least, imply a tenancy from year to year. A strict tenancy at will may be still created, though it seldom is so, by express agreement. See Hargr. & Butler's Co. Litt. 55, a. n. 361. & 4 Taunt. 128; Coleridge's note to 2 Comm. c. 9.

WILL OF THE SUMMONS. In Scotch law, that part of the letter of diligence, or process, which contains the order of the sovereign, beginning with these words, "Our will is," &c.

WILLS; OR LAST WILLS AND TESTAMENTS.

A preliminary observation is necessary; namely, that the system of wills, under the laws and decisions hereinafter mentioned, does not extend generally to Scotland; a will or testament being incapable of conveying landed property in that part of the kingdom, and having of late been greatly superseded in practice even as to personal property by deeds of general disposition.

The following summary as to the dispositions of lands in Scotland, which have superseded wills and testaments, is abstracted from Bell's Scotch Law Dictionary.

The transmission of land is, by the law of Scotland, regulated entirely on feudal principles. In all such transmissions there is a superior and a vassal. On the death of the vassal, the heir pointed out by the investiture, that is, by the title to the land, applies to the superior, and receives a renewal of the right; and it is a peculiarity in the law of Scotland, that a person on death-bed can do no deed by which the interest of the heir at law can be any way affected; and where a person has been ill at the time of any disposition made, it is only by going to kirk or market unsupported, or by surviving the execution of the deed of disposition for sixty days, that the objection of death-bed can be taken off.

It is on these grounds, therefore, that landed property must be conveyed in Scotland by deed, in the form of a disposition, by which the grantor gives, grants, and disposes in terms of present donation; and that the mere nomination of an heir in lands, or any similar form in the nature of a devise, as it is termed in the English law, is ineffectual to convey a right to lands under the law of Scotland. It may appear, perhaps, that by this form of deed the proprietor must instantly deprive himself of the property of his lands; and so he does in form; but by the use of two clauses, the one reserving his life interest, and the other a power to revoke or alter the deed, joined to the power of retaining it in his own possession or putting it into the custody of a friend, and still possessing the power of altering it, all danger from this form of conveyance is done away. One clause of the deed also specifies the consent of the party granting to the registration thereof, and appoints persons for that purpose. The deed must be executed in the presence of two witnesses named and described in the deed itself.

The reasons on which the form of a will or testament of personal property has in Scotland given way to that of a deed of disposition, depends on the construction of laws peculiar to that country. The present general adoption of the method by deed must obviously have arisen from the convenience of uniting the final disposition of a person's lands and moveables in the same instrument, by which a proprietor may convey his whole property to such persons as he prefers, and burthen them with the payment of such legacies as he thinks proper.

It may also be observed that, with respect to the wills of seamen and mariners, specific regulations are made by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 20. to prevent impositions upon them, as to the disposal of their pay and prize money: but these do not supersede the general rules of law in case of wills of real estates. See Navy, II.

In 1833 the Real Property Commissioners made a report upon the subject of wills, in which, after giving a compendious account of the present state of the law, they concluded by appending to the report a variety of propositions, having for one of their principal objects the reduction of the law to a uniform standard, with respect to the execution and operation of wills of real and personal estate. A bill, founded upon this report has just passed through the House of Commons, and some of the most important alterations it has in contemplation will be noticed in the course of the present title.

The Real Property Commissioners, in their report, also propose to take away the jurisdiction of the Spiritual Courts, with respect to the probate of wills and the granting of the administrations, as well as with regard to legacies and other testamentary matters. They recommend a general office to be established in the metropolis, where wills shall be registered, instead of being proved in the ecclesiastical courts, as at present, and that the jurisdiction of determining upon the validity of wills of personalty, and the power of granting administrations, which are also to be registered, shall be transferred to the Court of Chancery.

I. 1. A WILL or testament is, "the legal declaration of a man's intentions of what he wills to be performed after his death;" a will or testament being of no force till after the death of the testator, or person making it. 1 Inst. 111.

A will and a testament, strictly speaking, are not words of the same meaning. A will is properly limited to land, and a testament only to personal estate; and the latter requires executors. Wills, by which lands are disposed of, are regulated by several statutes made for that purpose, and are a conveyance unknown to the old common law, which permitted a man only to dispose of his goods or personal property. So the word devise seems most properly applicable to the disposition of lands by will; and bequest or legacy to that of personal estate. But in a course of time the words have come to be applied indifferently to a disposition of lands or goods, which are frequently and continually distributed and devised, at the same time, by the same will. Burn, Eccl. L. tit. Wills.

Upon the notion that a devise of land by will is merely a species of conveyance, is founded the following distinction between such devises, and dispositions of personal estate: that a devise of a man's goods and personal property will operate upon all such personal estate as the maker of the will dies possessed of, at whatever distance of time he may die after making the will. But a devise of real estate will only operate on such estates as were his at the time of executing and publishing his will; so that freehold lands, purchased after making the will, cannot pass under any devise in that will, unless the will shall have been legally and formally republished subsequent to the purchase or contract. See post, IV. 1.

It is intended, however, to alter the law in this respect, so that any freehold or other property acquired by a testator subsequent to the execution of his will shall pass by it, and the will be considered, with reference to the property comprised in it, as speaking at the testator's death, unless a contrary intention appears. See post, V.

Wills and testaments are divided into two sorts; first, written; and secondly, verbal, or nuncupative.

The law also takes notice of a particular gift, in the nature of a will, made by any one in contemplation of immediate death, which is called donatio causa mortis, a gift in prospect of death. This is, where a man, being ill, and expecting to die, gives and delivers something to another, to be his in case the giver dies; but if he lives he is to have it again. In every such gift, there must be a delivery made by the giver himself, or some person by his order, in his last sickness, while he is yet alive; for the gift will not be good if the delivery is made after his death. The delivery, however, may be made either to the person himself, for whom the gift is intended, or to some other for his use, which will be equally effectual, so as it is made in the life-time of the party giving. See further, Donatio causâ mortis, Legacy.

No stamp-duty whatever is imposed on wills; but the probate or letters of administration are charged with certain duties, in proportion to the value of the deceased's personal property. A will may therefore be written and executed by the testator on unstamped parchment or paper.

2. A NUNCUPATIVE WILL extends only to the personal property of the testator, and is his intention, declared in his last hours before a sufficient number of witnesses, and afterwards reduced to writing.

As these verbal wills (which were formerly more in use than at present, when the art of writing is become almost universal) are liable to great impositions, and may occasion many perjuries, the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2. c. 3. (amongst other things) enacts—

First, That no written will shall be revoked or altered by a subsequent nuncupative one, except the same (the nuncupative will) be in the lifetime of the testator put in writing, and read over to him and approved; and unless the same be proved to have been so done by the oaths of three witnesses at the least, who, by the 4 & 5 Ann. c. 16. must be such as are admissible upon trials at common law. See Evidence, II. 1.

But where a man by will in writing devised the residue of his personal estate to his wife, and she dying, he afterwards, by a nuncupative codicil, bequeathed to another all that he had given to his wife; this was resolved to be good. For by the death of the wife the devise of the residue was totally void, and the codicil was no alteration of the former will, but a new will for the residue. 1 Eq. Ab. 408; T. Raym. 334.

Secondly, That no nuncupative will shall be good (where the estate thereby bequeathed shall exceed the value of 30*l.*) which is not proved by the oaths of three witnesses at the least, who were present at the making of it; nor unless it be proved that the testator, at the time of pronouncing the same, did bid the persons present, or some of them, bear witness that such was his will, or to that effect; nor unless such nuncupative will were made in the time of the last sickness of the deceased, and in the house of his habitation or dwelling, or where he hath been resident for the space of ten days or more before the making of such will; except where such person was surprised or taken sick, being from his own house, and died before he returned.

Thirdly, That after six months passed after the speaking of the pretended testamentary words, no testimony shall be received to prove any nuncupative will, except the said testimony, or the substance thereof, were committed to writing within six days after the making the said will.

Fourthly, That no letters testamentary, or probate of any nuncupative will, shall pass the seal of any court till fourteen days at least after the death of the testator; nor shall any nuncupative will be at any time received to be proved, unless process have first issued to call in the widow, and next of kindred to the deceased, that they may contest the same if they please. Soldiers and sailors in actual service may dispose of their moveables, wages, and personal estate, as they might before this act. See the statute.

The legislature has, by the above restrictions, provided against frauds in setting up nuncupative wills by so numerous a train of requisites, that the thing itself is fallen into disuse, and is hardly ever heard of, but in the only instance where favour ought to be shown to it, when a person is surprised by sudden and violent sickness.

The words by which the devise is made must be spoken with an intent to bequeath, not any loose, idle discourse in his illness; for the sick man must require the by-standers to bear witness of such his intention. The will must be made at home among his family or friends, unless by unavoidable accident, to prevent impositions from strangers; it must be in his last sickness; for if he recovers, he may alter his disposition, and has time to make a written will. It must not be proved at too long a distance from the testator's death, lest the words should escape the memory of the witnesses (but which is permitted to be remedied by their writing down within six days what they heard the testator say); nor yet too hastily, and without notice, lest the family of the testator should be put to inconvenience or surprise. 2 Comm. c. 30.

Nuncupative wills, for the reasons given by Blackstone, have of late years hardly ever been heard of, and by the bill now before parliament they are to be abolished.

3. A CODICIL is a supplement to a will, or an addition made by the person making the will, annexed to, and to be taken as part of the will itself, being for its explanation or alteration; to add something to, or take something from the former dispositions; or to make some alteration in the quantity of the legacies, or the regulations contained in the will. This codicil may also be either written or verbal, under the same restrictions as regard wills. 2 Comm. c. 32.

Whenever a codicil is added to a will or testament, and the testator declares that the will shall be in force, in such case, if the will happens to be void for want of the forms required by law in the execution, or otherwise, yet it shall be good as a codicil, and shall be observed by the administrator. And though executors cannot regularly be appointed in a codicil; yet they may be substituted in the room of others named in the will, and the codicil is still good. If codicils are regularly executed and witnessed, they may be proved as wills; and so if they are found written by the testator himself, they ought to be taken as part of the will, as to the personal estate, and proved in common form by witnesses to be the handwriting of the person making the codicil, and by giving an account when, where, and how the same was found. Burn, Eccl. Law.

4. If two wills are found, and it does not appear which was the former or latter, both are void; so if two inconsistent wills of the same date appear, neither of which can be proved to be last executed, unless such inconsistency can be explained by some subsequent act of the testator, both are void; but if two codicils are found, and it cannot be known which was first or last, and one and the same thing is given to one person in one codicil, and to another person in another codicil, the codicils are not void, but the persons therein named ought to divide the thing betwixt them. But if the dates appear to the wills or codicils, the latter will is always to prevail, and revoke the former; as also the latter codicil, as far only as it is contradictory to the former; but as far as the codicils are not contradictory they are allowed to be both in force. For though I make a last will and testament irrevocable, or unalterable, in the strongest words, yet I am at liberty to revoke or alter it, because my own act or words cannot alter the disposition of law, so as to make that irrevocable which in its own nature is revocable. If in the same will there are two clauses or devises totally repugnant and contradictory to each other, it has been held, that the latter clause or devise shall take effect, on the same principle as respects prior and subsequent wills. But it seems now, that where the same estate is given by a testator to two persons in different parts of his will, they shall be construed to take the estate as joint-tenants, or tenants in common, according to the limitation of the estates and interests devised. 3 Atk. 493; 1 Inst. 112 b, n.

It was determined by the House of Lords, upon the opinion of all the judges, that if a will be made, and afterwards another will, without cancelling the former, and either will is proved to be confirmed after the other will, the whole estate comprised in the will so last confirmed will go according to the limitations in that will. And that if two wills appear, and the limitations in both are consistent, and they have both been confirmed by various codicils, the wills and codicils may all be taken together as one testamentary disposition, and such construction made as that the limitations in both wills shall take place to the disinherison of the heir at law. Phipps v. Anglesey (Earl), Parl. Cases, tit. Will, ca. 2.

Where two legacies are given to the same person by the same will, or by will and codicil, the rule seems clear, that by the devise of the same sum to a person by a second clause in a will as had before been given him by a former clause in the same will, he shall only take one of the legacies, and not both. But where a legacy is given to a person by a codicil as well as by a will, whether the legacy given by the codicil be more or less than, or equal to, the legacy given by the will, the legatee shall take both; and if the executor contests the payment, it is incumbent on him to shew evidence of the testator's intention to the contrary.

Equal sums given by a will and codicil were held to be substitutional, and not accumulative, although the latter was only conditional. The question always is, whether from the whole of the instruments taken together an intention on the part of the testator to substitute the one legacy for the other can be collected. Fraser v. Byng, 1 Russ. & M. 90. See further, Legacy.

5. Several regulations have been made by the law in order to guard against any frauds in the disposition of real estate by will. As to such wills as dispose of goods and personal property only, if the will is written in the testator's own hand, though it has neither his name or seal to it, and though there are no witnesses to it, it is good, if sufficient proof can be obtained of the handwriting. And even if it is in another person's handwriting, though not signed by the testator, it will be good, if proof can be produced that it was made according to his instructions, and approved of by him. But as many mistakes and errors, not to say misfortunes, must often arise from so irregular a method of proceeding, it is the safer and more prudent way, and leaves less in the breast of the ecclesiastical judge, if it be signed and sealed by the testator, and published in the presence of witnesses. 2 Comm. c. 32.

It is expressly provided by the English statute, 29 Car. 2. c. 3. (and by the Irish acts, 7 Wm. 3. c. 12. § 3.) that all devises of lands and tenements shall not only be in writing, but shall also be signed by the party so devising the same, or by some other person in his presence, and by his express direction; and shall be witnessed and subscribed, in the presence of the person devising, by three or four credible witnesses; or else the devise will be entirely void, and the land will descend to the heir-at-law.

In the construction of this statute it has been adjudged that the name of the person making the will, written with his own hand at the beginning of his will, as, "I, John Mills, do make this my last will and testament," is a sufficient signing, without any name at the bottom. But this seems doubtful, unless the whole will be written by the testator himself; and the safe and proper way is to sign the name, not only at the bottom or end of the will, but, as is usual and regular, at the bottom of each page or sheet of paper, if the will contain more than one; and the witnesses to the will, seeing the testator sign all the sheets, and put his seal (though this latter is not absolutely necessary in law), as well as his name, to the last sheet, must write their names under the attestation in the last sheet only.

Sealing of a will is not a sufficient signing. 1 Wils. 313.

Where a will, written on three sides of one sheet of paper, and attested by three witnesses, concluded by stating, "that the testator had signed his name to the two first sides thereof, and had put his hand and seal to the last side," and he put his name and seal to the last side only, the will was held to be duly executed. 5 Moore, 484; 2 B. & B. 650.

It has also been determined, that though the witnesses must all see the testator sign the will, or at least acknowledge the signing, yet they may do it at different times.

Jones v. Dale, 5 Bac. Abr. But they must all subscribe their names as witnesses in his presence, lest by any possibility they should make a mistake; and that a will is good, though none of the witnesses saw the testator actually sign it, if he owns it before them to be his handwriting. It is remarkable that the 29 Car. 2. c. 3. does not say the testator shall sign his will in the presence of the three witnesses, but requires these three things:—First, That the will should be in writing; Secondly, That it should be signed by the person making the same; and, Thirdly, That it should be subscribed by three witnesses in his presence. 3 P. Wms. 254. But it is not at all necessary that the witnesses should be acquainted with the contents of the will, provided they are able, when called on, to identify the writing; i. e. to say that the paper then showed them, is the same they saw the testator sign.

Though the statute has required that the witnesses to the will shall witness it in the testator's presence (in order to prevent obtruding another will in the place of the true one), yet it is enough that the testator might see the witnesses; it is not necessary that he should see them signing; for otherwise, if a man should but turn his back, or look off, it might make the will void. And in a case where the testator desired the witnesses to go into another room, seven yards distant, to witness the will, in which room there was a window broken, through which the testator might see them, it was by the court adjudged to be a witnessing in his presence. So where the testator's carriage was drawn opposite the windows of an attorney's office, in which the witnesses attested the will; this was clearly determined to be in the testator's presence. 1 Bro. C. R. 99.

Where there was a possibility of seeing the witnesses from the testator's room, but it was found that he was not in such a situation in the room as to see them, the attestation was declared invalid. 1 M. & S. 294.

Two witnesses to a will devising lands subscribed their names at the devisor's request, but did not see his signature, nor knew the nature of the instrument. A third witness (though he did not see the devisor's signature) was informed by him that the paper in question was his will. Above the names of the witnesses was written by the devisor, "In the presence of us as witnesses thereto." This attestation was held to be good, apparently on the ground of the immediate privity of the testator himself to the attestation, and thereby in fact acknowledging it to be his will. 6 Bing. 310.

If a will is executed at one time, and at another time afterwards the witnesses put their names to it, the testator being then insensible, this will not be a good will, as it cannot be said to be witnessed in his presence, if he is unconscious of what is passing. Doug. 241.

A will made beyond sea of lands in England, must be attested by three witnesses. 3 P. Wms. 293.

Before passing the act 55 Geo. 3. c. 192. a will devising copyhold land, witnessed by one or two witnesses, or even without any witnesses at all, was held sufficient to declare the uses of a surrender of such copyhold lands made to the use of a will. 2 Atk. 37; 2 Bro. C. R. 58. But an equitable estate of copyhold will pass by devise without surrender. 1 Bro. C. R. 481. A copyhold or customary estate, the freehold of which is in the lord, and not in the tenant, and which passes by surrender and admittance, was held to be neither within § 5. of the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2. c. 3. so as to require to a devise thereof the signature of the party, or the attestation of witnesses; nor within § 7. of that act, as a declaration of trust requiring to be proved by a writing signed by the party, which applies only to cases where the legal and equitable estates are separated; or by a will in writing, which must be understood only of such a will of lands as the statute recognizes, viz. by a will attested by three witnesses. The Court of King's Bench held, that such estate might well pass by instructions for a will taken in writing by another in the presence and by the oral dictation of the party, without any signature or attestation; and which was established as a will by the Ecclesiastical Court granting probate thereof; and which is a good will by the Statute of Wills (32 Hen. 8. c. 1; see post, III. 1.); the estate having been surrendered to the use of the last will of the party in writing. Such estates passing not by the will alone, but by the will and surrender taken together. 7 East, 299.

But query as to the effect of these determinations since the 55 Geo. 3. c. 192; and with reference to the terms of that act (see Copyhold,) it may not be irrelevant to observe that the power of devising copyholds was originally wholly dependent on special custom; and to such custom the 55 Geo. 3. expressly refers: but in 3 Bro. C. R. 286, it being alleged that according to the custom of a manor, copyhold lands holden thereof could not be surrendered to the use of the copyholder's will, and were not devisable by virtue of any custom subsisting in such manor, Lord Thurlow said it was totally impossible that a copyhold surrendered to the use of a will should not pass thereby; and therefore he must declare the custom, if there were such an one, bad. See now post, III. 2.

By the bill before mentioned it is proposed to enact that no will of any description (except wills of personal estate made by soldiers in actual service, or sailors at sea, under the present law, see Navy, II.) shall be valid unless it be in writing and signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction, and the signature be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more credible witnesses present at the same time, who shall subscribe their names to the will, in the presence of the testator, but no form of attestation shall be necessary.

It will be observed, that among other alterations meant to be introduced with respect to the execution of wills, that the name of a testator shall be signed at the foot of the will, and that the writing of his name at the commencement will not be sufficient. The witnesses also are to subscribe the will or acknowledge their signatures in each other's presence.

And with respect to appointments, the above bill provides (§ 17.) that no appointment made by will in exercise of any power shall be valid unless executed in manner thereinbefore required; but every appointment by will so executed shall be a valid execution of a power, notwithstanding such power imposed some additional form or solemnity.

It is also intended that a will executed in the above manner shall not require any other publication.

The witnesses to a will ought to be disinterested. In a case formerly determined by the Court of King's Bench, the judges were extremely strict in regard to the credibility, or rather the competency, of the witnesses; for they would not allow any legatee, nor by consequence a creditor, where the legacies and debts were charged on the real estate, to be a competent witness to the devise, as being too deeply concerned in interest not to wish the establishment of the will; for if it were established, he gained a security for his legacy or debt from the real estate, whereas otherwise he had no claim but on the personal assets. 2 Str. 1253. This determination, however, alarmed many purchasers and creditors, and threatened to shake most of the titles in the kingdom that depended on devises by will. For if the will was attested by a servant to whom wages were due, by the apothecary or attorney whose very attendance made them creditors, or by the minister of the parish who had any demand for tithes or ecclesiastical dues (and these are the persons most likely to be present in the testator's last illness,) and if in such case the testator had charged his real estate with the payment of his debts, the whole will, and every disposition therein, so far as related to real property, were held to be utterly void. This occasioned the 25 Geo. 2. c. 6. (and the Irish act, 25 Geo. 2. c. 11.) which restored both the competency and the credit of such legatees, by declaring void all legacies (and in this are included devises of lands and other interests) given to witnesses, and thereby removing all possibility of their interest affecting their testimony. The Irish act imposes a penalty of three years imprisonment on persons paying or accepting the legacy.

In the 17 Ves. 508. a personal bequest to a subscribing witness to a will of personal estate was held void, although no attestation was necessary in such case.

But in the 3 Russ. 436. it was determined that the 25 Geo. 2. c. 6. does not extend to wills of personal estate, and that a legacy to a person who is attesting witness to such a will is not void; the statute relating only to such wills and codicils as by the Statute of Frauds are required to be attested by witnesses.

The same statutes likewise established the competency of creditors by directing the testimony of all such creditors to be admitted, but leaving their credit (like that of all other witnesses) to be considered on a view of all the circumstances by the court and jury before whom such will should be contested. And the testimony of three witnesses, who were creditors, has been since held to be sufficiently credible, though the land be charged with the payment of debts.

An executor of a testator, possessed of real and personal estate, clothed with a trust to pay debts, and to lay out money for the benefit of the testator's children, and with a power to sell freehold lands in fee, but taking no beneficial interest under the will, was held a good attesting witness. 6 Taunt. 220.

So the wife of an acting executor taking no beneficial interest under the will. 12 East, 250.

But where an estate in fee on the determination of a life estate was devised to the wife of one of the attesting witnesses, and the testator and devisee died before the life estate was determined; held that the husband of the devisee was not a good attesting witness. 5 B. & A. 589.

With respect to the credibility of witnesses, by the bill before parliament, gifts to them, whether they attest wills of real or personal estate, are declared void, and they are to be admitted to prove such wills notwithstanding.

By § 22. creditors attesting wills are to be admitted as witnesses to prove the execution thereof.

And by § 38. executors are also to be admitted as witnesses to prove the execution of wills or the validity thereof.

A will more than thirty years old proves itself, and this though the testator died within the time. 2 M. & R. 195; 8 B. & C. 22. where one of the attesting witnesses was living.

II. 1. REGULARLY every person has full power and liberty to make a will and testament who is not under some special prohibition by our law or by custom, which prohibitions are principally upon three accounts: 1st, for want of sufficient discretion in the person making the will; 2dly, for want of sufficient liberty and freewill; and 3dly, on account of their criminal conduct. 2 Comm. c. 32.

It may not be amiss, perhaps, first to mention a case which does not strictly come under either of these heads, unless on some occasions it might be supposed proper to be referred to the third: An alien, while living under the English government, may obtain money, goods, and personal property, and may make a will, and dispose of such property as he pleases, contrary to the ancient custom in France, where the king, at the death of an alien, was entitled to all he was worth in that kingdom, a custom repealed under the reign of the late unfortunate Louis XVI. A distinction is made in some of the law books between alien friends and alien enemies. But in the case of an alien, the subject of a state at war with England, if he lives here and trades, and is not guilty of any unfriendly act, he is permitted to dispose of his goods and money as freely as any subject, and this under the idea that he has the king's license for staying in the kingdom, and is therefore in some degree entitled to the protection and privilege of a subject. But an alien (friend or enemy,) not being capable of acquiring any right in land for his own benefit, can never therefore have any real estate to dispose of. Yet it seems undisputed that an alien may be a devisee, even of lands, whatever the further effect of his taking such lands may be. Powell on Devises.

Some doubts have arisen, but it is believed have never yet been brought before the courts here, of the power of an alien, during a temporary residence here, to devise his property in the funds. It seems that such a devise is certainly good, unless the alien be positively restrained therefrom by the established laws of his own country, or by his own precontract. See further, Alien.

2. It is particularly provided by the 34 & 35 Hen. 8. c. 5. § 14. that no person under the age of twenty-one years shall make a will or testament of any manors, lands, tenements, or other hereditaments. See post, III.

It appears settled, however, that a male infant of the age of fourteen years and upwards, and a female of twelve years or upwards, are capable of making a will respecting only personal estate, but as the ecclesiastical court is the judge of every testator's capacity, and decides on disputes respecting the validity of wills relating to personal estates, the discretion of the person making the will may be disputed there, and his capacity of devising, let him be of what age he will. But no custom can be good to enable any persons to make a will under the respective ages of fourteen and twelve above-mentioned. Burn's Eccl. L. Though, by custom in particular places, infants may devise lands after that age, and before twenty-one. Burn's Eccl. L. See further, Infant.

By the bill before parliament it is proposed to fix seventeen years as the age at which persons, whether male or female, may make wills either of real or personal estate.

An idiot or natural fool, notwithstanding he may be of lawful age to make a will, cannot at any time make a will or testament, nor dispose either of his lands or goods; and on the same principle, persons who are grown childish, either through old age or any infirmity or distemper, are, during the continuance of such incapacity, disabled from making a will. 2 Comm. c. 32.

Lunatics, during the time of their madness, cannot make a will or testament, nor dispose of any thing thereby, and that for the most forcible of all reasons, their utter incapacity of knowing what they are doing; and it is a principle of law, that in making of wills, integrity, soundness, and perfectness of mind are absolutely requisite, the health of the body rarely not being regarded. Yet if such mad persons have had intervals of reason, then during the time of such intervals, if they are fully possessed of a sound and disposing memory and understanding, they may make their wills. Burn's Eccl. L. See Idiots and Lunatics.

Every person, however, is presumed to be of perfect mind and memory, unless the contrary is proved; and therefore if any one attempts to call in question or overthrow the will, on account of any supposed madness or want of memory in the testator, he must prove such impediment to have existed previous to the date of the will, but people of mean understanding and capacities, neither of the wise sort nor of the foolish, but intermediate betwixt both, even though they rather incline to the foolish sort, are not hindered from making their wills. The law will not scrutinize into the depth of a man's capacity, particularly after his death, if he was able to conduct himself reasonably in the common course of life; as it might be opening a wide door to support pretensions of fraud or imposition on the testator. Burn's Eccl. L. And if a person of a sound mind nicks his will, this shall not be revoked or affected by his subsequent infirmity. 4 Co. 61.

One overcome with drink is equally incapable of using his reason during his drunkenness as a madman; and therefore if he makes his will at that time, it is void. 2 Comm. c. 32.

Persons born blind, deaf, and dumb, are incapable of making a will, as they want the common inlets of understanding, and are incapable of having any desire of bequeathing or obtaining any knowledge with respect to property, or the disposal of it, and are in as helpless and ignorant a situation as idiots themselves, and even those who are only deaf and dumb by nature, cannot make any will, unless it very manifestly appears, by strong and convincing proofs, that such persons understand what a will means and they have a desire to make a will; for if they are possessed of such understanding and desire, then they may, by signs and tokens, declare their intentions. Burn's Eccl. L.

A blind person may make a nuncupative will, by declaring his intentions before a sufficient number of witnesses, and he may also make a will in writing, provided the will be read to him before witnesses, and in their presence acknowledged by him for his last will; but if a writing should be delivered to a blind man, and he, not hearing the same read, acknowledged the same for his will, this would not be sufficient; for it might happen that if he had heard the same read he would not have acknowledged it for his will. The best way, therefore, in such a case is, that the will be read over to the testator, and approved by him in the presence of all the attesting witnesses; and although this is not necessary to the validity of such will (2 New Rep. C. P. 214.) yet a court of justice will demand satisfactory proof of some kind that the identical will was read over to him, though it was not in the presence of the witnesses; it is, therefore, good policy to let all the subscribing witnesses be present at the reading over such a will, as in case of any dispute which may be more likely in such extraordinary circumstances, they will be most capable of affording complete satisfaction to the minds of a judge and jury. Burn's Eccl. L.

The above precautions seem in like degree requisite in the case of a person who cannot read; for though the law in other cases may presume that the person who executes a will knows and approves the contents of it, yet that presumption will cease where through defect of education he cannot read, or is by sickness incapacitated to read the will at that time. Burn's Eccl. L.

3. A married woman is restrained and prevented from devising any land or real estate whatsoever (but by the custom of particular places she may devise her freehold estate,) being particularly excepted out of the 34 & 35 Hen. 8. c. 5. enabling other persons to dispose of their lands and tenements by will; and it is a general rule, that she cannot make any will, even of goods or personal estate, without the license or consent of her husband, because by the law, as soon as a man and woman are married, all the goods and personal estate, of what nature soever, which the wife had at the time of the marriage, or may acquire after, belong to the husband, by force of the marriage, which empowers him to make such part of them his own as are not absolutely vested in him immediately by the marriage; and therefore it would be an inconsistency in the law to give her a power of defeating that rule, by bequeathing those goods and chattels to another. 2 Comm. c. 32. See Bacon and Fen.

Although a married woman is, generally speaking, so entirely under the power of her husband, that she cannot make what in propriety of speech is called a will, yet she may, with the consent of her husband, make what is termed an appointment, and which, like a will, does not take effect till her death, and may be altered or revoked during her life; and the usual way in such cases is for the intended husband to enter into marriage articles, or a bond, before marriage, in a sufficient penalty, conditioned to permit his wife to make a will, and to dispose of money or legacies to a certain value, and to pay what she shall appoint, not exceeding such value; and in that case, if after the marriage, and during it, she makes any writing, purporting to be her will, and disposes of legacies to the value agreed on, though in strictness of law she cannot make a will without her husband's positive assent to the specific will, but only something like a will, yet this shall be good as an appointment, and the husband is bound by his bond, agreement, or covenant, to allow the execution of it. 2 Comm. c. 32. And this will or appointment ought to be proved in the spiritual court. 1 Burr. 431; Stone v. Forsyth, Doug. 707.

To the above general rules there are also some few other exceptions.

The queen consort is exempted from these restrictions, and she may dispose of her goods and personal estate by will, without the consent of her lord. See Queen.

If a married woman is executrix to some other person, and in that right has goods and chattels, these do not become the property of the husband by marriage, because she has them not for her own use, but as representing the person of another, and therefore in this case she may, for the continuation of the executorship only, and for no other purpose, make an executor, and consequently a will, without the consent of her husband; but she cannot, either in her lifetime or by her will, dispose of the goods which she is thus possessed of in right of another, any otherwise than as by law she is required to do as executrix. See Baron and Feme, V.

If a married woman has any pin-money, or separate maintenance, she may dispose of any savings made by her out of the same by will, without the controul of her husband. Pre. Ch. 44.

Another remarkable exception is in favour of a married woman, whose husband is banished for his life by act of parliament; for she may make a will, and act in every thing as if she was unmarried, or as if the husband was dead. 2 Vern. 104. See further, Baron and Feme, VI.

Where personal property is given to a married woman for her sole and separate use, she may dispose of it by will without the assent of her husband. 3 Bro. C. R. 8.

Where lands are conveyed to trustees, a married woman may have the power of appointing the disposition of them after her death, which appointment must be executed like the will of a feme sole, and will be subject to the same rules of construction. 2 Ves. 610; 1 Bro. C. R. 99. And (though the contrary has been held) it has been determined by the House of Lords, that the appointment of a married woman is effectual against the heir at law; though it depends only upon an agreement of her husband before marriage without any conveyance of the estate to trustees. Bro. P. C. vi. 156.

By the measure before parliament (§ 14.), no will made by a feme covert shall be valid, except a will of real or personal estate to which she may be entitled for her separate use, or an appointment by will in pursuance of a power of appointment to be exercised by her, notwithstanding her coverture, or a will made with the consent of her husband of personal estate, or for appointing an executor to a will of which she shall be executrix.

If a woman makes a will and afterwards marries, and dies during the life of her husband, yet being at the time of her death incapable by law of devising, because her husband is then living, the will is void; for it is necessary, in order to make her will of force in law, that she had ability to make a will, not only at the time of making thereof, when the will received its being, but also at the time of her death, at which time only any will can receive its strength and confirmation. 4 Rep. 60; 2 P. Wms. 624. If a wife survives her husband, a will made during the marriage is not good, because she is, during such time, by law restrained from making any will; but if a will is made during the marriage, and she survives her husband, and approves and confirms the will after his death, in this case it will be good by reason of her new consent or new declaration of her will, for then it is, as it were, a new will. See post, IV. 1.

If a woman makes her will, and afterwards marries and survives her husband, and dies a widow, leaving such will made before her marriage; it has been held that the will was revived, and in force. Plowd. Comm. 343. But later determinations seem to have settled, that though she was able in law to make a will, both at the time of the execution of it and at her death, yet such will shall not be good or valid in law without a republication, it having been once absolutely revoked and entirely made void by the marriage. See 2 T. R. 695.

For the intended measure with respect to the revocation of the will of a woman by marriage, see post, IV. 2.

4. A will will be set aside which is made by a person in consequence of any threats made use of to him, whereby he is induced, through fear of any injury, to make such a will as he would not otherwise have wished to do; and as to this, no certain rule can be laid down, but it is left to the discretion of the court to determine upon the particular circumstances of the case, whether or no such persons could be supposed to have a free will in the disposing of their estates; and the judge will, on such an occasion, not only consider the quality of the threats, but also the persons as well threatening as threatened; in the person threatening, his power, and disposition; and in the person threatened, the sex, age, courage, pusillanimity, and the like. But if, after making the will, when there is no cause of fear, the maker of it ratifies and confirms it, it will be good in law. Burn. Eccl. L.

If a man makes a will in his sickness, at the over-importunity of his wife, contrary to his own wishes and desires, and merely that he may be quiet, this is a will made by restraint, and shall not be good. Sty. 427.

The ecclesiastical court has jurisdiction of fraud or deception relating to a will of personal estate, and can examine the parties by allegation concerning such fraud and deceit; and if the will was falsely read to the testator, then it is not his will; but in the case of a real estate, a will cannot be set aside even by a court of equity for fraud or imposition, but must be tried at law; on the question, whether the testator did or did not in fact devise; the fraud or imposition in this case being a matter proper for a jury to inquire into. Ker-ric v. Bransby; Parl. Ca. See further, Fraud.

5. A traitor, lawfully convicted of high treason, by verdict, confession, outlawry, or otherwise, besides the loss of his life, shall forfeit to the king all his goods and chattels, and all such lands and freehold property as he shall have at the time of his committing such treason, or at any time after; and so consequently is unable to dispose of any thing by will; and traitors are not only deprived of the privilege of making any kind of last will, from the time of their being convicted and found guilty, but any will made before does, by reason of such conviction, become void, in respect both of goods and lands. But if any person convicted of treason obtain the king's pardon, he is thereby restored to his former estate, and may make his will as if he had not been convicted; or if he had made any before his conviction and condemnation, such will, by reason of the pardon, recovers its former force and effect. See Attainder, Forfeiture, Treason.

A felon, lawfully convicted, cannot make any will, or other disposition of any goods or lands, because the law has disposed thereof already; so that it cannot be in the power of the felon to devise them. But in this case also, a pardon restores him to his former estate and capacity of making a will. See Attainder, Forfeiture.

The will of a felo de se is void both as to the appointment of an executor, and also with respect to any legacy or bequest of goods, for they are forfeited by the very act and manner of his death, but any devise of land made by him is good, as that is not subjected to any forfeiture. See Forfeiture, Homicide.

An outlaw is not only out of the king's protection, and out of the aid of the law, but also all his goods and chattels are forfeited to the king, by means of the outlawry, although it should only be for debt, and even though the action in which he is outlawed is not just, nevertheless his goods and chattels are forfeited by reason of his contempt in not appearing; and therefore he that is outlawed cannot make his will of his goods so forfeited. But a man outlawed for debt, or in any other personal action, may, in some cases, make executors; for he may have debts upon contract, which are not forfeited to the king, and those executors may have a writ of error to reverse his outlawry. Burn, Eccl. L. See Outlawry.

It was always the better opinion, that an excommunicated person might make a will; though some disputes had arisen as to the effect of what was called the greater and lesser excommunication; but these niceties are put an end to by 52 Geo. 3. c. 127. by which all disabilities resulting from excommunication are abolished. See Excommunication.

With respect, however, to the wills of traitors, felons, outlaws, &c. though they are void as far as concerns the king, or the lord who is entitled to the forfeiture of their lands or goods, yet the will is of force against the testator and his representatives, and all other persons whatsoever; so that if the king or the lord pardons the forfeiture, the will is suffered to take effect.

Formerly Roman Catholics were under several disabilities, both as to the purchasing lands, and taking them by descent or devise; but those are now done away, and persons of this persuasion are rendered capable of purchasing and devising lands, and having them by descent, purchase, and devise, on taking the oath prescribed to them by the act of the 18 Geo. 3. c. 60. but which oath seems now virtually repealed. See Roman Catholics.

III. 1. ANCIENTLY there were in different parts of the kingdom, and particularly in Wales, and in the province of York, and in London, several customs, the remains of the old common law, which prevented persons from disposing of more than the one-third part of their goods and personal property. And this restraint continued till very modern times, when, in order to favour the power of bequeathing, and to reduce the whole kingdom to the same standard, three acts of parliament have been provided; (one 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 2. explained by 2 & 3 Ann. c. 5. for the province of York; another, 7 & 8 Wm. 3. c. 38. for Wales; and a third, 11 Geo. 1. c. 18. § 17. for London;) whereby all persons within those districts, and liable to those customs, are enabled to dispose of all their money and other personal estate by will; and the claims of the widows, children, and other relations, to the contrary, under pretence of the custom, are totally barred. Thus is the old common law, restraining devises, and the customs in those places, which were the relics of it, entirely abolished throughout all the kingdom of England; and a man may give the whole of his chattels by will, as freely as he formerly could his third part; in disposing of which he was bound, by the custom of many places, to remember his lord and the church, by leaving them his two best chattels; and afterwards he was left at his own liberty to bequeath the remainder as he pleased. 2 Comm. c. 32. These customs, however, as far as they respect the distribution of an intestate's estate, still remain in force. See Executor, V. 9.

It seems sufficiently clear that, before the conquest, lands were devisable by will. Wright of Tenures, 172. But, upon the introduction of the military tenures, the restraint of devising lands naturally took place, as a branch of the feudal doctrine of non-alienation without the consent of the lord. See Tenures. And some have questioned whether this restraint was not founded upon truer principles of policy than the power of wantonly disinheriting the heir by will, and transferring the estate, through dotage or caprice, to utter strangers. See 1 Comm. c. 23.

However this be, we find that, by the common law of England since the conquest, no estate, greater than for term of years, could be disposed of by testament, except only in Kent, and in some ancient boroughs, and a few particular manors, where their Saxon immunities by special indulgence subsisted. 2 Inst. 7; Litt. § 167; 1 Inst. 111. And though the feudal restraint on alienations by deed vanished very early, yet this on wills continued for some centuries after; from an apprehension of infirmity and imposition on the testator in extremis, which made such devices suspicious. Besides, in devises there was wanting that general notoriety, and public designation of the successor, which in descents is apparent to the neighbourhood; and which the simplicity of the common law always required in every transfer and new acquisition of property. 2 Comm. c. 23.

But when ecclesiastical ingenuity had invented the doctrine of uses, as a thing distinct from the land, uses began to be devised very frequently, and the devisee of the use could in chancery compel its execution. For it has been observed, that as the Popish clergy then generally sat in the Court of Chancery, they considered that men are most liberal when they can enjoy their possessions no longer; and therefore at their death would choose to dispose of them to those, who, according to the superstition of the times, could intercede for their happiness in another world. But, when the statute of uses had annexed the possession to the use, these uses, being now the very land itself, became no longer devisable. See Uses. This might have occasioned a great revolution in the law of devises, had not the statute of wills been made about five years after, viz. 32 Hen. 8. c. 1. explained by 34 & 35 Hen. 8. c. 5. (and in Ireland by the Irish act 10 Car. 1. st. 2. c. 2.) which enacted that all persons being seised in fee-simple except feme coverts, infants, idiots, and persons of nonsane memory, might by will and testament in writing devise to any other person, except to bodies corporate, two-thirds of their lands, tenements, and hereditaments, held in chivalry, and the whole of those held in socage; which now, through the alteration of tenures by the statute of Charles the Second, amounts to the whole of their landed property, except their copyhold tenements; and these latter pass, as we have seen, rather by surrender than by will; and in the latter case, rather as personal than real property. But see 55 Geo. 3. c. 192; and post, III. 2.

Corporations were excepted in these statutes, to prevent the extension of gifts in mortmain; but now, by construction of the 43 Eliz. c. 4. it is held, that a devise to a corporation for a charitable use is valid, as operating in the nature of an appointment, rather than of a bequest. See Charitable Uses, Mortmain.

But, by the bill before parliament, it is intended to be enacted (§ 15.) That no devise or other disposition by will of real estate to any body politic or corporate shall be valid, unless such body is empowered by act of parliament to acquire real estate by devise.

With regard to devises in general, experience soon showed how difficult and hazardous a thing it is, even in matters of public utility, to depart from the rules of the common law; which are so nicely constructed, and so artificially connected together, that the least breach in any one of them disorders for a time the texture of the whole. Innumerable frauds and perjuries were quickly introduced by this parliamentary method of inheritance. For so loose was the construction of the 34 & 35 Hen. 8. c. 1. by the courts of law, that bare notes in the handwriting of another person were allowed to be good wills within the statute. To remedy which the statute of frauds and perjuries, 29 Car. 2. c. 3. already so fully stated, was passed. And to remedy the further inconveniences as to witnesses, the 25 Geo. 2. c. 6. (see ante, I. 5.) was found necessary.

One inconvenience more was at length found to attend this method of conveyance by devise; in that creditors by bond and other specialties, which affected the heir, provided he had assets by descent, were now defrauded of their securities, not having the same remedy against the devisee of their debtor. To obviate which, the 3 & 4 IV. & M. c. 14. provided, that all wills and testaments, limitations, dispositions, and appointments, of real estates by tenants in fee-simple, or having power to dispose by will, shall (as against such creditors only) be deemed to be fraudulent and void. And that such creditors might maintain their actions of debt against the heir and devisee jointly. And such devisees should be liable and chargeable for a false plea in like manner, as heirs, for false pleas, or for not confessing lands descended. A devise for payment of any real or just debts, or for raising portions for younger children, according to an agreement before marriage, were exceptions in the statute, § 4. [The corresponding act in Ireland was 4 Ann. c. 5.]

The provision of these statutes being confined to an action of debt, an action of covenant did not lie thereon. 7 East, 127. And a suit in equity founded on the statute must have been against the heir and devisee jointly. 2 Atk 125. As to the manner of declaring, see Clift's Ent.; Lill. Ent.; 5 Wantw.; 2 Chitty. In a case within the statutes, the devisee must have shown by plea the particular lands devised. Gott v. Atkins, Willes, 521, 523.

In Gott v. Atkins, Willes, 521, it was held that no action could be maintained on the 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 14. against devisees in trust to sell and apply the money arising by such sale in payment of debts. In 1 Comp. Ch. Ca. 45, it was held, that a devise to pay simple contract creditors, in preference to specialty creditors, was good within the statute. It was previously held, (Vernon v. Vaudry, Barn. 304.) that a devise to pay debts, excepting a debt as a surety, was not valid; but this appears to have been contrary to the letter of the act, and all other authorities. In Longard v. Derby, (Ld.) 1 Bro. C. R. 311. the testator devised to trustees in trust to apply the yearly rents and profits in payment of his debts; upon application by bond creditors for a sale, it was insisted that the will was not authorised by the statute; for a bond creditor, without the devise, may compel a sale, and the devise tends to defeat his claim; but, by the chancellor, Lord Loughborough, both by the words and the construction of the statute, where there is a devise for the payment of any real and just debt or debts, the case is taken out of the statute, and stands as it would have done before making the statute; the creditor can come in only as the will directs. See to the like effect, Bath (E.) v. Bradford (E.), 2 Ves. 577.

In Hughes v. Dolben, 2 Bro. C. R. 614. the testator had made a general charge of his debts upon his real estate, and devised a particular estate to trustees for that purpose, excepting the mansion-house. Lord Thurlow, C. said, that a devise for paying of debts, which was not effectual, did not take the case out of the statute; and that, if requisite, he should order the mansion to be sold. In Bailey v. Ekme, 7 Ves. 323, Lord Eldon, C. stated the uniform rule to be, that a provision by will, effectual in law or equity for payment of creditors, was not fraudulent within the statute: and see Kidney v. Cousmaker, 12 Ves. 154. Where an estate is charged with or devised generally for payment of debts, simple contract creditors are entitled equally with specialty creditors: and if the latter have exhausted the personal estate, they can have no benefit from the real estate until the simple contract creditors are paid pari passu. See further, Heir, III. 2, 4; Executor, V. 6.

The 3 & 4 Wm. & M. c. 14. was repealed by the 1 Wm. 4. c. 47, which provides a remedy for several cases in which there was no adequate relief under the above statute. See Real Estate.

In the arrangement of the funds in equity, as between the heir and the devisee, assets descended to the heir must be applied to pay debts, before lands specifically devised can be charged. 3 P. Wms. 367; 3 Atk. 556. As to the order of liability between different funds, see Executor, V. 6, and in addition to the cases there cited, see 8 Ves. 124; ib. 125.

2. More immediately as to what Things are devisable.—In general it may be stated, that every thing in which a man has the absolute property may now be devised by his will; disputes at present arising mostly on the words of the will, and not on the capacity to bequeath. Thus rents, tithes, manors, franchises, and annuities, may be devised, by virtue of the words, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, in the statutes of wills. So may reversions, and vested remainders expectant after an estate tail, and trust estates by the cestui que trust. See Powell on Devises.

Estates pur autre vie are devisable by 29 Car. 2. c. 3. § 12. by a will attested by three witnesses; but not where there is no special occupant. But now see post. See also, Life Estate, Occupant.

If any one has money owing to him on mortgage, he may devise this money to be paid when it becomes due. Burn, Eccl. L. See 1 Inst. 208; and tit. Mortgage.

The right of presenting to the next avoidance, or the inheritance of an advowson of a benefice, may be devised; so also a donative may be devised. Powell on Devises. And a devise of the next turn, or presentation, carries the next turn of presenting absolutely to the devisee, and not merely the right of getting himself presented. 3 Black. Rep. 1240. And such devise may be made by an incumbent or parson of any church, to whom the inheritance of the advowson of that church belongs, though he is the incumbent or parson of the church when he dies; for though the will has no effect but by the death of the testator, yet it has a beginning in his lifetime; and the disposition and bequest will be good also, if he appoints by his will who shall be presented to the church by his executors, or that one executor shall present the other, or that his executors shall grant the advowson to any particular person. This case being distinguished and excepted from the general rule as to advowsons, which are by law forbidden to be disposed of while there is no incumbent, and the church is empty, in order to restrain the practice of simony. 3 Bulst. 38, 43; 1 Roll. Rep. 210; Cra. Jac. 371; 1 Atk. 619. See Dy. 456; and tit. Simony.

If a man has agreed to purchase an estate, and the buyer and seller enter into articles for the purchase, and the buyer dies, having by his will devised the land so agreed to be purchased, before any deed to convey the same is made to him; the land will in equity pass to the devisee; the seller only standing as trustee for him, and whom he should appoint till a regular conveyance be executed. 1 C. C. 39; 2 Vern. 679; 1 Atk. 578. And see 11 Vesey, 550; Doug. 718; and 2 Ves. & B. 332.

A lease for any number of years, determinable upon a life or lives, or a lease for 500 or 1000 years, or any other term absolute, may be given and disposed of by will, as personal estate. Burn, Eccl. L.

If one of two joint-tenants, during his lifetime, devise his share in the land, and die, this devise will not be good; and the person to whom the joint tenant has devised his share takes nothing, because the devise does not take effect till after the death of the joint-tenant, and then the survivor takes the whole land by a prior title, that is to say, the deed of purchase. Burn, Eccl. L. And although the joint-tenancy is severed before the testator's death, yet if the will be made before the severance, it will have no effect; unless there is a republication of the will after the partition. 3 Burr. 1497.

By stat. Merton, 20 Hen. 3. c. 2. widows may bequeath the crop of their ground, as well of their dowers as of their other lands and tenements; and by 28 Hen. 8. c. 11. if the incumbent of a living, before his death, has caused any of his glebe lands to be manured and sown at his own expense, with any corn or grain, he may by his will devise such corn, and all the profit of it, growing on the glebe land so manured and sown. So if a man is possessed of land for the term of his life only, and the land after his death descends to his heir, yet he may devise the corn growing on the land at the time of his death, away from the heir, to some other person;

although he has it not in his power to devise the land whereon it grows. Burn, Eccl. L. So where a man has lands in right of his wife, or is tenant by the curtesy of lands, and sows them with corn, he may devise the corn growing on the lands at his death: and if the husband, or tenant by the curtesy, lets the lands to another, who sows the ground, and afterwards the wife, or the tenant by curtesy, dies, the corn not being ripe; yet in this case the person to whom the lands were let is entitled to the corn, and may devise it, notwithstanding his estate and interest in the land is determined. See Emblements.

But trees, and other things fixed to the freehold, or heir looms, which by custom go to the heir with the house, are not devisable but by him who has the fee-simple. 4 Co. 64; 1 Inst. 185. See Heir.

An executor or administrator cannot devise those goods which he has as executor or administrator, and which belong to the person to whom he is executor or administrator; but the same must be applied in payment of that person's debts, and distributed in a due course of law; the executor or administrator having these goods only for such particular purposes, and not to their own absolute use. Nor can a husband devise any effects which his wife has as executrix, for the like reason. Burn, Eccl. L. See further, Executor, Baron and Feme.

Although the personal estate of the wife becomes the property of the husband immediately on marriage, as he is thereby enabled to make all debts due to her, and bonds for money given her before marriage, his own; yet unless he recovers such debts during the marriage, and renews the bonds, and takes them in his own name, he has not such an absolute interest in them as to be able to devise them by his will; but they will, after his death, again become the property of the wife. 1 Inst. 351. But if a woman's fortune, or any part of it, consisted in bonds given her before marriage, and the husband on the marriage makes a settlement on her in consideration of such fortune, notwithstanding the bonds are not renewed during the marriage, yet the husband will be entitled to them, being in this case considered as a purchaser for a valuable consideration; and he may devise them, or they shall go to his executor, even though the wife should survive him. Talb. 108. See Baron and Feme.

It has been already noticed, that one cannot, under the law as it stands at present, devise lands which he shall acquire after making his will; the will only operating on such lands as he is possessed of at the time of publishing it. And though a man does, by express words in his will, give to another all the lands which he shall have at the time of his death, yet this devise will be good only as to such lands as he had at the time of making the will; and any lands purchased afterwards will not pass by it, but go to the heir at law, unless the will is republished. See post, IV. 1.

But where a man is entitled to an estate in reversion, expectant on the determination of another person's life, who holds the lands for his life or in tail, he may by his will dispose of this; and if the tenant in tail or for life dies during the lifetime of the testator, such lands, which will then come to his possession, will pass without any republication of his will; the reversion at the time of making the devise being a certain present interest, though it was to take place in future. 10 Rep. 78, a; 4 M. & S. 366.

It is a general rule that a right of entry is not devisable, the authorities for which are fully stated in Goodright v. Forrester, 8 East, 552, in which it was held that the fine of tenant for life divested the estate of tenant in fee in remainder, and turned it to a right which was not devisable; and Lord Ellenborough, C. J. of K. B. observed, that whatever mischief or hardship might attend such a decision, could (if the judgment of the court was well founded) only be remedied by positive law; and that the propriety of applying such a remedy, by which the same rights of entry and action which belonged to the heir might be extended to the devisee, was a question peculiarly for the consideration of the legislature. Upon the case being brought by writ of error before the exchequer chamber, it was decided on the ground of non-claim; that if the devise were of any effect, the devisee must enter within the same time within which the deviser if living, or his heir, must have entered: but the court declined giving any opinion upon the point decided in K. B., as to which however the observation of Mansfield, C. J. of C. P. deserves notice. See 1 Taunt. 578.

It is now in contemplation to enact by the bill before referred to (§ 3.) that every person may devise, or dispose of, by his will executed in manner thereafter required, all such real estate, and also all such personal estate as he shall be entitled to, either at law or in equity, except any real estate to which he shall be entitled for an estate tail or an estate in quasi entail, and any real or personal estate or share thereof to which he shall be entitled as joint-tenant, and which shall survive by his death to some other person.

And by § 4. every person may devise, or dispose of, by his will executed in manner thereafter required, any such real estate and personal estate, as thereinbefore are mentioned (except as aforesaid), to which he may be entitled at the time of his death, notwithstanding that he may become entitled to the same subsequently to the execution of his will.

By § 5. the powers of disposition by will thereinbefore contained, shall extend to all contingent and executory and other future interests in any real estate or personal estate (except as aforesaid), whether the testator may or may not be ascertained as the person or one of the persons in whom the same may become vested, and whether he may be entitled thereto under the instrument by which the same was created, or under any disposition thereof by deed or will; and every person, to whom any such interest, or any part thereof, may be disposed of by will, shall be entitled to the same interest, or such part thereof as may be disposed of to him, and to the same actions, suits and remedies for the same, as the person originally entitled thereto, his heirs, executors, or administrators, would have been entitled to, if no disposition thereof had been made: provided, that no person shall be empowered by the act to dispose of any expectancy which he may have as heir or heir of the body inheritable to any real estate, or as next of kin under the statutes for the distribution of the estates of intestates of a person entitled to any personal estate who shall survive him, or under any deed which shall not be executed in his lifetime, or under the will of any person who shall survive him (except under any devise or bequest in the will of his ancestor, which, in pursuance of the provision hereinbefore contained, shall not lapse by the death of such person in the lifetime of such ancestor).

By § 6. the powers of disposition by will thereinbefore contained, shall extend to all such rights of entry for condition broken, and other rights of entry, as would (if the act had not been made) have become vested in the heir or customary heir, or executor or administrator of the testator.

By § 7. the powers of disposition by will thereinbefore contained, shall extend to all real estate of the nature of customary freehold, or tenant right, or customary, or copyhold, or of any other tenure, which in consequence of the want of a custom to devise, or to surrender to the use of a will or otherwise, could not have been disposed of by will if the act had not been made; and the will by which such disposition shall be made shall be enrolled in the court rolls, or manorial books of the lord of the manor or reputed manor, of which such real estate shall be held; and the same fine, heriot, dues, duties and services shall be paid and rendered by the devisee as would have been due from the customary heir in case of the descent of the same real estate, and the lord shall have the same remedies for recovering and enforcing such fine, heriot, dues, duties and services, as he is entitled to for enforcing and recovering the same against the customary heir in case of a descent.

By § 8. the powers of disposition by will thereinbefore contained, shall extend to all real estate of the nature of customary freehold, or tenant right, or customary, or copyhold, which by the custom of the manor of which the same is holden, might be surrendered to the use of a will, notwithstanding that the testator shall not have surrendered the same to the use of his will.

By § 9. the powers of disposition by will thereinbefore contained, shall extend to all real estate of the nature of customary freehold, or tenant right, or customary, or copyhold, to which the testator, as devisee or otherwise, shall have been entitled to be admitted, notwithstanding that he shall not have been admitted thereto.

By § 10. the devisees of customary and copyhold estates, capable of being surrendered to the use of the will, are to pay, where there has been no such surrender, the like fees as would have been payable on such surrender; and also, where the testator was entitled to admittance, and was not admitted, and might, after admittance, have surrendered to the use of his will, the like fine and fees as would have been payable on such admittance and surrender.

By § 11. the powers of disposition by will thereinbefore contained, shall extend to an estate pur autre vie, whether there shall or shall not be any special occupant thereof, and whether the same shall be freehold or customary freehold, tenant right, customary, or copyhold, or of any other tenure, and whether the same shall be a corporeal or an incorporeal hereditament.

By § 12. if no disposition by will shall be made of any estate pur autre vie of a freehold nature, the same shall be chargeable in the hands of the heir, if it shall come to him by reason of special occupancy as assets by descent, as in the case of freehold land in fee simple; and in case there shall be no special occupant of any estate pur autre vie, whether freehold, or customary freehold, tenant right, customary, or copyhold, or of any other tenure, and whether a corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, it shall go to the executor or administrator of the party that had the estate thereof by virtue of the grant; and if the same shall come to the executor or administrator, either by reason of a special occupancy or by virtue of this act, it shall be assets in his hands, and shall be distributed in the same manner as the personal estate of the testator or intestate.

3. By the above bill it is also proposed to alter the rules by which gifts in wills lapse by reason of the death of the person to whom they are made.

By § 38, 39. where any person to whom any real property shall be given by will for an estate tail, or an estate in quasi entail, shall die in the lifetime of the testator, leaving issue, who would be inheritable under such entail, and such issue shall be living at the death of the testator; and also where any person being a child, or other issue of the testator, to whom any real or personal estate shall be devised or bequeathed, or any estate or interest not determinable at or before the death of such person, shall die in the lifetime of the testator, leaving issue, who shall be living at the death of the testator, such devise or bequest shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of the testator had happened before the deaths of such tenant in tail, or child or other issue, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will. And see further, V.

IV. 1. THE REPUBLICATION OF WILLS has already been alluded to. The cases respecting such publication relate chiefly to the rule that a will as to real estate can only operate upon the land which the testator has at the time of the execution; and establish, first, that a republication of a will gives it the same effect as if originally made at the time of the republication. 1 Ves. 440; and, secondly, that a codicil confirming the will gives effect to the whole will, as if made at the time of publishing the codicil, whether the codicil be annexed to the will or not. Comm. Rep. 381; 3 Bro. P. C.

107; 1 Ves. jun. 486; 4 Bro. C. C. 2; 7 Ves. 98; 2 M. & S. 5. Unless the expressions of the will and codicil are of so qualified a nature as to require a different construction. 7 T. R. 482; 2 Bos. & Pull. 500; 7 Ves. 499; 10 East, 242.

And where a codicil applies solely to property previously devised by the will, it has not the effect of republishing the will, so as to carry after-acquired property. R. & M. 117.

The cancelling a second will revives the first, which was thereby revoked. 4 Burr. 2512; but if one part of a will, of which there are duplicates, be cancelled at the time of making the second, the other duplicate not being then in the testator's possession, the first is not revived by cancelling the second. Comp. 49. And see 13 Ves. 290.

Where the testator continues exactly of the same mind, as to the method of the disposal of his property, and circumstances only require that the will should bear date at any particular time, it will be sufficient for him to call in three proper witnesses, and before them declare the signature to be his handwriting, and use the same forms as in the original execution. And the three witnesses sign their names to such new will or republication, mentioning the date thereof.

A new publication of a will is in truth, as has been already said, making it a new will; so that after such publication it has the force and operation of a will just made at the time of such publication. Therefore, if a man by his will devises "all his lands;" and after making the will purchases other lands, and then new-publishes his will, this new publication has made it a new will, and consequently by the devise of all his lands the newly purchased lands shall pass; for there is no necessity to make any alteration in this case in the will, the words being sufficient, upon the new publication, to convey all the lands he had at the time of such publication. So if a man by his will devises all his lands to certain uses, and afterwards purchases copyhold lands, and surrenders them to the uses declared, or to be declared, (or to the uses declared only,) by his last will; this has the effect of a republication of his will, as to such after-purchased copyhold lands, and they shall pass thereby. Comp. 180. So, as before stated, if the testator, after making such a devise, purchases freehold lands, and then makes a codicil, duly executed to pass real estate, though no notice is taken of the after-purchased lands; yet if the codicil is annexed to or confirms the will, or (as it seems) has a reference to it, this amounts to a republication of the will, and the after-purchased lands will pass under the general devise. Comp. 158; Com. 383; Acherley v. Vernon, 3 Bro. P. C. 107. See Powell on Devises; and Brady v. Cubitt, Doug. 40; where it seems that such republication may be effected by any instrument (sufficiently executed) referring to the will.

This rule, as to the new publication of a will, should be understood with the following restriction, viz. that the words of the will at the time of the new publication are such as are proper to convey the lands, and also sufficiently to denote the person to whom they are devised; for if there is any change with respect to the person who is to take the lands by the will between the time of the first making the will and the new publication of it, in such case the new publication will not alter the intention of the will as originally made, nor change the import of the words made use of; so as to make the persons named in the will take in a different manner than was intended at the time of such original making the same. If therefore I devise land to A. and his heirs; and A. dies in my lifetime, yet a new publication after the death of A. will not make his heir take by the will; for though the original devise was to A. and his heirs, and from thence it appears to be my intention that his heirs should have the land; yet because the heirs were named in the will to take by descent, as heirs only, and not as the persons designed to take the land immediately, the devise to them was rendered void by the death of A. in my lifetime, and the new publication of the will could not make it good; the publication making no alteration in the words of the will, and having no other effect than this, that if the words in the will are proper to convey and describe the person to take, and the land or thing to be taken, it makes that will, though of never so long a date, to be as perfectly new as if but then made. Powell on Devises.

There codicils, of different dates, were indorsed on the back of a will: the two first referred to lands mentioned in the will, made in disposition of lands purchased subsequent to the will, according to directions in the will, as to the deviser's lands in general, and appointed new executors; but these codicils were attested by only two witnesses each; the third codicil only appointed a new executor, in the room of one named in the second codicil; but this third codicil was attested by three witnesses. This was held to be a republication of the second codicil, and of the will; and the land acquired subsequently to the will passed according to the disposition made in the will, or to the deviser's land in general. 2 Bingham, 429.

A delivery of a will by a widow to her executor, which was made before her marriage, was held a sufficient recognition or republication. 2 Hagg, 209.

A testator devised to his wife certain estates, subject to particular bequests; and also all other his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates whatsoever, not before otherwise disposed of. By a codicil, in case his wife should die before him, he devised all his said estates to trustees, on entire trusts. His wife died before him: held that the codicil was not a republication of the will, so as to pass estates purchased between the date of the will and codicil. 3 Y. & J. 280.

Such republication being duly made will supply a defect for want of capacity in the testator to make a will, as well as any inability for want of a subject matter whereon the will may attach. And, therefore, if one having, under age, made a will of land, duly executed according to the statute, which is void by reason of his infancy, re-execute it after he come of age, with the circumstances required by the statute, this will render such will valid. 1 Sid. 162; 1 Keb. 589.

New publication of a will is always favoured in equity; and as regards personal or copyhold-estate, may be republished by parol; and with respect to personal estate, very slender evidence will serve; though it is not safe to trust to it. As if a man says, "My will in the hands of Robert shall stand;" this will amount to a good republication. See 3 Add. Eccl. Rep. 48. But we have seen that, in the case of real estate, the republication must be as formal as the original execution.

In consequence of the contemplated alteration in the law already mentioned, of making a will as to freehold property speak at the time of the testator's death, republication will be no longer necessary to pass real estate acquired subsequently to the making of the will. See post, V.

The Real Property Commissioners think, as publication is to be declared unnecessary, the expression republication may be dropped.

2. REVOCATION OF A WILL may arise from various causes both in fact and law; and is either express or implied. Express, as if the testator absolutely cancels the will, by tearing off the seal and the signature; or if he destroys or burns the whole will, or expressly declares his mind that his will should be revoked. Revocations are implied where the state or condition of the person devising, or of the estate or thing devised, is altered after making the will. As the revocation of a will may frequently take place without the knowledge, or even against the consent, of an uninformed testator, it is necessary to state the principles of the law on this subject something at length.

By the statute of frauds, 29 Car. 2. c. 3. no devise of land in writing shall be revocable, otherwise than by another will, or some other writing, to be executed in the presence of three witnesses: or by burning, tearing, or cancelling the will containing such devise, by the person making the same, or in his presence, or by his consent.

A will, with a clause of revocation of a former will, being signed by the testator in the presence of three witnesses, but being not valid as a will on account of not being attested in the presence of the testator, is not a revocation of the former will, not being intended for such, as an independent act. See Preced. Ch. 459; 1 P. Wms. 344; 3 Mod. 258; 1 Show. 89.

In the case of lands, where the law does not imply a revocation, it must be in writing, operating as a will, and signed by the person making the will; or by some writing, by which the testator declares his intention to revoke the first will, and signed by three witnesses, pursuant to the statute of frauds.

A subsequent devise to another person, though he may be incapable of taking, is a revocation of a precedent devise to a person who was capable of taking; as it serves to show the intent of the testator to revoke the first devise, though the second cannot take effect. See Spragge v. Stone, cited Doug. 35. But one will cannot be revoked by another will, though it should contain a clause declaring all former wills to be revoked, unless the second is valid and effectual as a will. 2 P. Wms. 343. Yet a will may be revoked by an instrument written merely for the purpose of revocation, if it is attested by three witnesses: and the testator must sign it in their presence, which, as already noticed, is not necessary in the execution of a will. 3 Comm. c. 23. in n.

If there is a duplicate of a will made, and deposited in the hands of an executor, or other person; in such case, a cancelling of that part of the will which is in the possession of the testator is a sufficient revocation of both the parts, as well that in his own hands as the duplicate in the hands of the executor; they being both in fact but one will. Doug. 40. So, if a testator makes a second will, and duly executes the same, it shall, without any thing further, revoke and make void the former will and duplicate.

Where a latter will is the instrument by which a former is revoked, the revocation effected thereby is ambulatory until the death of the testator; for although, by making a second will, the testator intends to revoke the former, yet he may change his intention at any time before his death, (until which neither of his wills can have operation,) and then the latter, being a revocable instrument itself, and only affecting the former as far as it is itself efficient, being revoked, is as no will; the consequence of which is, that the first will never having been cancelled, but remaining entire, stands in like manner as if no other had been made. 4 Burr. 2512; Comp. 92. If a will be made, and then a subsequent, expressly revoking the former, although the first will be left entire and the second will be afterwards cancelled, yet the better opinion seems to be that the former is not thereby set up again. See Comp. 53. So, if a testator having made a new will, actually cancel the former will by tearing off the name and seal, &c., and afterwards cancel the latter will, the former will is not revived thereby, although a counterpart thereof be found uncanceled and undestroyed; because the revocation is here an express, independent, substantive act; by which the former will becomes to all intents and purposes void, and incapable of taking effect, unless as a new will by force of a republication. See Comp. 49; 13 Vesey, 290.

An instrument void as a conveyance, does not revoke a prior will. Where, therefore, a wife having a power of appointment by will, duly executed that power, and afterwards joined with her husband in a deed purporting to be an appointment of the same lands, but which was a nullity as to the wife, it was held that the will made in pursuance of the power was not revoked. 1 Russ. 564.

A codicil does not revoke or alter a will to a greater extent than was intended. A testator by his will gave certain legacies exclusively charged on real estate. By a codicil reciting so much of the will as related to those legacies, he revoked that part of his will, and in lieu of the legacies therein given, gave smaller. Held, that the object of the codicil being merely to alter the amount of the legacies, it could not extend to charge the personal estate; but the codicil not being attested by three witnesses, did not alter the amount of legacies charged on the real estate. 4 Russ. 435.

A beginning to cancel, under the impression that a new will is complete, and desisting, on being informed of the contrary, is no revocation. 1 Eq. Abr. 409. Throwing the will into the fire with intent to destroy it is sufficient, though it fall off, and is preserved. 2 Blackst. Rep. 1043. The obliteration of a part is only a revocation as to that part. Sutton v. Sutton, Comp. 812.

A testator having quarrelled with one of the devisees named in his will, began to tear it in a fit of passion, with the intention of destroying it; and having torn it in four pieces he was prevented from proceeding further, partly through the efforts of a by-stander, and partly by the entreaties of the devisee: he afterwards became calm, and, having put by the several pieces, expressed his satisfaction that no material part of the writing had been injured, and that it was no worse. It was held to be properly left to a jury to say, whether the testator had completely finished all that he intended to do for the purpose of destroying the will; the jury having found that he had not, the court refused to disturb the verdict. 3 B. & A. 489.

A testator in Peru, supposing his will to be lost, by which he had appointed his wife to be executrix and universal legatee for life, made a nuncupative will there (not in conformity with the statute of frauds) with a general revocatory clause, appointing two executors and his wife universal legatee absolutely. The executors renounced, and the wife took probate in Peru of the nuncupative will. The former will was afterwards found, and probate thereof granted to the wife at her prayer. 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 378.

Where a will was executed in duplicate, and one part remains in the custody of the testator, but the other is left abroad, where the testator resided at the time of making his will, if the testator destroys the part in his own custody, the legal consequence is that the part remaining abroad is revoked, unless it is clearly shown that the testator did not intend his act to have that operation. Colvin v. Fraser, 2 Hagg. 266. This was a case of immense property of a Mr. Farquhar. The facts were much contested, but the principle was held to be clear.

Striking out the name of a joint-tenant has the effect of leaving the entire estate in the other. Aliter as to tenants in common, who cannot thereby acquire an estate not originally given. 2 Bos. & Pull. 16, 109. See also 4 East, 419.

Without any express revocation, if a man who has made his will afterwards marries, and has a child or children, whether such child is born before or after his death, this is a presumptive or implied revocation of his former will which he made in his state of celibacy, as well as to his real as his personal estate; and the statute does not extend to this case, but he shall be said to die intestate; the law supposing that he must mean to provide in the first place for his family, and distributing his estate for their benefit accordingly. See 5 T. R. 49. This, however, being only a presumptive revocation, if it appears, by any expression or other means, to be the intent of the testator that his will should continue in force, the marriage will be no revocation of it. As in the case where a man devised an estate to a woman, whom he afterwards married, and when he died she was with child of a son, yet the will was determined to be good, and not revoked by the marriage. And such implied revocation may, in all cases, be rebutted by parol evidence. Doug. 40. And more particularly, 2 East, 530, and 7 Ves. 348.

In Wright v. Netherwood, in the Prerogative Court, 1793, where A. made a will leaving legacies, and appointing his wife residuary legatee, and she died leaving several children: A. married again, and had one child by his second wife; and afterwards he, his wife, and all his children, perished by shipwreck, it was determined that the will was not revoked; on the ground that implied revocations depend on the circumstances at the time of the testator's death, and that in this case at the time of his death he had no wife or children.

In Doe d. White v. Burford, where J. B. had married, and afterwards made his will, and devised to his niece; and then died, leaving his wife enchant with a daughter, which was unknown to him: the Court of King's Bench held that the will was not revoked by the birth of the daughter. 4 M. & S. 10.

That the presumptive or tacit revocation, by marriage and birth of a child without provision, can be rebutted by a parol evidence of intention is affirmed per cur. Lord Raym. 441; Doug. 31; per Eyre, J. 2 H. Blackst. 522; but negatived per Lord Alvanley, 4 Ves. jun. 848; Lord Rosslyn, 5 Ves. jun. 664. See 2 Comm. 503, n.

It is still a matter of doubt, but evidence of circumstances has been admitted, and has been made the foundation of several exceptions to the rule.

Thus marriage and issue have been held not to be a revocation of a will, when there were children of a first marriage, and a provision for the second wife and her issue. 2 Hagg. 561.

By the bill before parliament, § 24. every will made by a man or woman shall be revoked by his or her marriage, except a will made in exercise of a power of appointment, when some person other than his or her heir, executor, or administrator, shall be entitled to the real or personal estate thereby appointed in default of such appointment.

By § 25. no will shall be revoked by any presumption of an intention on the ground of an alteration in circumstances.

By § 26. no will or codicil, or any part thereof, shall be wholly revoked, otherwise than by the burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same by the testator, or by some person in his presence or by his direction, with the intention of revoking the same, or by marriage, except as aforesaid, or by another will or codicil executed in manner thereinbefore required, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same, and executed in the manner in which a will is hereby required to be executed; and no will or codicil shall be revoked in part, otherwise than by a codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same, and executed in the manner in which a will is thereby required to be executed, or by an obliteration, interlineation, or alteration, executed as thereinbefore is required.

By § 27. no obliteration, interlineation, or other alteration, made in any will after the execution thereof, shall be valid, or have any effect, unless such alteration shall be executed in like manner as hereinbefore is required for the execution of the will; but the will with such alteration as part thereof, shall be deemed to be duly executed, if the signature of the testator be made and the names of the witnesses be written by them in the margin, or some other part of the will opposite or near to such alteration, or at the foot, or end, or opposite, or near, to a memorandum referring to the alteration, and written at the end, or on some other part, of the will.

By § 28. no will or codicil, which shall be revoked by burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same, shall be revived, otherwise than by the re-execution of a duplicate thereof; and no will or codicil, which shall be revoked by marriage, shall be revived, otherwise than by the re-execution thereof, or by a codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, and showing an intention to revive the same; and no will or codicil, which shall be wholly revoked by another will or codicil, or writing executed as aforesaid, shall be revived, otherwise than by the re-execution thereof, or by a codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, and showing an intention to revive the same, or by the revocation of such subsequent will, codicil, or writing, by burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying, with the intention of revoking the same; and when any will or codicil shall be partly revoked, the part thereof so revoked shall not be revived, otherwise than by a codicil executed in manner thereinbefore required, and showing an intention to revive the same, or by the revocation of the codicil or writing, by which the same was revoked, by burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying, with the intention of revoking, the same, or by an obliteration, interlineation, or other alteration, executed in manner thereinbefore required; and when any will or codicil, which shall be partly revoked, and afterwards wholly revoked, shall be revived, such revival shall not extend to so much thereof as shall have been revoked before the revocation of the whole thereof, unless an intention to the contrary shall be shown.

Where a man, possessed of stock or money in the funds, devises the exact quantity he is possessed of to any one or more persons by his will, this is a specific legacy; and if the testator afterwards, before his death, sells any part of the stock so devised, such sale shall operate as a revocation (or, as the law terms it, an ademption or taking away) of so much of the legacy as shall be sold: and the legatee or legatees shall be only entitled to so much stock as actually remains at the time of the testator's death; and if there is no stock at all remaining, the whole legacy is gone, and the legatees cannot come on the other part of the estate for a satisfaction. If the testator, however, after sale of part of the stock, purchases other stock, this shall restore the legatees to the amount of such purchase. See Legacy, I.

Revocations of a will may also take place by an actual or intended alteration in the estate of the testator. And here it is necessary to observe, that the principle which governs cases of such actual alteration is clearly distinguishable from that which governs cases of an intended alteration only: in the former cases, the revocation is a consequence of law, uninfluenced by, and independent of any intent in the testator to revoke or not; but, in the latter cases, the revocation is an inference from the fact, as furnishing a ground to conclude that such was the intent of the party. Powell on Devises.

The following general principles will explain the nature of such revocations, and the decisions of the courts thereon; and the instances quoted, though few, may suffice in a work of this nature.

There is no feature in our law more prominent than that of an uniform solicitude, on every occasion, to favour the heir, and prevent his disinheritance: this anxious attention to the interest of the lawful representative has introduced into the law respecting devises this fixed principle; namely, that as at the inception of his will a man must be seised of the estates he devises, so the law requires that such estate should remain in the same plight and unaltered, to the time of its consummation by his death; and that his original intention in respect thereto should continue, unremittingly, the same until the object of it takes effect, when the will is consummated thereby; and therefore not only any alteration or new modelling which makes it a different estate, but also any intent of the owner to alter or new-model the estate, will, in construction of law, render a disposition of it by will invalid. See Powell on Devises, tit. Revocations, and the cases there cited.

Any alteration whatever in a freehold estate will operate as a revocation; even although the act done be necessary to give effect to the disposition made by such devise. 3 P. Wms. 163, 170. And the rule of law will be the same, although the act be expressly declared to be done with a view to give effect to the will, if, in its operation, the deviser be in as of a new purchase; for the rule being introduced with a view to preserve the inheritance in the heir-at-law, and not with a view to carry into execution the intent of the deviser, the question is not, whether the deviser intended to revoke; but whether he intended to do that, the effect of which in law will be to alter the estate or interest which was in him, by passing it away, and taking it back through a new channel; for if that be his intention, whether he meant to revoke or not is immaterial; the alteration operating as a revocation in law, and not as a revocation by the party; and therefore taking effect without reference to the intent of the party, as to the stability or non-stability of the will. Powell on Devises. See 2 Atk. 579; 1 Bos. & Pull. 576.

A fine levied by a testator subsequent to his will, was held to operate as a revocation. 3 Moore, 24; 3 Bro. P. C. 361.

Where a testator, after having made his will, levied a fine to such uses as he should by deed or will appoint, and died without making any new will, the will made prior to the fine was revoked thereby. 2 New Rep. 401.

Since courts of equity have considered articles for the sale of estates, or respecting the settlement of them, as of the nature of actual conveyances, from the time at which they are agreed to be carried into execution; even covenants, when the covenantee has a right to a specific performance, have been allowed in equity to operate as revocations of wills previously made. See 2 P. Wms. 329, 624.

But, upon the principle that no actual alteration is made in the thing devised, the changing of trustees, where the estate originally devised is only the trust, will not amount to a revocation. 1 C. R. 23; 2 C. R. 109. Nor though the estate is absolutely conveyed to different parties from those who had it at the time of the devise; as in the case of an intended purchase being completed, or a mortgage paid off by the testator. Doug. 561; Doug. 719; 3 P. Wms. 170; 1 Wils. 311; and 11 Vesey, 550. But see 2 Ves. & Beames, 382, where a person, after devising land contracted for, took the conveyance, with limitation to bar dower by the interposition of a trustee; and it was ruled by the vice-chancellor that the will was revoked.

Under the head of intended alterations of his estate by the deviser may be arranged those cases, where the deviser, after making his will, attempts a disposition of his estate, and intends a complete conveyance, but fails therein, either for want of due formalities, in the instrument that he uses, or from an incapacity to take, in the person to whom he means to convey; in these cases of intended alteration, it may be shown that the deviser had no intent to alter the disposition he has made; and if that be made out in proof, no revocation will ensue from the circumstance of there having been such imperfect conveyance. Powell on Devises.

In all cases, where a person having lands in fee devises them, and then parts with or conveys them away, though he afterwards, nay immediately, takes a new estate in fee, this will be a revocation of his will. 1 Ro. Ab. 616. pl. 15; 2 Atk. 325; Bro. P. C.; 1 Eq. Ab. 412. c. 12; and see Powell on Devises. As where a person having made his will, and thereby devised his real estate, afterwards, in contemplation of an intended marriage, conveys that estate to trustees for the use of himself and his heirs till the marriage should take effect, and after the marriage for other particular uses; but happens to die before any marriage had; this has been determined to be a revocation of his will as to the disposal of such estate. Shaw. P. C. 154; 4 Burr. 1961. See Powell on Devises. But in the case of coparceners, as also in the case of tenants in common, having devised their several parts by will, any partition between them, (or even the levying a fine, in consequence of and to strengthen the same,) shall not revoke their will; if the conveyance is merely for the purpose of partition. T. Raym. 140, 240; 3 P. Wms. 170; 1 Wils. 309. But see 8 Ves. 231; 10 Ves. 246.

If a man, seised of lands in fee, devises the same by his will, and afterwards mortgages them in fee, to secure a sum of money, though in law the legal estate is conveyed to the mortgagee, and such mortgage is therefore held to be a revocation of the devise in the will; yet in equity it is now settled that these mortgages shall only operate as a revocation pro tanto; (for so much as the land is mortgaged for;) by which means the devisee shall take the land under the will, subject to the mortgage. 1 Vern. 239; 2 C. R. 154; 1 Salk. 158; and see Powell on Devises. A conveyance by way of mortgage for years amounts, both in law and equity, only to a conditional revocation pro tanto of a devise in fee: but still the construction is different in law and in equity; for in law the mortgage is an absolute revocation quoad the term, though the reversion passes by the will notwithstanding; but in equity it is a revocation pro tanto only as well with respect to the term as to the reversion, and the reversion there draws to it the equity of redemption. Powell on Devises. But if one devise lands to A. in fee, and afterwards mortgage the same lands to A., this has been decreed to be an entire revocation, it being inconsistent with the devise. Pre. Ch. 514.

If a man possessed of a leasehold estate in land for a term of years, or for life or lives, by his will bequeaths the same to A., and after making his will takes a new lease of the same land for another term of years, or for other life or lives, so that the former lease is surrendered in fact or in law, this is a revocation of his will, or at least makes the same void as to this devise; for this is another lease, and not that which he had at the time of the making of the will. 1 P. Wms. 575; 2 P. Wms. 168; 3 P. Wms. 163.

But these revocations turn merely on the penning the will, viz. whether the words are sufficient to pass the subsequent renewed interest; and not on any inability in point of law, to give by will an after-taken lease: and therefore if such lease be disposed of by will, by a proper form of words, it will pass, notwithstanding any subsequent renewal. As if one give "all his estate, right, and interest, he shall have to come in such lease at the time of his death." So, such right of renewal will pass by general devise of the residue; or by a devise of the lease, together with the right of renewal: and the devise of the lease carries the right of renewal as well as the lease itself. Salk. 237; 1 P. Wms. 575; 1 Atk. 599; 3 Atk. 177, 199; and see Powell on Devises.

Perhaps there are few settled doctrines of law, to which it would be more desirable to apply the correction of legislative authority, than those by which a devise is rendered inoperative, in consequence of a subsequent conveyance of the estate, contrary to the admitted intention of the testator. The positions, that a devise is generally annulled at law by any conveyance of the estate made subsequent to the devise, although the testator, by the effect of the statute of uses, continues seised of the ancient estate, and even though the conveyance is inoperative for want of legal requisites; and that when there is a revocation at law, a court of equity will not controul the legal operation of the conveyance, except in certain deficient cases; are fully established as settled rules of property. The history of the law on this subject, and the grounds and principles upon which it is founded, have been already stated in part, and are most fully stated in 2 Ves. 417; 7 Bro. P. C. 505; 1 B. & P. 576; 7 T. R. 399; and S. C. in equity, 3 Ves. 682; 7 Bro. P. C. 503; and see 6 Ves. 199; 8 Ves. 106; 9 Moore, 286; 2 Bingh. 136; 3 B. & A. 462. The question for consideration as a matter of legislative interference is, whether it would be more conducive to utility, that the law should continue as it is, or that it should be reformed. The disappointment of the intention of the testator is undisputed in all the cases; and the benefit from permitting it to continue results from the contingent advantage derived to the heir in consequence of his ancestor's ignorance of a technical rule, the knowledge of which would be immediately followed by the necessary provisions for preventing such advantage from being obtained. The remedy suggested is by a law, enacting, that no devise of lands should be annulled or affected by any recovery, fine, or conveyance, except so far as shall be necessary for the express object or purpose for which such conveyance shall be made: but that every such devise shall be valid and effectual at law, as to all such legal interest as, after such conveyance, shall remain in, or result to the devisor; and that where the legal estate shall be transferred from such devisor, the devise shall be deemed valid in equity as to all such beneficial right and interest as shall remain in the devisor. See Evans's Collection of Statutes, note on 32 Hen. 8. c. 1. pt. ii. cl. xi. nu. i.

The alteration suggested in the above remarks with respect to the law of revocation of wills by an alteration in the estate devised, is intended to be effected by the before-mentioned bill, which (by § 29.) enacts that no conveyance or other act made or done subsequently to the execution of a will, of or relating to any real or personal estate therein comprised, shall prevent the operation of the will with respect to such real or personal estate, or such estate or interest therein as the testator shall have power to dispose of by will at the time of his death.

The effect of the contemplated changes under this head is thus summed up in the Report of the Real Property Commissioners:

"If the alterations we have proposed with respect to the revocation of wills be carried into effect, the laws relating to it, which at present are so complicated and incongruous, will be reduced to a few very simple rules applicable to wills of every description. There will be only four modes in which any will can be revoked: 1st, by another inconsistent will or writing, executed in the same manner as the original will; 2d, by cancellation, or any other act of the same nature; 3d, by the disposition of the property by the testator in his lifetime; and 4th, in the case of a woman, (and also of a man, see ante), by marriage. By the first and third of these modes the will may be revoked entirely or in part; by the second and last the revocation will be complete."

In all cases where a will is determined to be revoked, and no other will is made, a person is said to die intestate; at least as far as concerns the devises thus revoked. In all cases also of void devises, an intestacy shall take place as to those, unless there is a particular devise contained in the will of the residue of the testator's estate to some person; in which cases the legacies sink into and become part of such residue, and go to the residuary legatee.

V. THE most general and comprehensive rule, as to the construction of wills, is, That a devise be most favourably expounded, to pursue, if possible, the will of the devisor, who, for want of advice or learning, may have omitted the legal or proper phrases: and, therefore, many times, the law dispenses with the want of words in devises, that are absolutely requisite in all other instruments. Thus a fee may be conveyed without words of inheritance; and an estate-tail without words of procreation. By a will also an estate may pass by mere implication, without any express words to direct its course. As where a man devises lands to his heir at law, after the death of his wife: here, though no estate is given to the wife in express terms, yet she shall have an estate for life by implication; for the intent of the testator is clearly to postpone the heir till after her death; and, if she does not take it, nobody else can. 1 Vent. 376. But it seems, that if it is given to a stranger, after the wife's death, the devise raises no implication in favour of the wife, for it may descend to the heir during the life of the wife. Cro. Jac. 75. So also where a devise is of Black-acre to A., and of White-acre to B. in tail, and if they both die without issue, then to C. in fee; here A. and B. have cross remainders by implication, and on the failure of either's issue, the other or his issue shall take the whole; and C.'s remainder over shall be postponed till the issue of both shall fail. But where cross remainders are to be raised between more than two, the presumption is against them. See Remainder. And, in general, where any implications are allowed, they must be such as are necessary, (or at least highly probable,) and not merely possible implications. And herein there is no distinction between the rules of law and of equity; for the will, being considered in both courts in the light of a limitation of uses, is construed in each with equal favour and benignity, and expounded rather on its own particular circumstances, than by any general rules of positive law. 2 Comm. c. 23.

The intention of the testator is said by Coke to be the pole-star to guide the judges in the exposition of wills; but though it is allowed to be thus considered, in order to explain the words of the will, yet such intention must be collected from the will itself, and not from any reports or evidence concerning it; the courts having been at all times careful of admitting verbal testimony in respect to a will: and little credit being due to any thing that may have fallen from a man himself, either before or after making his will; it often appearing that insinuations may be thrown out purposely to mislead those who were interested in the disposal of his property. Though a parol averment shall not be admitted to explain a will, so as to expound it contrary to the import of the words; yet, when the words will bear it, a parol averment may be admitted. As, for instance, to ascertain a person; but in no case to alter the estate. 1 Freem. 292; 5 Rep. 68, Lord Chagney's case.

It may be laid down generally that parol evidence is admissible to show extrinsic facts, remove latent ambiguities, correct mistaken descriptions, rebut constructive trusts, repel presumptions against double legacies and in some other instances. See Powell on Devises by Jarman, vol. 1, c. 12.

Other rules of construction are the following; all consistent with, and dependent upon, that which lays down the intent of the testator as the general guide for the expositions of doubtful circumstances. Where the words of a will have a plain sense, and no doubt is in any matter within or without the words, touching the matter of the devise, there the words of the will shall always be taken to be the intent of the deviser, and his intent to be what the words say. 2 And. 17. All the words of a will are to be carried to answer the intent of the deviser; but this is to be understood in cases where the intent of the party may be known by the words that are in the will. 2 And. 10, 11, 134. If there are inconsistent and contradictory words in a will, words may be rejected to make it sense. And words may be supplied to render a sentence complete and intelligible in aid of the apparent intent to be collected from the whole context. 6 East, 486. And even in a case where two estates were misdescribed by their contrary appellations, this was remedied by a construction according to the intent appearing on the face of the will. 8 East, 149.

A will must have a favourable interpretation, and as near to the mind and intent of the testator as may be, and yet so withal as his intent may stand with the rules of law, and not be repugnant thereunto; it being a rule or maxim of law, quod ultima voluntas testatoris perimplenda est, secundum veram intentionem; sed legum servanda fides, suprema voluntas quod mandat fierique jubet parere necesse est. In deeds the rule of construction is, that the intention must be directed by the words; but in wills the words must follow the intent of the deviser; and such a construction is to be made of them, as to make use of all the words, and not of part, and so as they may stand together, and have no contrariety in them. Shep. Abr. part 10, voc. Testament; Bridg. 105. See Words.

Such a sense shall be made of a devise, that it may be for the profit of the devisee, and not to his prejudice. General and doubtful words in a will shall not alter an express devise before, nor carry any thing contrary to the apparent intent. The clauses and sentences of a will shall be severally transposed to serve the meaning of it: and construction shall be made of the words to satisfy the intent, and they shall be put in such order as the intent may be fulfilled. No sense may be framed upon the words of a will, wherein the testator's meaning cannot be found. Shep. Abr. voc. Testament.

One part of a will shall be expounded by another: as where a man leaves an estate to another and his heirs, and afterwards mentions to have given him an estate-tail, heirs shall be taken to mean heirs of the body, and the devisee shall take only an estate-tail. 2 Freem. 267. See further on this subject, Burr. 912—924, 1110—1118; 1 Vesey, 142.

Where there is no connection by grammatical construction, or direct words of reference, or by the declaration of some common purpose, between distinct devises in a will, the special terms of one devise cannot be drawn in aid of the construction of another, although similar in its general terms and import, and applicable to persons standing in the same degree of relationship to the testator; and there being no apparent reason, other than the different wording of the clauses, to presume that the testator had a different purpose in view. 9 East, 267.

In the case of devises to relations generally, it seems the established doctrine of the Court of Chancery to make the statute of distributions the rule and measure of such general devise, so that those who by the statute of distributions would have been entitled to the personal estate in case the testator had died intestate, shall upon such general devises be benefited. See 1 Bro. C. R. 31. And the rule will be the same though the word poor be prefixed to relations. Ambler, 507, 595, 636. But if the bequest be to the testator's descendants, these being capable of being ascertained, the necessity of resorting to the statute of distributions does not arise. 3 Bro. C. R. 367; Amb. 397. And where the court does resort to the statute, it does not consider itself bound to adopt the proportions prescribed by the statute, but distributes per capita, and in such shares as any particular expressions of the bequest may call for. 2 Ch. Rep. 77, 179; Talb. 251; Bro. C. R. 31.

Under a devise of freehold property "to the relations on any side," it was held that all should take who could be entitled to personal estate under the statute of distributions, as well in the maternal or the paternal line at the time of the testator's death; and where one who was in equal degree at the time of making the will died before the testator leaving a son, the son was held not entitled to a share as such relation. 1 Taunt. 263.

Devise of "the interest of all my land property, whether houses, bank stock, or cash, after discharging my debts, to my wife; and after her demise, to my brother W. for life, but not to cut, fall, or destroy any thing of the estate, and after his decease, into my sister C.'s family, to go in heirship for ever" the Court of King's Bench held, that the real estate passed in entirety to the eldest son and heir of C. in fee. 5 M. & S. 126.

A devise to the testator's wife of "all my property both personal and real for ever;" held to pass the fee in the real estate, and that the deviser's intent to use them in a more restricted sense was not shown by a subsequent clause in the will whereby he gave an additional annuity to a person (after the wife's death) to whom he had before given a smaller annuity. 11 East, 518.

A. devised to his daughters, J. and E., "their heirs, executors, and administrators, equally between them, all and every his messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, both freehold and leasehold in England, to have and to hold to the said J. and E. their heirs, executors, and administrators equally." This devise was held to pass all his interest in the estates to his daughters in fee, to the exclusion of the testator's right heirs. 4 D. & R. 246.

A gift confined expressly to the donee's life, with a power of disposition superadded, confers a power only over the remainder, after the estate for life, but a gift to a person indefinitely, with a superadded power of disposition, passes the absolute interest; and this rule applies to personal estate as well as real. Therefore where a testator bequeathed all his personal estate to his wife for life; and after her decease one moiety thereof was to be at her disposal either by will or otherwise, the other moiety being given to other persons, she had the moiety for her life with a mere power of appointment. 4 Russ. 263.

If a man devises land to another for ever, or in fee-simple, or to him and his assigns for ever, or to him and his; in all these cases the fee-simple passes by the will: for it is evident by the testator's intention, that the gift should continue beyond the life of the devisee. So if one devises lands to another, to give, sell, or do what he pleases with them, these words, by the intent of the giver, convey the fee-simple; as does also to one and his blood; because the blood runs through every branch of a family. A devise also to a man and his successors carries a fee; for by the word successors is intended heirs, the heir succeeding to the father. Burn, Eccl. Law. See Comp. 352.

A devise of all his estate, (or estates,) whatsoever, or all his effects real and personal, comprehends all that a man has, land, money, goods, or other property whatever: provided, in all cases, that the will is duly executed, and attested by three witnesses, so as to pass land. And a copyhold estate will fall under the same construction. See Comp. 299.

A devise of "all my freehold estate, consisting of thirty acres of land more or less, with the dwelling house and all erections on the said farm, situate at Sudbury, Harrow, in the county of Middlesex;" held, by the Court of Common Pleas, on a case from Chancery, to pass an estate in fee-simple, 1 B. & B. 72. And see 6 Taunt. 410; 7 Taunt. 35.

If lands are devised to trustees for any particular purposes, without using the word heirs; yet, by implication of law, the trustees must have an estate of inheritance sufficient to support such trust; for there is no difference between a devise to a man for ever, and to a man upon trusts which may last for ever. 1 Eq. Abr. 176.

Where one devises land to another, on condition that the devisee shall pay several sums of money in gross, and not saying out of the profits of the land; or shall release a debt due from the testator; the devisee, in this case, shall have a fee-simple in the land, though all the sums of money together, which he is to pay, do not amount to a year's rent of the land; for the devise shall be intended for his benefit: and if he was to have the land for his life only, he might die before he could receive the amount of the legacies out of the land, and consequently be a loser: and where there is a sum thus to be paid all at once and immediately, there the person to whom the land is devised shall have the whole of it, though the sum is not the value of the land, or near it; the quantity of the sum thus to be paid in gross not being material. But if a devise were to A., paying so much, or such sums of money, out of the profit of the lands, there A. would take but an estate for his life; for though he takes the land charged with payment of money, yet he is to pay no faster than he receives, and so he can be no loser. 1 Eq. Ab. 166, 167.

A. devised to his daughter, then under age, an estate in fee, and if she died under the age of twenty-one, unmarried, and without leaving lawful issue, then to his wife in fee: the daughter married and died under the age of twenty-one years without issue, but left her husband surviving her. Held that the devise over to the wife of the testator did not take effect, as by the will it was made to depend on the happening of the three events. 2 B. & A. 441. And see 12 East, 298.

A. devised his estate to trustees for the maintenance of six children; and immediately on the youngest attaining twenty-one then to his said six children and the survivor and survivors of them their heirs and assigns for ever as tenants in common. The term "survivor or survivors" was held to refer to the time of the testator's death and not to the coming of age of the eldest child, and therefore each had a fee-simple estate in reversion in one sixth part; which (on the death of any without issue and intestate after the testator's death and before the coming of age of the youngest child) descended to the heir at law of the party dying. 2 Marsh. 24; 6 Taunt. 213. But see 1 Price, 264.

A. devised lands to his wife for life, and at her death to his son B. and his heirs for ever: but if B. should die unpossessed of the land, or without heirs, to his daughter C. and her heirs for ever. In this case the word heirs was held to be confined to heirs of the body, and that therefore B. took an estate tail with remainder in fee to C. 2 Marsh. 170; 6 Taunt. 485.

It would be endless to multiply individual cases, as to the construction of wills, where the words have been held to give an estate in fee, in tail, or for life. A devise of land to A. B., without any further words, gives him only an estate for life. The reason why the word estate has been held to pass a fee, is, that this word (and which has been extended to the plural, estates,) comprehends not only the land or property that a man has, but also the interest he has in it. The general rule of construction, that governs all uncertain cases, of which innumerable instances occur in the books, seem to be that "if there be no words of limitation added, nor words of perpetuity annexed to the devise, so as to show the intention of the testator to convey the inheritance to the devisee, he can only take an estate for life." Comp. 299. But "wherever there are words and expressions, either general or particular, or clauses in a will, which the court can lay hold of, to enlarge the estate of a devisee, they will do so, to effectuate the intention of the testator: but if the intention of the testator is doubtful, the rule of law must take place." Comp. 352.

The following clauses of the bill now before parliament will put an end to many of the questions, which have arisen upon the construction of wills:—

By § 30. every will shall be construed, with reference to the real estate and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.

By § 31. unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will, such real estate or interest therein as shall be comprised or intended to be comprised in any devise in such will contained, which shall fail or be void by reason of the death of the devisee in the lifetime of the testator, or by reason of such devise being contrary to law, or otherwise incapable of taking effect, shall be included in the residuary devise (if any) contained in such will.

By § 32. a general devise of the real estate of the testator, or of the real estate of the testator in any place or in the occupation of any person mentioned in his will, or otherwise described in a general manner, shall be construed to include any real estate, or any real estate to which such description shall extend (as the case may be), which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will; and in like manner a bequest of the personal estate of the testator, or any bequest of personal property described in a general manner, shall be construed to include any personal estate, or any personal estate to which such description shall extend (as the case may be), which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.

By § 33. a devise of the land of the testator, or of the land of the testator in any place, or in the occupation of any person mentioned in his will, or otherwise described in a general manner, and any other general devise which would describe a leasehold estate, if the testator had no real estate which could be described by it, shall be construed to include the leasehold estates of the testator, or his leasehold estates to which such description shall extend (as the case may be).

as well as real estates, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.

By § 34. where any real estate shall be devised to any person without any words of limitation, such devise shall be construed to pass the fee-simple, or other the whole estate or interest which the testator had power to dispose of by will in such real estate, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.

By § 35. in any devise or bequest of real or personal estate the words "die without issue," or "die without leaving issue," or, "have no issue," or any other words, which may import a want or failure of issue of any person in his lifetime, or at the time of his death, or an indefinite failure of his issue, shall be construed to mean a want or failure of issue in the lifetime or at the time of the death of such person, and not an indefinite failure of his issue, unless by reason of such person having a prior estate tail, or of a preceding gift being a limitation of an estate tail to such person or issue, or otherwise a contrary intention shall appear by the will: provided, that the act shall not extend to cases, where such words as aforesaid import, if no issue described in a preceding gift shall be born, or if there shall be no issue who shall live to attain the age or otherwise answer the description required for obtaining a vested estate by a preceding gift to such issue.

By § 36. no trustee or executor shall be construed to take any chattel interest in any real estate (other than a next presentation to a church), under any devise to him as such trustee or executor of any such real estate, unless a definite term of years, absolute or determinable, shall thereby be given to him expressly or by implication.

By § 37. where any real estate shall be devised to a trustee without any express limitation of the estate to be taken by such trustee, and the beneficial interest in such real estate, or in the surplus rents and profits thereof, shall not be given to any person for life, or such beneficial interest shall be given to any person for life, but the purposes of the trust may continue beyond the life of such person, such devise shall be construed to vest in such trustee the fee-simple or other the whole legal estate which the testator had power to dispose of by will in such real estate, and not an estate determinable when the purposes of the trust shall be satisfied.

Notwithstanding that wills are generally favoured, yet where a person endeavours to make a settlement of his estate against the reason and policy of the common law, the judges are bound to reject it. And where a man by his will makes no other disposition of his land than the law itself would have done, had he not made any will, there such a will is useless, and will be invalid. As if one give land to his son and his heirs, or to A. and his heirs, and his son or A. is heir at law, this was formerly held a void devise, and the person to whom the land was given should not take the land under the will, but by descent, being the better title, as if no will had been made: for a descent strengthened a title, taking away the entry of such as might possibly have had right to the estate: while he who had an estate by devise was said by law to be in by purchase; a worse title than descent. But if one by will created an estate in his heir, different from what he would have taken by law, there the devise should be good, the quality of the estate being altered, and it being indeed not the same estate as would have descended to him. Burn, Eccl. Law.

The law with regard to devises to the heir is now altered, see Descent.

Those devises are also void and rejected where the words of the will are so general and uncertain that no meaning can be collected from them. And therefore, where a man by will gives "all to his mother," these general words will not pass lands to his mother; for since the heir at law has a plain and uncontroverted title, it would be severe and unreasonable to set him aside, unless the intention of the testator is evident from the will; for that would be to set up and prefer a dark, and at best but a doubtful title, to a clear and certain one. Burn, Eccl. Law.

So a devise of real estate to the heir of an alien is void; because an alien, according to the policy of the English law, can have no heir, either to inherit or to take by purchase. See ante, II. 1. and tit. Alien.

A native of Scotland, domiciled in England (having no real property at his death), when on a visit to Scotland executed and deposited there a will, prepared in the Scotch form, and afterwards died in England. Held that the will was to be construed by the law of England. 2 Sm. 1.

By the bill before parliament, (§ 40.) the heir shall not be a necessary party in suits in equity for the execution of a will, or for the administration of assets.

And by § 41. depositions shall not be taken in equity in suits for establishing wills, unless required by a party at the peril of costs.

By § 42. the act is not to extend to wills made before 1836, nor to the assets of persons who die before 1836.

And by § 43. the act is not to extend to Scotland.

As to stealing wills, see Larceny.

WIN, Sax.] In the beginning or ending of the names of places, signifies that some battle was fought, and victory gained there.

WINCHES. A kind of engine to draw barges against the stream of a river. 21 Jac. 1. c. 32.

WINCHESTER MEASURE. The standard measure originally kept at Winchester. See further Measure.

WINDAS, or WINDLASS, corruptly Wanlass. A term for hunting of deer in forests to a stand, &c. See Wanlass.

WIND-MILL. A man may not erect a wind-mill within any forest, because it frightens deer, and draws company to the disquiet of the game. W. Jones's Rep. 293. See Forest, Malicious Injuries.

WINDOW-TAX. See Taxes.

WINE, vinum.] Very heavy duties were formerly imposed on foreign wines imported into this country, but these were reduced 50 per cent. in 1825. The duties thus reduced were 7s. 3d. per imperial gallon on French wines; 4s. 10d. on all other foreign wines, and 2s. 5d. on those of the Cape of Good Hope, which continued until the passing of the equalization act, (1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 30.) whereby a duty of 5s. 6d. per gallon is imposed on all foreign wines, and of 2s. 9d. on those of the Cape.

Various regulations are made by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 52, 54, 57. with respect to the importing of foreign wines for home consumption, or warehousing them for re-exportation.

The retailers of wine are subject to certain license duties.

Home made wines (usually called sweets) are also under the regulation of excise, subject to certain internal duties.

By several ancient acts of parliament the prices of wine were to be set by the great officers of state. See 4 Edw. 3. c. 22; 28 Hen. 8. c. 14; 7 Edw. 6. c. 5.

The sale of corrupted or unwholesome wines is prohibited by a very ancient statute, 51 Hen. 3. st. 6. under severe penalties.

And by 12 & 13 Car. 2. c. 20. penalties from 40l. to 300l. are imposed on merchants and others adulterating, mixing, or brewing of wines.

WINE-LICENSES, or the rents payable to the crown by such persons as are licensed to sell wine by retail throughout England, heretofore, formed part of the royal revenue.

These were first settled in the crown by 12 Car. 2. c. 25. and, together with the hereditary excise, made up the equivalent in value for the loss sustained by the prerogative in the abolition of the military tenures, and the right of pre-emption and purveyance: but this revenue was abolished by 30 Geo. 2. c. 19. and an annual sum of upwards of 70000l. per ann. issuing out of the new stamp-duties imposed on wine-licenses was settled on the crown in its stead. See further, King, V. 4. Taxes.

WINTER-HEYNING. The season between the 11th day of November and the 23d day of April; which is excepted from the liberty of commoning in certain forests. See 23 Car. 2. c. 3. and Forest.

WIRE, of iron or gold or silver, is one of the articles, the importation duties on which are regulated by statutes; home-made wire is liable to an excise duty on the manufacture.

WIRE-DRAWERS. By 15 Geo. 2. c. 20. the silver wire to be drawn for silver thread, is to hold eleven ounces and fifteen penny-weights; and all silver to be gilt and used in the wire-drawers' trade shall hold eleven ounces and eight penny-weights of silver on the pound weight Troy; and four penny-weights and four grains of gold to be laid upon each pound of silver, on forfeiture of 5s. for every ounce make otherwise. And see 28 Geo. 3. c. 7. by which copper, brass, and metals, inferior to silver, are directed to be spun on thread, not on silk; which act also regulates making copper-wire, lace, spangles, &c. Wire-drawers are to take out annual licenses under the laws of excise.

WISTA. A measure of land among the Saxons; being the quantity of half a hide; the hide being 120 acres. Mon. Ang. i. 133.

WITAM. Secundum witam jurare, was for a person to purge himself by the oaths of so many witnesses as the offence required. Leg. Inq. cap. 63.

WITCHCRAFT. See Conjuration.

WITE. A Saxon word used for punishment; a pain, penalty, mulct, &c. So witefree is a term of privilege or immunity from fines and amercements. Sax. Dict. Hence come the words Bloodwite, Lechermite, &c.

WITENA (or WITTENA) GEMOT, Sax. Conventus sapientium.] A convention or assembly of great men, to advise and assist the king, answerable to our parliament, in the time of the Saxons; or rather an assembly of the whole nation. See Diets, Squire's Anglo-Saxon Government, 165, &c.; and Parliament.

WITENS. The chief of the Saxon Lords or Thanes, their nobles and wise men. Sax. Dict.

WITEKDEN. A taxation of the West Saxons, imposed by the public council of the kingdom. Chart. Ethelwulf. Reg. Anno. 855.

WITHERNAM, from the Sax. Wieder, back, and naam captio.] Where a distress is driven out of the country, and the sheriff upon a replevin cannot make deliverance to the party distrained; in this case the writ of withernam is directed to the sheriff, for the taking as many of his beasts or goods, who did thus unlawfully distrain, into his keeping, till the party make deliverance of the first distress, &c. It is therefore a taking or reprisal of other cattle or goods, in lieu of those that were formerly unjustly taken and eloigned, or otherwise withheld. F. N. B. 68, 69; 2 Inst. 140; Stat. West. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 2. See Replevin, I. V.

This writ is granted on the return of the sheriff upon the alias and pluries in replevin, that the cattle, &c. are eloigned, by reason whereof he cannot replevy them; and it appears by our books, that the sheriff may award withernam or replevin sued by plaintiff, or if it be found by inquest in the county, that the cattle were eloigned according to the bailiff's return, &c. Though upon the withernam awarded in county-court, if the bailiff doth return that the other party hath not any thing, there shall be an alias and pluries, and so infinite, and no other remedy there; but on a withernam returned in the King's Bench or Common Pleas, if the sheriff return that the party hath not any thing, &c. a capias shall issue against him, and exigent and outlawry. New Nat. Br. 168. In replevin, &c. the sheriff returns averia elongata sunt by the defendant; thereupon a writ of withernam is awarded; and if he return nihil, the plaintiff proceeds to outlawry by alias and pluries capias in withernam, and so to exigent.

There is some difference where the defendant appeareth upon the return of the pluries capias, and when he stays longer, and appears on the return of the exigent and not before; for in the first case his cattle shall not be taken in withernam: but he must find pledges to make deliverance, or be committed; and in the last case shall not only find pledges for making deliverance, but shall be fined, and his cattle may be taken in withernam: in both cases the plaintiff may declare for the unjust taking, and yet detaining of his cattle, and so go to trial upon the right; and if it is found for him, then he shall recover the value of the cattle, with costs and damages, or may have the cattle again by a retorno habendo directed to the sheriff; but if it be found for the defendant, he shall keep the cattle, and have costs and damages for the unjust prosecution. 1 Brownl. 180.

A defendant in replevin may have a writ of withernam against the plaintiff; as if the defendant hath a return awarded for him, and he sueth a writ de retorno habendo, and the sheriff return upon the pluries quod averia elongata sunt, he shall have a scire facias against the pledges which the plaintiff put in to prosecute, &c.; and if they have nothing, then he shall have a capias ad withernam against the plaintiff. The cattle taken in withernam are to be ad valentiam, i. e. to the value of the cattle that were first taken and detained; for it is to be understood not only of the number of the cattle, but according to the worth and value; otherwise he that brings the replevin and withernam will be deprived of his satisfaction. Where cattle have been taken in withernam, they have been by a rule of court delivered back and restored to the owner, on his payment to the plaintiff of all his damages, costs, and expenses. 3 Lill. Abr. 690.

Cattle taken in withernam may be milked or worked reasonably; because they are delivered to the party as his own cattle, &c. Contrd of cattle distrained, 1 Leon. 302. See further, Replevin, V.

This word withernam also signifies reprisals taken at sea by letters of mark. See Letters of Marque.

WITHERSAKE. An apostate or perfidious renegade. 1 Leg. Canut. cap. 27.

WITHOUT DAY. See Sine Die.

WITNESS, testis.] One who gives evidence in a cause; an indifferent person to each party, sworn to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. 2 Lill. Abr. 700. See Evidence; and particularly Division II. of that title.

As supplementary to what is there said the following abridgment of the law respecting parol or personal testimony may be found useful.—

I. Of compelling the Attendance of Witnesses; and Payment of their Expenses, &c.

II. The Causes which render Witnesses incompetent, and the Exceptions thereto; and how such Causes may be removed.

As to bills of exceptions, and demurrers to evidence, see those titles.

I. The process far compelling the attendance of witnesses in civil cases is a subpoena ad testificandum, commanding the witness to appear at the trial, and testify what he knows in the case, under the penalty of 100*l.*; to which the 5 Eliz. c. 9. § 2. adds a penalty of 10*l.* and recompence to the party grieved. This statute requires that on serving the process there shall be tendered to the witness, according to his circumstances and calling, such reasonable sum for his costs and charges as is necessary, having regard to the distance. No witness is therefore bound to appear in civil causes, unless his reasonable expenses of going, remaining, and returning, are tendered with the subpoena; nor is he bound to give evidence until these expenses are paid, or undertaken for, except when he resides within the bills of mortality. So in cases of witnesses brought from abroad. Compensation for loss of time is not generally allowed, except to medical men and attornies; but there may be some cases in which it is justified. Four witnesses, and no more, may be included in one writ of subpoena, with each of whom a ticket or copy of the writ is to be left, the original being at the same time shewn to them. This should be served personally on the witness in reasonable time before the day of trial. A witness thus summoned, if neglecting to attend, is punishable either by attachment for contempt of the process of the court, or by special action on the case for damages at common law; or by an action on the stat. of Eliz. The first is the most usual, and generally the most effectual proceeding: the third is attended with some difficulties and niceties, which render it not useful in practice. When the witness neglects to attend at the trial, and it is intended to proceed against him, he is usually "called on his subpoena" by the crier in open court. Witnesses are privileged from arrest in going, tarrying, and returning, either at the trial, or before an arbitrator, under an order of reference at nisi prius, or before commissioners of bankrupt or courts martial. But in the latter cases they are compellable to attend, though their expenses are not tendered to them; but to which they are entitled after examination. Magistrates have not in general any authority to compel the attendance of witnesses for the purpose of summary trials before them, except in such cases in which special provision is made by act of parliament; and such power is by several acts given to commissioners for special purposes.

The means of compelling the attendance of witnesses in criminal cases are by subpoena, for the disobedience to which the party is liable to attachment; or by recognizance (taken by the justice, &c. before whom information is given) to appear at the trial: and, on refusal to come before the justice, or to enter into recognizance, they may be committed for contempt.

Witnesses for the accused are compellable to appear by the provisions of 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. § 7; 1 Ann. st. 1. c. 9. § 3. in treason and felony: and in cases of misdemeanour, by subpoena allowed from the earliest times. See Treason and Trial.

By 45 Geo. 3. c. 92. § 3. 4. persons may be compelled by subpoena to attend and give evidence in criminal prosecutions in any one part of the United Kingdom, on service of the subpoena on him in any other part, having his reasonable expenses of coming, attending, and returning, tendered to him. But in all other cases, witnesses in criminal proceedings are bound to appear unconditionally.

With respect to the subsequent allowance of the expenses to witnesses in criminal cases, see Expenses.

Where the witness is in custody, his testimony is obtained either in civil or criminal cases by means of a habeas corpus ad testificandum.

A subpoena has no effect where the witness is in custody, or on board ship, under command of an officer: in this case a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum must be obtained. See Habeas Corpus, I.

Witnesses residing abroad, or about to depart the realm, may be examined on interrogatories de bene esse by consent of the parties: and when a cause of action or offence arises in India, provision is made for obtaining the evidence of witnesses there, by the 13 Geo. 3. c. 63. §§ 40. 44. and now by the 1 Wm. 4. c. 22. witnesses may be examined on interrogatories in all colonies abroad, and in all actions depending in the courts at Westminster, &c. where such witnesses are residing out of their jurisdiction. See Deposition.

If a witness have in his possession any deeds or writings required to be produced at the trial, a special clause is inserted in the subpoena, called a duces tecum, commanding him to bring such deeds, &c. with him. See Subpoena.

II. The competency of a witness is to be determined by the court; as his credibility is by the jury. The several grounds of incompetency are, 1. Want of reason or understanding; 2. Defect of religious principle; 3. Infamy of character; 4. Interest in the matter in question.

1. Insane persons, idiots, and lunatics, are disqualified; but the former may be admitted to give testimony in their lucid intervals, if any. Persons born deaf and dumb are not therefore absolutely incompetent, if they have otherwise sufficient understanding, and can give evidence by signs, with the assistance of an interpreter. Children, not distinguishing good from evil, nor understanding the moral obligation of an oath, cannot be examined. The judges have often thought it necessary for the purposes of justice to defer the trial of an offender, directing that the child should be in the mean time properly instructed. No age therefore of an infant, capable of being taught, is of itself an objection to its competency as a witness. If a child cannot be sworn, any account given by it to others cannot be admitted: and it is in all cases desirable that some concurrent testimony of time, place, and circumstances, should be adduced to strengthen the evidence of an infant so admitted as a witness.

2. All witnesses, by the oath taken before they are examined, appeal to the Supreme Being for the truth of their testimony. It is therefore required that every person, to be admitted a witness, should believe in a God, and a future state of rewards and punishments; and that by taking the oath he imprecates the divine vengeance on himself, if his testimony should be false. Hence atheists and infidels, who profess not any religion which can bind their consciences to speak truth, are excluded from being witnesses: but this does not exclude Jews, nor Heathens who believe in a God, the avenger of falsehood. Persons excommunicated were heretofore disabled from giving testimony; but this disability is removed by the 53 Geo. 3. c. 127. See Excommunication. The ceremony may be adapted to the religious belief of the party: Jews are sworn on the Pentateuch; Mahometans on the Koran, &c. In civil cases the solemn affirmation of Quakers is admitted: and perhaps no good reason can be given why it should not be admitted also in criminal cases; as, in the case of a prosecution against a Quaker in certain cases, his affirmation is received in his own defence, even against criminal charges; but in any trial for a crime they are deprived of the testimony of those of their persuasion, which, after the admission of the testimony of Heathens, seems inconsistent.

3. The conviction of an infamous crime, followed by judgment, disqualifies a witness from giving evidence in a court of justice: but no suspicion, even though the party be an accomplice in the crime, is sufficient. See Accessory. The crimes, the conviction for which produces this disability, are treason, forgery, perjury, or subornation thereof, and all offences which involve the charge of falsehood, and the whole class of felonies.

Conviction and judgment in cases of barratry, præmunire, bribery of witnesses, or conspiracy, at the suit of the king, to accuse another of a capital offence, and for fraudulent gaining, under 9 Ann. c. 14; all these appear to disqualify a person as infamous. And outlawry for treason or felony has all the effect of conviction. It is to be remembered that it is the nature of the crime, and not of the punishment, which renders a person infamous.

So by the suffering of transportation, fine or whipping, in cases where by statute it is provided that these punishments shall operate as a pardon: and persons convicted of grand larceny are restored to their competency by suffering the punishment awarded by their judgment. But the most effectual mode of restoring the competency of a witness is by a pardon, either under the great seal, or by act of parliament, which, after conviction or attainder, whether it remits the punishment, or is after punishment suffered, (by the pillory, burning in the hand, &c.) clears the party from the legal disabilities of infamy, makes him a new creature, and gives him a new capacity. See tit. Pardon. But from this case must be excepted a conviction for perjury, or subornation, under the 5 Eliz. c. 9. which expressly provides that the party shall never be allowed to give evidence in courts of justice, till the judgment be reversed. See Perjury, II., and further, Evidence, II., 1.

4. It is a general rule that all witnesses interested in the event of a cause are to be excluded from giving evidence in favour of that party to which their interest inclines them: they are excluded from a supposed want of integrity, and not, as some have supposed, that they may be saved from the temptation to commit perjury: if that were the true principle, there would be some inconsistency in excluding witnesses who have an interest even to the smallest amount, at the same time that a child is allowed to give evidence for the parents; and a witness is not privileged from answering against his interest. The temptation to perjury may be much stronger in the two last cases than in the former; yet in the former the witness is permitted, and in the last is compelled, to give evidence: and it may be observed that the weight of the evidence of a child, in favour of a parent, carries with it a sort of feeling which is apt to induce juries to give it even more than its due weight.

The old cases on the incompetency of witnesses, on account of interest, were generally decided on very narrow grounds, without reference to the distinction now adopted between an interest in the question put to a witness, and an interest in the event of the suit; the general rule now established is, that a witness is not disqualified, unless actually interested in the event of the suit. In an action against the master for the negligence of his servant, the servant is not a competent witness to disprove his own negligence; for the verdict may be given in evidence in a subsequent action by the master against the servant, as to the quantum of damages, though not as to the fact of the injury: and so the servant is manifestly interested in the event of the suit against his master. Persons any way liable to the costs of the suit have an immediate interest in the event, and therefore are not competent witnesses. The defendant's bail are not competent to give evidence for their principal, being immediately answerable in case of a verdict for the plaintiff. In an action against a sheriff for a false return, his officer having given security to him, is not a competent witness for him to prove an endeavour to arrest. In an action by an insane plaintiff, his guardian, or prochein amy, are not competent witnesses, being liable to costs. Any certain, direct, and immediate interest, to result from the verdict, will disqualify a witness, although the verdict cannot be evidence for or against the witness. Before the 54 Geo. 3. c. 170. rated parishioners were incompetent witnesses on appeals against orders of removal. A bankrupt is not a competent witness to any fact which may tend to increase the fund of his estate; nor a creditor, as that will increase his dividend. In all cases where there is a direct interest in the event of the suit, this will make a witness incompetent, however small or inconsiderable the degree of interest may be.

See now the provisions of the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 26. whereby witnesses interested solely on account of the verdict are declared admissible, Evidence, II. 1.

Where the witness has an interest inclining him to each of the parties, so as on the whole to make him indifferent, he is competent to give evidence for either party. The objection to a witness on account of interest is an objection on the Voire Dire (see that title); and excludes him from giving any kind of evidence for the party who calls him.

A party on record to the suit cannot be a witness to the trial for himself, or for a joint-trustee, or co-defendant, on account of the immediate and direct interest which he has in the result, either from having a certain benefit or loss, or from being liable to costs; and this, though he be merely a trustee for others: but those who are parties to a suit, as members of a corporate body, and not individually liable to costs, have been held competent.

As a party to the suit is not suffered to be witness in support of his own interest, so he is never compelled in a court of law to give evidence for the opposite party. A defendant cannot regularly be a witness for co-defendants; but if no evidence has been produced against him, he is entitled to his discharge as soon as the opposite party has closed his case, and may then give evidence for the others. In equity, defendants, made parties to a suit without having interest, are allowed to be examined either for the plaintiff or their co-defendants.

As a party on record is not a competent witness, so neither is the husband or wife of such party competent to give evidence either for or against them: but in an action for criminal conversation, discourses between the wife and the defendant are evidence against him; and where the husband and wife were living in different families, the wife's letters were admitted to show the affection subsisting between them. This rule of evidence, adopted for promoting a perfect union of interests, and securing mutual confidence, is so strictly observed, that even after a dissolution of marriage for adultery, the evidence of the divorced wife has been refused as inadmissible; nor will a wife be admitted, though the husband consent.

Generally speaking, the husband and wife are not permitted to be witnesses against each other in any criminal proceeding. In a prosecution for bigamy the first husband or wife cannot be admitted to prove the first marriage: but the second husband or wife may prove the second marriage, after proof of the first, as they are not in fact lawful husband and wife. In suits or proceedings between third parties only, the result of some conflicting cases goes to the admission of a husband or wife to prove a first marriage, even after proof of a second; but that in such case the witness is not compellable to answer, and that in such cases the husband may be cited to contradict the wife, à contra. The reasoning, however, for the admission of such evidence seems founded on the fear of failure of justice between third parties; and on this ground it seems to be that where a wife has made contracts with the authority of her husband, she has been considered as his agent, and her representation admitted as evidence against him; and, on an order of bastardy, the wife has been admitted to prove her criminal conversation with the putative father: but these cases do not appear sufficiently supported either by authority, or incontrovertible principle. The wife of a bankrupt may be examined for disclosure of his effects. On an indictment for a forcible marriage, under the repealed statute 9 Hen. 7. c. 2. the wife was a competent witness; and, as it seems, even though she had consented to the marriage after the first forcible abduction. See Marriage.

In cases also of offences against the person of a lawful wife by her husband, she is a competent witness against him: as is every day's practice in exhibiting articles of the peace for ill usage; and other more atrocious cases might be instanced. See further Baron and Feme.

As the parties to a suit are excluded from being witnesses on account of their interest, statements or representations made by them against their interest, are admissible in evidence against them: and in many instances are the strongest evidence. Upon this principle the free admission of any party to a suit, or the matter in issue, and the voluntary confession of a prisoner under a criminal charge, are always received in evidence against the party.

In criminal prosecutions it is a general rule that the injured party may be a witness, although on the conviction of the prisoner he might be entitled to a reward (see Rewards); and this extends to cases of robbery, fraud and perjury. But formerly, in case of forgery, the party by whom an instrument purported to be made was not admitted to prove it forged, if he could be either liable to be sued upon the instrument (if genuine), or be thereby deprived of a legal claim against another. This anomaly in the law of evidence is now removed by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 32. § 2; see Forgery, V.

There are certain exceptions to the general rule, that all persons who gain or lose directly by the event of a cause are incompetent witnesses. By the express provision or policy of many (perhaps too many) acts of parliament, informers, entitled to part of the penalties, are admitted as competent witnesses. On indictments for not repairing bridges, &c. the inhabitants of the county, &c. are made competent witnesses for the prosecution by the 1 Ann. st. 1. c. 18. § 13. Surveyors of the highways, and inhabitants of parishes, under the general highway acts; inhabitants of parishes, where the penalty is given to the use of the poor, 27 Geo. 3. c. 29; rated inhabitants of parishes or orders of removal, 54 Geo. 3. c. 170. § 9; agents for their principals to prove contracts, &c. and servants and agents to prove payment or receipt of money or delivery of goods, although their evidence tend to discharge themselves.

By § 64, 65. of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. (the general Larceny Act), and by § 29, 32 of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 30. (the Malicious Injuries Act), the evidence of the party aggrieved is declared admissible in evidence; but he forfeits all claim to the sum awarded for compensation, which is to be paid to the overseer of the parish, and by him to the county rate. As to Ireland, see 9 Geo. 4. c. 55. § 57, &c. and c. 56. § 36, &c.

The competency of interested witnesses may be restored in certain cases. Where the objection arises on the voire dire, it may be removed by the witness's answer. See Voire Dire. Whatever interest a witness may have had, if he is divested of it by release or payment, or any other means when he is ready to be sworn, there remains no objection to his competency on that ground: in case of forgery, the release of the holder of the security formerly made the party, whose name was forged, a competent witness to prove the forgery. The competency of a bankrupt is restored by his certificate, and his release to the assignees of his share in the surplus and dividends. The competency of the member of a corporation may be restored by his resignation or disfranchisement. In some cases a release is not necessary; as where the witness offers to surrender his interest, but is refused; or the party interested offers to release, and the witness refuses: so where a witness has acquired an interest for the mere purpose of disqualifying himself: or where the witness is answerable to one or other of the parties, and the event of the suit determines only to which.

One particular kind of incompetency remains yet to be considered, founded on the professional confidence which a client reposes in his counsel, attorney, or solicitor, and which courts of justice ever hold to be inviolable. Confidential communications between attorney and client are not to be revealed at any period of time, nor in an action between third parties, nor after the proceedings to which they referred are at an end: nor after the dismissal of the attorney. The privilege of not being examined as to such points, is the privilege of the client, and never ceases: but it is confined to such communications as are made with reference to professional confidence in the particular business. It is confined to counsel, solicitor, and attorney; and does not extend to medical persons. If the party interested waive the privilege, the witness may be examined of course.

By the 29 Geo. 2. c. 26. and 31 Geo. 2. c. 31. the owner of wastes, on which others have right of common, with the consent of the major part in number and value of the commoners, may inclose such wastes for the growth of timber. See Common, II. Forests.

WOOL, being a staple commodity of the greatest value in this kingdom, the employment of our poor at home, and our most beneficial trade abroad, depending in a great measure upon it, divers laws were heretofore made to preserve the same entirely to ourselves, and to prevent its being transported to other nations.

By the early statutes the exportation of wool was prohibited, but the law was afterwards relaxed, and the exportation appears to have been allowed. However, in 1660, (see 12 Car. 2. post.) a total prohibition was again enforced, which continued till 1825.

An old statute of 27 Edw. 3. declared it felony to transport wool; but the felony was repealed by the 38 Edw. 3. c. 6; and see 11 Edw. 3. c. 1. The 8 Eliz. c. 3. prohibited the transportation of live sheep on severe penalties. By the 12 Car. 2. c. 32. any person exporting any wool, yarn, sheep, or fuller's earth, was to forfeit the same; and for every pound weight of goods, 3s. And the owners of the ship in which it was transported, being privy to the offence, were to forfeit all their interest of the said ship; also the master and mariners assisting, all their goods; and any persons might seize such wool, and should be entitled to one moiety, and the king to the other moiety of forfeitures, &c. The 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 18. made the transportation of wool felony again; though, this being thought too severe, the 7 & 8 Wm. 3. c. 28. a second time repealed the felony, and ordained that exporting wool beyond sea should incur a forfeiture of the vessel, and treble value, and persons aiding and assisting suffer three years' imprisonment.

These and several subsequent acts as to the export and transport of wool, were all repealed by the 5 Geo. 4. c. 47, 6 Geo. 4. c. 105.

Down to 1802 the importation of foreign wool into Great Britain was quite free, but in that year a duty of 5s. 3d. a cwt. was imposed upon it, which in 1813 was raised to 6s. 8d., and was further increased to the enormous sum of 56s. in 1819. The impolicy of this high impost led to its repeal in 1828, and foreign wool now pays a duty of a ½d. a lb. where the wool is not worth 1s., and a penny where it is of that value.

Sheep are prohibited to be imported by the act for the general regulation of the Customs, 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 52.

By the 35 Geo. 3. c. 124, wool-combers, their wives and children, may freely exercise their trade, or any other they may know, in any town or place in the kingdom, without being free of any corporation, &c.; and shall not be removable from such places until they become actually chargeable.

Much contest having arisen as to the policy, in the present times, of several acts heretofore made for the regulation of the woollen manufactures, these acts were by the 43 Geo. 3. c. 136. (a temporary act continued by several subsequent acts) suspended, with a view to the framing of a new law on the subject. At length by the 49 Geo. 3. c. 109, several acts, and parts of acts, (nearly forty in number,) on this subject, from the 2d of Edw. 3. to 5 Geo. 3. are repealed; and persons having served apprenticeship to any branch of the woollen manufactures, and their wives and families, are allowed to set up and exercise that trade, or any other, in any part of Great Britain, notwithstanding the restrictions in the 5 Eliz. c. 4.

By 50 Geo. 3. c. 83, a few other latent acts on this subject were repealed, and offenders indemnified against the penalties thereof.

As to Wool-winders, see the 8 Hen. 8. c. 22; 23 Hen. 8. c. 17; which are not included in the list of acts repealed by 49 Geo. 3. c. 109, or 50 Geo. 3. c. 83.

By the 54 Geo. 3. c. 103, the acts 30 Car. 2. c. 3, 32 Car. 2. c. 1. for compelling the burying of corpses in woollen, were repealed.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 28, an act passed in the 13 Geo. 1. c. 23. for the better regulation of the woollen trade, was repealed.

WORDS, which may be taken or interpreted by law in a general or common sense, ought not to receive a strained or unusual construction; ambiguous words are to be construed so as to make them stand with law and equity, and not to be wrested to do wrong. A Latin word in pleading, which signified divers things, was well used to express that thing intended to be expressed by it. Uncertain words in a declaration are made good in a plea in bar, where notice is taken of the meaning of them; and words which are in themselves uncertain, may be made certain by subsequent or following words. The different placing of the same words may cause them to have different sense and construction. A word which is written short, or abbreviated, is not good without a dash to distinguish it. Senseless words are void and idle, though they shall not hurt where the sense is good without them. Nor shall words in deeds that are needless impeach a clause certain and perfect without such words. 2 Lill. Abr. 711 to 714; Hob. 313.

The following general rules and maxims are stated by Blackstone as having been laid down by the courts of justice for the construction and exposition of the several species of common assurances or conveyances whereby a title to lands and tenements may be transferred and conveyed from one man to another. 2 Comm. c. 23.

1. That the construction be favourable, and as near the minds and apparent intents of the parties as the rules of law will admit. For the maxims of law are, that verba intentioni debent inservire, and benigne interpretamur chartas propter simplicitatem laicorum. And therefore the construction must also be reasonable, and agreeable to common understanding. And. 60; 1 Bulst. 175; Hob. 304.

2. That quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas, ibi nulla expositio contra verba fienda est; but that, where the intention is clear, too minute a stress be not laid on the strict and precise signification of words; nam qui hæret in literâ, hæret in cortice. 2 Saund. 157. Therefore, by a grant of a remainder, a reversion may well pass, and à converso. Hob. 27. And another maxim of law is, that mala grammatica non vitiant chartam; neither false English nor bad Latin will destroy a deed; which perhaps (says Blackstone) a classical critic may think to be no unnecessary caution. See 10 Rep. 133; 1 Inst. 225; 2 Show. 334.

3. That the construction be made upon the entire deed, and not merely upon disjointed parts of it. Nam ex antecedentibus et consequentibus fit optima interpretatio. 1 Bulst. 101. And therefore that every part of it be (if possible) made to take effect, and no word but what may operate in some shape or other. 1 P. Wms. 457. Nam verba debent intelligi cum effectu, ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Plowd. 156.

4. That the deed be taken most strongly against him that is the agent or contractor, and in favour of the other party; Verba fortius accipiuntur contra proferentem. As if tenant in fee-simple grants to any one an estate for life, generally it shall be construed an estate for the life of the grantee. 1 Inst. 42. For the principle of self-preservation will make men sufficiently careful not to prejudice their own interest by the too extensive meaning of their words; and hereby all manner of deceit in any grant is avoided; for men would always affect ambiguous and intricate expressions, provided they were afterwards at liberty to put their own construction upon them. But here a distinction must be taken between an indenture and a deed-poll; for the words of an indenture, executed by both parties, are to be considered as the words of them both; for though delivered as the words of one party, yet they are not his words only, because the other party hath given his consent to every one of them. But in a deed-poll, executed only by the grantor, they are the words of the grantor only, and shall be taken most strongly against him. 1 Inst. 134. And in general this rule, being a rule of some strictness and rigour, is the last to be resorted to, and is never to be relied upon but where all other rules of exposition fail. Bac. Elem. c. 3.

5. That if the words will bear two senses, one agreeable to, and the other against law, that sense be preferred which is most agreeable thereto. As if tenant in tail lets a lease to have and to hold during life generally, it shall be construed to be a lease for his own life only, for that stands with the law, and not for the life of the lessee, which is beyond his power to grant. 1 Inst. 42.

6. That in a deed, if there be two clauses so totally repugnant to each other, that they cannot stand together, the first shall be received, and the latter rejected, contrary to the general rule as to the exposition of wills, yet in both cases we should rather attempt to reconcile them. Hardr. 94; Cro. Eliz. 420; 1 Vern. 30.

tice in almost every modern act, and particularly in the statutes amending the laws of real property, to define the meaning of the words employed.

WORKHOUSES. By the 55 Geo. 3. c. 137. § 2. pawning or receiving goods belonging to workhouses, or articles provided for the use of the poor, may be summarily punished before a justice, on the oath of one witness, by a fine not exceeding 5*l.* or under 1*l.*

WORT, or WORTH, from Sax. weorth.] A curtilage, or country farm. Mat. West. 870.

WORTHIEST OF BLOOD. An expression of the lawyers, signifying the preference given in descents to sons before daughters. See Descent.

WORTHINE OF LAND. A certain quantity of ground so called in the manor of Kingsland in the county of Hereford; and in some places the tenants are called worthines. Consuetud. Maner. de Hedenham in Com. Bucks. 18 Edw. 3.

WRECK, Lat. wreccum maris, Fr. wreck de mer, sometimes writ varech, wroche, werec, et scup werpe, quasi sea-up werp, i. e. ejectus maris.] Such goods as after a shipwreck are cast upon the land by the sea, and not there, within some county; for they are not wrecks so long as they remain at sea in the jurisdiction of the admiralty. 2 Inst. 167. Where a ship perisheth on the sea, and no man escapes alive out of it, this is called wreck. And the goods in the ship being brought to land by the waves belong to the king by his prerogative, or to the lord of the manor. 5 Rep. 106.

By the common law all wrecks belonged to the crown, and therefore they are not chargeable with any customs, and for that goods coming into the kingdom by wreck are not imported by any body, but cast ashore by the wind and sea. But it was usual to seize wrecks to the king's use only when no owner could be found; and in that case the property being in no man, it of consequence belongs to the king, as lord of the narrow seas, &c. Bract. lib. 2, c. 5.

The profits arising from shipwrecks are classed by Blackstone among the articles of the king's ancient ordinary revenue. These are declared to be the king's property by the prerogative statutes, 17 Edw. 2. st. 2. c. 11. and were so long before at the common law.

It is worthy of observation how greatly the law of wrecks has been altered, and the rigour of it gradually softened in favour of the distressed proprietors. Wreck, by the ancient common law, was where any ship was lost at sea, and the goods or cargo were thrown upon the land; in which case these goods so wrecked were adjudged to belong to the king; for it was held that by the loss of the ship all property was gone out of the original owner. Doct. & Stud. D. 2. c. 51. But this was undoubtedly adding sorrow to sorrow, and was consonant neither to reason nor humanity. Wherefore it was first ordained by King Henry I. that if any person escaped alive out of the ship, it should be no wreck; and afterwards King Henry II. by his charter declared that if on the coasts of either England, Poitou, Oleron, or Gascony, any ship should be distressed, and either man or beast should escape, or be found therein alive, the goods should remain to the owners, if they claimed them within three months; but otherwise should be esteemed a wreck, and should belong to the king, or other lord of the franchise. This was again confirmed with improvements by King Richard I., who, in the second year of his reign, not only established these concessions, by ordaining that the owner, if he was shipwrecked and escaped, omnes res suas liberas et quietas haberet, but also that, if he perished, his children, or, in default of them, his brethren and sisters, should retain the property; and in default of brother or sister, then the goods should remain to the king. And the law, as laid down by Bracton, in the reign of Henry III., seems still to have improved in its equity. For then, if not only a dog (for instance) escaped, by which the owner might be discovered, but if any certain mark were set on the goods, by which they might be known again, it was held to be no wreck. Bract. lib. 3. c. 3. And this is certainly most agreeable to reason; the rational claim of the king being only founded upon this, that the true owner cannot be ascertained. Afterwards, in the stat. Westm. 1. 3 Edw. 1. c. 4. the time of limitation of claims given by the charter of Henry II. is extended to a year and a day, according to the usage of Normandy; and it enacts, that if a man, a dog, or a cat, escape alive, the vessel shall not be adjudged a wreck. These animals are only put for examples; for it is now held, that not only if any live thing escape, but if proof can be made of the property of any of the goods or lading which came to shore, they shall not be forfeited as wreck. The statute further ordains, that the sheriff of the county shall be bound to keep the goods a year and a day; that if any man can prove a property in them, either in his own right or by right of representation, they shall be restored to him without delay; but if no such property be proved within that time, they then shall be the king's. 2 Inst. 168. If the goods are of a perishable nature, the sheriff may sell them, and the money shall be liable in their stead. Plowd. 166.

The year and day in the stat. Westm. 1. shall be accounted from the seizure; and if the owner of the goods die within the year, his executors or administrators may make proof. 2 Inst. 167; 5 Rep. 106. If a man have a grant of wreck, and goods are wrecked upon his lands, and another taketh them away before seizure, he may bring action of trespass, &c. For before they are seized there is no property gained to make it felony. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 33. § 24. See now post.

If goods wrecked are seized by persons having no authority, the owner may have his action against them; or if the wrong-doers are unknown, he may have a commission to inquire, &c. 2 Inst. 166. Goods lost by tempest, or piracy, &c. and not by wreck, if they afterwards come to land, shall be restored to the owner. 27 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 13. Where a ship is ready to sink, and all the men therein, for the preservation of their lives, quit the ship, and afterwards she perishes; if any of the men are saved and come to land, the goods are not lost. A ship on the sea was chased by an enemy; the men therein, for the security of their lives, forsook the ship, which was taken by the enemy, and spoiled of her goods and tackle, and then turned to sea; after this, by stress of weather she was cast on land, where it happened her men safely arrived; and it was resolved that this was no wreck. 2 Inst. 167.

This revenue of wrecks is frequently granted out to lords of manors, as a royal franchise; but if any one be thus entitled to wrecks in his own land, and the king's goods are wrecked thereon, the king may claim them at any time, even after the year and day. 2 Inst. 168.

In order to constitute a legal wreck, the goods must come to land. If they continue at sea, the law distinguishes them by the barbarous and uncouth appellations of jetsam, flotsam, and lagsam. Jetsam is where goods are cast into the sea, and there sink and remain under water. Flotsam is where they continue floating or swimming on the surface of the waves. Ligan, or Lagan, is where they are sunk in the sea, but tied to a cork or buoy, in order to be found again. 5 Rep. 106. These are also the king's, if no owner appears to claim them; but if any owner appears, he is entitled to recover the possession. For even if they be cast overboard, without any mark or buoy, in order to lighten the ship, the owner is not by this act of necessity construed to have renounced his property; much less can things ligan be supposed to be abandoned, since the owner has done all in his power to assert and retain his property. These three are therefore accounted so far a distinct thing from the former, that by the king's grant to a man of wrecks, things jetsam, flotsam, and ligan, will not pass. 5 Rep. 108. See Jetsam, &c.

Wrecks, in their legal acceptance, are at present not very frequent; for if any goods come to land, it rarely happens, since the improvement of commerce, navigation, and correspondence, that the owner is not able to assert his property within the year and day limited by law. And in order to preserve this property entire for him, and, if possible, to prevent wrecks at all, our laws have made many very humane regulations. By the 27 Edw. 3. c. 13. if any ship be lost on the shore, and the goods come to land (which cannot, says the statute, be called wreck), they shall be presently delivered to the merchants, paying only a reasonable reward to those that saved and preserved them, which is called salvage. See Insurance, II. 6. Also by the common law, if any persons (other than the sheriff) take any goods so cast on shore, which are not legal wreck, the owners might have a commission to inquire and find them out, and compel them to make restitution. F. N. B. 112. And by the 12 Ann. st. 2. c. 18. confirmed by the 4 Geo. 1. c. 12. in order to assist the distress, and prevent the scandalous illegal practices on some of our sea-coasts, it is enacted, that all head officers and others of towns near the sea shall, upon application made to them, summon as many hands as are necessary, and send them to the relief of any ship in distress, on forfeiture of 100*l.*; and in case of assistance given, salvage shall be paid by the owners, to be assessed by three neighbouring justices.

And by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 18. G. B. (9 Geo. 4. c. 56. § 18. I.) plundering any part of any ship or vessel in distress, or wrecked, stranded, or cast on shore, or any goods or articles belonging to such ship, is felony, punishable with death: but if articles of small value stranded or cast on shore are stolen, without cruelty or violence, the offender may be punished as for simple larceny.

By § 19. persons in possession of shipwrecked goods not satisfactorily accounted for, they may be taken under a search-warrant and restored. By § 20. persons offering shipwrecked goods for sale may be stopped and seized.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 30. § 11, G. B. (9 Geo. 4. c. 56. § 10. I.) procuring or endeavouring to procure the wreck of a ship, by false lights; destroying a shipwrecked vessel or cargo, or any part thereof; or forcibly impeding men from saving their crews; are declared capital felony.

By the 9 Geo. 4. c. 31. assaulting or wounding any magistrate, or person lawfully authorized, on account of the lawful exercise of his duty in the preservation of any vessel in distress, or wrecked, &c. is punishable with transportation for seven years, &c.

By the 48 Geo. 3. c. 130. which extended only to the Cinque-Ports, and by the 49 Geo. 3. c. 122. which extended to all places other than the Cinque-Ports, and both of which were amended by 58 Geo. 3. c. 87. regulations were made for the preventing frauds and depredations on merchants, &c. by boatmen and others, and for remedying some defects as to the adjustment of salvage. With reference to wreck they were chiefly directed against the wilful injury to or embezzlement of cables, anchors, &c. by boatmen, pilots, hovelers, and others, and also to the regulations of the claims of lords of manors to wreck.

By the 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 75. the acts of the 49 Geo. 3. c. 122. & 58 Geo. 3. c. 87. which were only temporary, were amended, and their provisions made perpetual. Many of the clauses of this statute have already been noticed. See Ships.

By § 26. lords of the manor are not to lay claim to wrecks or goods found jetsam, flotsam, or ligan, until they have made a report in writing to the deputy vice-admiral of that part of the coast, or his agent; or if there be no such deputy, &c. within 50 miles, then to the Trinity House; and such deputy vice-admiral, on receiving the report, is within forty-eight hours to transmit it to the secretary of the Trinity House, under a penalty of 50*l.*

By § 27. perishable goods taken possession of by any lord of the manor, or found flotsam, &c. may be sold with the consent of a justice, and the money deposited with such lord of the manor. An account of the sale is to be transmitted to the deputy vice-admiral, who is to forward it to the secretary of the Trinity House.

§ 28. The commissioners of the customs and excise are to permit goods saved from vessels wrecked to be forwarded to the ports of their original destination, but are to take security for the protection of the revenue in respect of such goods.

§ 29. The deputy vice-admiral, or his agent, or the owner or master of any ships wrecked or stranded, or the owner of goods, or any officer of the customs or excise, or any person employed in aid of the deputy vice-admiral, &c., may pass over private lands near the coast where vessels are wrecked, for the preservation of the wreck, &c. if there be no other fit road: Compensation is to be made to the occupiers of such lands; and if the parties cannot agree, the amount is to be settled by two justices.

§ 30. Refusing to let persons so employed pass over lands renders the party liable to a penalty of 100*l.* recoverable by an action of debt.

By the 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 76. the provisions of the 48 Geo. 3. c. 130. relative to wrecks, &c. within the jurisdiction of the Cinque Ports, were amended and made perpetual.

By the above two mentioned acts the provisions of the 12 Ann. c. 18. with respect to salvage on ships wrecked, &c. are amended. See Insurance, II. 6.

As by the ancient common law all property stranded belongs to the king or his grantees; and after a year and a day, without claim, it still belongs to him entirely: it is vested in him during that time for protection, until the owner can be found. It is therefore very properly, in the first instance, placed in the custody of the admiralty; the proctor of the admiralty interposes for its protection until a claim is made; but as soon as a lawful owner appears within the year and a day, the proctor withdraws his claim; the right of the crown is then gone, the ship and goods are restored, and the charges of the admiralty, and salvage, if any, are paid. See 1 Hagg. R. 16—20; 1 Chitty's Gen. Pr. 103.

The grantee of wreck has a special property in all goods stranded within his liberty, and may maintain trespass against a wrong-doer for taking them away, though such goods were part of the cargo of a ship from which some person escaped alive to land, and though the owners within a year and a day claimed and identified them, and though the taking was before any seizure on behalf of the grantee. 1 B. & Ad. 831.

WRIT,

BREVE, from Sax. writan, i. e. scribere.] In general is the king's precept, in writing under seal, issuing out of some court to the sheriff or other person, and commanding something to be done touching a suit or action, or giving commission to have it done. Termes de la Ley; 1 Inst. 78. Also a writ is said to be a formal letter of the king's, in parchment, sealed with a seal, directed to some judge, officer, or minister, &c. at the suit or plaint of a subject, requiring to have a thing done for the cause briefly expressed, which is to be discussed in the proper court, according to law. Old Nat. Br. 4; Shcp. Abr. 245.

Of writs there are divers kinds; in many respects some writs are grounded on rights of action, and some in nature of commissions; some mandatory and extrajudicial, and others remedial; some are patent or open; some close or sealed up; some writs issue at the suit of parties; some are of office; some ordinary; and others of privilege; some writs are directed to the sheriffs, and in special cases to the party, &c. 1 Inst. 289; 2 Inst. 39; 7 Rep. 20.

The writs in civil actions are either original or judicial; original writs are issued out in the Court of Chancery for the summoning a defendant to appear, and are granted before the suit is begun, to begin the same; and judicial writs issue out of the court where the original is returned after the suit is begun. The originals bear date in the name of the king, but judicial writs bear teste in the name of the chief justice. See Capias, Latitat, Original Process, &c. A writ without a teste is not good, for the time may be material when it was taken out, and it is proved by the teste; and if it were out of the common law courts, it must formerly have been dated some day in term (not being Sunday); but in Chancery, writs might always be issued in vacation as well as term time, as that court is always open. F. N. B. 51, 147; 2 Inst. 40; Latw. 337. • See 13 Car. 2. c. 2.

Writs in actions are likewise real, concerning the possession of lands, called writs of entry or of right, touching the property, &c.; personal, relating to goods, chattels, and personal injuries; and mixed, for the recovery of the thing and damages. 2 Inst. 39. Writs may be possessory, of a man's own possession, or ancestral, of the seisin and possession of his ancestor.

All writs of entry and writs ancestral, and also all other real and mixed actions, with the exception of a writ of right of dower, or writ of dower unde nihil habet, quare impedit, and ejectment, are now abolished. See Limitation of Actions, 11. 1.

There are also certain writs of prevention or anticipation, and of restitution, &c. But the most common writs in daily use are in debt, detinue, trespass, action upon the case, account, and covenant, &c. which, with others, must be rightly directed, or they will be naught. F. N. B.; Style 42, 237. In all writs care is to be taken that they be laid and formed according to the cause or ground of them, and so pursued in the process thereof. Though the writ in some cases may be general, and the count or declaration special. Hob. 18, 84, 251.

By the 2 Wm. 4. c. 39. (Uniformity of Process Act,) there are now but three species of writs for commencing personal actions in any of the superior courts, viz. a writ of summons, where the process is not bailable; a writ of capias, where the defendant is held to bail; and a writ of detainer against prisoners in custody. See Process.

For an account of the present practice with regard to the writs allowed by the above statute, see 3 Chitty's Gen. Pr. 140.

WRIT OF ASSISTANCE. A writ issuing out of the Exchequer to authorize any person to take a constable, or other public officer, to seize goods or merchandize prohibited and uncustomed, &c.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 53. § 39. these writs are to continue in force during the whole of the reign in which they are granted, and for six months longer.

There is also a writ of this name issued out of the Chancery to give possession of land. 11 Car. 2. c. 1.

WRIT OF DELIVERY. In what cases grantable, 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 11. § 30.

WRIT OF ENTRY. See Entry.

WRIT OF ERROR. See Error.

WRIT OF INQUIRY OF DAMAGES. A judicial writ that issues out to the sheriff upon a judgment by default, in action of the case, covenant, trespass, trover, &c. commanding him to summon a jury to inquire what damages the plaintiff hath sustained occasione præmissorum. See Judgment, I.; Tidd, 314.

Formerly the writ of inquiry must have been returnable on a general return, or day certain, according to the nature of the proceedings; if by original, on a general return; if by bill, on a day certain; and it must also have been returnable in term; but now by the 1 Wm. 4. c. 7. § 1. it may be made returnable and be returned on any day certain in term or vacation.

1. In what cases granted.—A writ of inquiry of damages is a mere inquest of office, to inform the conscience of the court, who, if they please, may themselves assess the damages. And it is accordingly the practice, in actions upon promissory notes and bills of exchange, instead of executing a writ of inquiry, to apply to the court for a rule to show cause why it should not be referred to the master to see what is due for principal and interest, and why final judgment should not be signed for that sum, without executing a writ of inquiry; which rule is made absolute on an affidavit of service, unless good cause be shown to the contrary. Tidd's Pract. K. B. And the same course is pursued in an action on an award, Tidd, 571; in covenant for non-payment of a liquidated sum, 1 Doug. 316; 13 Price, 52; as for non-payment of money lent upon mortgage, 8 T. R. 326; or for non-payment of rent, 8 T. R. 410; or for the arrears of an annuity, 2 Chit. R. 32, or the like. This practice, however, is confined to actions where the quantum of damages depends on figures, which may be as well ascertained by the master as before a jury; and therefore where the defendant had suffered judgment by default in an action of assumpsit, on a foreign judgment, the court refused to make the rule absolute for a reference to the master, saying this was an attempt to carry the rule further than had yet been done, and as there was no instance of the kind, they would not make a precedent for it. 4 T. R. 493. The court has also refused to make the rule absolute, in an action upon a bill of exchange, for foreign money, the value of which is uncertain, and can only be ascertained by a jury. 5 T. R. 87. See Cro. Eliz. 536; Cro. Jac. 617.

Where the jury, upon the trial of an issue, omit to assess the damages, the omission may in some cases be supplied by a writ of inquiry; as to which, it seems that where the matter omitted to be inquired by the principal jury, is such as goes to the very point of the issue, and upon which, if it be found by the jury (now abolished,) an attaind would formerly have lain against them by the party, if they gave a false verdict; there such matter cannot be supplied by a writ of inquiry, because thereby the plaintiff might have lost his action of attaind, which would not lie upon an inquest of office. Tidd's Prac.

Thus, where in detinue the jury omitted to assess the value of the goods, the court refused to supply the omission by a writ of inquiry. And so where the jury who try the issue in replevin (see that title) omit to inquire of the rent in arrear and value of the cattle, pursuant to the 17 Car. 2. c. 7. no writ of inquiry can be afterwards awarded to supply the omission; for by the words of the statute these matters are to be inquired of by the same jury who try the issue. Tidd's Prac. and the authorities there cited.

In debt on a replevin bond, assigning for breach the not making a return of the goods distrained for rent, the plaintiff may, after signing judgment for not returning the demurrer-book, tax the costs and issue execution for them and the value of the goods distrained as indorsed on the replevin bond, without executing a writ of inquiry. 3 M. & S. 155.

But where the matter omitted to be inquired by the principal jury doth not go to the point in issue or necessary consequence thereof, but is merely collateral, as the four usual inquiries on a quare impedit; there such matter may be supplied by a writ of inquiry, without any damage to the party; because if the same had been inquired of by the principal jury, it would have been, as to those particulars, no more than an inquest of office, upon which an attaind would not lie. Carth. 362.

Thus, where the parties being at issue in assumpsit, a demurrer was joined upon the evidence, and the jury discharged, without assessing the damages, and afterwards judgment was given for the plaintiff, and a writ of inquiry of damages awarded, the court held that though the same jury might have assessed the damages conditionally, yet it may be as well done by a writ of inquiry of damages when the demurrer is determined; and the most usual course is when there is a demurrer upon evidence, to discharge the jury without further inquiry. Cro. Car. 143.

So in trespass or replevin against overseers of the poor, acting virtute officii, if the plaintiff be nonsuit, or have a verdict against him, and the jury are discharged, without inquiring of the treble damages, pursuant to the 43 Eliz. c. 2. § 19, the defect may be supplied by a writ of inquiry, because such inquiry is no more than an inquest of office. In such case, as a ground for awarding a writ of inquiry, it is necessary to enter a suggestion upon the roll that the defendants were overseers of the poor, and that the action was brought against them for something done by virtue of their office. Tidd's Prac.

And lastly, where the jury, on a trial at nisi prius, or before the sheriff, under the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42, or at bar, act as an inquest, as where they are to assess contingent damages on a demurrer, or where they are to assess damages on a judgment by default as to some of the counts of the declaration (Barnes, 228,) the omission of the jury to assess the damages, may afterwards, upon application to the court, be supplied by a writ of inquiry; and the same in all other cases where an attain would not lie. 2 Wils. 367; Hard. 295.

2. Before whom executed.—The writ of inquiry may be executed, on due notice, before the sheriff or his deputy; or by leave of the court under special circumstances, before the chief justice or a judge of assize, as an assistant to the sheriff. And where the writ of inquiry is executed before the chief justice or a judge of assize, it is usual to move the court for the sheriff to return a good jury. But unless some matter of law is likely to arise in the course of the inquiry, the court will not give leave to have it executed before a judge, merely on account of the importance of the facts. Tidd's Prac.

3. Notice of executing the inquiry.—The notice of inquiry should be in writing; and if the defendant have appeared, and his attorney be known, it should be delivered to such attorney; but if the defendant have not appeared, or his attorney be unknown, the notice should be delivered to the defendant himself, or left at his last place of abode.

By the rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. r. 57, notice of trial and inquiry shall be given in town; but countermand of notice of trial or inquiry may be given either in town or country, unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge. See 3 East, 568.

If the venue be laid in London or Middlesex, and the defendant live within forty computed miles from London, there must be eight days' notice of inquiry, exclusive of the day it is given; which notice is also sufficient in country causes; for the 14 Geo. 2. c. 17. § 4, which requires ten days' notice of trial at the assizes, does not extend to notices of inquiry. But where the venue is laid in London or Middlesex, and the defendant lives above forty computed miles from London, there must be fourteen days' notice of inquiry. And Sunday is to be accounted a day in these notices, unless it be the day on which the notice is given. Short notice of inquiry is the same as short notice of trial; and where a term's notice of trial is required, there must, at the same distance of time, be the like notice of inquiry. Tidd's Pract. See Trial.

It is usual to give the notice on a separate piece of paper; but by the rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. r. 59, in all cases where the plaintiff, in pleading, concludes to the country, the plaintiff's attorney may give notice of trial at the time of delivering his replication or other subsequent pleading.

Where the inquiry is to be executed before the chief justice or a judge of assize, the notice should be given for the sittings or assizes generally; but otherwise the notice should express the particular time and place of executing it. A writ of inquiry may be executed, in point of time, on the day it is returnable, but not on a Sunday; and where the notice was to execute it by ten o'clock, the court set it aside for uncertainty. The usual way is to give notice that the inquiry will be executed between two certain hours, as between ten and twelve o'clock in the forenoon, or between four and six in the afternoon, of a particular day, on or before the return of the writ. On a notice of inquiry so given, the party is not tied down to the precise time fixed by the notice; for the sheriff may have prior business, which may last beyond it. Tidd's Prac.

Notice of inquiry may be continued or countermanded in like manner as notice of trial. Tidd's Pract.

With regard to the place of executing an inquiry, it must be executed within the county where the action is laid, and the notice should be given accordingly.

But by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 22, the court or judge may in a local action order the inquiry to be executed in another county than that in which the venue is laid.

How executed.—In London or Middlesex the writ must be left at the sheriff's office the day before the time appointed for its execution. And if either party propose to attend by counsel, he should give notice thereof to his adversary, or he will not be allowed for it in costs. The execution of the writ may be adjourned by the sheriff after it is entered upon. And if the plaintiff do not proceed to execute the inquiry according to notice, or countermand in time, the defendant, on an affidavit of attendance and necessary expenses, shall have his costs, to be taxed by the master. Tidd's Prac.

All that the plaintiff has to prove, or the defendant is allowed to controvert, is the amount of the damages; 1 B. & P. 365; for letting judgment go by default is an admission of the cause of action; and therefore where the action is founded on a contract, the defendant cannot give in evidence, on a writ of inquiry, that it was fraudulent. So in an action on a promissory note or bill of exchange, the note or bill need not be proved, though it must be produced before the jury, in order to see whether any money appears to have been paid upon it. And where an action was brought on a policy of assurance on a foreign ship, wherein there was a stipulation that the policy should be deemed sufficient proof of interest, the plaintiff, on the writ of inquiry, was only bound to prove the defendant's subscription to the policy, without giving any evidence of interest. Tidd's Prac.

Formerly, on the return of the inquiry, the plaintiff must have given a rule for judgment with the clerk of the rules, which expired in four days; but now by the rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. r. 57, such rule for judgment is unnecessary, and without it judgment may be signed after the expiration of four days from the return of the inquiry; in the mean time the defendant may move to set aside the inquisition for want of due notice, or on account of an objection to the jury, or mode of returning them, as that some of the jury were debtors, taken out of prison for the purpose of attending, or that they were returned by the plaintiff's attorney; or for excessive damages.

The sheriff or other officer before whom the writ was executed may likewise, under the 1 Wm. 4. c. 7. § 1, certify under his hand, upon such writ, that judgment ought not to be signed until the defendant shall have had an opportunity of applying to the court to set aside the execution of the writ, or one of the judges shall think fit to order the judgment to be stayed until a day to be named in such order.

The plaintiff, in like manner, may move to set aside the inquisition when it is obvious the damages are too small, except in vindictive, hard, or trifling actions. On the expiration of the rule for judgment, the sheriff, being called upon for his return, will deliver it, with the inquisition, to the plaintiff's attorney, who gets the inquisition stamped, and taxes his costs thereon with the master. Tidd's Prac.

The want of a writ of inquiry is aided by the Statute of Jeofails. And where a writ of inquiry had been many years executed, and costs taxed upon it, but no final judgment entered up, there being occasion to prove the debt in Chancery, and the writ of inquiry being lost, a rule was made for a new writ of inquiry and inquisition, according to the sheriff's notes, and that the master should indorse the costs, which by the commitment-book appeared to have been taxed. Tidd's Prac. and the authorities there cited.

WRIT OF REBELLION. A writ out of Chancery or Exchequer, against a person in contempt, for not appearing in those courts, &c. See Commission of Rebellion.

WRIT OF RIGHT.

BREVE DE RECTO.] The great and final remedy for him that was injured by ouster, or privation of his freehold. See Recto, Right.

By the several possessory remedies formerly given by our law, (see Entry, Assize.) the right of possession might be restored to him that was unjustly deprived thereof. But the right of possession (though it carried with it a strong presumption) was not always conclusive evidence of the right of property, which might still have subsisted in another man: for as one man might have the possession, and another the right of possession, which was recovered by possessory actions; so one man might have had the right of possession, and thus not be liable to eviction by any possessory action, and another might have had the right of property, which could not be otherwise asserted than by the great and final remedy of a writ of right, or such correspondent writs as were in the nature of a writ of right. 3 Comm. c. 10. See Title.

This happened principally in four cases: 1. Upon discontinuance by the alienation of tenant in tail, whereby he, who had the right of possession, had transferred it to the alienee; and therefore his issue, or those in remainder or reversion, were not allowed to recover by virtue of that possession, which the tenant had so voluntarily transferred. 2, 3. In case of judgment given against either party, whether by his own default, or upon trial of the merits, in any possessory action: for such judgment, if obtained by him who had not the true ownership, was held to be a species of forfeiture; which however bound the right of possession, and suffered it not to be ever again disputed, unless the right of property were also proved. 4. In case the demandant, who claimed the right, was barred from these possessory actions by length of time and the statute of limitations. See Limitation of Actions. In these four cases the law applied the remedial instrument of either the writ of right itself, or such other writs as were said to be of the same nature.

1. And, first, upon an alienation by tenant in tail, whereby the estate-tail was discontinued, and the remainder or reversion is, by failure of the particular estate, displaced, and turned into a mere right, the remedy was by action of formedon, (secundum formam doni.) which was in the nature of a writ of right, and was the highest action that tenant in tail could have. See Formedon.

2. In the second case; if the owners of a particular estate, as for life, in dower, by the curtesy, or in fee-tail, were barred of the right of possession by a recovery had against them, through their default or non-appearance in a possessory action, they were absolutely without any remedy at the common law, as a writ of right did not lie for any but such as claim to be tenants of the fee-simple. Therefore the Westm. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 4. gave a new writ for such persons, after their lands have been so recovered against them by default, called a quod ei deforceat; which, though not strictly a writ of right, so far partook of the nature of one, as that it would restore the right to him who had been thus unwarily deforced by his own default. F. N. B. 155. But in case the recovery were not had by his own default, but upon defence in the inferior possessory action, this still remained final with regard to these particular estates, as at the common law: and hence it was that a common recovery (on a writ of entry in the post) had, not by default of the tenant himself, but (after his defence made and voucher of a third person to warranty) by default of such vouchee, was, until recently, the usual bar to cut off an estate-tail. See Recovery.

3, 4. Thirdly, in case the right of possession were barred by a recovery upon the merits in a possessory action, or, lastly, by the statute of limitations, a claimant in fee-simple might have had a mere writ of right; which is in its nature the highest writ in the law, and was only of an estate in fee-simple, and not for him who had a less estate. F. N. B. 1. This writ lay concurrently with all other real actions, in which an estate of fee-simple might be recovered; and it also lay after them, being as it were an appeal to the mere right, when judgment had been had as to the possession in an inferior possessory action. F. N. B. 155. But though a writ of right might be brought where the demandant was entitled to the possession, yet it rarely was advisable to be brought in such cases; as a more expeditious and easy remedy is had, without meddling with the property, by proving the demandant's own, or his ancestor's possession, and their illegal ouster, in one of the possessory actions. But, in case the right of possession were lost by length of time, or by judgment against the true owner in one of these inferior suits, there was no other choice; this was then the only remedy that could be had; and it was of so forcible a nature, that it overcame all obstacles, and cleared all objections, that might have arisen to cloud and obscure the title. And, after issue once joined in a writ of right, the judgment was absolutely final; so that a recovery had in this action might be pleaded in bar of any other claim or demand. F. N. B. 6; 1 Inst. 158.

The pure, proper, or mere writ of right, lay only, we have seen, to recover lands in fee-simple, unjustly withheld from the true proprietor. But there were also some other writs which were said to be in the nature of a writ of right, because their process and proceedings did mostly (though not entirely) agree with the writ of right; but in some of them the fee-simple was not demanded; and in others not land, but some incorporeal hereditament. Nor was the mere writ of right alone, or always, applicable to every case of a claim of lands in fee-simple: for if the lord's tenant in fee-simple died without heir, whereby an escheat accrued, the lord should have had a writ of escheat, which was in the nature of a writ of right. Booth, 135; F. N. B. 9. And if one of two or more coparceners deforced the other, by usurping the sole possession, the party aggrieved should have had a writ of right, de rationabili parte; which might be grounded on the seisin of the ancestor at any time during his life; whereas in a nuper obiit, (which was a possessory remedy,) he must have been seised at the time of his death. F. N. B. 9.

The general writ of right ought to have been first brought in the court-baron of the lord of whom the lands were holden; and then it was open, or patent: but if he held no court, or had waived his right, remisit curiam suam, it might be brought in the king's courts by writ of præcipe originally; and then it was a writ of right close, being directed to the sheriff and not to the lord. F. N. B. 2; Finch. L. 313; Booth, 91. Also, when one of the king's immediate tenants in capite was deforced, his writ of right is called a writ of præcipe in capite; (the improper use of which, as well as of the former præcipe, quod dominus et must. c. 11, so as to oust the lord of his jurisdiction, was restrained by Magna Carta, c. 24.) and, being directed to the sheriff and originally returnable in the king's court, was also a writ of right close. F. N. B. 7.

There was likewise a little writ of right close, secundum consuetudinem manerii, which lay for the king's tenants in ancient demesne, and others of a similar nature, to try the right of their lands and tenements in the court of the lord exclusively.

But the writ of right patent itself might also at any time be removed into the county court by writ of tolt, and from thence into the king's courts by writ of pone or recordari facias, at the suggestion of either party that there was a delay or defect of justice. 3 Comm. c. 10.

In the progress of this action, the demandant must have alleged some seisin of the lands and tenements in himself, or else in some person under whom he claimed, and then derived the right from the person so seised to himself; to which the tenant might have answered by denying the demandant's right, and averring that he had more right to hold the lands than the demandant had to demand them: and, this right of the tenant being shown, it then put the demandant upon the proof of his title: in which, if he failed, or if the tenant had shown a better, the demandant and his heirs were perpetually barred of their claim; but if he could make it appear that his right was superior to the tenant's, he recovered the land against the tenant and his heirs for ever. But even this writ of right, however superior to any other, could not be sued out at any distance of time. For by the ancient law no seisin could be alleged by the demandant, but from the time of Henry I.; by the statute of Merton, 20 Hen. 3. c. 8. from the time of Hen. 2; by the statute of Westm. 1, 3 Edw. 1. c. 39. from the time of Richard I.; and at length by statute 32 Hen. 8. c. 2. seisin in a writ of right should be within sixty years. So that adverse possession of lands of fee-simple uninterruptedly for threescore years was a sufficient title against all the world, and could not be impeached by any dormant claim whatsoever. 3 Comm. c. 10.

With a view to shorten the time within which suits for the recovery of land may be brought, and for simplifying the remedies for trying the rights thereto, by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27. § 36. writs of right, except the writ of right of dower, have been abolished as well as all other real and mixed actions, with the exception of the writ of dower unde nihil habet, quare impedit, and ejectment, and the latter will hereafter be the usual action in which the title to lands may be contested. See Limitation of Actions, II. 1; and further, Possession, Title.

YEAR, annus.] The time wherein the sun goes round his compass through the twelve signs, viz. three-hundred and sixty-five days, and about six hours. A year is twelve months, as divided by Julius Cæsar.

The church formerly begun the year on the first day of January, called New-year's-day; but the civil account, not till March the 25th. It appears by ancient grants and charters, that our ancestors began the year at Christmas, which was observed here till the time of William I., commonly called the Conqueror; but afterwards for some time the year of our

YEAR.

Lord was seldom mentioned in grants, only the year of the reign of the king. Mon. Ang. i. 62.

At the Reformation the commencement of the year was fixed to the 25th of March, by the following rubric added to the calendar, immediately after the table of moveable feasts for forty years: "Note, that the Supputation of the year of our lord in the church of England beginneth the 25th day of March, the day supposed to be the first day on which the world was created, and the day when Christ was conceived of the Virgin Mary." [The 25th of March is distinguished as the feast of the Annunciation.] This continued till soon after the Restoration of Charles II., when it was thought proper to retain this order and drop the reason for it, and in this shape it was continued down to the parliamentary correction of the calendar after mentioned.

The civil government seems never to have used any other date than that of the king's reign, till after the time of Charles I., not even in common deeds. During the usurpation of Cromwell the years of our Lord seem to have been introduced, and continued after the Restoration of Charles II. for convenience without the interposition of legal authority.

Several deeds of early date have the year of the Lord inserted, not in the body of the deed, but in the middle of the initial letter.

The Scotch, from time immemorial, dated from March 25 as the first day of the year, until 27 November, 1599, when the following entry was made in the books of the privy council there, "On Monday proclamation made by the king's warrant, ordaining the first of January, in time coming, to be the beginning of the new year."

There being a difference in the computation of time in these kingdoms, and on some parts of the continent, of eleven days; and frequent uncertainties having arisen from the different times of commencing the year above-mentioned, (which introduced the mode of dating 1743, for days between the first of January and twenty-fifth of March,) all these inconveniences were remedied by 24 Geo. 2. c. 23. which enacts, that the first day of January next following the last day of December, 1751, shall be the first day of the year, 1752. And that the first day of January next after the first day of January, 1752, shall be the first day of the year, 1753. And so on, the first day of January in every year shall be the first day of the year. And that after the first day of January, 1752, the several days of each month shall go on in the same order; and the feast of Easter, and other moveable feasts thereon depending, shall be ascertained according to the same method they then were, until the second day of September, 1752; and that the natural day next following the said second day of September shall be reckoned the fourteenth day of September, omitting, for that time only, the eleven intermediate days. And that the several natural days which shall succeed the said fourteenth day of September shall be reckoned in numerical order according to the order and succession of days now used in the present calendar. All writings, &c. after the first of January, 1752, to be dated according to the new style.

After 2d September, 1752, the terms of Hilary and Michaelmas, and all courts were to be held on the same nominal days and times they then were.

The several years 1800, 1900, 2100, 2200, 2300, and any other hundredth year, (except every four hundredth year of which the year 2000 shall be the first,) shall not be deemed Bissextile or Leap Years, but common years, to consist only of 365 days. The years 2000, 2400, 2800, and every other four hundredth year, from the year 2000 inclusive, and all other years, which are now esteemed Bissextile or Leap Years, shall for the future be esteemed Bissextile or Leap Years consisting of 366 days. A calendar, and certain tables and rules for the fixing the true time of the celebration of the feast of Easter, and the finding of the times of the full moons on which the same depends, are annexed to this act, which are to be prefixed to all future editions of the Common Prayer-Book. Courts of session and exchequer in Scotland, and markets, fairs, and marts, to be held upon the same natural days they should have been holden on, if this act had not been made. The natural days and times for the opening and inclosing of commons of pasture, were not altered by this act.

Where the opening or shutting of commons is regulated by any moveable feasts, they shall be computed according to the new calendar. 25 Geo. 2. c. 30. § 2.

The natural days and times of payment of rents, annuities, sums of money or interest, or of the delivery of goods, commencement or expiration of leases, &c. or of attaining the age of twenty-one years, &c. not altered by the 24 Geo. 2. c. 23.

The mode of computation, introduced into England by the above act, is called the new style, to distinguish it from the former called the old style, which still continues to prevail in many places; and the new style had been used by other nations long previous to its adoption by the English.

The Old Style now prevails in Muscovy, Denmark, Holstein, Hamburg, Utrecht, Guelders, East Friesland, Geneva, and in all the protestant principalities in Germany, and the cantons of Switzerland: in this style the date is now twelve days earlier than the new style, owing to the circumstances of the new style having omitted the intercalary day in the month of February in the year 1800.

The New Style is used in all the dominions subject to Great Britain; in America, in Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Leyden, Haerlem, Middleburg, Ghent, Brussels, Brabant, and in all the Netherlands, except the places before-mentioned: also in France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Hungary, Poland, and in all the popish principalities of Germany and cantons of Switzerland. See Month, Time.

YEAR AND DAY, annus et dies.] A time that determines a right, or works a prescription in many cases by law; as, in case of an estray, if the owner challenge it not within that time, it belongs to the lord. See Estray.

The owners of wreck must likewise claim within a year and a day, otherwise the king or his grantees become entitled to it. See Wreck.

A person wounded must die within a year and day, in order to make the offender guilty of murder, &c. 3 Inst. 53; 6 Rep. 107.

A year and a day was given to prosecute appeals of murder, (now abolished by 59 Geo. 3. c. 46.) and was also allowed for actions after entry, or claim, to avoid a fine, now likewise abolished. See Claim, Entry, Fine.

YEAR, DAY, AND WASTE, annus, dies, et vastum.] Formerly a part of the king's prerogative, whereby he had the profits of lands and tenements for a year and a day of those that were attainted of petit treason or felony, whosoever was lord of the manor whereto the lands or tenements belonged, and [or] the king might cause waste to be made on the tenements, by destroying the houses, ploughing up the meadows and pastures, rooting up the woods, &c. except the lord of the fee agreed with him for the redemption of such waste; afterwards restoring it to the lord of the fee. Staud. Prærog. 44. See further, Attainder, Escheat, Forfeiture, II. 1., Tenures.

"We will not hold the lands of them that be convict of felony but one year and one day, and then those lands shall be delivered to the lords of the fee." Magna Charta, 9 Hen. 3. c. 22. This chapter expresses that which belonged to the king, viz. the year and the day, and omits the waste, as not belonging to him; and this explained by our ancient books with an uniform consent. 2 Inst. 36. cites Bracton, lib. 3. fol. 129, and 137; and Britton, c. 5. fol. 14; and Fleta, l. 1. c. 28; and Mirror, c. 5. § 2. The Mirror, speaking of this chapter, saith, Le point des terres aux felons tener per un an, est du susie, car per la ou le roy ne duist aver que le gast de droit, ou l'an in nosme de fine pur sauver le fief de l'estripment preignont les ministers le roy ambideux. Upon all which it appears, that the king originally was to have no benefit in this case upon the attainder of felony, where the free land was holden of a subject, but only in detestation of the crime; ut poena ad paucos, metus ad omnes perveniat; to prostrate the houses, to extirpate the gardens, to eradicate his wood, and to plow up the meadows of the felon: for saving whereof, and pro bono publico, the lords, of whom the lands were holden, were contented to yield the lands to the king for a year and a day; and therefore not only the waste was justly omitted out of this chapter of Magna Charta, but thereby it was enacted, that after the year and day the land should be rendered to the lord of the fee, after which no waste could be done. 2 Inst. 37.

And where the treatise of Prærogativa Regis, made in 17 Edw. 2, says, Et postquam Dominus Rex habuit annum, diem, et vastum, tunc reddatur tenementum illud capitali domino feodi illius, nisi prius faciat finem pro anno, die, et vasto; this is so to be expounded, that forasmuch as it appears in the said old books, that the officers and ministers did demand both for the waste and for year and day, that came in lieu thereof, therefore this treatise named both, not that both were due, but that a reasonable fine might be paid for all that which the king might lawfully claim. But if this act of 17 Edw. 2. were against this branch of Magna Charta, then it was repealed by the act of 42 Edw. 2. c. 1; 2 Inst. 37; 2 Hawk. P. C. cap. 49. § 8.

Hereby (says Coke) it appears how necessary the reading ancient authors is for understanding of ancient statutes. And out of these old books you may observe, that when any thing is given to the king in lieu or satisfaction of any ancient right of his crown, when once he is in possession of the new recompence, and the same in charge, his officers and ministers will, many times, demand the old also, which may turn to great prejudice, if it be not duly and discreetly prevented. 2 Inst. 37.

If there were lord, mesne, and tenant, and the mesne was attainted of felony, the lord paramount should have the mesnalty presently; for this prerogative belonging to the king extended only to the land, which might be wasted, in lieu whereof the year and day was granted. 2 Inst. 37. And this is to be understood when a tenant in fee simple was attainted; for when tenant in tail, or tenant for life, was attainted, there the king should have the profits of the lands during the life of tenant in tail, or of the tenant for life. 2 Inst. 37.

That be Convict.] Here convict, in a large sense, was taken for attincti: for the nature and true sense of both these words, see the first part of the Institutes; and likewise for this word felony there. 2 Inst. 37; and see Attainder.

Of Felony.] Must be understood of all manner of felonies punished by death, and not of petit larceny, (now abolished,) which notwithstanding was felony. 2 Inst. 38. If lord and tenant were, and the tenant was attainted of felony, and the king has annum, diem et vastum; yet if the lord entered without due process, and the writ sued to the escheator, the land should be re-seised, and he should answer for the mesne issues and profits. Br. Re-Seiser, pl. 36, cites Edw. 2; and Fitz. Traverse, 48.

Tenant by copy of court roll by the verge in ancient demesne committed felony, and was attainted of it, and annum, diem, et vastum, was awarded for the king; and the reason seems to be, inasmuch as frank-tenants in ancient demesne have no other evidence but copies of court-rolls; for otherwise it seems to be of a mere copyholder out of ancient demesne for other frank-tenement. Br. Tenant per Copie, &c. cites 3 Edw. 3. See Copyhold, Forfeiture.

A man was outlawed of felony, and aliened his land to J. N., on which scire facias issued against him, who came and would have traversed the felony: and the court doubted if he might traverse it, by reason that he is a stranger to the record; but per Pigot, by 7 Edw. 4. c. 2, he cannot traverse it in case of felony, being a stranger to the record; contra in case of trespass; on which it was prayed for the king, that year, day, and waste, be adjudged for the king immediately, and so it was immediately from that day till a year and a day next after: quod nota. Quære, if the king might take the year and the day at what time he pleased; it seems he could not. Br. Corone, pl. 204, cites 49 Ass. 2. See Inquest of Office.

The king should have the first year and day and waste of the land of him who was attainted of felony, which came after the attainder, and whosoever took the profits that year should answer the profits to the king; per Fitzherbert. But it seems that this is to be understood after office found, or that the inquest which attainted him found also what lands he had at the time of the felony committed, or after. And in the case above, of 49 Ass. 2, the outlawry of felony was 18 Edw. 3, and writ issued to the coroners to inquire of his goods, lands, and tenements, 48 Edw. 3; which returned that he had land, and aliened to J. N. after the outlawry; and upon this scire facias issued against J. N., who came and would have traversed the felony; and the year and day was awarded to the king with the waste. And so it seems that the king could not take it, unless after office, which was thirty years after, as there. But quære, if upon the office found, he who received the profits the first year after the felony should not be charged? It seems he should per Fitzh. above. Quære the experience thereof in B. R.? Br. Corone, pl. 207, cites F. N. B. fol. 144. See Inquest of Office.

This prerogative of the king is now abolished by the 54 Geo. 3. c. 145, which enacts that no future attainder for felony, except in cases of high treason, or murder, shall extend to the dismembering of any heir, or to the prejudice of the right or title of any person, other than the right or title of the offender during his life.

YEAR-BOOKS. Reports, in a regular series, from the reign of King Edward II., inclusive, to the time of Henry VIII., which were taken by the prothonotaries, or chief scribes of the court, at the expense of the crown, and published annually; whence they are known under the denomination of the Year-Books. See Law-Books.

YEARS, Estates for. See Lease.

YEMAN, or YEOMAN, or YOMAN. A derivative of the Saxon, geman, i. e. communis.

These Camden in his Britannia placeth next in order to gentlemen, calling them ingenuos; whose opinion the statute affirms, anno 6 Rich. 2. c. 4. and 20 Rich. 2. c. 2. Sir Thomas Smith, in his Republ. Anglorum, l. 1. c. 23. calls him a yeoman, whom our law calls legalem hominem, which (says he) is in the English a freeborn man, that may dispense of his own freeland in yearly revenues to the sum of forty shillings sterling. Verstegan, in his Restitution of decayed Intelligence, c. 10, writes, that gemen among the ancient Teutonic, and gemein among the modern, signifies as much as common; and the letter g being turned into y, is written yemen, which also signifies a commoner. See Procedure.

Yeoman also signifies an officer of the king's house, in the middle place between the serjeant and the groom; as yeoman of the chandry, yeoman of the scullery, stat. Antiq. 33 Hen. 8. c. 13. Yeoman of the crown, stat. Antiq. 3 Eliz. 4. 5. The word youngmen is used for yeomen, in the 33 Hen. 8. c. 10. Cowell.

YEME. An ancient corruption of Hieme, Winter. Cowell.

YEOMEN OF THE KING'S GUARD. were first established by King Henry VIII. in 1485. See Soldiers.

YEOMANRY. See Volunteers.

YEONOMUS, œconomus; an advocate, patron, or defender. Vit. Abbat. S. Abbatis.

YEVEN, or YEOVEN. Given; dated. Cowell.

YEW. Said to be derived from the Greek ἔνω, to hurt, probably because, before the invention of guns, our ancestors made bows with this wood, with which they annoyed their enemies; and therefore they took care to plant the trees in the church-yards, where they might be often seen and preserved by the people. Minsheu.

YIELDING AND PAYING, reddendo and solvendo. Comes from the Saxon geldan and gildan; and in Domesday, gildare is frequently used for solvere, reddere, the Saxon g being often turned into y. See Deed.

YINGMAN. Mentioned in the laws of King Hen. 1. c. 15. Spelman thinks this may be a mistake for Englishman, or, as we now say, Englishman: but perhaps the yingmen were rather youngmen, printed for yeoman and yemen, in 33 Hen. 8. c. 10.

YOKELET, Sax. joculet.] A little farm, &c. in some parts of Kent, so called from its requiring but a yoke of oxen to till it. Sax. Dict.

YORK, Custom of. See Executor, V. 9.

YORK-BUILDINGS COMPANY. A corporation or company erected by statute for raising Thames water in York-Buildings, and dissolved by the 10 Geo. 4. c. xxviii. a private act.

YULE. In the north of England, the country people call the feast of the nativity of our Lord by the name of Yule, which is the proper Scotch word for Christmas; and the sports used at Christmas, here called Christmas Gambols, in Scotland they term Yule Games. The 1 Geo. 1. c. 8. was made for the repeal of an act, passed in the parliament of Scotland, intituled "An Act for discharging the Yule Vacance." See Gale.

ZANT-KILLOW. A measure containing six English bushels.

ZETA. A room kept warm like a stove; a withdrawing chamber with pipes conveyed along in the walls, to receive from below either the cool air in the summer, or the heat of fire, &c. in winter: it is called by our English historians a
